IN wholly different vein from the author's last novel, "The Right of Way," comes this exquisite romance, delightful in conception, swift and compelling in interest, and written in the finished style of this great novelist. The story recounts the love of two Huguenot refugees and their fugitive life on the island of Jersey in the British Channel. Later the scene changes to England, where exciting intrigue and startling situations in the palace of Queen Elizabeth result in repeated dangers for the faithful lovers, but they finally escape the hazardous favor of the great queen and are united. The scenes on the island of Jersey are of idyllic freshness and beauty, and in the Seigneur of Rozel, the lord of the island, the author has produced a character of delightful humor and braggadocio. It is a thoroughly rounded, satisfying story, written with brilliancy and charm of style.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

The Most Schlitz
Healthy Nations
Drink the Most Beer.

The Germans, Norwegians and Swedes are types of healthy and vigorous people.

Nervousness, dyspepsia and all the results of them, are little known in their countries. And beer is the national beverage. From childhood to age almost every soul drinks it.

There's a lesson in that fact. Malt and hops are nerve foods and tonics. The slight percentage of alcohol is an aid to digestion.

And the habit of beer drinking supplies the body with fluid to flush the system of waste. The lack of that fluid is the main cause of nervous disorders.

Your doctor will tell you that pure beer—Schlitz beer—is good for you. Ask for the brewery bottling.

The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous

Imported by C. F. Brugg

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER & BROTHERS

NEW YORK

Locomobile GASOLENE CARS

Every user of Locomobile will testify to the fact that it is Easily the Best Built Car in America.

PRICES BEGIN AT.

THE LOCOMOBILE CO., Bridgeport, Conn.
BRANCHES: NEW YORK, Boston, and all Major Cities. Write for New York Branch to Locomobile, 1208 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.

In Search of the Unknown

By
ROBERT W. CHAMBERS
Author of "The Maids of Paradise," "Cardigan," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

FIFTY-TWO PAGES

are required just to describe a lot of interesting booklets of travel, any one of which can be obtained by sending a few cents in stamps. These fifty-two pages make the

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF THE NEW YORK CENTRAL'S "FOUR-TRACK SERIES"

Embracing 37 Books of Travel

A copy of this catalogue will be sent free, post-paid to any address on receipt of a two-cent stamp, by

GEORGE H. DANIELS,
Gen'l Passenger Agent,
Grand Central Station, New York.

THE GIVERS

BY
MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

HARPER'S WEEKLY

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLVIII.

New York, Saturday, September 24, 1904

NO. 242

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved.

DEFIANCE!

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2493

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Cuba, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
LONDON: 43 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO HUMBLE!

THEODORE ROOSEVELT SAYS:

We are content to rest our case before the American people upon the fact that in adherence to a lofty ideal we have added proved governmental efficiency. Therefore, our promises may surely be trusted as regards any issue that is now before the people; and we may equally be trusted to deal with any problem which may hereafter arise.

Our actions speak even louder than our words for the faith that is in us. We base our appeal upon what we have done and are doing, upon our record of administration and legislation during the last seven years, in which we have had complete control of the government. We intend in the future to carry on the government in the same way that we have carried it on in the past.

Self-satisfaction! Self-confidence! Self-certainty! Take us or leave us! That sums it up.

We discuss Mr. ROOSEVELT's letter of acceptance at length in other columns. En passant, we may say that it is an unprecedentedly masterful and extraordinarily able document. In both thought and expression it beams with the natural vigor and nervous energy of its author. No opportunity is missed to keep the enemy on the run. Some subtleties are shown in the method of stating the criticisms of the opposition, but such is not boldly, confidently, aggressively. There is not so much as a hint of the possibility of the present administration ever having been or ever going to be in the wrong. Mr. ROOSEVELT is absolutely wholly sincere in regarding it as ideal. But, he insistently urges upon his rival, if you will persist in finding faults, in detecting errors, in seeing danger in present policies, what remedial changes do you propose? Speak up, in detail, and we will join issue; otherwise, by holding your peace, confess your impotence. It is a direct, personal challenge to the Judge to come into the open and fight it out on every point he cares to raise. We shall know in a day or two how it is met.

One fact is certain. The letter of acceptance shows that in so far as pertains to convincing him that he is unworthy of election, the Democrats' two months' work has gone for nothing. He still obstinately claims to be the worthy leader of a worthy party, and if either he or his party have done anything they ought to be sorry for he is glad they did it. He is not very successful as an apologist, but perhaps he didn't try.

For a broad, handsome claim it is hard to beat the following: "There is not a policy, foreign or domestic, which are now carrying out, which it would not be disastrous to reverse or abandon." He proceeds to declare that if the Democrats should come in and not reverse the Republican policies they would show themselves to be impostors and unfit to be trusted; but if they should reverse any of the said policies, "by just so much would the nation as a whole be damaged."

Apparently there is nothing left for the Democrats, in case of success, but to abandon the course of government and climb a tree. The President speaks with characteristic comprehensiveness, but the case of the Democrats is not so desperate as he makes out. A new administration begins where the last administration left off. It has to take things as it finds them, and must often carry out policies which it has criticized. Moreover, both among the ROOSEVELT voters and the PARKER voters there will be many men of many minds. There is hardly a policy among those which the President commends as indispensable which a good many Republicans do not criticize and a good many Democrats do not approve. And, further, it is not alone what the Republican President has done that influences voters, but what they think he is liable to do when he gets his second wind.

The journalists in charge of the Democratic canvass make characteristic comments. "Like an impetuous mountain stream, the current of his utterance moves rapidly, dashing over, but not dislodging, the obstacles it encounters," is the World's picturesque description. And then it proceeds to gasp at the daring of the man in refusing to "bend to the rising storm of popular demand for tariff reform" and in "ranging himself with the stalwart enemies of all who would seek to lower taxation and relieve manufacturers and consumers generally of the barbarous enormities and exasperations of a protection which has outgrown every decent claim and has overriden the commercial rights and liberties of the people." His pronouncement of satisfaction with and unhesitating perpetuation of his foreign policy is taken as an indication of the kind of "Serbian bog" of expenditures and taxation the country will be plunged into "if his ambition and aspirations are gratified."

Careful not to encroach upon Mr. PUTNEY's exclusive personal privilege of injecting thunder and lightning into "open letters"—another of which is about due—the World sticks closely to prosaic governmental expenditures, and the candidate's treatment of them. Between ourselves, President ROOSEVELT, when dealing with United States currency, has not what might be called a saving disposition. He likes to do far things in a big way, and distinctly does not like to be bothered about expenses. Why is KNIGHT he might and probably does occasionally ask. But he writes about them in his letter after a manner not wholly free from grudge. It is true, as he says, that there have been no very great changes in the cost of running the government since the war with Spain, but, as the World pertinently inquires, why render the comparison to that brief period? Of course, expenditures increased enormously during the war; and were sure to continue on a higher level for a year or two, but not necessarily forever. The fact of no decrease is as significant as a big increase would be under normal conditions. A very proper comparison is that made by the World with 1897, thus:

$ expenditure for	1897.	1904.
Civil and miscellaneous.....	$80,000,000	$122,000,000
War Department.....	30,000,000	315,000,000
Navy Department.....	31,000,000	102,000,000

Here, in three items, is an increase of $187,000,000 in ordinary running expenses. It is a lot of money, and the question is, if we keep on adding to expenditures at that rate, may we not bring up in the poorhouse? Probably not. The country is rich and the people are doing well. Besides, some day they will get used and turn out the men who are piling up their taxes. Possibly Mr. ROOSEVELT thinks that, if he gets South America into good running order, he will have done his share, and his successors can struggle with the popular resentment that will then have been aroused against paying the piper.

Anyhow, it is interesting to see how, after making a few sly digs at figures—just enough to let you know that he knows they are there—he takes the flat position that present expenditures are necessary and that reduction would be unwise. Stand up, Judge Knicker! You declare for retrenchment. Where will you retrench? Will you promise to cut down the rural free delivery, stop irrigating the plains, and lose the farmers' votes? If so, the issue is joined. Will you "dismanle our coast fortifications?" Will you "cut down the navy" (horrible thought!) or "the Alaskan telegraph system" (frightful)? Or, now look sharp, will you promise to revoke our imperial order to the effect that each and every one of our faithful soldiers shall have a pension when—at sixty-two—he becomes incapacitated for further strenuous effort with his hands! Perhaps you will raise the limit to twenty or seventy-two! But what will you do, anyway? Maybe, you don't care for the votes of veterans. That is the line of argument. It is not so easy to meet while carrying water on both shoulders, in your hands and on your head. But the fact remains that, second only, as no effective issue, to the personal proclivities of the Republican candidate, is governmental extravagance. We are willing to pay well for what we get, and make allowance for an occasional fling on the part of Presidents who want to break some sort of record, but this continuing to pay more and more pensions year after year—now forty since the war ended—is getting to be mighty tiresome.

The Evening Post declares that Mr. ROOSEVELT's letter says in effect to the army: "Elect me . . . and your opportunities to glut your warlike passions will be increased"; and to the navy: "Elect me, and your guns shall be heard on every sea." Shucks! The army has not nearly as much warlike passion per capita as the Post's editorial staff, and the last thing the navy wants is war. Fighting modern war-ships is as disagreeable a job as exists. If Colonel ROOSEVELT offered the navy gun-play in every sea, the navy would come ashore and vote for PRUEMER. The Post should apologize to the service and mix in more homilies with whatever it is taking. Men who know what war is don't like it. American professional soldiers are always for peace until war actually comes. The folks who want war are amateur fighting-men, reformers, cranks, contractors, and some editors and publishers of newspapers.

Mr. ROOSEVELT is quite warranted in lashing the Democratic management for its lack of cohesion and indefiniteness of purpose, but in applying the same to the Democratic party as a whole he makes only a distinction which might or might not be regarded as helpful to his own cause. A party representing the common people and dominated by them necessarily lacks the consistency of well-defined policy possessed by a party guided by a class, by a few, or by one man. It is the difference between democratic government, on the one hand, and oligarchic, or autocratic, government, as the case may be, on the other. All depends on what you want.

We cannot agree with the President when he declares that his actions do and will continue to speak "even louder" than his words. Somehow we cannot get these particular "words" out of our heads:

If a nation shows how to act with decency in industrial and political matters, if it keeps order and pays its obligations, then it need fear no interference from the United States. Brutal wrong-doing or an injustice which results in a general lowering of the law of civilized society may finally require intervention by one civilized nation, and in the Western Hemisphere the United States cannot ignore this duty; but it remains true that our interests and those of our southern neighbors are in reality identical. All that we ask is that they shall govern themselves well and in peace and order and decency.

We should hate to believe that the time will ever come when he or any future President will act accordingly.

Speaking of the Monroe Doctrine the President says:

While upholding the rights of the weaker American republics against foreign aggression the administration has had no opportunity to point out to these republics that those who seek equity should come with clean hands, and that whoever claims liberty as a right must accept the responsibilities that go with the exercise of the right.

Columbia probably decline to give the administration a certificate of efficiency in upholding its rights against foreign aggression, but let that go. Tell us, Great and Good Friend, who constituted your administration a grandfather in the South-American republics, to disclose to them the fine points of equity, to warn them about the responsibilities of those who claim liberty as a right, and to shake the Big Stick at them when they are noisy? Do you think it was MONROE who put all these duties upon you? Not a bit! You and yours invented them. The Monroe Doctrine commits us to a lively interest in the territorial integrity of the South-American countries, not for their sakes, nor because we are fond of them, but because it is inconvenient for us to have Central and South America parcelled out among a lot of European powers, to bring war into this hemisphere every time a bullet sings in Europe. The Monroe Doctrine rests upon enlightened self-interest. We look up with it out of consideration for ourselves. The only sure, reasonable ground for our adherence to it is that it is profitable to us. In so far as you represent it to be a policy of benevolence, with homiletic and pulpitary obligations, you weaken it. Please think less about the responsibilities of those who claim liberty as a right and more about the embarrassments of those who proffer unnecessary loans for their neighbors' good behavior. When you feel that you must lecture those republics about equity and clean hands, go behind the barn and speak low, for once it gets about that you are reaching those folks in ethics we shall have to build a hundred new war-ships.

The political effect of Mr. ROOSEVELT's buoyant and defiant letter is not so quickly apparent as in the case of Judge PRUEMER's innocuous speech. Most people were surprised; some were amused. It was and still is difficult to see why, when his opponents were rifling under a wet blanket and everything was going his way, he should have awakened sleeping distrust. The very danger could not but evoke admiration, but was it wise? Upon second thought, will not a good many conservative citizens regret that the Vermont election convinced the candidate that he was cock-sure of winning anyway and might as well let himself go, incidentally conveying the information to any who might seem at first lukewarm, if not indeed doubtful, in his support that he could get along with or without their assistance? And if so, will the effect be helpful? We doubt it. The fact was apparent that the laborious testimonies of Mr. Root, Secretary Hay, and Secretary Tamm, along with the unprecedented quotation of the President himself, had resulted in a feeling of reassurance in minds which had been disturbed by the prospect of four years more of apprehension. Clearly, Mr. ROOSEVELT now regards this element, whose favorable opinion he certainly seemed to be cultivating, as negligible, else he would not so emphatically convey the information that the change indicated in his speech of acceptance was one of mood and not of heart. Sometimes such a policy wins out; we dare say it will in this case in the end; but for a time, now that the first enthusiasm has begun to wane, we expect to see the pendulum swing back quite a little way.

The expenditures of the nation have been managed in a spirit of economy so far removed from waste as from niggardliness.—PRUEMER ROOSEVELT's letter.

1893-6 (inclusive) under CLEVELAND, $1,442,000,000. 1901-4 (inclusive) under ROOSEVELT, $2,770,000,000. Under the circumstances, Mr. ROOSEVELT's apparent apprehensions of personal disfavor on account of niggardliness do not seem to be well founded.

The President does not seem to recognize the greatness of the change that, by his intervention in the anthracite coal strike, he transcended his constitutional powers, and that such arbitrary assertion of authority, however well meant and salutary in a particular instance, establishes a dangerous precedent. He tries, in the first place, to evade the constitutional question, by intimating that his intervention in that matter was the act, not of the President, but of THOMAS ROOSEVELT, the individual. We scarcely need point out that it was practically impossible for the parties to the anthracite controversy to discriminate between the private individual and the Chief Magistrate, and that it was solely because of his official position that his intervention was effective. Moreover, Mr. ROOSEVELT is stopped from undertaking to draw any such distinction by the fact that he signed the bill appropriating fifty thousand dollars for the expenses of the strike commission appointed by him. Had the commission been appointed by him in his private capacity, by what authority could Congress have used the money of the taxpayers for paying salaries to the commissioners? Mr. ROOSE-VELT seems to think that he has settled the matter by asking whether any wrong was done by his interposition in the coal strike, and shuts his eyes to the fact that, inasmuch as neither the Governor nor the Legislature of Pennsylvania requested him to interfere, he had no constitutional warrant for his interference. The fact that in 1902 the Democratic State convention of New York was persuaded by ex-Governor Hull to commit an act of idiocy by demanding that the national government should take possession of Pennsylvania's anthracite coal fields does not justify Mr. Roosevelt in assuming that there would have been an irretrievable demand for such a lawless and crazy assertion of national ownership, but for the wrenching of the Constitution involved in his own interposition.

It is not clear, either, that Mr. ROOSEVELT appreciates the significance of the objection to Pension Order No. 78, whereby he directed that any veteran of the civil war who should have reached the age of sixty-two should be held presumptively entitled to the pension of six dollars a month, given under the Dependent Pension law to those whose capacity to earn their livelihood by manual labor should have been decreased fifty per cent. Pension Order No. 78 also directed that, by the time the age of seventy should have been reached, the presumption should be that the physical disability was complete. Now the gist of the objection to this order is that Congress alone is constitutionally empowered to determine who shall receive the taxpayers' money under the guise of pensions, and that it had no right to delegate such authority to the Executive. Congress, therefore, transgressed its powers if, by the act requiring the Executive to make regulations to govern the subordinates of the Pension Office in determining who are entitled to pensions, it meant to authorize the President to issue an order whereby a vast number of persons can be placed on the pension roll. It is true that President CLEVELAND exercised this power by a regulation declaring that seventy-five should be the age at which total disability should be presumed, and that President McKINLEY made sixty-five the age at which half-disability should be regarded as presumptively existing. It is also true, no doubt, that some additions to the pension roll were made by these rulings, but they were few compared with the multitude that will be enabled to draw pensions through Mr. ROOSEVELT's order. It is the extreme seriousness of the burden imposed upon the taxpayers by Mr. ROOSEVELT which has rendered urgent the fundamental question whether the act of Congress, under which the power to issue Pension Order No. 78 was arranged, is not essentially unconstitutional. Here, again, the President seems to think that he has offered sufficient apology for a given proceeding when he challenges his opponents to deny that it is well meant and beneficial. The inclusiveness of the report is too obvious to require elucidation.

This government has been true to the spirit (our italics) of the Fourteenth Amendment in the Philippines. Our opponents deny that here at home the principles of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments have been in effect nullified.—MR. ROOSEVELT'S letter.

They cannot. But does that fact constitute sufficient warrant for the violation, here tacitly admitted, of the letter of the Constitution by the national government? He was a wise man who suggested a useful way to treat sheeping dogs.

It seems odd to think of HENRY CLAY LOVELL in connection with pickled sheepskins, but circumstances have arisen that require the contemplation. Until last month the manufacturers in eastern Massachusetts imported large quantities of the skins of sheep, pickled or unpickled, without paying duty, but on August 25 the Treasury Department gave notice that thereafter the pickled variety would be classified as partly manufactured goods and taxed at twenty per cent. The manufacturers called Senator LOVELL to task, and there followed a touching illustration of the way the tariff is handled by "its friends," who, it will be remembered, are the only ones it to touch it with a ten-foot pole. The Senator was interrupted in the preparation of an essay entitled "How to be Reciprocated without Reciprocating Yourself," and did not care to be disturbed. Nevertheless, being a statesman and a true servant of the people—some people—he promptly replied: "I had noticed in the papers the despatch about pickled skins with surprise and annoyance. I am writing to the President about it." The President also was stung. Immediately upon receipt of Senator LOVELL's communication he telegraphed to Washington suspending the ruling until he should have an opportunity to "personally go over the matter with the Secretary of the Treasury." Just when that will be is uncertain, because Mr. STAY is fully occupied in pickling Democrats in the remotest region (thence BARCE could find on the map. Meanwhile the Senator's constituents, of course, can continue their importations without cost and vote the right ticket in November.

There is natural difficulty in regarding the fate of pickled sheepskins in other than a humorous light, and yet the incident is not unsuggestive of questions that might impress some as being pertinent. Why, for example, did not Senator LOVELL send the complaint of the manufacturers directly to the department which made and whose business it is to make and, if need be, change rulings? And why should the President take it upon himself to suspend an order without even inquiring why it was declared? Is it his duty, or even his prerogative, strictly speaking, to personally construe by telegram each section of the tariff act, even to pickled sheepskins? Where does he get his authority? What are the experts in the Treasury Department paid for doing? Why should the order be superseded during the Secretary's absence on a private mission? Why, unless the department officials are known to be utterly incompetent, should it not be enforced pending a personal conversation between the Secretary and the President to determine whether or not they are in the wrong? What occasion was there for bothering the President, anyway? Why did not the Senator neatly dispose of the whole matter himself by simply reminding his lukewarm constituents that "the foreigner pays the tax"?

The answer of Maine is a thundersing "No!"—The Press.
The reverberation of a reduced majority!

Nearly every day now the Tribune catches a poor Man. The latest to appear under the lambo-tro is Mr. ALEXANDER K. CHAN, whose credentials bore the signatures of his poverty-stricken associates on the directors of the New York Life Insurance Company, New York Produce Exchange, Safe Deposit and Storage Company, Title Guarantor and Trust Company, United States Trust Company and the South Brooklyn Savings Institution, Associated Merchants Company, Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company, Continental Insurance Company, Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, Erie Railroad Company, Federal Insurance Company, Greenwood Cemetery, Hudson Trust Company, Mechanics' National Bank, National Bank of Commerce, New York Produce Exchange Bank, Queen Insurance Company of America, Realty Associates, and the Union Ferry Company. Elected unanimously.

The Governor finally met the chairman in "open convention" and humiliated Lieutenant-Governor FRANK W. HUGHES for Governor, gravely to the disgust of Senator PLATT, who wanted TIM, and thereby definitely confirmed the assertion in these columns three weeks ago, that a man of the intelligence and independence of ELMER ROOT or NICHOLAS MURPHY BUTLER would not suit his purpose. Appreciating the blight that would attach to a confessedly "Ocell man," the Governor-chairman tried to invade Senator PLATT into a packed conference in order to make an appearance of unanimity, but the wary old gentleman wouldn't go, and the scheme fell through. Mr. HUGHES, meanwhile, became very indignant in interviews trying to expunge the OCELL brand mark, but since the Governor-chairman had not indicated a willingness to nominate him until the two had reached "an understanding" as the result of a private conference lasting two hours, the effort availed little. Mr. HUGHES is not very well known. He is said to be an ineffective man of fair capacity, and will probably prove a lighter weight upon the ticket than his nomination would have been had he possessed the courage to run himself. The net outcome seems to be the final disappearance of Senator PLATT as a political factor along with Mr. ROOSEVELT's last hope of carrying the State—unless, of course, the Democrats—but the Lord only knows what they may do!

THE WEEKLY takes no stock in the report that ORELL's dark horse is President NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER, of Columbia University, who, it says, is too high-minded and clean-handed to do the work that would be required of him, nor does it believe that the nomination will name Mr. ROOF in the face of his efforts to prevent his nomination. It does not venture a guess as to who ORELL's dark horse is, but it asks why should the candidate not be "the master himself instead of a slave." The answer to that question is that probably ORELL thinks it would be easier to secure the election of a "slave" than his own return to the gubernatorial chair.—Rockster Union and Advertiser of September 1. No it seems.

Several admirers of HOMER DAVENPORT have remonstrated with us for characterizing that clever draughtsman's Republican cartoons as "yeast cakes." Well, here is a sample entitled "Passing on the Word to Maine":

That the sturdy Republicans of both States will be immensely flattered seems obvious, although the strongest appeal perhaps is to those of Maine who still hold that prohibition is not a failure. What is the point in the thing, anyhow? As we have said, Mr. DAVENPORT does very telling caricatures, but there is really no reason for believing that the occasional utilization of an idea would detract from the excellence of his work.

A man who ought to know better asks us why we consider Dr. LANCEY NICHOLS a stronger candidate for Governor than EDWARD M. SHEPARD. Some of the reasons are that Mr. SHEPARD, a professional reformer, accepted a Tammany nomination for Mayor, after a good deal of hemming and hawing about the usefulness of his associates, and got properly beaten; he bolted the nomination of DAVID B. HILL for Governor in 1884; he ran as an independent candidate against EDWARD M. GORCE, the regular nominee, for Mayor of Brooklyn, in 1885; he bolted the Democratic national ticket in 1896; and he capped the climax by declining or neglecting to vote at all when GEORGE R. MCCLELLAN was elected Mayor. If he should depend upon the support of those whom he has not offended or antagonized, therefore, we figure that he would get our vote—and that in Brooklyn, unless perchance the distinguished citizen having the right to cast it should again forget to register. There are other reasons, but these may suffice.

Can they point to one single act or word of THOMAS ROOSEVELT's that was one-half so rash, so reckless, so brooding, so nobly offensive to international amity, so grave a menace to the peace of the world, as Mr. CLEVELAND's famous Venezuelan message of nine years ago?—The Tribune.

They certainly cannot—and they don't want to have to.

Much light is shed upon the present Democratic situation by the declaration which we have had authority for saying Judge PARKER has made and is still making to his important friends, substantially in these words: "I do not really care whether I am elected President or not. I did not seek the office and do not particularly want it. I will not do one single thing to help forward my election. If the people want me I shall be glad to serve, but I am not going to ask anybody to vote for me."

When one of Senator DAVEN's friends asked him if he had made any plans for the evening, he replied, "None, that's not a fair question to put to a bachelor like myself when he reaches New York in the early part of the evening."—The Sun.

Many grandfathers at home are bachelors when they reach New York in the early part of the evening.

Mr. CHARLES A. TORNE, the local spellbinder who once represented Minnesota in the Senate, for a few minutes "elicited cheers" the other day, by declaring, "I have seen this so-called President's personal habit of interviewing United States Senators much in the same way that a school-master talks to a lot of whipped schoolboys who had spent an unpleasant half-hour on the dunce stool." Why "so-called" we cannot surmise, but we do know this, that when Mr. ROOSEVELT defied and smashed the ruling oligarchy of the Senate he rendered the greatest possible service to his party and the country. By the way, what are our slick old Bourbon Senators doing nowadays? We don't seem to hear much from the ALDRICH-ALLISON group.

At a meeting of the Free Trade Club of New York in 1883 the BOSTONIAN free-trader made an impassioned speech in favor of that economic method, and maintained in his intense way that the movement was one which he was prepared to die for, and now, after this interval, we have him making use in this letter of acceptance of the old stock arguments of the narrow, short-sighted protectionists, arguments which from his past investigation he knows to be sophistical and delusive.—Boston Herald.

A boy born in that year could vote in this. What, in Boston, is considered a suitable period to allow for effecting a change in an adolescent opinion?

Mr. ROBERT J. WATT writes to the Globe:

There are two questions which I think your readers would like to have you answer, namely: Was President ROOSEVELT responsible for General WARD's promotion (I think it was a good one)? Was it not McKINLEY who promoted him, making him senior ranking officer? Mr. HARVEY refers to this in last week's Harvard as unprecedented and vertiginous. This last word must make it a crime too horrible to contemplate.

We don't know what Mr. WATT's business is, but if he is a practicing physician or something of the sort, and has had no military experience, let him picture himself in the resplendent uniform of a Major-General in the United States regular army six years hence, and see if the thought doesn't make him dizzy.

How the HILL, SHEPARD, and MCCLELLAN mouths must water at the prospect of the $100,000,000 canal improvement, and how they would like to snatch it from the control of the admirable commission of engineers which Governor ORELL has appointed.—The Tribune.

Are these the only mouths that are watering? Ask the Sun!

Tammany finally "rallied" and the honorable BOCKEE COCKRAN gave further evidence of his astonishing fidelity.

What seemed to annoy him most was the report that had reached his alert ears that the trusts are filling up the Republican campaign fund. He was also a good deal worried about the $50,000,000 paid for the canal rights and the $10,000,000 paid to Panama. Many "communions" were apparent to his keen and highly trained scent—and sundry sat upon his brow.

OFFICE HAY, N. Y., September 7, 1901.

MR. DEAR WATSON—I heartily congratulate you and your fellow Republicans in Vermont. The result is admirable in every way.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

That word "admirable" again! Is subtle satire yet another of Mr. ROOSEVELT's many accomplishments?

"What has the President done for you?" shouted a man who stood near the door at the meeting of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen at Buffalo. "What has he done?" somewhat replied Grand-Master HANNAHAN. "He has shown his approval of organized labor by accepting honorary membership in this organization." (Cheers.) Let us see, what paper did the report of this episode appear in? Was it the Sun?

Has anybody notified Mr. TRIBLE that he has been nominated for Vice-President?

At Rosemount—family gathered on piazza—the Judge in front—grawson waving flag—visiting editors approaching—loud fanfades: "Hail to the Chief!"—impassive silence, finally broken by a warning voice through the kitchen window: "Mrs. PARKER, the fish man is here!"—Revised version of Toot's special letter designed to had a sympathetic chord in the hearts of 100,000 women who will vote in the Far West.

The Republican National Committee has shown sagacity in circulating as a campaign document the notable address delivered by Secretary HAY at Jackson, Michigan, on July 6, 1901. In this speech the original intention of the Democratic managers to make the campaign turn on the issue of Mr. ROOSEVELT's personality is pronounced a mere counsel of desperation. Has not the President, asks Secretary HAY, been a good citizen, a good soldier, a good man in all personal relations? Is not he a man of intelligence, of education? Does he not know this country well? Does he not know the world outside? Has he not studied law, history, and politics? Has he not had great chances to learn, and has he not improved them? Is he not sound and strong in mind, body, and soul? Is he not accessible and friendly to all sorts and conditions of men? Has he not the courage, the candor, and the ability to speak to the people and tell them what he thinks? To these questions many Democrats, if not all Democrats, will answer, Yes. Then, if pressed to state their objections, they reply: He is unwise. Now what, inquires Secretary HAY, are the coefficients of safety in a chief of state? Courageous, intelligent, and honest he must be; these three qualifications are indispensable. A man is all the more safe if, with these essential qualities, he have a sense of proportion, a sense of humor, a wide knowledge of men and affairs; if he seeks good counsel; and, finally, if he is a patriot, if he loves his country, believes in it and works in all things its interest and its glory. As for Mr. ROOSEVELT's willingness to seek and accept advice, Secretary HAY testifies that he takes infinite pains to get at the facts before he acts. In all the crises in which he has been accused of undue haste, his action is declared to have been the result of long meditation and well-reasoned conviction.

When, for example, the President made peace between the miners and the operators, Mr. HAY declares that the interposition was not the outcome of any sudden caprice, but the fruit of serious reflection. The Secretary of State points out, moreover, that this act of mingled philanthropy and common sense was justified by a great practical result. Mr. ROOSEVELT's action in the merger suits is defended on the ground that, without a breach of his official duties, he could have done no otherwise. He was informed through legal channels that a Federal statute had been violated. He did not make the statute, but he was bound by his oath to execute it. Accordingly, he brought the proceeding which it was his duty to bring. The courts, from the lowest to the highest, sustained his action. He did, in a word, what it would have been a high misdemeanor to have left undone. The laws in this country are made to be obeyed, whether it is safe or not. It is always unwise to disobey them. As to the clamor that has been made over Mr. ROOSEVELT's suddenness on the balance of Panama, Mr. HAY finds it hard to believe that any American can seriously object to it. It is alleged that the President should not have recognized so quickly the new-born Republic of Panama. Mr. HAY answers that if a thing is right and proper to do, it does not make it criminal to do it promptly. In Mr. HAY's opinion, the hour and the man arrived together at Panama. The man struck while the iron was white-hot on the anvil of opportunity, and forged as perfect a bit of honest steelcraft as this generation has seen. On the whole, the Secretary of State opines that the Republicans could desire no better fortune in the campaign now going on than that their opponents should persist in their unmodified intention of making President ROOSEVELT the chief issue.

Mr. HALL's declaration that this is his last year in active politics has pretty much disposed of the fear that he might become Judge PARKER's Secretary of State. But what about President ROOSEVELT's Secretary of State in case he is re-elected? Is it safe to take it for granted that it will be Mr. HAY? In Washington the opinion is very persistent that Mr. HAY has already been a member of the ROOSEVELT cabinet longer than his inclinations have warranted, and that he has a fixed purpose to retire as soon after election as he can. It is conceivable that the Colonel's pervasive personality may become wearisome after a time to men who are closely and continuously associated with him in his work. They like him; we all like him; but it is conceivable that to be coupled to a steam-engine may in time become trying to the nerves, especially if it is an engine that always wants the right of way, and is liable at times to jump the track. There was that story that Mr. ROOR offered to run for Governor if the President would give him assurance that the Presidency in 1908 should be an open event, for which all corners might compete. Can that have been a true story? Does the President already claim the right of way in 1908 also? We don't know. All we do know is that Mr. ROOR is not a candidate for Governor.

Ex-Senator McLARIN of South Carolina discusses the Southern race problem in an interesting open letter in which he says that conditions are likely to grow much worse before they grow better. But he also says that as a believer in our country and in the democratic ideas on which it is founded, and which "are surely working us toward that condition where liberty and justice will be the birthright of each unit comprising what we call government," he knows that the race problem, the labor problem, and the other great issues of the day "can never be settled except in harmony with the ethical spirit of the age." He believes that "in time every false doctrine and flimsy pretext which impedes this onward march will be crushed out of existence," but as a man who has seen much of public life he does not expect anything to be done until conditions become unendurable. Here is a mixture of optimism as to the eventual outcome, and pessimism as to the immediate conditions, and both of them, apparently, pretty well founded. "If some power," says the ex-Senator, "could bar out the politicians of the North who traffic with the negro vote in national convention, and those of the South who 'holler nigger' every time there is an honest difference of opinion, and then call into a great convention the wisest and safest men of the nation without regard to race or party, these great issues might be considered upon their merits and a way be found out of the wilderness which would save much sorrow and suffering." Certainly we have in this letter an expression of the spirit to the working of which the right solution of the race problem will finally be due. There are plenty of men in the South who feel as Mr. McLARIN does, and plenty of men in the North who share the same grave and dispassionate sentiments, and by such men, in the course of time, the problem will be worked out.

Mr. McLARIN speaks of having read with great interest the article by Mr. THOMAS in the current North American Review, in which it is proposed to repeal the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution and parts of the Fourteenth, and by a new amendment base the representation of all the States in Congress on the number of their voters who vote for President and Congressmen. We called attention last week to that article, which is well worth consideration. Of course it would be immensely difficult to secure the repeal of the Fifteenth Amendment (which provides that the right to vote shall not be abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude). Before it could be done the people of the North would have to be convinced not only that the negro was no longer protected or benefited by the amendment as it stands, but that blacks, as well as whites, would be benefited by its repeal. That both these propositions are now true, and that the people could be convinced that they are true, is by no means impossible, but it would take a vast amount of time and labor to bring the public mind to these conclusions. The leading minds of both parties and both races must first accept them.

Credit, or rather debit, the World with a new verb. FANAGAS, it says, is "slowly and painfully rear-platforming" his way eastward again.

The presence of Mr. WILLIAM WALDORE ASTOR in New York is a cause of some excitement to the local papers, and of considerable interest to the resident population of Manhattan. Whenever Mr. Astor is recognized he draws a crowd. His movements are noted by reporters in so far as it is possible to follow them, and there is a constant rain of inquiries at his residence about his plans, impressions, and intentions. He went into a Christian Science Church on a Sunday morning, and was voluminously credited next day with being a convert to Mrs. Eddy's new religion. But that is a very unnecessary inference. Mr. Astor is a man of intellectual tastes and a good deal of mental activity of a certain sort. The development of Christian Science in New York would naturally interest so thoughtful a visitor, and what is more natural than that he should want to know what is the reigning principle of a cult whose members select their real estate with so much judgment and improve it so handsomely. We hope Mr. Astor will appreciate the new New York, and will enjoy his visit here. He is not in all respects a lucky man. He seems not to have in very full measure the good gift of enjoying life. When he grew up in New York enormous fortunes were still rather scarce, and nobody had had much practice in bringing up boys who were the prospective heirs of such fortunes. That business is better understood now, and the machinery for accomplishing it has been developed. No amount of prospective wealth need any longer condemn an American lad to a lonely boyhood. There are schools and colleges where he can find companions of his own kind and of other kinds, and cultivate besides the intimacies and get the contact and the discipline which help so much to make life worth living.

About a hundred thousand pupils in New York, they tell us, will have less schooling this year than they should have, because there are not yet enough public-school buildings to hold them all. The conditions of the school problem here are familiar. Immigrant families from southwestern Europe with quantities of children swarm into the city and swamp its school accommodations. Will there ever be schools enough? May be so; some time. When the public schools have so increased in number as to eat down sufficiently the space available for tenement-houses on Manhattan Island, there will be schools enough. There is supposed to be a relation between the probable height of an office-building and the area of the lot it stands upon. If the building is too high, the necessary elevators will take up so much room that the available office space will be inefficient to pay a profit on the investment. That is the theory. So, when the schools have so multiplied on Manhattan Island as not to leave room for a profitable population, there will be schools enough.

"JOHN W. GATES Was Good for $200 Thill," is the headline. We suppose it would not be polite—in case he was the one threatened with incarceration—to hint that a good many people wish to goodness he hadn't been.

The Russian Baltic fleet has set out at last, if the cables are to be credited. It is more probable, however, that it will put into Libau or one of the Baltic ports before the definitive departure. The admiral in command, Vice-Admiral ROZHSKY, has certain grave problems to face. Not the least is the final part of destination. It is almost beyond human possibility that General STOKHOLM should hold out at Port Arthur for the two or three months which will pass before the new fleet can possibly reach the Far East. Nor would it be no easy matter to get there without first disposing of Admiral TOSI, Vladivostok, the probable destination of the new fleet, will be frozen in long before Admiral ROZHSKY can get there, even supposing that he found Admiral KAMOHARA napping and the way clear before him. It is true that the ice-breakers designed by Admiral MAKANOV can force a channel through the ice to the inner harbor of Vladivostok, but as soon as the new war-ships reached their anchorage they would be frozen in. One can hardly conceive of a more disheartening task than the constant effort to keep an open channel for a large fleet through the rivers of a Siberian winter. But to reach the Far East the Russian ships will have to pass through the Indian Ocean, which will be lashed by the tail of the monsoon, and will be running mountains high, in the literal meaning of the words. Add the great possibility of cyclones to supplement the monsoon, and the certainty of hurricanes in the China seas, and it is evident that, short of a journey to the north pole, no harder or more exhausting task could be conceived than that which lies before the Russian blue-jackets. The crews of the light destroyers and torpedo-boats are especially to be pitied. Even in comparatively good weather these very frail and unsteady craft have a hard time of it, but in the tremendous seas which sweep up from the south pole to the Persian Gulf their lot will make the whole world sympathize with the plucky Russian crews.

You can't help feeling sorry for the Russians.

The newspapers report that at a lawn fete in New York a lady lost a gold-chain bag containing five thousand-dollar bills, eight hundred-dollar bills, eight $200 in smaller bills, two drafts on New York for $10,000, and a long jeweled necklace worth $2000; in all about $25,000 worth of "smut," not counting the value of the gold bag. It would be a relief to the nerves of the country if the Newport ladies would use a little common sense about the care of their money and their jewels. He is an exceptional man who carries about with him any considerable sum of money or anything else that it would profit any one to steal. If he is going to an auction or a horse-race he may provide himself with ready cash, but certainly when he puts on his best clothes he is not apt to encumber himself with much more than his cash here. And a man has pockets, too, in which, at a pinch, he can tuck away bank-bills so that they will be fairly safe. But a man who would carry twenty thousand dollars to a garden-party would be thought to need a guardian.

RETRA OF THE GAME.—The Party out of Office, being free from Business Cares, has Leisure for Reflection undisturbed by the passing agitators that are incident to Practical Responsibility. It shall, therefore, have the Privilege to say whether we ought to promise Independence to the Filipinos. But if any Party that has made such Promise gets into Office, the privilege of promising independence shall pass automatically to the Opposition.

While there may possibly be something to be said in exaltation of King LORAN in the matter of the Congo atrocities, there can hardly be much dispute about his claim to be considered the most unsuccessful family man in Europe.

Platform: No Humbug! The natural defenders of the Constitution at any given time use the members of the party that is opposed to the party which is at that time in a position to subject the Constitution to pressure.

Mr. Roosevelt's Letter of Acceptance

NEXT to going on the stump himself, President ROOSEVELT could hardly have done better work on his own behalf than was embodied in his letter of acceptance, which was published on September 12. In that document he takes up in order, and answers in answer, every argument that has been advanced against the expediency of electing him to the office of Chief Magistrate. "We are by no means disposed to say that he has been entirely successful, in the sense that the replies to the criticism which some of his acts have provoked will be accepted as conclusive by constitutionalists, by tariff revisionists, and by anti-imperialists. But as fair-minded readers of the paper will question the sincerity of the writer's patriotism, the elevation of his motives, or the rectitude of his intentions. We purpose, first, to outline the answers made by Mr. ROOSEVELT to some of the assertions upon which stress is laid by his opponents, and then to mark certain passages, in which his sturdy, estimable, and engaging traits are exemplified. Subsequently, we may invite attention to some features of the letter that seem unlikely to carry conviction to impartial minds.

It is unquestionably true, as the President points out, that during his term of office he is to enforce the admitted and interstate commerce laws, but he has been prosecuted to a successful issue; and that, if the multiplication of trusts and their increasing power be largely due to the "failure of officials charged with the duty of enforcing the law to take the necessary procedure," such failure is chargeable, not to the present Executive, but to the Democratic administration which preceded President McKINLEY. To another assertion made by Judge PARKER, namely, that "the common law, as developed, affords a complete legal remedy against monopolies," Mr. ROOSEVELT answers that there is no common law of the United States. The rules of the common law can be enforced only by State courts and officers. No Federal court or officer can take any action whatever under them. To say, therefore, that action against trusts and monopolies should be limited to the application of the common law is equivalent to saying that the national government should take no action whatever to regulate them. Here the President seems to have in mind only the question of jurisdiction. It is true that State courts have no jurisdiction of interstate commerce, the regulation of which is confided by the Constitution to the Federal government. Federal tribunals, however, except when sitting as courts of equity, are habitually guided by the principles of the common law.

Now let us glance at Mr. ROOSEVELT's reply to the charge that the Federal government is now administered extravagantly, and that, whereas there is a surplus of expenditures in 1899, there is "a deficit of more than forty millions" in the year that has just closed. The President insists that this deficit is imaginary, and is obtained by including in the ordinary current expenses the sum of fifty millions which was paid for the right of way in the Panama Canal out of the accumulated surplus in the Treasury. It is admitted to be true, however, that, if the current or ordinary expenses for the two years be compared, there will be found to have been a surplus of nearly eighty millions for the year 1899, while there is a surplus of only a little more than eight millions for the year that has just closed. Mr. ROOSEVELT explains that this diminution of the annual surplus was brought about designedly by the abolition of war taxes in the interval between the two dates, the acts of March 2, 1891, and of April 12, 1892, having cut down the internal revenue taxes to an amount estimated at one hundred and five millions of cents. In other words, the reduction of taxation has been considerably greater than the reduction in the annual surplus. As for extravagance, there has been no substantial change in the rate of annual expenditures since the close of the war with Spain. It is true that, as compared with the fiscal year ending in June, 1891, the fiscal year that has just closed shows a relatively small increase in expenditures (excluding the rental payment just mentioned); but, on the other hand, the previous year showed a relatively small decrease. According to Mr. ROOSEVELT, the prime reason why the expenses of the Federal government have not in recent years decreased more than they have is to be found in the fact that the American people have deliberately sanctioned the performance of certain new kinds of public works at the public expense. What the President has in mind are the disbursements for rural free delivery, for the inspection of meats by officials of the Department of Agriculture, and for the irrigation of meadows in arid and semiarid regions of the West. It is true, as Mr. ROOSEVELT says, that no one would seriously propose to abandon any one of these new fields of public work. While this is a fact, however, we presume that the President himself would scarcely regard his answer to the charge of extravagance as fall and conclusive. Undoubtedly, however, it is adroit, for it fastens attention upon defensible subjects of outlay.

To the accusation that is the appropriation for the regular army made in recent years has been responsible a decline in and dangerous drift to militarism, Mr. ROOSEVELT deems it an adequate reply that the army is now relatively smaller than it was in the days of WASHINGTON, when, on the peace establishment, there were 3500 soldiers to a little less than four millions of population. What we have now is an army of 50,000 to care for the interests of over eighty millions of people. What Mr. ROOSEVELT means to maintain is the fact that, when WASHINGTON was President, a relatively large army was imperatively needed, for, on the southern frontier ran a line of fortified posts held by the British, and as they now are, important to Mexico. So far as the South, not only Florida, but the whole west bank of the Mississippi, was held by Spain, whose attitude could not be described as friendly. Moreover, before WASHINGTON's administration drew to a close, it became questionable whether we could avoid a war with the French Republic. Then, again, the Indians were troublesome, not to say rebellious, neighbors, instead of being, as they now are, important to Mexico. So far as the liability of disturbance at the hands of any enemy on this Continent is concerned, it is probable that a regular army of twenty thousand, or even ten thousand, men would suffice. If we really need sixty thousand, it is because we have assumed responsibilities in the Philippines of which Mr. ROOSEVELT's opponents do not approve.

Mr. ROOSEVELT dwells at length upon the fact that the Chicago platform described "protection" as "robbery." The protective principle is not so described by the Democratic candidate, either in his speech of acceptance, or in his subsequent utterances, the speech made to Democratic editors. On the contrary, Judge PARKER has pointed out the impossibility of making any change in the tariff at all during the next four years, unless the Republican majority in the Federal Senate shall be convinced that the people are grudgingly in earnest in demanding that the DINGLEY tariff shall be revised in certain schedules. Where, therefore, Mr. ROOSEVELT derides many hundred votes to a ratification of the statement that "protection is robbery," he is belittling the platform, not the candidate. What the tariff revisionists in Iowa and in several pivotal States want to know is whether Mr. ROOSEVELT favors immediate revision of the existing tariff, and, if so, in what schedules. All that the President is willing to say upon the subject is that, "from time to time, schedules must undoubtedly be rearranged and readjusted to meet the shifting needs of the country; but this can with safety be done only by those who are committed to the cause of the protective system." What the many tariff revisionists in the Republican party think is that the time for revision is now, and that if they must wait for the "stand-patters" to say who a revision may be done with safety they are likely to wait four years longer.

How does Mr. ROOSEVELT reply to the assertion that an material enlargement of the foreign market for American products through reciprocity can be looked for at the hands of the Republican party? The President begins by stating that the action of his Democratic opponents in regard to the reciprocity treaty with Cuba cannot be reconciled with the assumption that they are sincerely devoted to the reciprocity principle. Obviously, Democrats would answer that some of these opposed the treaty with Cuba, not because that agreement made a slight concession to the reciprocity principle, but because it did not go far enough. In their eyes, the abandonment of only twenty-five per cent. of the DINGLEY rates in favor of Cuban sugars was not a genuine, but a sham, recognition of the wisdom of reciprocity. Mr. ROOSEVELT goes on to point out that "there can be no reciprocity unless there is a substantial tariff; free trade and reciprocity are not compatible." That is unquestionably true. A substantial tariff, however, in one thing, a prohibitive tariff is another. The maximum rates of the DINGLEY tariff are almost prohibitive, and they were defended by their author on the express ground that it would be easy to evade from them, while still retaining substantial duties, if thereby reciprocal concessions could be secured from foreign countries. That is to say, the maximum rates were designed by Mr. DINGLEY to constitute an instrument of coercion. For that purpose they were used effectively under the McKINLEY administration, and a number of reciprocity treaties were secured, not one of which, however, has been ratified by the Republican majority in the Senate. What the "stand-patters" who controlled the Chicago convention are accused of is bad faith, and it will hardly be pretended that Mr. ROOSEVELT has met this charge in his letter of acceptance.

A large fraction of Mr. ROOSEVELT's letter of acceptance is allotted to a defense of the Republican party's refusal to pause indecisively to the Philippines. Such a promise has been made by the Democratic nominee. Mr. ROOSEVELT evidently thinks that to treat the Philippines provisionally, as we have treated the Cuban case, and to name a date when the islands would be evacuated and endowed with absolute independence would be "fraught with dishonor and with disaster." Anti-imperialists, of course, would answer that the course which we have pursued in Cuba has not proved disastrous to the Cubans, and certainly has never been denounced as dishonorable to ourselves. On the contrary, our self-denying conduct with reference to the Pearl of the Antilles is given as the ground on which we have treated the Cuban case. We have no doubt that Mr. ROOSEVELT himself looks upon it as most laudable. Why should not the performance of a sim-the set in Asiatic waters be equally deserving of encomium? Because, says Mr. ROOSEVELT, to abandon the Philippines without obtaining even a coaling-station would mean to abandon the position in the competition for the trade of the Orient which we have acquired during the last six years. As for the retention of a coaling-station, the Philippines would be no more object to it than did the Cubans, while it is plain that, on geographical, strategic, and commercial grounds, there was ten times more to be said for continued occupation in the case of Cuba than in the case of the Philippines. But, says Mr. ROOSEVELT, to evacuate the Philippines would mean irreparable damage to those who have become the wards of the nation and evasion of moral responsibility on our own part. With this view we believe the great body of American people concur.

In his persuasion, Mr. ROOSEVELT says that "there is not a policy, foreign or domestic, that we are now carrying out, which it would not be disastrous to reverse or abandon." "For Mr. ROOSEVELT really believes that it would prove disastrous to proclaim as a fixed principle of our government that the Constitution shall follow the flag, and that, outside of coaling-stations, our flag shall not go anywhere whither, according to a five-to-four decision of the United States Supreme Court, the Constitution does not follow it? Would it prove disastrous for the 'stand-paters' to admit that some schedules of the DUTY tariff need revision at this moment, to take up and pass on the re-arranging of the Fifty-eighth Congress some of the reciprocity treaties negotiated by Mr. McKINLEY, but, up to the present hour, 'hung up'?" It is probably true that, if the Democrats should come in, they would try to reverse Mr. ROOSEVELT's policy in all of these particulars. It would be the fault of the Republican majority in the Senate if a Democratic administration failed to do so.

Whatever qualifications may be made, however, it cannot be denied that Mr. ROOSEVELT's letter of acceptance is a striking document. It is well calculated to hold Republicans together, to lead them to their leader with admiration and with sympathy, and to cause them to look forward with confidence to the approaching contest.

Judge Parker's Latest Speech

THE speech made by Judge PARKER at Keosau on September 4 to some hundreds of Democratic editors has excited a great deal of interest, not only because it was the first extended utterance of the Democratic nominee since his speech of acceptance, but because in it he indicated a desire to make the campaign turn to a considerable extent on the extravagance imputed in fact and in tendency to the ROOSEVELT administration. From the view-point of the burden imposed on the taxpayers, Judge PARKER entered on a comparison of the four years ending March 4, 1898, when, for the first time, Mr. CLEVELAND occupied the White House, with the three fiscal years which have elapsed since Mr. ROOSEVELT became President. Judge PARKER pointed out that, during Mr. CLEVELAND's first term, the average annual expenditure was about $209,000,000, whereas, for the past three years, the average annual expenditure has been about $319,000,000. The governmental expenditure last year amounted up to $282,000,000, an amount not equaled by any year since the civil war, with the exception of the twelve-month which included the Spanish war.

Judge PARKER submits that there is danger in such extravagance. He holds up the result in the fact that, instead of a surplus in the annual receipts of about $80,000,000, which the present President found on assuming control of the nation's affairs, there is now a deficit of $42,000,000. President ROOSEVELT, in his letter of acceptance, having Judge PARKER's charge under his eye, replies that the extinction of the surplus is due to the repeal of the war taxes, which resulted, he says, in a loss of revenue estimated at $105,000,000 a year. It is a curious fact that the Indianapolis News, generally regarded as the personal organ of Senator FAIRBANKS, the Republican nominee for the Vice-Presidency, points out that there has been no such decline in the receipts of the Federal Treasury. It defies contradiction to the statement that in 1903 the income of the Federal government, in spite of the repeal of the war taxes, was $359,000,000, or only $7,000,000 less than it was in 1902, when the war taxes were collected. In 1900, when the war taxes were levied, the revenue was only $104,000,000. With the war taxes abolished, or nearly so, the Federal revenue was $340,500,000 for the year just closed. Evidently, a reduction in revenue does not explain the growing deficit. It appears, then, that Judge PARKER's contention is sustained by a Republican authority.

We may here refer, although the reference is scarcely germane to Judge PARKER's speech, to another criticism on the President's letter of acceptance, which is made by the Indianapolis News, understood, as we have said, to be an organ of the candidate for Vice-President. The News directs attention to the fact that, with regard to the Philippine question, Mr. ROOSEVELT refuses to promise independence to the islanders, on the ground that such a promise would deceive them and would obstruct the beneficent work which we are performing in the islands. The News perceives that it is not easy to reconcile this position with the circumstance that Mr. ROOSEVELT congratulates us on the fact that we freed Cuba and gave her reciprocal trade advantages, "while, at the same time, keeping naval stations and providing against the island's sinking into chaos." In view of the promise made by Congress, it would have been morally indefensible to hold Cuba permanently, yet we did hold it temporarily, as we are holding the Philippines. It would have been morally indefensible to hold the whole of China, yet we did hold, and are still holding, part of it for naval stations. Was, inquires the News, the latter act indefensible? If not, why should such an act be morally indefensible in the case of the Philippines? The News also says that the President is wrong when he asserts, in his letter of acceptance, that, if protection were withdrawn, all the trade would cease to prosper. He was right, it thinks, in the speech made by him at Minneapolis last year when he declared that "certain great trusts, or great combinations, are wisely unaffected by the tariff," and that, in the case of some of our greatest trusts, the abolition of a protective tariff might confer upon them a positive benefit. It follows, obviously, that all trusts would not "cease to prosper" by a repudiation of the protection principle.

Tom Taggart of Pike County

The Mystery of Gûgal

(From "Pike County Ballads," by John Hay.)

The darkest, strangest mystery
I ever read, or heard, or saw,
Is 'long of a drink at Taggart's Hall—
Tom Taggart's of Gûgal.

I've been the tale a thousand ways,
But never could get through the maze
That hangs around that queer day's doings;
But I'll tell the yarn to you.

Tom Taggart stood behind his bar,
The time was tall, the skies were far,
The neighbors round the counter draped,
And 'o' my drink and jaded.

At last came "Olden Blood of Pike,
And old Judge Phinn, perambulate,
And each, as he musedered in,
Remarked, "A whiskey skin."

Tom raised the beverage full and far,
And slugged it, smoking, on the bar,
Some says three fingers, some says two—
I'll leave the choice to you.

Phinn to the drink put forth his hand;
Blood drew his knife, with accent bland,
"I ax yee parding, Mister Phinn—Best strap that whiskey-skin."

No man high-toneder could be found
Then old Judge Phinn the country round,
Nays he, "Young man, the title of Phinn Knows their own whiskey-skin!"

He went to his "leven-hen house-knife—
"I tries to follow a Christian life;
But I'll drop a 'slew of liver to you,
My blossom' drunk, with you."

They carried in a way that all admired,
That blood drewed iron at last, and fired,
It took Seth Blaine 'twist the eyes,
Which mused his great surprise.

Then coats went off, and all went in,
And both drewed iron and the skin;
The short, sharp bark of Derringers,
Like bull-pup, cheered the fun.

They piled the stiffs outside the door;
They made, I reckon, a cord or more,
Girls went that winter, as a rule,
Afore to spellin' school.

I've searched in vain, from Dan to Beer-
Shen, to make this mystery clear;
But I end with but as I did begin—
WHO GOT THE WHISKEY-SKIN?

* Published in 1911

George R. Feltgou, Chairman of the Republican National Committee

Senator Neill of West Virginia, who is in charge of the Speakers' Bureau at Republican Headquarters

LEADERS IN THE POLITICAL CAMPAIGN—PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN AT THE HEADQUARTERS OF THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE

The campaign work carried on at the headquarters of the Republican National Committee, at Madison Avenue and Twenty-third Street, New York, is under the personal direction of Chairman George R. Feltgou, the former Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Associated with him in the management of the campaign at the Republican headquarters are Frank H. Hitchcock, assistant chairman; Cornelius V. Bliss, treasurer of the committee; Senator Nathan B. Reelt, of West Virginia, who is in charge of the speakers' bureau; L. V. Foulger, secretary of the literary bureau; and the manager of the press department, Jules Guthridge.

Thomas Taggart in his Office at the Headquarters of the Democratic National Committee

In Mr. Belmont's Office—from Left to Right: August Belmont, Dr. Francis Pickens, George Foster Peck

LEADERS IN THE POLITICAL CAMPAIGN—PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE HEADQUARTERS OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE

The Democratic National Committee has its headquarters on Thirty-fourth Street, New York. Thomas Taggart, of Indiana, is chairman of the committee. William F. McLean, Dr. Francis Pickens, George Foster Peck, and August Belmont, who is a member of the National Committee, and who has offices at the committee headquarters, are prominently identified with the work of the campaign. The following are officers of the committee: Frey Woodson, of Kentucky, secretary; Aaron D. King, auditor; Judge Daniel McConville, of Ohio, head of the speakers' bureau; George F. Parker and Thomas D. Fletcher of the literary and press bureau; and F. C. Penfold, of the department of documents.

General Kuropatkin Reviewing a Company of Russian Troops

From Liao-Yang to Mukden

By Charles Johnston

THE character of the Manchurian battle-fields is determined by the long backbone of mountains, called the Lesser Khingan, which runs north from the cape below Port Arthur to the Amur River, deflecting that mighty stream northwest toward the frozen sea of Okhotsk. The peninsula on which Port Arthur stands is, in fact, one end of this mountain chain. The bog, broad, but not very lofty ridge of the Lesser Khingan divides the Yalu Valley on the eastern, or Korean, side from the wide and immensely fertile valley of the Liao River, on the western, or Mongolian, side. The railroad from Port Arthur to Harbin for the first part of its extent skirts the foothills of the ridge, keeping along the western side of the range. From this central backbone a series of short ribs run east and west, into the valleys of the Yalu and the Liao rivers. Close to Port Arthur, and, indeed, nearly all the way to Liao-Yang, the railroad crosses one after another of these ribs of hills, a part of it, about Tscheliu, having been compared by travellers to a sawtooth in consequence.

Tscheliu is the point where the lines from Newchwang and Port Arthur join, and proved northward to Liao-Yang and Mukden. From this juncture the distance to Liao-Yang is about fifty miles. Before the road reaches Liao-Yang it crosses two of the ribs of hills already described. The more southerly of these ribs, some fifteen or eighteen miles from Liao-Yang, is dominated by An-shan, the "Saddle Hill," from which An-shan-chau, the "Saddle Hill village," takes its name. This was General Kuropatkin's advance line of defence against the Japanese army under Marshal Oyama, and here the Russians met a serious reverse, on August 28-29. General Kuropatkin withdrew his fighting line to the next rib of hills, the Shou-shan, some five miles south of Liao-Yang, and here were fought the fierce battles of August 30-31, in which the slaughter was great in both armies. It was really along this ridge of hills, the Shou-shan, that the so-called battle of Liao-Yang was fought, and not at the city itself. General Kuropatkin made a brilliant flanking movement along the foothills of the Lesser Khingan, crossing the river Taitsze, at Nakasaka on August 31, and pushing southeast to the neighborhood of the Yentai coal mines, in a rib of short hills north of the Taitsze River. His position threatened Kuropatkin's line of communications, and forced the Russian commander to fall back on Mukden, a movement which represents only a further stage of the inevitable retreat to Harbin, and, perhaps, farther still. As Kuropatkin was at the same time warned on the west by a force reported to be ascending the Liao River, his situation was dangerous in the extreme, and he manifested the finest qualities of generalship in extricating his army with comparatively speaking, insignificant losses. It was a successful strategic retreat, and will go into history as the most brilliant Russian achievement of the war.

A word about Liao-Yang and the surrounding country. The eastern horizon of this district is formed by the Lesser Khingan ridge, with its heavily wooded foothills, which come within fifteen miles of the town of Liao-Yang. North and south of the town, ribs of hills run westward from the backbone ridge, the southern rib at Shou-shan, the northern at the Yentai coal mines. Between each pair of ribs there is a broad and deep mountain funnel, which begins its flow westward, and then, reaching the Liao River, in the centre of the valley, finds its way into the sea at Yui Kow, the port of Newchwang. The Manchurian winter is as cold, though Liao-Yang is about on the same latitude as New York, that these rivers are frozen solid every winter. Throughout the summer they are tempestuous floods, and they run high through the autumn months. These rivers, and especially the Liao, are the great highways of Manchuria, being covered with thousands of heavily laden Chinese boats, carrying beans, peas, millet, dressed hogs, rice, fruit, and furs down to the sea, for export to the southern cities of China, and also to Japan. The Liao Valley, one of the richest and most fertile regions in the world, is reached chiefly by these waterways, and wherever builds the port of Newchwang can make the innumerable Chinese boats pay a heavy and very remunerative toll. This is the real importance of the "eastern Newchwang," as Yui Kow is silently, if inaccurately, called.

The Taitsze River is the wide mountain torrent of the Liao-Yang

Valley. It comes close to the northeastern corner of the town, and there divides into two streams, with a long bar of sand, some thousand feet wide, separating the two channels, each of which is several hundred feet across. The Chinese had pile bridges across these streams, and these were supplanted by the Russian railroad bridges, but all were burned by General Kuropatkin in his retreat. The Liao-Yang plain, watered and finely irrigated by the Taitsze River, is of immense fertility, and is cultivated like a market garden for the Chinese are the finest gardeners in the world. The plain is by no means so bare and stark as most landscapes in China. On the contrary, it is richly adorned with fine trees: Manchurian pines, very like Scotch firs, willows, and elms, heavily loaded with melaleuca, being the commonest. These bouquets of trees mark the villages, farms, and tombs of the laconic gardening population of the plain, and also shelter their fruit trees: plums, peaches, cherries, and vines growing abundantly all over the plain. Indigo and rice are also cultivated, and the Manchurians have a dry crop rice which it has been proposed to introduce into the famine districts of India.

Liao-Yang is only some forty

Looking West over the City of Mukden

From photograph copyright, 1914, by Underwood & Underwood, New York

gates south of Mukden, yet historically they belong to different worlds. Liao-Yang was the advance post of the Chinese Empire to the north, the provincial capital of the Liao-Yang province, while Mukden was the outpost of the Tartar Manchus, who threatened the Middle Kingdom from the northern wilderness. The ground between Liao-Yang and Mukden is, therefore, the scene of a historic strife for empire, a strife in which the Manchus became a nation, and made one of the greatest conquests in history. The city of Liao-Yang, with the simple uniformity of all Chinese towns, is built into a square, a wall facing each point of the compass. Each wall has one main gate, and the main streets run north and south, and east and west, joining the gates on the opposite side of the town. The walls of Liao-Yang are about two miles each way, and are built of brick, with a stone foundation. They are crowded on the top like the walls of Peking. There are few interesting buildings in Liao-Yang; the imperial Treasury stands on the only eminence within the walls; the Buddhist temple of Kwan Yin, Goddess of Mercy, is architecturally handsome, and there are several substantial mission buildings. But these suffered heavily during the Boxer outbreak of July, 1900, and many of the converts, who numbered over a thousand, were murdered. Liao-Yang is also adorned with two or three telescope-shaped pagodas, one being just outside the west gate, close to the railroad station. The railroad keeps clear of the town, passing outside the western wall. It was the center of the Russian town, with its barracks, warehouses full of supplies, and stores of railroad materials. It was probably this Russian town which was expected to be on fire, and not the walled native city, with its hamlet thousands Chinese and Manchus inhabitants.

North of Liao-Yang the backbone ridge retreats farther to the east, leaving a wide plain between Liao-Yang and Mukden, with a series of broad mountain torrents crossing it from east to west, and ultimately flowing into the eastern branch of the Liao River. The most important of these rivers are the Tai-tse, the Shi-li-ho, and the Hsiao-ho, the termination here meaning "river." There is a slight elevation of the land between these streams, but in general the prospect, for one going along the road from Liao-Yang to Mukden, is an immense flat plain, richly dotted with trees, splendidly irrigated and filled, and with masses of prosperous villages and farms. At present the Indian corn is at its full height, and forms dense cover for the sharpshooters of both armies. On the eastern horizon the outline of the backbone ridge of the Lesser Khingan is visible, while to the west the plain stretches away to the broad Liao Valley.

Hsiao-yen-tai, or Yentai, as it is commonly called, is the first place of importance on the road. It is some seven or eight miles north of the Tai-tse River, and is approached on the east by a rift of hills, in which the real ruins are located, some five miles from the village. This place is memorable as the shipwreck of Nanyang-kuan's land against the attempted tank movement of General Kuroki's division, and very fierce fighting raged here during the first days of September.

Thirteen miles north of Yentai is another considerable village, Pa-tai-pu by name, the syllable for cultivating the trisyllabic pagoda, which rises beside the village, and is a conspicuous landmark over the wide flat plain. Four miles north of Pa-tai-pu the road reaches the bank of the Hun, or Hsün, River, two miles south of the suburbs of Mukden. This wide mountain torrent is a waterway for Chinese boats, for the most part carrying the market produce of the immense garden tract south of the Manchus capital, and it was feared that the Japanese might make a dash up it with light draught gunboats and cut the line of communication of the Russian army. Facts showed that this fear was unjustified. But the danger of a similar attack from the west will remain until the retreating Russian army is north of Tieling, where the railroad touches the Liao River.

The Hun River, two miles from the suburbs of Mukden, marks the frontier of the great Manchus tradition, one of the most remarkable exploits of conquest that the world has seen. It has abundant analogies and similarities with the preceding epoch of conquest in Eastern Asia, the heroes of which were another Tartar tribe, close kin to the Manchus, and like these, producing a family of military heroes. For the sake of comparison with the rise of the Manchus, it may be worth while to refer to this earlier episode, the great conquering movement of the Mongols. It happens that there are abundant materials for a history, or at least a running commentary, on the Mongol uprising, in English literature, beginning with Chaucer, and extending to Coleridge and Tennyson. When Chaucer wrote the Squire's Tale he drew for his materials on the Book of Sir Marco Polo, the Venetian adventurer whose fortunes were so intimately involved with those of the greatest Mongol conqueror, Kubli, and Chaucer's Conqueror is no other than Genghis Khan, the maker of the Mongol power. He evidently took the name Cambalo from Cambalio, which Marco Polo gives to the Mongol metropolis of Uchia, later called Peking, the northern capital, as opposed to Nan-king, "the southern capital." Yet and Nan meaning "north" and "south." From Chaucer the heroes of the Squire's Tale find their way into the fourth canto of Spenser's Fairie Queene, and, even more memorably, into Milton's Il Penseroso, where he wishes to Call up him that left half told

The story of Cambalio's bed,
Of Cambalio and Algorie,
And who had Camalio to wife;
That would the virtuous ring and glass,
And of the wondrous horse of brass
On which the Tartar king did ride . . .

With Coleridge's "Kubli Khan," the most musical thing in the whole range of English verse, and the most hauntingly beautiful, the other great hero of Mongol history comes into our literature, "Akbar's Dream" and the dreams of Arundel and Tennyson illustrate the abundant inspiration which the greatest English writers have drawn from the northern branch of the same family, which conquered Persia, Afghanistan, and India, for the Moguls and the Mongols are the same people, and Akbar was fourteenth in direct descent from Genghis Khan.

Genghis Khan belongs to the twelfth century. He made the Mongol power, welding together a great mass of scattered clans-

A Battalion of the Twentieth Japanese Infantry Fording the Kolo-pien River Photograph by Edwin Eastman, Jr.

A Group of Russian Artillerymen, showing the new uniforms lately adopted them, very like the Highlanders in martial spirit and love of adventure, tempered by cattle-raiding. Genghis was a supreme administrative genius, and in his closing days repented of his useless cruelty, chiefly shown in the slaughter of prisoners of war, and gave commands of gentleness and moderation to his descendants. He had two grandsons. Kublai Khan conquered China, and made Peking his capital. Batu Khan invaded Eastern Europe, with the Golden Horde, and "woreyed" Moscow," as Chaucer says, fixing his capital at Saray, or Tarsuff, on the lower Volga. This wonderful family, therefore, conquered the whole of Asia, including India and Burma, and also much of Eastern Europe, holding Russia in subjection until 1481. The one kingdom in Asia which held out against them was Japan (the yen, "Sun-rose"), which resisted two Mongol invasions, in 1274 and again in 1281.

There were thus two supreme geniuses among the northern Mongols: Genghis the organizer, and Kublai the Emperor of China; the heroes, respectively, of China and of Europe. They have their exact counterparts, in Manchu history, in the two great men whose tombs near Mukden belched ground. When we think of the inferiority of Asiatics it would be well to remember these two splendid families, belonging to the thirteenth and seventeenth centuries. The family of Genghis Khan is the more magnificent, as it dominated all Asia and part of Europe, and probably ruled over more than half of the human race. We have nothing in our western history to compare with it, not even the fortunes of Alexander or the conquests of the Caesars.

The Mongols were a group of Tartar clansmen. Mongol means "brave," and is an epithet, not a race name. Their power in the Chinese Empire fell in 1367, though it continued in India until the days of Clive. Then China, for nearly three hundred years, was ruled by the native dynasty of the Ming, during whose closing reigns another Tartar confederacy, led by two men of genius, entered history, under the name of Manchus. Manchu, "clear," is once more an epithet, not a race name, and finds its Chinese equivalent in the name Tai-tung, "the clear," "the pure," by which the present dynasty is known.

When the Mongol power fell many of the Tartar tribesmen who had formed it fled into the wide regions north of Liao-Tung, the outlying Chinese province towards Korea. "Land of Morning Calm." The native name for these Tartar tribesmen was Nintche, and one family of the semi-nomadic Nintche took the title of Manchus. They had a stockaded stronghold, really little more than a "cattle-kraal," as it would be called in South Africa, at Hutuala, some thirty miles northeast of the site of Mukden, among the foothills of the Lesser Khingan range. Hutuala was just such a valley as we have described at Liao-Yang, a flat space between two ribs of hills, with wide mountain streams running down it from the hills. Here, in the year 1559, was born Nurhachu, the Genghis Khan of the future Manchu confederacy. He is described as a "thirteen-month's" child, with phoenix ears, an enormous closed, big ears, and a voice like a bull—certainly formidable endowments in a baby, and which must have added singularly to the liveliness of the Hutuala khal.

Thus naturally endowed, Nurhachu gradually bought his way up to the leadership of the Nintche horsemen, and in 1594 made his way across the backbone ridge of the Lesser Khingan, and conquered the Yalu Valley. He gradually accumulated a list of grievances against his great and powerful neighbor, the Empire of China, and in 1607, about the time Shakespeare was writing "Hamlet," and a year before the birth of Milton, he declared war on the dynasty of the Mings in a fashion at once vigorous and characteristic. He drew up a table of "histories," ending with the words: "For all these reasons, I hate you with an intense hatred, and now make war against you," and then, instead of sending it to Peking, he burned the document, so that it might enter the invisible world and be witnessed by Heaven. With forty thousand fire and well-drilled troops he then set forth to rumpus China. It should by no means be thought that these Manchu armies, or those of their earlier cousins, the Mongols, were mere hordes of barbarians. The truth is, that both Genghis Khan and Nurhachu in many things anticipated the great tactical ideas of Frederick the Great and Napoleon, which form the groundwork of modern military science. Both mastered the principles of high mobility and concentration on the point of attack, the latter of which was Napoleon's supreme secret. The earliest fighting was along the Hsin River, whose name recent events have made so familiar to us, and the fate anticipated for General Kuropatkin actually overtook the Chinese general, whose army of forty-five thousand was cut to pieces while crossing the Hun. Five thousand Koreans, who were in the Chinese army as breakwaters, deserted to the Manchu standard, which, by the way, was originally adorned with the tail of a roe.

The Manchu fight against the Chinese was continued for a generation. In 1621 Nurhachu took the Chinese outpost of Fan Yang, north of the Hun River, and liked it so well that he later planted his capital there, calling it by the Manchu name of Mukden, which is now almost as antiquated as that of Byzantium, the Chinese calling the town Chen Yang. In 1621 Nurhachu took Liao-Yang, then the Chinese capital of the Liao-Tung province, and here, for the first time, the Chinese "pigtail" comes into the saga. It appears that Nurhachu ordered all Chinamen who submitted to him to shave their foreheads, the hair at the back of the head being braided in a queue. All who failed to do this lost their hair and their heads along with it. Nurhachu died at Mukden in 1626, the year after he had transferred his capital thither.

He was succeeded by his son Tai-tung, a military leader of equal genius, and, further, a great civilizer and administrator. He built the present walls and the palace of Mukden, which we shall shortly describe. He established a Manchu protectorate over Korea in 1627, the year in which Tsung-Ching, the last of the native Ming dynasty, came to the throne of China. In 1628 the Manchu leader Tai-tung set forth to invade China and attack Peking, at the head of a finely drilled force of a hundred thousand men.

This force was divided into the Eight Banners, whom we repeatedly hear of even to-day. This is the first occasion of their appearance. Three years later the Manchus, for the first time, constructed cannon, and replaced their bows with muskets. Both weapons they borrowed from the Chinese, who had got them from the Portuguese. We hear of both cannon and explosive shells in Korea during the great Japanese invasion of a generation earlier. Tai-tung arrived before Peking, and camped there, but without taking or even officially invading the city. He turned his attention rather to mastering the principles of Chinese culture and organization, and applying them to the needs of his Manchu tribesmen. He adapted the Chinese system of civil service examinations, and borrowed the Chinese syllabic characters, thus superseding the interesting Manchu alphabet, which came to Tartary, perhaps through the Nestorians, from a Saxon or Zend original. Tai-tung tried to win over the Chinese to his side. To all officers who joined him he gave military titles one step in advance of that which they had held in the Chinese service. A deserving major was made a colonel, and a colonel became a general, to speak of 1634. Tai-tung made a second expedition against China, and brought back a rich booty from Pehili, Shensi, and Shanwang, but he did not a second time attempt to attack Peking. He died at Mukden in 1643, and his body lies in the second of the great tombs.

It was not directly the armed force of the Manchus which brought about the downfall of the Ming. That result was caused by a southern Chinese rebel, who anticipated the modern Taping revolt. This adventurous person conquered a large part of the empire, and pressed Peking so hard that the Emperor Tsen Ching gave up the struggle in despair, and went and hanged himself by his scarf to a favorite weeping tree. His death even preceded that of Tai-tsong, the second hero of Mukden.

The latter's son, Chüncheib, by nature, while a mere boy, was set on the throne of Peking by the combined Chinese and Manchu armies, and his dynasty holds the same subtitle seat today. This must take place in 1644, the year before Cromwell and his forces, disappointed Charles I. of England. He ascended the throne with very noble sentiments on his lips: "Do not think that I am ambitious, solely for my own ends, to possess these vast estates. I desire them only to give peace to the many who have suffered."

It is worth noting, as coordinating events not taking place in distant parts of Asia, that this Emperor Chüncheib first destroyed the title of Dalai-lama, that is, "Green Priest," on the chief of the Tibetan hierarchy, who visited his court in 1653, and received this title and a golden seal of office. In a somewhat similar way Kubli Khan, the Mongol prototype of Chüncheib, had patronized and supported the Tibetan Lama, Peking, and had thus done much to consolidate the Lamaic hierarchy in the thirteenth century. Thus in Asian history intricately connected, over vast spaces of mountain and desert, and it is a singular coincidence which draws the eyes of the world at the same moment to the sacred cities of Tibet and Manchuria.

We are now in a position to appreciate the historic interest of Mukden. Chosen by the first great Manchu genius, its walls and palace were built by the second, while the third was transferred to the walled bulwarks of Peking as Emperor of China.

Mukden is a series of three concentric squares. The outer, with a wall of clay, encloses the suburbs, and is three miles each way. The second is Tai-tsong's city, and is the original Manchu capital. Its walls, of stone and brick, crested like battlements like the walls of Peking, are a mile each way. The third and innermost square is the old Manchu palace. The retreating Russians and the advancing Japanese, after crossing the Hun River, some two miles south of the suburbs, were apprised of their nearness to Mukden by a lofty pagoda, which stands at the point where the road enters the outskirts of the town. If they had found the roads from Liao-Yang heavy going, those within the city were not much better, though the Russians, during their years of occupation, did something to abate the extreme of ill-sounding rapid road dotted with islands of refuse, which formerly did duty as streets in Liao-Yang and Mukden. But before entering the city, the hurrying troops were greeted by a charming sight: the Manchu park before the southern gate, with its splendid pines, its flowering shrubs, its Chinese pagoda, and Manchu memorial temples, all gorgeously decorated with many colored glazed tiles. This park, with those at the foot of Nurharin and Tai-tsong, give Mukden a singular charm, making it quite unlike the ordinary city of the Chinese Empire. Mukden has many beautiful buildings, of most varied styles. Chief among them is the imperial palace, in its sacred enclosure at the center of the town, corresponding to the Forbidden City of Peking. The palace is covered with glazed tiles, colored yellow, the imperial hue everywhere in China. Besides the main buildings of the palace there are also pagodas and pavilions, likewise covered with yellow tiles. Noteworthy also are the chief yamens, or Chinese government offices, many of which are roined with green tiles, the color symbol of the Manchuian order, as yellow is of the imperial house. At the four corners of the city, in the suburbs, are Tibetan monasteries, with towers of an extraordinary shape, which can best be described by comparing each to a bottle of Bénédictine liqueur, set on a fat, square base. They contrast remarkably with the triangle-shaped pagodas of the Chinese, like that at the west gate of Liao-Yang, or at the village of Pailiao, thirteen miles north of Yentai. There are also many European churches, mission buildings, and hospitals. The missions suffered even more severely from the floods than those at Liao-Yang, the Catholic bishop with his priests and congregations being driven into their cathedral and there burned to death.

Mukden is a great grain and fur mart, and the broad main streets, together with the side streets diverging from them at right angles, brim with busy life, and echo with the shrill notes of far-going Chinamen. There is still a nucleus of Manchu nobility at Mukden, though in Manchuria no genuine Manchu is something of a rarity, most of them having been drafted south as garrisoners in all the walled towns of China. Of a total population of ten millions for Manchuria, perhaps a million have some title to be called Manchus. In Mukden, which has a quarter of a million in habitants, the proportion is somewhat lighter, and the Manchus have many privileges, especially in the matter of official appointments, as compared with the Chinese. They are allowed to take degrees and pass examinations on comparatively slender qualifications, making up for this shortcoming by supposed martial arts, mostly rather obsolete.

To avoid disturbing the hallowed ground of the famous tombs of Mukden, where lie the bodies of the two great founders of the Manchu line, the railroad made a wide detour, forming a semi-circle of some fifteen miles' radius, towards the west. The nearest station is thus fifteen miles off, at the village of Ku-ch'ien-shan, on the road to Ben-min-tsun, which lies some thirty miles to the northwest of the city of Mukden. After completing this detour, the railroad continues northward on its way towards Harbin. Some forty miles from Mukden, about the same distance on the north as Liao-Yang is on the south, the railroad passes through a narrow gorge of the Liao River. The place is called Tsching, and it was at this point that a flank attack from the Japanese, crossing the river in boats, was apprehended. Finally, it should be remembered that the backbone ridge is some twenty or thirty miles to the east of Mukden city; and that among the foothills of the range, on the Sushan stream, was the medieval Muscadet camp of Nurhachi, the Genghis Khan of the Manchus.

Japanese Interlocked at the Apex of a Frying-Pan Photograph by Edwin Smith, Jr.

Signal Corps Men putting in Telephone Wires at the Headquarters Tent of the Second Brigade

The Eighth Minnesota, Major Rappert leading, smoking over a Hill near Hay Market

On the Fighting-line—A Scene near Bricker's Farm

On the Fighting-line—Troops on Bull Run Battle-field

THE WAR GAME AT MANASSAS—SNAP-SHOTS OF INCIDENTS AND SCENES DURING THE MILITARY MANOEUVRES ON THE BATTLE-FIELD OF BULL RUN

General View of Camp No. 3, Corps Headquarters of the Seventh Cavalry

General Corbin starting on a Tour of Inspection in his Automobile. On the rear seat are Captains Blum and Winthrop

The Ninth United States Infantry in Camp. To the Left in the rear is the Camp of the Twelfth Regiment of New York. In the Distance to the Right is the Seventh Cavalry

THE WAR GAME AT MANASSAS—VIEWS OF THE TROOPS IN CAMP TAKEN BY OUR SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHERS

The army maneuvers at Manassas, in which 27,000 troops were engaged, ended with a grand review before General Adna R. Chaffee, chief of the General Staff, on September 10. Two problems were worked out during the maneuvers. In the first, the "Blues," under General Grant, attacked, and the "Browns," under General Bell, defended. Toward the end of the second day the Blue army succeeded in penetrating the Brown centre, and the final advantage seemed to be with General Grant. In the contest more than 1000 men were supposed to have been killed. In the second problem the conditions were reversed, and the Brown army took the offensive. In this contest General Bell's army made a brilliant attack, and by a wide flanking movement successfully surprised and crushed General Grant's left, winning a theoretical victory.

Photographs by Perfield

"An English Dreyfus Case"

By Sydney Brooks

London, September 7, 1904.

I MUST warn the reader against the heading of this article. It is not my own, but Mr. George R. Sims', and though I like his effective and quite candid manner of presentation, I do not like his effectually obstructing justice, no "dramatic" supposition of anything like it. The Beck case is not the Dreyfus case, nor anything like it. There is here no serious suggestion of a conspiracy to convict and keep in prison an innocent man, no frenzy to let a man off and release him, no government or judicial officer wilfully obstructing justice, no "dramatic" supposition of anything like it. There has, however, been displayed an amazing mass of stupidity and carelessness among high officials and possibly of something more sinister among their subordinates. There has certainly been a gross misstatement of justice, one of the most extraordinary cases of "mistaken identity" in criminal annals, and a severe and scorching shock has been administered to the faith of the average Englishman in the criminal procedure of his country. Shocks of that sort are rare in England, but when they do occur their effect is devastating. The Beck case has undoubtedly agitated the public mind more than a little, and a public inquiry into all its circumstances is being vigorously demanded and will certainly be conceded. What that inquiry will bring forth we can say as yet with any precision, but there will be little surprise if it reveals itself into a court of impeachment on Scotland Yard and Home Office methods, or if, more even than the Marbeck case, it leads to the establishment of a Court of Criminal Appeal.

The tale begins as far back as 1877. In that year a man who gave the name of John Smith was charged at the Old Bailey with stealing jewelry from women. They were all women of the "unfortunate" class; he had accosted them, representing himself to be "Lord Willoughby," and taken them to a house-keeper for his "nice little house in St. John's Wood, in the Abbey Road," making out lists of clothes they were to purchase, giving them bags charged on the Union Bank, and borrowing their rings "to get better ones of the same size." There were seventeen charges against him, and he was sentenced to five years' penal servitude. In the ordinary course he was examined and measured by the police, and all his marks and physical peculiarities noted. Among other things his doctor recorded that he was a Jew. Smith was liberated in 1880, and for a long while nothing further was heard of him. Then in 1890, nineteen years after the first series of crimes, the same thing began again. Women were again defrauded in precisely the same way. The same nice little house in St. John's Wood again figured as the lair, the same lists of clothes were made out, the same drafts were uttered on the Union Bank, and the man again represented himself to be a lord, varying his title from "Lord Willton" to "Lord Willton de Willoughby." This time a series of crimes the police treated as reputable, well-to-do, named Lord Beck. In the police court proceedings a policeman named Sparrell, who had been concerned in the Smith case of nineteen years earlier, gave evidence. He positively and repeatedly declared that Beck was Smith.

Nothing has come out to make one doubt the honesty of Sparrell's evidence, but its value could and should have been immediately tested. The Scotland Yard authorities had Smith's identification record to refer to. Beck was also examined after the police court proceedings and before his trial at the Old Bailey, so two particulars did the records tally. Nevertheless, Sparrell's evidence was allowed to stand, and in the Old Bailey calendar Beck's name appeared with a previous conviction against him in the margin. But it soon became known that Beck was in a position to give a perfect alibi. Three highly respectable witnesses, one of them a Gentleman of the Chamber to the King of Denmark, were prepared to come forward and swear that Beck was in Paris in 1880, at the very time when Smith was serving his sentence of penal servitude. The prosecution accordingly decided not to take the line that Beck was Smith, and not to call Sparrell, and the common sergeant who tried the case at the Old Bailey rested all the efforts of the defence to bring the issue in, ruled that "the question whether the prisoner was or was not the man convicted in 1877 was immaterial," and so destroyed Beck's chance not only of showing that he could not possibly be Smith, but also of proving that the documents connected with his case were, by the admission of the Treasury's handwriting expert himself, in the same hand as the documents connected with the Smith case. As matters have turned out, the decision of the common sergeant was a grave wonder. Beck was tried on the specific evidence: a number of women swore that he was the man who had robbed them; and he was sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

But what was to follow was worse than a blunder. The letters and number given back to wear on his convict dress were "D. W. 121"—the "D" signifying "convicted in 1877" and the "W." signifying "Willesden," in spite of the fact of his identity with Smith having been withdrawn from the jury, and in spite of the fact that his measurements in no way corresponded with Smith's, he was, when in prison, treated as though he and Smith were one and the same, and made to wear Smith's convict badge. From Portland Prison Beck repeatedly petitioned the Home Office, but it was not until two years after sentence had been passed that one of his petitions had the slightest effect. He had discovered somehow that Smith was a Jew. He asked to be examined by the prison doctor, the request was granted, and the prison doctor reported to the Home Office that Beck was not a Jew. The Home Office, however, without reopening the question of his guilt or innocence, contented itself with a practical admission that Beck was not Smith. It ordered the "D" to be removed from his clothes, and beyond that did nothing. Beck served the remainder of his sentence, and in July, 1901, was released on ticket of leave. He at once set about repairing his fortunes and endeavoring to clear his name. In the latter process he was most successful. He had some money in investments and some property he holds, and has greatly developed in Paris, secured him of a competence, but though he spent over £5000 and worked untiringly to establish his innocence, he appears to have failed entirely.

In the present year what must have seemed to him a fatal and final blow fell upon him. On April 15 he was again arrested, for the same sort of fraud, carried out in precisely the same manner—with all the machinery of the house in St. John's Wood, the title of "Lord Willoughby," the checks on the Union Bank, and the list of dresses complete. Again women came up in court and swore that Beck was the man who had robbed them. Again he was tried and found guilty. But the judge reserved sentence, and in the interval between the two sessions the last incident in this strange drama occurred. The real man, the John Smith of 1877, was caught red-handed at the same game. An inspector with his wits about him noted the coincidence, followed it up, and in a few days all was set right, and Beck was released. Mr. George R. Sims, who has been from the first a strong champion of Beck's innocence, declares that "the man once admitted to be the sham earl of 1877 and 1890 and 1904 is utterly unlike Beck. He is considerably stouter and heavier. The difference of bulk is striking. He has totally different features; he has a conspicuous wart over one eye, and a noticeable scar on the forehead. Beck has no single one of these marks. No one looking at the two men side by side could possibly mistake one for the other." But that is only one and by no means the most extraordinary feature of the case. What has come out of it is a gross and flagrant and is the negligence of Scotland Yard, the practically official stupidity of the Home Office, the apparent lack of correspondence and consultation between the two departments, and the revelation that a man with all the proofs of innocence in his hand can yet be delivered by a point of technical procedure from putting them in evidence. I need scarcely say that an enormous amount of indignation has been aroused by the case, and that the press and the people are very firmly resolved not only that justice shall be done in Beck, but that all the details of his case shall be impartially and independently investigated. The Treasury's notion of justice is very far from agreeing with popular views. The Treasury has offered Mr. Beck £10,000 as a solution to settle the case. If he were to accept it, he would, of course, be deluded into believing his convictions quashed and his name cleared. Inquiry into the conduct of his cases. The Daily Mail has, therefore, in a very public-spirited manner come forward with a promise to provide Mr. Beck with £10,000 should he, in the interests of public justice, decline the Treasury offer. Mr. Beck has accordingly accepted a full public inquiry, and though it is impossible to say yet been made to it, it is certain that an inquiry will be held either on his initiative or on the initiative of the Home Office, and that it will not be of the whitewashing, departmental order, but will be a full and independent inquiry, and that all England, feeling the disgrace of the whole affair, is resolved.

Are College Men becoming "Flabby"?

By Charles F. Thwing

President of Western Reserve University and Adelphi College

PROFESSOR BARRETT WENDELL of Harvard College, in an article in the York American Review for September, 1901, that the college students of to-day are flabbier than the college students of thirty years ago. The comprehensive reason for his judgment lies in the evidence provided by the writings of these men.

Assuming that the inference is truthful, one is eager to inquire into the cause. Are the causes local and transient, or general and permanent? Do the causes arise from the community and society, or are they largely or wholly academic? Some would say that the alleged increasing flabbiness of the academic world is only a piece of the increasing flabbiness of the extra-academic world. Some would say that the new and great wealth of the community, especially in the first generation of its makers or possessors, is not making for the virility of either the student or the citizen. Flabbiness is undignified, and makes for rightness of action. Some would say that the failure of some colleges to hold men up to a high scholastic standard makes for carelessness and character as well as scholarship. These considerations might be urged as causes of the alleged flabbiness. It might also be urged that the alleged flabbiness itself might be a cause of these untoward results.

But I wish to declare at once that I do not believe the flabbiness of college men is increasing. I do not believe that there ever was a time when, taking all in all, college men held a purpose more firm, or when their moral character was more vigorous, or when their grit and pluck were more abundant. A certain laudable simplicity of manner, a certain rural simplicity are indeed passed by. But the passing of brightness and of simplicity does not infirmate the coming of weakness and hostility. Robustness survives urban and urban manners quite as constantly as it survives rustic and rustic. The expression of hearty vigor, intellectual and ethical, has become more human, more regular, more sane, and more gentle. But the hearty vigor itself is just as hearty and just as vigorous. One should not mistake quietness for weakness.

Furthermore, the whole athletic movement strikes against flashiness. Let it be at once acknowledged that this movement has had, very bad, elements. But let it also be said as promptly that it has elements, also many, which are very, very good. For it has led to create a manliness of vigorous and contentedness, it quickens the will of those who participate in it to control appetite and passion. It teaches endurance and persistence. It magnifies hardihood and daring. It holds in the control of temper and in the development of a worthy temperament.

But the athletic movement, outside of those who participate in its various forms, works against flashiness through its duties, which it gives many college men in the proper management of the movement itself. The managers of these affairs are obliged to exercise a high degree of executive skill. For instance, the work of the managers of the football teams of a college is all now in burning how to get on with other men, with other men like themselves, with other men whose inclinations and inhibitions and prejudices are unlike their own. The manager of the football team is obliged to make the grumpy sweet, the obstinate pliant, the selfish firm, the grizzled large, the obstinate gentle, the egoistic altruistic, the slow swift, the rash calm, the tricky fair, and the severe kind. He is obliged to get on with all sorts and conditions of men, and to use them for his own purposes.

The football manager is compelled to adopt measures and means, however, for ending the whole college community about certain details and central propositions. He is to arouse and maintain enthusiasm; he is properly to relate his college team to other college teams and his college to other colleges. Economy in time and money, in health and strength, he is to promote. He is obliged to consider what games to play, and when, to direct the march to make himself properly to the faculty, to be on good terms with the newspapers—in general, to be all good things to all men, to serve them righteously and to cause them to serve him righteously.

It has to be said that the tendency to give a college man freedom leads to develop conditions for using this freedom properly. This liberal and liberalizing movement develops self-responsibility, self-reliance, and self-control. In this cultured freedom of the sphere certain men will be found who, of its opportunities, will misuse these opportunities, and will abuse themselves. But, on the whole, such freedom represents the divine method, not only for control, but also for the enrichment of men and for the advancement of man.

It is therefore, to my thought, clear that the conditions of college life of the present and of the last decades tend to create a reaction of vitality the opposite of flashiness.

But the question, yet more important possibly, emerges. What can and should the college do to keep its men so all-aroundly sound in body and in mind as no evidence can appear intimating that they are soft and flaccid?

The first answer to be given is that the colleges should cause their students to exercise. Then how little work a student may go through his college I should hesitate to say; but I do know that at some colleges the work is so slight as not to merit the name of work. There are indeed, he it at once confessed, ready to establish in the American college a mere pass degree. If, it is argued, a man of eighteen or twenty does not wish to study, and if his parents do not care for him to study, why should the college oblige him to study? At their not other advantages, and, some would say, richer, than those which the curriculum represents. What right has a college, as a public institution, to keep a worthy fellow from burning the friendships, from entering into historic conditions, and from coming into certain general knowledge, which are not necessarily results of a college education? But these would lead, it must be acknowledged, to the peril. Men who find their chief contentment in such processes and products are in danger of degenerating from gentlemen of leisure into fellows of laziness. They come to know their pipes better than their books. They grow to be reluctant to do or to bear loved things. They find themselves becoming soft and pliant. The men, also, who work hard are not free from serious dangers. They may be educated, but not cultured; trained, but not appreciative and sympathetic with the best. And such hard workers are not in peril of dullness, not at all. Their intellectual muscles are hard, perhaps too hard. They have strength, and they are efficient.

College men also may add themselves in reading a temptation to dullness by the reading of most vigorous biography. Life makes life—weak life, weak life; strong life, strong; the need not multiply instances or name books. A downy start in the morning. The autobiography, for instance, of John Stuart Mill, or the biography of Charles Darwin, or of Huxley, cannot but stir any young fellow's intellect to intellectual honesty, to intellectual patience, and to intellectual aggressiveness. General reading is reading in college. "The authors" have lost their place. Special courses demand special reading. Certain intellectual and ethical advantages would follow from the return to the earlier custom. For the college is set not only to make scholars in English, but also Englishmen.

I can also say that the presence of personalities who embody these qualities, character the very opposite of flashiness would quicken the fellows into vigor and vitality. Character makes character and personality becomes life personality. What a record of men who have helped boys to become men is set forth in the history of American colleges! Alfred Hopkins, as well as his more distinguished brother, at Williams, Washburn and Packard, of two brief careers at Yale, Lord, of Dartmouth; what influence have they exerted in making men? If only one could be permitted to tell of the men now living who have helped and helped to make college men live! Professor Wendell and I can together name such creators of character. Let them be great scholars in the college and great teachers. Neither can be too numerous or too great. Let there also be great men who shall help to make great men through the intellect and the intellectiveness of men.

In securing the robust results in character the college men should, moreover, be impressed with the seriousness of all life and of American life in particular. To such institutions of seriousness college men are especially susceptible. The higher the self which life makes the more easily do college men hear and the more eagerly do they heed it. Think of the way the college men, North and South, went to the war in '61! Higginson's Harvard Recruits, and Johnson's Biography, and Frederick Remond, concerning the sons of the University of Virginia as well as the conflict, prove that hundreds and thousands of these college boys counted not their life dear unto them, but only dear to the nation or to their commonwealths. The problems of the present, of labor and capital, of the colored race so serious as was the problem of union or disunion of forty years ago. The problem of transmitting this new, heterogeneous, aggressive, impatient life of America into quiet orderliness and mature strength, into judgment and temperance, is of invaluable significance. The impression of such great problems upon the minds and hearts of college men arouses them to do their duty through clear thinking and vital action. The comprehension and realization of great dualities transmits any tendency toward flashiness into firm and vital strength.

How Weather Conditions affect the War

By Frank Waldo, Ph.D.

It is probable that the outcome of the present war between Japan and Russia will eventually hinge on the weather conditions that are encountered by the Russians in moving a sufficiently large force to the front to offset the advantages already won by the Japanese. These conditions are better known than one might imagine. The Russians have made a careful study of the temperature, rainfall, and wind, and winds of this desolate stretch from St. Petersburg and Moscow to the scene of action. They have been fifty years accumulating this information, and know what climatic conditions are to be expected at any season of the year over the whole length of the Trans-Siberian Railroad.

It is generally believed that Siberia is a country of eternal winter, while the Japanese can sit around in their gardens at any time of the year. As a matter of fact, while in Siberia an intensely cold wave of frost five to nine months' duration does prevail, on the least summer in character it is not so long, warm days, but by a heat that is made all the more uncomfortable by the combination with the chill of the night. The contrasts in temperature between the winter cold and the summer heat are, in some parts of Siberia, as great as the difference between freezing and boiling water. Thus while the Russian is insured to the cold he is also surrounded to oppressive heat.

In Japan, on the contrary, we find a climate much like that of the British Isles, although on account of its position further south, the Japanese summer is longer and hotter. The Japanese winters are shorter and a little colder, owing to Japan's location on the eastern, or leeward, side of the great continent. In the short winter the temperature does not usually go much below freezing, and seldom reaches zero, except at the very top of the mountains.

In case land fighting is to be conducted through the Manchurian winter, either Japanese aggression must be suspended, or else, according to all past experience of warfare, the Russians will have the advantage, even with greatly inferior numbers. The inevitable physical and mental influences of intense cold will be a most demoralizing effect on the Japanese troops who, on account of their peculiar living habits, cannot become acclimated to the extreme cold as easily even as Europeans. In the matter of keeping warm by watching the Russian can make it so hot and comfortable that his health will not suffer, while the Japanese will find the experience most destructive to efficiency, if not to life. We do not usually realize how far north St. Petersburg lies. It is just under the parallel of 60 degrees, or the latitude of the northern part of Hudson Bay and Lake Athabasca. While the eastern terminus of the Trans-Siberian road is in about the

(Continued on page 172.)

RUSSIAN SUBMARINE MINES REMOVED BY JAPANESE SOLDIERS FROM THE HARBOR AT NEWCHWANG AFTER THE WITHDRAWAL OF THE RUSSIAN FORCES FROM THE CITY

Before withdrawing from the port of Virehwan the Russians sank a large number of mines in the harbor and along the Liao Ho River, which could be exploded by means of electric wires connected with the shore. After the Japanese took possession of the city, on July 26, divers were sent down to locate these mines and bring them to the surface. The mines were charged with gunpowder, and were fastened to cast-iron "watertraps" to keep them in position in the river.

Making Way for the Approach to the new Williamsburg Bridge on Duane Street

The Demolition of Buildings from Seventh to Ninth Avenues and Thirty-fourth Street, where the new Pennsylvania Railroad station is to be erected

The Point at the Battery from which the Tunnel is being Constructed to connect the Subway with Brooklyn

WORK NOW UNDER WAY TO IMPROVE THE TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES OF NEW YORK CITY

Four solid blocks of buildings between West Thirty-first and West Thirty-third streets and Seventh and Ninth avenues are being torn down to make way for the new Pennsylvania station in New York city. The tunnel under the North River through which the Pennsylvania trains are to run from Jersey City to New York has also been begun on the Jersey side. A similar tunnel will be constructed under the East River, through which trains from Long Island will run into the station. Another tunnel under the North River, through which a bridge line from Jersey City is to run, is now nearing completion.

Photographs by Brown Brothers

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

SIR GILBERT PARKER'S new book is, as the subtitle has it, "a tale of love, laughter, and tears." It is a romance of two Huguenot boys in the days of Queen Elizabeth, refugees from France, where the persecuting hand of the Medici lay heavy on the Huguenots. Some years before the story opens Michel de la Forêt had become an officer in the army of Claude Gaius de Montgomerie, and fought with him until the Comte, grown desperate when besieged in his castle in Normandy, besought the intrepid young Huguenot soldier to desert Madame de Montgomerie to England, to be safe from the oppression and misery sure to follow any mishap in the noble leader of the Comtards.

When half-way across the Channel the fugitive, with the refugees who stopped by an English frigate. After much persuasion the captain of the frigate agreed to land Madame de Montgomerie upon the island of Jersey, but forced Michel to return to the coast of France, where he went into hiding. Meanwhile, Michel had received a letter at the very moment of his leaving Normandy with the Comtards which spoke of his departure.

It was from Madame Angèle, formerly of Rouen, but now a refugee in the Jersey Isle, to which place Michel, her lover, was bound, no one knew save, with Madame de Montgomerie, all unknown to Angèle, while she yet waited news of the safe delivery of her letter. The deep and enduring love of these Huguenot boys is tenderly and beautifully disclosed in Angèle's letter, with which the story opens. "Thy great letter by safe carriage cometh to my hand," she writes, "bringing to my heart a lightness. It hath not known since that day when I was hastily carried to the part of St. Math, and then towards the King his prisoner, in what great fear have I lived, having no news of thee and fearing all manner of mischance! But our Lord hath benignly saved thee from death, and now He hath set safely here in this Isle of the sea."

Then follows an urgent appeal for his coming—to work for the cause in England, but more, she confesses, with joyful anxiety longing, because "it is for my own happiness that I ask thee to come. . . . Near by the Tour de Babel shall I be watching and waiting thee. By day and night doth my prayer ascend for thee." She concludes with this fervent and touching appeal: "The Lord make thee true, Michel. If thou art faithful to me, I shall know how faithful thou art to all; for thy love to me was most frequent and passionate, with a full sense that might warrant such seeming. Yet, because thou mayst still be given to such dear fantasies of truth as were on thy lips in those dark days wherein thy sword saved my life 'twixt Paris and Rouen, I tell thee now that I do love thee, and shall so love when, as my heart inspires me, the cloud shall fall that will hide us from each other forever. And, womanlike, she adds an "after-word" which gives the title to her story: "I doubt not we shall enjoy in the heights where there is peace, though we climb therein by a ladder of swords."

After a weary time of waiting and watching Angèle's patience and loyalty were at last rewarded, and Michel returned has escape from the coast of France, and landed upon the Isle of Jersey after a fierce battle with wind and waves. But the heights where there is peace were not yet reached; urged by the treacherous coming of Catherine de Medici, whose hatred for the Huguenots pursued Michel, Queen Elizabeth sent for him to appear before her and show if there was any reason why he should not be returned to France as an enemy to her peace. Thither Michel and Angèle with other good loyal friends and true repaired, and it is their adventures at the court of Elizabeth, surrounded by friends and foes, that constitute the steps of the ladder of swords by which they climbed to the heights of peace. Leicester appears in his customary rôle of cunning villain and unscrupulous ruff. But of all the characters, historical or imaginary, that enter into the tale, that of Leicester, the longing Seigneur of Rouen, is the most original, the most human, and the most entertaining. His friendship for Michel and Angèle began with his rough wooing of the girl, when he learned that her love had been given to another, when he had seen tears in her eyes and misunderstood them, and when with a sudden impulse he had seized his hand and kissed it. "Well, well," said he, with serene generosity, "I'll be thy everlasting friend if not thy husband. Cheer thy heart, lady. And a brave, trusty friend he proved himself, though oftentimes tripped in his good intent by his pompous conceit. His vanity was invincible, but through it ran so childlike a spirit that it bred friendship and liking. Angèle moves in modest simplicity and the dove-like gentleness to the end, and Michel exchanges the sword for the pulpit—the warmest outcome of a just at Elizabeth's court that sprang from the discovery of his having escaped from France in a priest's disguise. A Ladder of Swords is not, as its title might imply, a story of blood and battle; it is not the clash of sword, but the clash of the spirit and the watching of wit for and against the fair issue and happiness of a maiden loyal to her lover. It is the old romance that glows on the tapestry of the summer past as the lamps of pen and ink and brush burning in the hours of the living present, throw their warm radiance upon the life-chairs and undying frailty of ancient knight and lady. Every page is infused with the spirit of Mrs. Browning's lines:

Learn to win a lady's faith,
Not by the thing's high,
But by the life and death
With a loyal quality.

An intimate friend of Ruskin's relates an incident illustrating that simplicity, gentleness, and sympathy which were characteristic of his relations with the servants of his household. "I was dining with Mr. Ruskin one evening when, during the meal, as we were enjoying a rib roast, I happened to say that it was the first I had tried that season, and he remarked how delicate it was. Mr. Ruskin manifested delight at my appreciation of his roast, and ringing for one of the servants, he said, 'Please tell Jackson I want him.' When Jackson came into the room, his master said: 'I am very pleased to tell you, Jackson, that your first pulling of rib roast was a success, and my friend here says that it is delicious.' When we had finished dining, a servant brought lighted candles into the room, which was almost dark, the windows being shaded by the dense, overhanging trees, although the sun had not yet gone down. After placing the candles, she was about to leave the room when she suddenly stopped and said: 'Please, sir, there's a beautiful son set sky just now over the Old Man.' Ruskin rose from his chair, and said: 'Thank you, Kate, for telling us,' then left the room. He returned soon. 'Yes,' he said to me, 'it was a queer evening. You and he led the way up-stairs to his bedroom. It was a glorious sight. The sun was sinking behind the Coniston Old Man mountain, and the mist and ripples on the lake were tinged with a crimson flush. We sat in the window recess without speaking a word till the sun went down behind the mountain.'

Sir Gilbert Parker
Author of "A Ladder of Swords"

A REMARKABLE PHOTOGRAPH OF THE RECENT MILLION-DOLLAR OIL FIRE AT ANTWERP, BELGIUM

On August 26 a fire, caused by the leakage of compressed gas, started at the tanks of a Russian oil company at Rubens, near Antwerp, Belgium. A bank wind raised the fire to spread rapidly. The great smoke, which was visible from a distance of 100 miles, was estimated at $1,000,000. The great loss is estimated at $1,000,000.

Correspondence

AN INTERESTING LETTER FROM KENTUCKY

LEWISBURG, Ky., August 15, 1902.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—A year ago I did not think it possible for politics to be made as intensely interesting to a woman as the WEEKLY is making the present campaign. I know of nothing in contemporary magazines to equal in interest the WEEKLY's political content.

It was not to say this that I write (however much I've been tempted to say it and am glad for the opportunity now), but rather to report the gist of an argument which engaged the attention of several persons lately, and showed as it began, with the question, "Can belief and hope be controlled?"

I was present at a big birthday dinner recently at which two of the guests were ministers. Shortly after leaving the table I found myself one of a group of three—two men and one other lady, and because of a remark which one of them made to the effect that a third party, not present, ought to be a Christian, sought to join the church. I felt constrained to offer the protest: "But do you suppose this person can force his belief? For not belief and love the two things which cannot be controlled?"

Immediately things stirred. But the pleasure of the controversy lay largely in the fact that neither the minister who spoke most nor I got angry, though at the risk of offending I suggested to the other lady that she calm herself. Perhaps she has forgotten. St. Just advises one in debate to "keep cool and command every body."

At any rate, the preacher kept delightfully cool, and fought valiantly, which enhanced the pleasure, for I've sometimes met those who, like others, can't argue without getting warm, and then I've run, even at the risk of being thought a coward, taking comfort in Cato's plan to "strike out with words against the countermeasures, for speech is given to all, but wisdom to few?"

(Did you ever meet a woman's equal to a drawback?) Well, the others, or, rather, the lady and one minister, tried to point out to me my incoherence. I declined to be convinced. I asked Brother D— (he had read the speech-making Treatise on Toleration by Voltaire.

Remember!) Of course he held up his hands in horror, replying he couldn't read Voltaire without becoming contaminated, and I agreed I feared he couldn't, though, for my own part, I put so much faith in the Hon. John Morley's opinion expressed in his magnificent Biographical Critique of the famous deed that I was willing to believe a thoughtful mind could not be influenced by such a superficial theology as Voltaire's. I confessed to reading him myself for the delight he gives as dramatist, essayist, novelist, historian, etc., and not for his theories, though still containing his wonderful Treatise is helpful rather than demoralizing in its effect. It was suggested merely as a broadener, and Monsieur Voltaire now dropped out of the dispute.

You haven't time for the whole argument. Suffice to say it heated. Unhappily Brother D— said many good things; made some good points, but for the most part his thoughts were parried, and when he declared vehemently that he "couldn't see or understand why a man who was willing to believe, couldn't believe in the free of God's commandments as he is to be saved," I argued, he argued against himself, saying, "The man on the other side is probably saying he can't see how you believe as you do. Please allow him the same liberty of conscience you demand for yourself."

My opponent continued to the end to declare that if one is willing to do so, he can force himself to believe other than he believes and live other than he lives.

My opponent may be right, but observation has seemed to teach me otherwise.

I know a woman who believes (though she is almost alone in this belief) that one very near to her is mentally unbalanced. It has been proved to her in many ways through many years, and this woman would give anything she possesses for the power to believe otherwise, but it is as impossible for her to do so as it would be for her to believe the mother love in her heart for her babies, dear of her flesh, born of her love.

I know another woman who loves a man not her husband. She has controlled all expression of it, as the strength to do this lies in her power, and she has refused any hint to be able to transfer her love back to her husband and be able to feel in her heart that she belonged wholly to him and to their sons and daughters.

A man, I know, whose life is broad and frank and upright, who says he would not enter to live in a world without Christ, lives and infuses and who for the sake of those who have him would to-morrow confess our Master if he could consistently with his convictions do so.

I could, of course, multiply instances which have come within the scope of my very limited observation, one of the most pitiful being that of a woman of twenty-eight years who grew to love a man before she knew of his engagement to another woman, and now has their wedding-travel in play. Talk of hermitism! Does any one believe this woman is not fighting this thing with all the strength of a noble womanhood?

I cannot (there it is again) rid myself of the belief that Aristotle in Homology was right when he said, "It is with religion as with love; command can do nothing; constraint still less; nothing so independent as love and belief," and Wordsworth, who left us this,

But who would force the soul, tills with a straw
Against a thimble-pointed adamant.

And Flécher, Bishop of Nîmes, "We know that faith will yield to persuasion but it never will be controlled," and Emerson and Diderot and Lactantius, and many others, even leaving Voltaire out, though it seems to me he knew a good deal about human hearts if he did about religions.

Of course these are taken in the sense of outside influences, though I believe it equally impossible for the subject to force these things. I believe it so sincerely that it would never have suggested to me to write this letter for the astounding number of people I've met who think otherwise.

Poor Dr. Abbott has been so troubled with "the troubled wife" that I won't bother him with this, though think how interesting his opinion would be. And Mark Twain has already been so generous to me in the matter of correspondence that I won't bother him for his view point. Can't you imagine it? He would laugh at that "generous correspondence." I must be honest about that; it covers only one and a half bullet-size pages, but a single word of his willingness never to use them tears from one less broad and wholesome.

You see you are the only victim and not deserving of much sympathy, because you are always getting the best of some one. "Slaves Henry," the press, or some poor editor who puts the rope about your neck in his paper and finds himself hung in the following issue of the WEEKLY, though so gracefully and gently to be both grin and bear it.

Whether you are for or against me, permit me, for your consideration and the benefit of thought you give us in each WEEKLY, to sign myself with gratitude.

I am, sir,

MARIE SHAW GRAHAM.

THE AMERICAN COFFEE INDUSTRY REQUIRES PROTECTION

HONOLULU, HAWAII, August 7, 1902

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—The tropical possessions of the United States, namely, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, have immense possibilities in coffee production, but owing to a severe competition and overproduction in the markets of the world, this industry cannot make growth and headway without tariff protection.

Inasmuch as the tariff has been the builder of a great industrial base for mainland industries, the same would apply to her tropical domains. At the present day, so far as coffee exists, the same having been removed in the year 1872.

All European countries, without exception, have export duties on coffee, whilst we admit this product duty free to our markets. Brazil and other coffee-growing countries levy export duties on their coffee, and the tax goes into the treasuries of these countries, or in other words, the people of the United States are contributing to their coffers without getting ample compensation in return.

The growth and welfare of the American Territories ought to be of some concern and importance to the nation we are united to. This great development should be made possible under the American flag, giving the opportunities in this line of agriculture to American citizens and American enterprise.

Under a protective policy, the Territories aforementioned can in years to come supply the mainland with this product. By so doing we shall be benefited in many ways. Firstly, we will add by a tariff many millions to our own Treasury that is now flowing into foreign treasuries. Secondly, we shall be creating a new and vigorous development under our own flag, a development that cannot harm or conflict with any similar interest on the mainland where the product does not grow. Thirdly, with increased industrial growth follows increased trade and shipping under our own flag. Increased overseas trade means a better and stronger navy to safeguard our interests, and the extra millions we are deriving from a coffee revenue will furnish funds to equip and add to our navy.

A only beneficial and good results can come from it. This tariff is of such momentous importance to our future growth and needs in many ways that both political parties should support it as a condition of the tariff. It should be the duty of the United States to make her tropical possessions valuable and prosperous adjuncts of the great American commonwealth, for as such they will be a growing and potent factor in her commerce.

It is one of the great industries we can have for the matter of tariff protection, and may be pleased that an altruistic regard for their future be forthcoming at the next session of Congress, irregardless to party politics.

I am, sir,

ABRAHAM L. LOUISIANA.

AN OLD, OLD STORY

WINSTON, ARIZONA, August 27, 1902

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—May I enter an emphatic protest against a phrase in an editorial in today's issue (p. 1309, second column)? You say "Why should the United States . . . have taken it upon themselves to revolutionize the world?" I am sure that you will find it hard to burk in this phrase. It unconsciously betrays the notion of the appearance and distinctness of the several States rather than their unity in one Antioch.

With Edward Everett Hale, who has lived some "men with a country" than any other American I know, I always say "the United States is," and never "the United States are." The individual, though united, States did not "take it upon themselves" to do something in China, but the United States—a nation—"took it upon itself" to do it. The very object of the Constitution was to establish "a more perfect Union."

I am, sir,

E. FLETCHER UNWIN.

THE TITMISTS BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS

In the opening chapter Pamela Mandale is introduced to the reader as a young society miss in London, identified and of rare present charm. Late one night Pamela and Alan Warfield, who is in love with her, observe a young couple leaving the opposite house. They are Tony and Millicent Strivens, who live in a gloomy house presided over by the rich but sinister father of the young man. They are really kept prisoners by the whims of the tyrannical old man, and it is only by playing truant and going out by stealth late at night that they are able to enter at all into the life of the outside world. But finally they both weary of their anomalous life, and Tony determines to go to America to make his fortune. In his absence Millicent becomes infatuated with Lionel Colton, a penniless adventurer. Pamela wishes to help her. She sends Warfield on a mission to find Tony and bring him home. Warfield finds that Tony, having lost all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the North Sea on a trawler. Warfield sees every argument to prevail upon him to come back, but he refuses. Tony remains on the trawler until the term of his cruise is over, unavailingly having learned of his father's death, and then decides to outfit in the Turkish Foreign Legion, as an officer career seems open to him. John Madge, a friend of Pamela's, learns from her of the perils Millicent is in from Colton. He buys an old Colton's debt and gives them in the hands of a single firm of solicitors, who insist on a settlement within twenty-four hours. Colton receives a proposition from Madge to expatriate an important enterprise of the latter's in Chile, which she financial difficulties compel him to accept. Warfield, although he has proposed to her unsuccessfully before, again asks Pamela to marry him, and she allows him to think that in time it will be possible for her to accept him. One thing, she tells him, would make her take the step now. The return of Tony Strivens. Warfield, desirous of obtaining information as to Tony's whereabouts, goes to London to visit Tony's friend Mr. Chase, who, he thinks, will be able to enlighten him. He finds on his arrival that Chase has died suddenly, and on examining the dead writing and address on the envelope of a letter headed for the missing, thinks that he has found a clue to Tony's hiding place. Colton returns from Chile and persuades Madge to go south with him. They are seen driving together late at night in Regent's Park to Mr. Under, who tells Pamela that he suspects danger for Millicent. Pamela assumes Warfield is in an old trying place of theirs for consultation. The partner of the village firm, in order to devise a plan to help Millicent, Pamela, for the second time, convinces Warfield to do his search of Tony, and he gladly accepts. Pamela goes to Rosqueburn, which she had visited as a young girl, and while there learns of the presence of Lionel Colton. Strivens, meanwhile, is sent with a troop of soldiers on an expedition across the desert of Sahara. On his return to Morocco he is given the commission of lieutenant, and he then decides to write to Millicent at that moment. Warfield arrives with the letter from Pamela. They read the letter, and decide to desert the legion, with which he has suffered for five years, and return to England. The stars in the guise of a pedlar for Morocco. Warfield is in most keen at Fox. Pamela learns that Millicent Strivens is expected at a hotel on the Riviera and sends a telegram to Warfield at Tanager urging him not to fail to return by the first, the date of Millicent's expected arrival. They come across through the mountains and moor. Warfield just in time at Fox, and they seek their way together, with some difficulty, to the coast, where they take a steamer to Larache. Tony leaves Warfield at Monte Carlo, and goes out to Rosqueburn, arriving there on the 21st. He finds Pamela, who informs him that Millicent has also just arrived. Tony suspects that Lionel Colton is there too and questions Pamela. She confirms, and he leaves her at once to find Colton. Pamela then hastily writes a note to Colton, and starts for the village with it.

CHAPTER XXX M. GIRARD AGAIN

THE dusk was deepening quickly into darkness. As she ran down the open stretch of hillside between her villa and the little town she saw the lights blaze out upon the terrace of Monte Carlo. Far below her upon her right they shone like great eyes, each with a heart of fire. Pamela stopped for a second to regain her breath before she reached Roquebrune. The sudden brightness of those lights varied her thoughts backwards to the years when the bright of trouble for her had been the sickness of a favorite horse, and all her life was an eager expectation. On so many evenings she had seen those lights flash out through the gathering night while she had sat talking in her garden with the little schoolmaster whom she was now to resist. To both of them those lights had been a paradise. They had glowed in friendliness and promise—thus she had read the paradise-out of a great, bright, gay world of men and women, upon a cool, twilight garden of youth and ignorance. She thought of what had come in place of all that inspired gaiety. To the schoolmaster, disappointment and degradation; while, as for herself, she felt very lonely upon this evening. "The world is a place of great sadness," Tony had M. Girard spoken when Pamela had returned to Roquebrune from her first season, and the words now came back to her again.

She ran on through the narrow streets of Roquebrune, her white frock shining in the light from the shops and windows. She wore no hat upon her head, and more than one of the people in the street called to her as she passed and asked her whether she needed help. Help, indeed, she did need, but not from them. She came to the tiny square where the steps led down to the station. On the wall side of the square stood the schoolhouse, and, close by, the little house of the schoolmaster. A light burned in a window on the ground floor. Pamela knocked loudly upon the door. She heard a chair grate upon the floor boards. She knocked again, and the door was opened. It was the schoolmaster himself who opened it.

"M. Girard!" she exclaimed, drawing her breath quickly. The schoolmaster leaned forward and stared at the white figure which stood in the darkness just outside his porch; but he made no reply.

"Let me in!" cried Pamela; and he made a movement as though to bar the way. But she slipped quickly past him into the room. He closed the door slowly and followed her.

The room was bare. A small table, a chair or two, and a few tattered books on a hanging bookshelf made up all its furniture. Pamela leaned against the wall with a hand to her heart. M. Girard saw her clearly now. She stood only a few feet from him in the light of the moon. She was in distress; yet he spoke harshly.

"Why have you come?" he cried; and she answered, pitiously: "I want your help."

At that a flame of anger kindled within him. He saw her again, after all this long time of her absence—her same eyes, but her never spoken with. Her dark hair, her eyes, the pure outline of her face; her tall, slim figure, the broad forehead—all the delicacy and beauty of her—was a torture to him. The sound of her voice, with its remembered accents, hurt him as he had thought nothing could ever hurt him again.

"Really?" he cried, in exasperation. "You want help; so you come to me. Without that need would you have come? No, indeed. You are a woman. Get your few friends to help you."

There were other follies upon his tongue, but he never spoke them. He looked at Pamela, and came to a stop.

Pamela had entered the cottage bent with a single mind upon her purpose—to exert a certain influence at the little restaurant on the Corniche beach. But M. Girard was before her, here in face with her, so she was free to face with him. She saw him clearly in the light as he saw her; and she was shocked. The card had prepared her for a change in her old comrade, but not for so complete a disfigurement. The new shape had written its sad story too legibly upon his prints. His face was bloated and red, the veins stood out upon the cheeks and the nose like threads of purple; his eyes were yellow and unwholesome. M. Girard had grown stout in body, too; and his dress was shabby and in disrepair. He was an image of degradation and neglect. Pamela was shocked, and betrayed the shock. She almost shrank from him at first; there was almost upon her face an expression of over-

(Continued on page 157.)

Dr. Osler at Oxford

DR. WILLIAM OSLER, who was recently appointed Regius Professor of Medicine at the University of Oxford, is a Canadian, born at Toronto, Ontario, in 1849. He was educated at the school of medicine of Trinity College, Toronto, and later attended McGill University, Montreal, from which institution he was graduated in 1872. He subsequently studied abroad, and returned in 1875 to be professor of the institutes of medicine. In 1884 he was appointed professor of clinical medicine at the University of Pennsylvania; and in 1889 he went to the Johns Hopkins Medical School as professor of medicine and physician to the hospital, which position he filled until he accepted the call to Oxford.

Dr. William Osler

Dr. Osler has written much that is of value to the medical world, and holds honorary degrees in America from a number of our foremost colleges and universities.

Stage Ice-cream

JOHN TERRACON tells the story of an amusing "break" in a production of "The Wolf" at the old Walnut Street Theatre in Philadelphia.

In these days sea-island cotton was stage ice-cream, just as molasses and water was male-believe wine—sherry or port, according to the proportion of molasses.

Armed and dressed were at table, where they had been discussing such viands as third sort of an impression on the crowded stage. Enter a maid, servant with candle-labers of the wall-labers not imaginable. The maid was so engrossed that the maid was hardly noticed by the audience, but, when she had set down the candle-labers between the unfortunate candle and her body and one candle toppled over and set the ice-cream in a blaze, the nervous strain upon the house was broken, and the entire audience burst into a roar of laughter that brought down the curtain.

A Good Rule

DELICATE MENTURE, of Oklahoma, tells of a conversation between two Irishmen living in that Territory. The one was lecturing the other upon his frequent exhibitions of ill-humor which often led him into futile quarrels in which he did not always get the best of it.

"Remember, Mulahy," said the first Celt, with an ironical air, "that when you're in a bad mood, never to say a word. Hear me and the saying: 'Silence is golden.'"

"That's a good rule," replied Mulahy, "waste no words, smash 'em!"

A pair of eyeglasses will decorate his room if his aim is true and his cartridges are loaded with Loftin & Road
Smokeless Rifle Powder

Extracts from Adam's Diary

By MARK TWAIN

"One of the funniest pieces of writing that has come from the pen of the veteran humorist," declares the Philadelphia Record of these extracts from the diary which Adam kept in the Garden of Eden, and in which he recorded his best impressions of Eve. "Of course, it is all nonsense," says the critic, "inasmuch as the wildest sort, but as such it is an undoubted masterpiece."

Hunting ed. Cloth, $1.00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Gold Bonds
for $10,000

Guaranteeing an Annual income of $500 for 20 years and then $10,000 cash would be a fine legacy for your wife and family

THIS AMOUNT OR MORE, IN
THE PRUDENTIAL
Write for Sample Bond
at your age to
THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO.
OF AMERICA.
John F. Dryden
President
HOME OFFICE
NEWARK, N.J.

Visit The Prudential's Exhibit, Palace of Education, World's Fair, St. Louis.

(Continued from page 137.)

sion and disgust. But sorrow drove the aversion away, and immediately her eyes were full of pity; and these swift changes M. Giraud saw and understood.

She was still his only window on the outside world. That was the trouble. By her expression he read his own decline more surely than in his mirror. Through her he saw the world; through her, too, he saw what manner of figure he presented to the world. Never had he realized how far he had sunk, until this moment. He saw, as in a picture, the young schoolmaster of the other days who had read French with the pupil, who was more his teacher than his pupil, upon the garden terrace of the Villa Pontignard—a youth full of dreams, which were vain, no doubt, but not ignoble. There was a tinge of melancholy, too. For even now one of the tattered books upon his shelf was a copy of his brochure on Roquebrune and the Upper Goulaine road. With perseverance, with faith—he understood it in a flash—he might have found here, at Roquebrune, a satisfaction for those ambitions which had so tortured him. There was a field here for the historian had he chosen to write on it. France might have come to him, though he never visited the great cities and the crowded streets. So he thought, and then he realized what he had become. It was true he had suffered great unhappiness. Yet so had she—Pamela; Madame; and she had not fallen from her pedestal. Here alone seized upon him. He lowered his eyes from her face.

"It is I!" he stammered. "You ask me to help you? Look at me! I can give you no help!"

He suddenly broke off. He sat down at the table, buried his face in his hands, and burst into tears. Pamela crossed to him, and laid her hand very gently upon his shoulder.

She spoke very gently, too.

"Oh, yes, you can," she said.

He drew away from her, but she would not be repulsed.

"You should never have come to me at all," he sobbed. "Oh, how I hate that you should see me like this. Why did you come?"

"I did not mean you to see me. You must have known that."

"It was not kind of you, madame-elle."

"I came, think me, it was not kind."

"Yet, I am glad that it is true—my need is so great; but now I am of myself, it is true—my need is so great. I ask you to rise up and see your need is as great as mine. I ask you to rise up and help me."

"No, leave me alone!" he cried.

"And she answered, gently. 'I will not.'"

M. Giraud grew quiet. He pressed his handkerchief to his eyes, and stood up.

"Forgive me!" he said. "I have behaved like a child; but you would forgive me if you knew how I have waited and waited for you to come back. But you never did. And the winter came, and I was left alone in the spring. But neither in winter nor in the spring did you return to Roquebrune. I have needed you all these years."

"She said to herself, 'I am very sorry.'"

"I am sorry," replied Pamela; "but she could not see, indeed, so badly as she thought."

"I am not sorry," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She did not weep," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

Pamela crossed to him, and laid her hand very gently upon his shoulder.

You must have known that. You could not be kind of you, madame-elle."

"I came, think me, it was not kind."

"Yet, I am glad that it is true—my need is so great; but now I am of myself, it is true—my need is so great. I ask you to rise up and see your need is as great as mine. I ask you to rise up and help me."

"No, leave me alone!" he cried.

"And she answered, gently. 'I will not.'"

M. Giraud grew quiet. He pressed his handkerchief to his eyes, and stood up.

"Forgive me!" he said. "I have behaved like a child; but you would forgive me if you knew how I have waited and waited for you to come back. But you never did. And the winter came, and I was left alone in the spring. But neither in winter nor in the spring did you return to Roquebrune. I have needed you all these years."

"She said to herself, 'I am very sorry.'"

"I am sorry," replied Pamela; "but she could not see, indeed, so badly as she thought."

"I am not sorry," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She did not weep," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

"She was not weeping," she said. "But she was none the less distressed."

red. There was something grotesque in the aspect of this drunken face, all convulsed with sorrow. Nothing could well be less in sympathy with Pamela's nature than Giraud's conduct and display of tears; for she was herself resilient and proud. She held her head high as she walked through the world, mistress alike of her sorrows and her joys. But Mr. Minder had spoken the truth when he had called upon her in Leinster-shire. Imagination had come to her of late. She was able to understand the other point of view—to appreciate that there were other characters than hers which must needs fulfil themselves in ways which were not hers. She put herself now in M. Giraud's place. She imagined his waiting and waiting at Roquebrune, with his one window on the outside world closed and shuttered—a man in a darkened room who most passionately desired the air with-out. She said, with a trace of hesitation:

"You say you have needed me very much?"

"Oh, have I not?" exclaimed Giraud; and the very weakness of his voice would have convinced her had she needed conviction.

It seemed to express the dilatory passage of the years during which he had looked for her coming, and had looked in vain.

"Well, then, listen to me," she went on. "I was once told that to be so loved by those whom one needs is a great comfort. I thought of the saying at the time, and I thought that it was a true one. Afterwards"—she began to speak slowly, carefully selecting her words—"it happened that in my own experience I proved it to be true, at all events for me. Is it true for you, also? Think well. If it is not true I will go away as you bade me at the beginning; but if it is true—why, then, I may be of some little help to you, and you will be certainly a great help to me; for I need you very sorely."

M. Giraud looked at her in a kind of wonder for a little while. Then he answered her with simplicity, and so, for the first time during this interview, were the proper dignity of a man.

"Yes, I will help you," he said.

"What can I do?"

"She held out the letter which she had written to him, the best speed he could to his destination.

"Leave me time!" she implored. "I am not sure, but it may be that one man's life, and the happiness of a man and a woman, both, all hang upon its quick receipt."

M. Giraud took his hat from the wall and went to the door, face, he said in a whisper, recalling thus, with an averted speech:

"There is one, then, whom you need? You are no longer lonely in your thoughts? I should like to know."

"Yes," Pamela answered, gently; "I am no longer lonely in my thoughts."

"And you are happy?" he continued. "You were not happy when you were at Roquebrune last. I should like to know that."

"Yes," said Pamela. In the presence of his distress she rather shrank from acknowledging the change which had come over her. It seemed cruel; yet he clearly wished to know. He clearly would be the happier for knowing. "Yes," she said; "I am happy."

"I am very glad," said M. Giraud, in a low voice; "I am very glad. And he went rather quickly out by the door."

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

To be continued.

How Weather Conditions affect the War

(Continued from page 1465.)

latitude 40 degrees (about that of New York city), most of the line lies north of latitude 30 degrees, and it is only after crossing the Amur region, almost across the continent, that the road inclines appreciably towards the south. The American parallel of this road would start a few hundred miles northwest of Sitka, Alaska, and pass eastward through the valleys of the Lena and Nakhchivan rivers to the lower basin of Hudson Bay, and then suddenly turn sharply to the southeast to New York; but to follow out the parallel climatically New York should have a south Canadian climate with temperatures of thirty to forty degrees below zero.

In average winters the minimum temperatures along the railroad route are about —22°F. at St. Petersburg, —28°F. at Moscow, —31°F. at the crossing of the Volga, —40°F. in the Urals, —50°F. at the crossing of the Irkutsk, —55°F. at the Ili, and —58°F. at the Yenisei. In the neighborhood of Lake Baikal there is apparently a slight alleviation of the cold, and temperatures of only —42°F. may be expected, but in the westward, in the region between the lake and the Amur River, the cold becomes more severe, and —50°F. is the rule. When the railroad turns south, the cold becomes gradually less, decreasing to —4°F. at Vladivostok and +10°F. at Port Arthur. It must be remembered that these are the minimum temperatures to be expected, but the thermometer may go from ten to twenty degrees lower than those in detail.

In the summer, on the contrary, steady temperatures of 95°F. may be expected at almost any point along the route traversed by the railroad. But it is the average temperature that exist day in and day out on which the thickness of the ice and other winter conditions depend. The average temperature for January decreases from +14°F. at St. Petersburg to zero at the Irkutsk, and —4°F. at Lake Baikal, and —12°F. on the Amur; but increases to +5°F. at Vladivostok and +14°F. at Port Arthur. The average January temperature at New York city is about +30°F.; at Peking about +24°F., and at Tokyo about +36°F. These figures indicate the enormous differences between the continued cold of Siberia and that of Japan. During the quiet condition of the air in Siberia it is about as cold in the valleys as it is high up on the mountains, and not infrequently it is actually colder in the former localities. This is a result of the usual condition, in which the temperature decreases with increase of altitude.

Fortunately the air of Siberia is very dry, and throughout most of the Trans-Siberian route the winter snowfall is slight. It is seldom that over a foot of snow accumulates on the ground during the whole winter, and sometimes the ground remains almost bare for months at a time; and even at Irkutsk, near Lake Baikal, in midwinter a wheelbarrow is used, while in warmer European Russia even a pair of runners. But when the snow does fall it is to stay until early summer, unless away from exposed places to be blown off in wind-swept hollows. The spring snows are much to be feared, however, for more snow usually falls then in a short time than during the whole winter, when a cloudless sky and steady cold is the rule. Spring freshets, sometimes of frightful dimensions, occur, and since the water usually all runs off to the frozen ground, it beats all runs off to the frozen ground, of the streams. Even the waters of the great Lake Baikal rise considerably as a result of receiving the flood drainage of the rains in eastern Siberia and Manchuria that even with the advent of spring all marching difficulties are not removed.

Although the usual atmospheric condition of the Siberian winter is a clear sky and blue sky, nevertheless winter storms occur at times which for violence are not ex-

AFTER a morning's shopping nothing will recuperate you so much as one of those delicious Club Cocktails. They are the correct thing to offer your friends whenever they call. They are both a tonic and stimulant, and fill a distinct place of their own. Easily served and appreciated by ladies and gentlemen alike. Buy some Manhattan and Martini, and ask your friends which they prefer. Of all dealers. Specify CLUB COCKTAILS.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., - Sole Proprietors
HARTFORD NEW YORK LONDON

The funniest of biographies—

The Memoirs of a Baby

By JOSEPHINE DASKAM

With Sixty Very Funny Pictures by F. Y. Cory

The memoirs are comical all the way through, but there are parts that are positively irresistible. —Baltimore Herald

One reads the tale to laugh at its pervasive humor, delight in its choice sketches of human nature, and fall in love with the baby. —Washington Times

In this strenuous and intense age it is one of the books that ought to be read by way of rest and relaxation. —Outlook

Never before has the dignified title of "Memoirs" graced so funny a book as this. —Chicago Leader

Josephine Daskam is to be accounted among American humorists. —Chicago Record-Herald

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

TWO BOOKS BY GEORGE ADE

(Imprint of R. H. RUSSELL)

THE GIRL PEOPLE
PROPOSITION YOU KNOW

A Bunch of He-and-She Fables

GEORGE ADE'S LATEST

George Ade's fables are read the world over. The present volume is, as its title indicates, a series of extraordinarily clever sketches on a theme that is very dear to the author's heart, and which is vastly interesting to most people.

The Girl Proposition is packed with sense and wit and entertainment, all in the inimitable Ade vein. Profusely illustrated by Holme and McCutcheon. $1.00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK CITY

No living writer could duplicate the work done here by this keen and humorous observer of American life. Among the twenty-six "people you know" are The Patient Toler, The True Friend, The Self-Made Hezekiah, The Married Couple, The Samaritan, The Work Horse, and The Two Young People.

Over fifty quaint illustrations by McCutcheon and others. $1.00.

MOTOR BOATS

LAUNCHES, STEAM AND SAIL YACHTS, ROW BOATS, CANOES

SPEED—PLEASURE—BUSINESS

Beverly, Boston, Kew-Forest, Hempstead, New York

Let us show you the latest in motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

We have a large stock of motor boats and yachts

THE ONLY SALESDROOMS IN GREATER NEW YORK FOR THE CELEBRATED

PIANOS SOHMER PIANOS

ARE LOCATED IN THE SOHMER BUILDING
FIFTH AVENUE CORNER 224 STREET

THE "SOHMER" HEADS THE LISTS OF THE HIGHEST GRADE PIANOS

AS OTHERS SEE US—SKETCHES OF THE AMERICAN INTERVIEWER BY TOM BROWNE, THE KNOWN ENGLISH CARTOONIST WELL.

By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS
F.R.G.S.

Stories of Travel and Adventure in Many Lands

Eight Volumes of Absorbing Interest

No more delightful stories of travel and adventure have ever been written than these charming pictures from the graceful pen of Mr. Richard Harding Davis. His genius for close observation, the personal charm of a natural style, and an ever-ready sense of humor bring to him an audience wide as the English-speaking world.

Eight Volumes Handsomely Bound

THE EXILES OUR ENGLISH COUSINS ABOUT PARIS
VAN BIBBER, AND OTHERS THE WEST FROM A CAR-WINDOW
THE RULERS OF THE MEDITERRANEAN
THREE GRINGOS IN VENEZUELA AND CENTRAL AMERICA
A YEAR FROM A REPORTER'S NOTE-BOOK

Eight Volumes Beautifully Illustrated

300 Full-Page Illustrations by Charles Dana Gibson, Frederic Remington, T. de Thulstrup, and a great many others.

OUR OFFER We will send you the entire set of eight volumes, charges prepaid, on receipt of $1.00. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $1.00 every month for eleven months. In order to keep you in touch with us during these months, on receipt of your request for these books we will enter you as a subscriber to either Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, Harper's Bazar, or The North American Review for one year without additional cost to you. In writing, state which periodical you want.

ADDRESS

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

HEALTH

is the

Most Important

The manufacturers of Royal Baking Powder have had forty years of scientific experience.

Every method of bread-and-cake raising has been exhaustively studied in this country and abroad.

The result is a perfect product in Royal Baking Powder. Alum and phosphate powders cannot be substituted for it.

Experiments have demonstrated conclusively that baking powders of greatest efficiency and wholesomeness can only be made with pure grape cream of tartar.

Royal is a pure, cream of tartar baking powder.

Royal Baking Powder is healthful and makes wholesome food.

Royal Baking Powder makes food good to taste.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

ABSOLUTELY PURE

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, October 1, 1904

No. 2603

Copyright, 1904, by Harper & Brothers. All rights reserved

"Oh, the bulldog on the bank,
And the bullfrog in the pool;
The bulldog...." etc., etc.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2493

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

FORTY-FOUR PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER 1, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Japan, and Tientsin, Samsou

Entered at the New York Post Office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO HUMBUG!

The nominations for Governor of the State of New York afford ample cause for intense gratification both within and without the State. Lovers of good government everywhere, irrespective of partisan proclivities, will rejoice in the evidences of a return to political policies consonant with the lofty aims and sturdy principles of the fathers of the republic. The fact that sordid and selfish purposes have constituted the ruling motives in the selection of candidates, especially in this State, for so many years, serves only to signalize a change so striking and emphatic as to seem almost revolutionary. Americans have known, though foreign commentators actuated by a spirit of envy have assumed to doubt, that it was only a question of time when the disgrace temporarily resting upon our popular government would be removed. Optimistic, however, as many have felt the necessity of being, few would have ventured to predict a transformation so quick, so unexpected by carping critics, so conclusive to the minds of unprejudiced observers. That New York should lead in an effort to purify our political system was but natural. She is the Empire State. Her citizens are justly proud, not only of her preeminent position as a nation within a nation, but of their own individual privileges of participation in her glorious present and, we trust, yet more glorious future. When the year opened the outlook seemed more discouraging than ever before. The two great parties apparently were ridden, not only by losses, but by the worst of losses, men incapable of appreciating high ideals in public service and more than willing to prostitute the power entrusted to them to unworthy ends. How mistaken was that judgment, how baseless the apprehension accompanying it, is evidenced by the most gratifying results to which we have referred.

ELIAS ROOR, the Republican nominee for Governor, is foremost among American statesmen. Although holding no public position until he had reached full maturity of years, his marked ability as a lawyer and student of affairs was so well recognized that, when he was appointed Secretary of War at a most trying time in our national history, no doubt of his successful performance of the severe task confronting him was expressed or entertained. Needless to say, the anticipations of the country were more than realized. He proved his intellectual and executive capacity in a manner so marked as to evoke only praise from men of all shades of opinion. That his party within the State, whose just pride in the great sons she had given to the national service in the past was intensified by the work he had done, should have insisted upon honoring both itself and him by placing the laurel of its chief magistracy upon his brow would have been but natural in the days of JAY, of CUSTON, of MARCY, of SEWARD. At this time, however, when political morals seemed to have reached their lowest ebb, we must reluctantly admit that the recognition, the appreciation, the insistence, were unexpected. For that very reason Mr. ROOR's nomination is doubly satisfying and more distinctly a cause of general congratulation than it could possibly have been in any other circumstances.

To what extent the naming of Mr. ROOR by the Republicans influenced the Democratic party we are unable to determine. That it induced at least an effort to attain a similarly high level is probable. In any case, the result is all-sufficient and equally gratifying. One needs but to recall the recent candidates—HILL, VAN WICK, STEVENSON, COLLES—to appreciate the signal advance made by the Democratic party in selecting Dr. LANSKY NICKOL as its standard-bearer. Mr. NICKOL has had less public experience in recent years than Mr. ROOR, but there are few minds which do not cherish the recollection of the extraordinary capability and utter fearlessness displayed by the district attorney who not only detected but convicted the thieves whose prey was the public. Nor since that time, although as a private citizen, has he ever wavered in the performance of a public duty. True to his convictions, without regard to possible personal advantage, he promptly repudiated the heresies which had taken possession of his party, and stood squarely for the right as he beheld the right. A strong, sagacious, respected man, incapable of deceit or wrong-doing, now in the full vigor of his powers, it must be admitted by the most partisan of opponents that a more creditable selection could not have been made. For the first time in years neither Democrat nor Republican need hang his head when entering the booth to prepare his ballot for his party's candidate for the splendid position of Governor of this great commonwealth.

But this is not all. Foreign critics have been accustomed to sneer at what they have been pleased to term the pernicious domination of our political bosses. We ourselves, at times in the past when it seemed as if we were justified in so doing, have lamented an apparently growing tendency to permit men engaged in politics solely for personal advantage to guide our great parties without let, hindrance, or complaint. So far as the human vision could perceive, it was an unwise policy. Instances when it had not proven wholly satisfactory were numerous. Consequently—we frankly admit in all humility—we contemplated the forthcoming nomination for Governor to be made by Governor BENJAMIN B. ORREL, Jr., and former-Senator DAVID BENNETT HILL with serious apprehension of an unsatisfactory outcome. We even went so far, our readers will remember, as to predict that Governor ORREL would never consent to the nomination of an independent, high-minded man of the order of ELIAS ROOR or NICHOLAS MITCHELL BUTLER, but, in some way or other, in the way best adapted to create a false impression, would foist upon the party a mere personal tool to whom his word would be law. It is true that, in venturing this anticipation, we implied plainly that Governor ORREL was less concerned by the fate of the national candidates than by his own as a future profit-sharer in political business as it has been transacted in the past. We can only say, in extenuation of the offense, that the implication was a logical and inevitable sequence of an apprehension of his probable action, and was believed to be warranted by his past conduct. In like manner, needless to inform our readers, we misunderstood former-Senator HILL. In some inexplicable manner we confounded patriotic fervor and partisan politics. We feared and said that we feared that he would select a professional politician of his own stripe with whom he could have an "understanding" respecting the future in return for the present favor conferred. That, in conformity with his custom, he would attempt to disguise his real purpose by choosing one not publicly recognized as his henchman in the past, we took for granted. In plaintive excuse for this unworthy suspicion, we can only plead that hitherto "shyness" had seemed to be his guiding star. While mere regard for justice compels us to speak thus frankly and humbly, we cannot but rejoice, as we said at the beginning, in the happy outcome. In either Mr. ROOR or Mr. NICKOL the Empire State will have a Governor worthy of her best traditions and her present preeminence. But, oh! the relief of the realization that at last we shall not have to choose between—shall we say a HUGAN and a HERRICK! For this boon all praise and gratitude to Governor BENJAMIN B. ORREL, Jr., and former-Senator DAVID BENNETT HILL. They not only, in the language of the classics, "seen their duty and done it," but in the no less graphic words of a well-known statesman, "they done their damndest; angels could do no more."

The pickled sheepskins will not down. The Boston Commercial Bulletin has run to earth the thoughtless official who made a ruling in conformity with his judgment without regard for political exigencies. Assistant-Secretary C. H. KAZZ is the wretched person and, speaking for the Massachusetts manufacturers who know from past experience what a tariff is between "friends," the Bulletin demands his instant dismissal on the broad ground of incompetency. Doubtless Senator LORAIN has already communicated with the President and may have received a reply, similar to the other, to the effect that the matter will be considered as soon as Secretary SAWYER finishes his real work of campaigning and returns to Washington to rest up. Meanwhile the Boston World observes that "this is not the only instance in which our junior Senator has made use of his power to procure a construction of the tariff relieving some of his constituents from taxation as a means of bolstering up his political fortunes." It seems that for a long time frozen herrings were admitted to Gloucester duty free, while a tax was imposed at the Boston port. This seemed a little irregular to the thrifty Bostonese, who complained. It was a difficult situation, but not too difficult for Senator LORAIN, who deftly solved it by getting the Boston ruling changed, so that frozen herrings could come straight to the gilded dome without contributing a cent to the maintenance of the army in the Philippines. The World considers this "a strained construction," but the interest being local, its protest is not unduly vehement. So also with the pickled sheepskins. While objecting to the method of fixing tariff rates between friends—i. e. between President and Senator—it wishes it distinctly understood that "we are not in this endeavoring to find a reason for imposing a new tax; far from it." And yet they laughed at General HANCOCK when he said that the tariff was a local issue!

Mr. WILLIAM L. DOUGLASS was so pleased by the Yazoo City Blade's discovery of his likeness to Judge PARKER that he decided to become the Democratic candidate for Governor of Massachusetts. He is no gum-shoe candidate, either.

Judge PARKER dictated and signed the following note to Mr. GEORGE F. PARKER—no relation—editor of the Democratic campaign text-book:

MY DEAR MR. PARKER.—The Times of this morning says that the pretty text-book is about prepared, and that it will go to the printer in a few days. Therefore I hasten to beg you to see to it that there is no word in it that reflects upon the personal honor and integrity of President ROOSEVELT.

As Evening Post editorial indicates that but little care was taken in that direction toward myself by the compiler of the Republican text-book, but let there be no rejoinder in kind or otherwise. I feel confident that you need no reminder: still my anxiety impels me to send this caution. Very truly yours,

ALFRED H. PARKER.

Thompson Tom had the letter lithographed at Mr. BELMONT'S expense and sent to all the good papers, such as the Times, the World, and the Brooklyn Eagle, and they printed it in facsimile with commendatory comment. Was ever such nonsense! Do they really mean to tell us that all the Judge knows of the contents of the two text-books he gets from the Times and Evening Post? And, pray, what has THOMPSON ROOSEVELT ever done that would justify an expectation that in any way was about to be made upon his "personal honor and integrity"? And if the Judge really did entertain such a suspicion, why did he not quietly and privately warn the presumed idiots instead of putting forth an ostentatious direction to be lithographed and exploited as a campaign document! Will politicians never learn that men are not mice!

Mr. THOMPSON accepts.

Everybody is more or less unhappy. Even the Press, the Mite, unthinking, partisan Press, is more than dissatisfied with the Republican nomination of LIZZ BRUCE for Lieutenant-Governor. Listen:

Governor QUELL made a serious error in permitting Mr. LIZZ BRUCE to be forced on the Republican State ticket by the influences which placed him there. The Governor ought to have held out to the very last against those who put Mr. Bruce forward. He ought not to have consented to this nomination under any circumstances. The name of Mr. Bruce ought not to be withdrawn from the ticket. It is not so late to do this. It is our earnest conviction that the good of the rest of the State ticket and perhaps even the national ticket demands this change.

This is truly touching. If the protest were based upon considerations of public weal, it would be creditable and significant; but of course there is something personal back of it and so it need not be regarded seriously. Incidentally the Press seems to have known who exercised the real power in the convention. Better substantiation of Senator PLATT'S sneering perception of the QUELL tag on Mr. THOMPSON could hardly be desired.

The oddity of the present situation could not be better illustrated than by the fact that the Sun supports a Republican for President and a Democrat for Governor, and the Evening Post supports a Democrat for President and a Republican for Governor. Heads or tails, each is pretty sure to be on both the winning and losing sides.

When, during the latest session of Congress, we read the speeches of Senator FURNES—one in particular exceptionally lucid and genuinely statesmanlike—we were happy to conclude that he had outlived the flamboyance which characterized his early career. The changing of spots, however, is a most difficult operation, as the Senator now demonstrates by joining the pack of small partisan barkers who question the sincerity of Judge PARKER's telegram to Mr. SHELDON. In it he receives only "the hand of that astute politician, DAVID R. HILL," and he sneers at the "hysterical" commendation of Mr. CLEVELAND. This, of course, is Senator FURNES'S privilege and apparently it is his nature. As a matter of fact, being an intelligent man, he knows perfectly well that, in hinting at trickery on the part of Judge PARKER in this connection, he is only trying to create a false impression of a most creditable act for political purposes. Fortunately, the attempt is as futile as it is unworthy. Moreover, the Senator's reference to Mr. CLEVELAND is hardly happy. It recalls to mind the incident of "the hero of the unshaken hand," in which it was neither Mr. nor Mrs. CLEVELAND, but a certain uncomfortable and very properly snubbed statesman, now Senator from Ohio, who became "hysterical."

Mr. HEARST'S papers are warmly and cordially supporting Judge PARKER.—Columbian Explorer writes.
Graciously referred to GEORGE HARVEY, of HARPER'S WEEKLY.—Rochester Press.

Only between meals: Old Doctor WATSON is their regular diet.

We have received quite a number of letters from people complaining that we do not treat the Republican candidate with proper respect, chiefly because we occasionally refer to him as "the Colonel" or "ROOSEVELT" instead of "the President" or "President ROOSEVELT." The only one in the lot to which we attach any importance came from Mrs. FREDERICK BULLINOS, an intelligent, public-spirited woman for whose opinions we have very high regard. Now the answer to all this is that when Mr. ROOSEVELT says or does something as President, we invariably give him his official title. When he says or does anything as a candidate, it is eminently proper—and will continue to be so until he declares himself THOMPSON the First—to refer to him as one would refer to any other candidate. Incidentally he has never yet been elected President. Moreover, it just happens that of late he has been so busy being a candidate that he has done comparatively little as President. Indeed, it would be difficult to tell in which capacity he suspended the Treasury ruling taxing pickled sheepskins; he probably doesn't know, himself; LORAIN asked him and he did it, possibly to demonstrate that, although a recent, he is not the least earnest "friend" of the tariff. There never was much trouble about titles, anyhow, until we started the country on the imperialistic road. The elder

SAMUEL BOWLER and the elder JAMES GORDON BENNETT objected even to "Miser." "Don't say Mr. GARRELY," the latter once directed; "say GREELEY; everybody knows who GREELEY is." So when you say ROOSEVELT, everybody knows whom you mean. He is unique. There is nobody of the same or any other name like him. When he hears it, he answers readily enough. And when he speaks, he speaks for himself—so why bother about it?

The Springfield Republican is eighty years old, and looks, but doesn't feel it. No newspaper in the country has a better editorial page. Indeed, we can think of but one as good—and that is not printed in New York, either. It is truly refreshing to turn from the series of military orders which now pervade metropolitan journalism to articles such as the one which we reprint elsewhere as a sample of the Springfield Republican's enlightened philosophy.

Judge PARKER does not claim any credit for himself or his party because the gold standard has been established. He does not say who established it or how it was established.—SENATOR FORAKER.

What he might have said with precise truth is that a Democratic President did more to establish it than anybody else, and that the chief obstacle in his way was the determined opposition of certain Republican filibusters. Would Senator FORAKER care to have his own record and that of various Ohio conventions in which he played a conspicuous part dug out of the History of Humbug?

ROBERT TRIST PAINÉ, Jr., twice the Democratic candidate for Governor of Massachusetts, declares for ROOSEVELT on the BOOKER WASHINGTON issue. It seems that ROBERT apprehends that the Judge might not ask BOOKER to dine in the main room, but would "shunt him off into a Jim Crow pantry behind the house." Personally, we doubt if Senator WASHINGTON would get as far as the pantry, but ROBERT, in his naïveté's eye, sees him nibbling a cookie in a corner as dark as himself, and the conjured spectacle is too much for his proud and sensitive spirit. By arduous mental process, therefore, he eliminates all other questions at issue and soulfully declares himself. It is pleasing to note that the saved lamb receives a hearty welcome into the fold. The Evening Mail seems to be the most deeply impressed. "Evidently," it sternly ejaculates, "the blood of the old signer of the Declaration of Independence, whose lineal descendant Mr. PAINÉ is, boils in his veins." We guess it does; it couldn't very well boil anywhere else. What does the Mail suspect it was doing when this "best of the representatives of the old, respectable element of the New England Democracy," this "man thoroughly in line with modern sociological thought," was shouting his lungs out for BRAN and all that he stood for? Only sizzling, we suppose. The Boston Herald, on the spot, doubtless hits the nail on the head when it says that ROBERT "finds in the somewhat erratic career of President ROOSEVELT a greater promise of eventually landing on the foundations of Populism than can be discovered in the career of the nominee of the Democratic national convention," and consequently slips from the frying-pan into the fire.

President ROOSEVELT regards the workmen as anarchists; he drives them from his presence; he calls the soldiers to shoot them.—From the Brooklyn speech of the peerless CUCKRAN.

The Press is as silly as usual in trying to fix the responsibility for the World's Oyster Bay fiasco upon the long-suffering Judge, simply because he commended Mr. PUTLITZ's trenchant open letter to Mr. ROOSEVELT. We have no means of ascertaining who was really responsible for the publication of that shameful tale, but we do know that the man who thus far has condoned the offence by neglecting to make correction and offer apology is Mr. JOSEPH PUTLITZ. The Judge has all the editing he can do in restraining Mr. GEORGE F. PARKER and other impetuous writers from telling fibs about his rival in the campaign text-book.

The most important fact yet developed regarding Mr. HUGGINS—or is it THOMAS?—the Republican candidate for Governor, in that he has what they call a "life motto." It is pasted on his desk and reads as follows:

Thy easy enough to be pleasant when life
Flows by like a song,
But the man worth while is the man with a smile
When everything goes dead wrong.

Inasmuch as his own life seems to be flowing by like a song just at present, we beg to suggest most respectfully that it would be a kindly act on the part of Mr. HUGGINS to send the motto to Senator PLATT. The Senator would appreciate something of the sort just now, and we have no doubt he would return it with his compliments on the day after election, when Mr. HUGGINS himself may feel in need of a little good philosophical cheer.

Professor HENRY LOWELL NELSON pauses in the contemplation of the latest variety of bugs in his Williamstown potato-patch to "point a moral," to the effect, namely, that Mr. ROOSEVELT ought not to be elected because "his manners are far inferior to those of all his immediate predecessors." We suppose he used the word "immediate" to avoid comparison with such Presidents as ANDREW JACKSON and ABRAHAM LINCOLN, who in some respects are supposed to have done pretty well. But has the Professor as soon forgotten the democratic simplicity, not to say boorishness, of manner of his own particular idol before he came under the refining influence of a gentlewoman after reaching the White House? Moreover, in what respect can Mr. ROOSEVELT be said truthfully to be deficient in the attributes of good breeding? Surely no slight can have been put upon a tutored Professor-politician who used to refer to him constantly as "THEODORE"!

Mr. HUGGINS is interested in four stores in Olean. Two of these are general stores and two are groceries.—The Herald.

Can this be the tie that binds?

Here are the Judge's hands as depicted by the Journal:

"Sketched from life—Judge PARKER giving the Glad Hand to the Leaders at the Hoffman House," is the title. We never knew before what a glad hand was. . . . Take it away!

"A speech unfit to be made," is the disrespectful way in which Mr. McKELWAY refers to the peerless CUCKRAN's latest ebullition of words in Brooklyn. Nevertheless, it is only fair to say that it purporteth to be in support of the Judge. Really now, what has become of that Trust money in the Republican treasury?

MARSH HENRY, taking it as task for suspecting another side of the story of Mr. ROOSEVELT's treatment of JEFFERSON DAVIS, hittingly asks:

He who did this is now the President of the United States. We owe respect at least to the office. We are mindful, too, of the circumstance that we would be as safe in using offensive language of the President as Mr. ROOSEVELT was in the use of offensive language to Mr. DAVIS, and, therefore, we shall not emulate his bad example. But, remarking that Mr. ROOSEVELT was not a young man when he treated General MEADE much as he had treated Mr. DAVIS, we put this question to Mr. HENRY, whether the ruffian who knows and how to respect either the gray hairs of a gentleman like JEFFERSON DAVIS, or the services of a veteran soldier like NELSON MILLS—in any notion of many other incidents of a similar tenor that might be recalled—does not deserve something more than to be excused and dismissed as a brave but unthoughtful youngster, lacking among his many surprising virtues, only the saving grace of a little courtesy and consideration!

Our readers, if not MARSE HENRY, are aware that we considered the President's attitude towards General MILLS unnecessary and unwise, not technically perhaps in the immediate circumstances, but in consideration of his past services. And yet there was severe provocation. Did MARSE HENRY never hear that NELSON A. MILLS, while in command of the United States army, tried to inveigle Governor THOMSON ROOSEVELT into a political conspiracy against WILLIAM McKINLEY, his commander-in-chief at that very moment? And was ever the conduct of a high military officer more destructive of discipline or more detrimental to the service he was bound in honor to maintain than that of General MILLS under President ROOSEVELT and Secretary ROOSEVELT? But the topic is not pleasing to those of us who prefer to cherish the recollection of the spid-like deeds of one of our greatest soldiers, and might well be dropped. We are glad, indeed, to receive MARSE HENRY's assurance of the recognition of the fact that he "ows respect at least to the office" of President. Otherwise we should never have known that "ruffian" could be considered a term of endearment.

Senator FARMER has travelled seven thousand miles over American railways without being delayed a moment by the familiar hot box.

MR. ADOLPH S. OCHS returned from Europe in the nick of time. The notes from Editor CHARLES R. MILLER's shiny coat were beginning to waver; one had even flatted to the plaintive zean, "Let us at least save New York!" It was one of those times, well recognized in every great journalistic history of the present day, calling for inspiration from the lost. Fortunately Mr. OCHS was in just the mood, full of happy thoughts and chipper as a cricket. The necessity confronting him was that of setting an example—and the occasion awaited the man. The Judge was about to put on his go-to-sleeping boots and wally forth in the darkness of night in the wicked city in order that he might confer more readily with the great minds—all except TOWN's—there assembled. With the quick decision characteristic of one accustomed to grab opportunity by the tail, Mr. OCHS dashed northward over the glistering rails and landed safely in classic Eospan. Scarcely conscious within sheltering leaves upon the bench of a friendly tree, pad and pencil in hand, he awaited impatiently but firmly the portentous event. Finally—but why lay profane hands upon those matchless words? The minister speaks:

With a sideways the candidate entered the cabinet and was driven down the hill to the dock. His departure was marked by a great display of natural pyrotechnics. The lightning flashed and the thunder crashed, and with a heavy haze settling down like a huge canopy, shutting off all view of the eastern shore, and the candidate going on a waltz drive down the rocky hill road through the rain, disciples of the strenuous life would have been quite well satisfied with the stage set for the Judge's entry into active work.

The shingles on the huge canopy being loose, the pad was hurled and streams trickled down the artist's back, but what cared he? Duty had beckoned and had been well met. In fitting words, the Judge's "entry into active work," his departure to stir up the hired men, had been celebrated. Only the rival would direct attention to the unfortunate circumstance that his path lay "down a rocky road." He had shouldered the burden; he had, as it were, went. Now blows the cornet clear and strong, and joy pervades the press-room.

Sure it is the Republican policy, its actualities and its tendencies as illustrated by its administration of the government. Its President being a candidate for reelection, how are we going to escape ROOSEVELT as the issue, both personally and politically? That is the "conundrum" we should like HARPER'S WEEKLY to answer for us.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

You can't escape him, MARSE HENRY; he wouldn't stay escaped if you did. Only please don't talk any more about his resemblance to pirates who scuttle ships. He might hang a few to bits—and enjoy doing it—if he should get started, but he is no scuttler, MARSE HENRY, as you very well know—and a chivalrous Kentucky gentleman ought not to say such things.

GEORGE ADE told the Colonel that out in Indiana they thought the Judge was a good sort of man to take along to picnics to build swings for the children. We dare say they are right. Anyhow, a mother would feel easier about her offspring in a good, safe swing built by the Judge than in a shoddy-sawdust, which would be the most natural thing for some people we know to start up at a picnic.

"Everything great done by this country in the last fifty years," said JONAS HAY in his Jackson speech, "has been done under the auspices of the Republican party." Mr. ROOSEVELT said in his key-note speech at St. Louis: "Through the Republican party more than any other political organization the moral sentiment of America finds expression. It cannot depart from the direction of its tendencies." The Republican party, thus lauded for its incomparable merits by two of its most honored and eloquent sons, has a good deal of history. During the second term of General GRANT the impression got around that the incomparable party was saturated with corruption. There were numerous whiskey frauds, some of which were prosecuted with good results, but the bulk of which, though known, were not punished. Men very near the President were believed to put their official power and official knowledge to most-trustfully corrupt uses, and this impression was strengthened by the conviction of one cabinet officer of high crimes and misdemeanors, and the retirement of other high officials in disgrace. So many scandals transpired, and so much gossip was there about them, that though General GRANT himself was always believed to be a man of honest purposes, the people were brought—were doubtless misled—to the conviction that the Republican administration was rotten to its core, and a considerable majority of the voters were induced to cast their votes for a Democrat; to wit, SAMUEL JOHNS THAYER.

Everybody thought that Mr. THAYER had been elected. The awful disaster of a Democratic administration was imminent. If it had befallen, no one can say to what extent the grand record which Mr. HAY and Mr. ROOSEVELT so feelingly expounded would have been curtailed. But it did not befall. A lot of devoted patriots, roused on election night by Senator BULL CHAMBERLAIN of New Hampshire Paul-Revering through the corridors of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, got up out of bed and hurled themselves into the numerous branches. Mr. HAY was found to be really entitled to 165 electoral votes. Only twenty more were required to establish him in the White House. It was not a simple matter to acquire those twenty votes, but the Republican patriots did it. One they got in Oregon. To that one they had perhaps a moral right. But the four they got in Florida, the seven from South Carolina, and especially the eight from Louisiana, were not obtained without a great deal of hard work, the cooperation of many earnest souls, and much violence, doubtless, to the feelings of the patriots most concerned. In Louisiana, where it was necessary to throw out over 12,000 Democratic votes, the proceedings were very trying indeed. But the noble men who had undertaken to avert disaster from the country were indomitably persistent. The vote of parish after parish was thrown out, usually on the ground of intimidation, supported by such evidence as was necessary. The patriots were rewarded by success, the humbler ones being further remunerated in cash, the higher with office of all degrees of emolument and dignity.

And here we come to the case of the devoted colored patriot ELIZA PINKSTON. She was a woman of very humble station, not well-to-do, not well considered, but when it was represented to her, as in many others, that her testimony was needed by the Republican party, to prove intimidation of voters in her parish, she came forward and gave it with such heartiness and in such quantity as made her name a household word throughout the United States. She swore that her husband had been taken in the night from his home in Ouachita parish, and had been shot seven times, run through and through with knives, and variously mutilated; that her child's throat had been cut while in her arms; and that she had been twice shot, and subjected to repeated indignities of a nature inexpressibly trying; and all by a company of young white men whose names she gave. ELIZA's testimony was a part of the evidence on which the vote of Chautauk parish was thrown out. She was only one of very many instruments that were used for the accomplishment of a great purpose. But, as said, the fame of her devotion spread far and wide in the land. It was the more noteworthy, the more pathetic, because all her testimony was the offering of a faithful heart, and unsupported by any shred of fact, as was afterwards effectually proven. It was the more affecting, too, because she was a female of abnormally deplorable reputation and character. Having little, she gave heartily out of her meagre store to keep the Republican party in a position indispensable to the welfare of the country, and from which it took eight more years to oust it.

These eight years are proudly included by Mr. HAY and Mr. ROSS in their retrospect of the record of the incomparable party. We think these gentlemen, who are passing off the stage (Mr. HAY says) and losing their grip on the flaming torch which is to show the truth to coming ages, ought, before they go, and when they have leisure from the labors of the present campaign, to get together and put up a monument somewhere to ELIZA PENNINGTON, as to one who saw her duty and did it. It was not that her individual services were of such indispensable value, but that they were typical in a particularly picturesque and striking way of a whole group of services rendered between election day, 1876, and March 4, 1877, which were indispensable to the continued supremacy at that time of the party which, Mr. HAY says, has done everything great that has been done in this country in the last fifty years, through which, as Mr. ROSS declares, the moral sentiment of America found expression, and of which Mr. ROSS avers that it cannot depart from the direction of its tendencies.

Speaking of Mr. TILNEY and his campaign, it so happened that Mr. JAMES C. CARTER was in Albany and the guest of Governor TILNEY on the day when Mr. TILNEY got word of his nomination for the Presidency. He has recorded his recollections of the conversation he had with Mr. TILNEY that day. He tells how, being impressed with Mr. TILNEY's profound knowledge of everything relating to government, and thinking that his views were not substantially at variance with those held by leading Republicans, he expressed surprise that Mr. TILNEY had not allied himself to that party, which seemed to Mr. CARTER, "considering the greatly superior number of men of education and public spirit to be found in its ranks," to be the fitter to secure a general acceptance of the opinions that Mr. TILNEY held. But Mr. TILNEY replied that though it was true that a large majority of men of culture, wealth, and force were to be found in the Republican party, the trouble was "it was a party of self-seekers." He explained that he did not mean this in any offensive sense, but that the controlling men of that party were men of large pecuniary interests, seeking to build up fortunes and families; that these personal interests were so large as necessarily to engross their thoughts and control their opinions, leading them to use their powerful influence so as to shape the legislation of the country in a form which would favor those interests; that it was difficult to lead such men along the pathway of those fundamental principles of democratic government by which alone equal justice could be done to the masses of men; that the Democratic party held within its ranks a far less number of men of this description—not enough to control its action—and consequently the opinion of its great masses could more easily be shaped and moulded by the mere force of ideas; that this was the distinction between the former Democratic and Whig parties; and that the Republican party would, as the patriotic inspirations caught from the opposition to slavery and the defence of the Union died away, become the mere successor to the spirit and policy of the Whig party.

It seems probable that if Mr. TILNEY were alive this year he would still be a Democrat, albeit the spirit of so sound and accomplished a financier as he must have been horribly tried by the eight-year aberration of the old party towards free silver. In his own State for six or eight years preceding his nomination for President he practically kept a school for the training of likely young men in the principles and practice of Democratic politics. So many of his pupils did credit to his teaching that for twenty years it has been a familiar form of commendation of a New York Democrat to say that he was "one of TILNEY'S lieutenants." The DAVID B. HILL school, which in a way succeeded his, and has kept for two decades, has never been able to impart the same value to its certificates of graduation. What a crying need there is now in both parties in New York of men of the TILNEY qualifications, who understand principles and care intensely about them; who understand practice and can marshal voters to the support of principles; who hate race-kill and are readier to hunt it down and drive it out of their own party than of the party opposed. "What concern have you," said TILNEY to a Buffalo audience in 1875, "by what name a man is called who goes to Albany to misrepresent your interests and duties? Is it any satisfaction to a Republican that that man is called a Republican, or to a Democrat that he is called a Democrat? Does it make any difference what liveries he wears the devil in?" Said CHARLES O'CONNOR in a letter to TILNEY: "It would displease 'our friends,' was his [Mayor —'] irresistible argument. In both of the great political parties 'our friends' are the country's bitterest enemies." Such is the case as these have never been successfully discriminated in the HILL school of statesmanship, nor, for that matter, in the political seminary lately conducted by THOMAS PLATT, and now by BENJAMIN ORRILL.

Every political campaign invites the voters to what in some aspects must be a choice of evils. No administration ever was perfect. None ever will be. It is the good fortune of the country this year that the evils between which it must choose are moderate, and that, whichever party wins, some good may fairly be expected to come of it. Conversely, it is the bad fortune of the partisans who are doing the heavy work of the campaign that both parties abound in voters who stop daily to consider again whether the objections to letting the other side win this year are really graver than the objections to having their own side take office. Republicans who distrust the strength of the constitutional hobbles on the impetuous legs of the strenuous One look longingly in the direction of Esopus. Conservative Democrats who speculate nervously about the infusion of poperaic virtue in the veins of the Democracy look indulgently towards Oyster Bay. There are many voters on both sides in whose minds the balance of general preference or special aversion is so nearly even, that some side issue is likely to determine for whom they will finally vote.

OSWEG SWEET MARSH, of Syracuse, made the opening address of the season before the Brooklyn branch of the New York School of Journalism. He said: "I was President ROOSEVELT'S guest last Saturday, and I brought away a vital impression—that no one can do anything great who hasn't physical energy back of him. The President said that he wouldn't have amounted to very much if it hadn't been for his efforts to keep his body strong. If it hadn't been for his experience in the West he might have been a failure." Lots of success has been pulled off by invalids. PARHAM, the historian, was a bankrupt in health before he began his life's work. HEINE lived in a mattress grave for years. Was it not POPE who spoke of "that long disease my life"? R. L. STEVENSON pushed away Death with one hand while he wrote and lighted cigarettes with the other. There are hundreds of like instances, but the case most to the point here is that of Mr. TILNEY, who always was a valetudinarian, and never had any physical energy to spare. But he had mental energy. That is the main thing. A sound body makes for sanity of mind, but physical energy and mental energy don't always go together. Indeed, the cultivation of excessive physical energy may impair the capacity for thinking. As for President ROOSEVELT, he inclines to put on weight and doubtless needs a good deal of exercise. But he has always worked his mind at least as hard as his body. Both are active. It is possibly debatable in his case whether his physical or mental activity has contributed more to his success. He can think and he can act. His critics say, however, that sometimes his physical activity pushes him so hard that his act gets the start of his thought.

Even saturnality has its moments of relaxation. "Did HILL call on JEROME?" asked the Honorable PATRICK MCCARREN. Then, meditatively, "Maybe he's been indicted."

The Military Principles Involved in the Far-Eastern War

We are materially helped to comprehend the principles of military and naval warfare exemplified in the pending contest between Russia and Japan by an article contributed to the Amosk River by Captain A. T. MAHAN, the well-known author of The Influence of Sea Power on History. Of course Captain MAHAN'S conclusion are subject to test, and may have to be revised as more exact heraldry, in the light of more adequate information than the Russian and Japanese sources have allowed to reach us. Provisional as they are, however, they come to us accredited with the high authority which the writer has acquired within an interesting field of study. Captain MAHAN, indeed, is inclined to say, though the assertion may sound paradoxical, that the very imperfection of the intelligence thus far obtainable promotes comprehension in a certain extent, by preventing the gist of the news from losing itself amid a mass of details, and by thus forcing attention to passing on the broad general lines of action which constitute the determinative features of the military situation. Even to the specialist such features are the most important; while, for the outsider, they alone can be easily and securely grasped. They essentially resemble general principles, which, undoubtedly, in the first instance, are formulated only by the observation and comparison of many details; but which, once established, far exceed in illuminative and directive value any unaided accumulation of the details on which they are based. A principle in warfare, like a generalization in science, is a result, but, when firmly grounded, the data from which it was evolved may be disregarded by the average man, who, for his own guidance, needs to know only the result, not the method of its attainment. For example, in the present war, the transportation problems involved, the particularities of tactics, the special difficulties or advantages presented by the ground over which the armies are fighting, and the efficacy of the several weapons employed on the different branches of the two services, are all details that may be disregarded by the general reader, and, indeed, must be in the absence of explicit and trustworthy information, very apt to be so. The definiteness of the great design of the war, but they are means, not ends.

Under the circumstances, it might have been predicted that Captain MAHAN would confine himself, for the most part, to strategic questions. Should the Russians have decided to retain Port Arthur as long as possible? Should the Japanese have passed it by, and concentrated every available soldier against KUROBATKY at Liao-Yang? Should the Baltic fleet, or as much of it as possible, have been dispatched to the rescue of hostilities? These are, modestly, are inquiries of fundamental importance, and it is equally plain that Captain MAHAN is peculiarly qualified to deal with them. Touching the first question we are reminded that the determination to hold Port Arthur was, at first, widely and severely resented as being an unnecessary concession to national pride and in political considerations of the humiliation involved in its surrender. A report has long been current, and is still contradicted, that General KUROBATKY himself urged the evacuation of the fortress, as being prescribed by sound military principle. It will be remembered that, during the first stage of the South African war, a similar discussion arose concerning the expediency of retreating Ladysmith. Captain MAHAN, for his part, is convinced that the occupation of Ladysmith was neither an error in the beginning, nor detrimental to the future of the war. So, in the first place, it arrested the invasion of Natal by threatening the base line of communication; and, because, secondly, it detained before the besieged place a body of enemies which, at a later stage of the hostilities, would have been more formidable elsewhere. He is inclined to think that Port Arthur has fulfilled, and continues to fulfill, much the same function toward the Japanese. The gradual development of operations has made it, in his mind, increasingly clear that the number of Russian ships, plus their tactical advantages of fortification, are much more useful to the general plan of campaign than they would be if with KUROBATKY. To carry Port Arthur, or even to maintain an investment, the Japanese have had to be much more numerous than the garrison. It follows that, had the place been abandoned, the aggregate of troops transferred to KUROKI would have exceeded signally, if not decisively, those added to his opponent.

But why might not the Japanese have postponed the attempt to take Port Arthur until after they had captured or routed the principal Russian army under KUROBATKY? Captain MAHAN opines that the Japanese could no more have given Port Arthur the go-by than the Boers could have invaded Natal in force had they left Ladysmith in their rear. We are reminded that to Japan the control of the sea is indispensable. The abandonment of Port Arthur by Russia would have meant destruction to the ships within; and that destruction would have meant the release of Tsou's ships from a wearing and damaging blockade, with freedom to concentrate efforts in protection of the general communications of his country, commercial and military. The commerce destroying achievements of the Vladivostok squadron would have been much curtailed, if not absolutely prevented, had Tsou been able to leave the neighborhood of Port Arthur. On the other hand, if Port Arthur holds out, some of the Vladivostok ships may be able to continue their predatory exploits until we forms. The derangement of Japanese communication with the outer world, particularly in the matter of warlike supplies, is undoubtedly a serious matter for a nation still relatively unprepared to provide from her own workshop the needed arms and ammunition.

But, although the retention of Port Arthur has caused a great deal of embarrassment to the Japanese, it is not asserted by Captain MAHAN that it will prove quite as distinctive and determinative a factor as Ladysmith did in the Transvaal war. In the present contest there is not between the opponents the same disparity of ultimate strength as in the earlier; indeed, the approach to equality is close, because of the evident great superiority in organization of the one weaker in material power, which latter constitutes possession also the immense advantage of experience in the field of combat. Yet, while the final outcome of the campaign remains still unknown, the process which we are watching trends more and more, in Captain MAHAN'S judgment, to confirm the forecast that the persistent occupation of Port Arthur by the Russians may prove, or at least might have proved, the turning-point of ultimate success for the belligerent, which, increasingly unprepared, and still more incalculably at last guarded by the Japanese, would meet, but the first and very important moves of the game. In a word, Port Arthur has meant, and still means, delay, the imperative need of all defense, but especially of the particular defensive which requires time to organize resources inconceivably superior. Whether it will avail finally has yet to be seen, but, during the course of operations, its influence has been visible with a clearness that would scarcely explain. Russia's retention of Port Arthur has imposed upon the Japanese at once two objectives: two points of the utmost importance, between which they must choose, whether to concentrate upon one, or divide their aggressive forces between the two. These divergent objects were Port Arthur and the discomfiture of the northern Russian army, a discomfiture needed to assure to the Japanese control of Korea and the delivery of Manchuria to them. That the Japanese had appreciated the dilemma is plain, for they were plain a potent from their desperate attempts to seal the mouth of the harbor and to capture the fortifications. They seem fain to have recognized that, if the large body of troops employed in the siege of Port Arthur could be sent to strengthen KUROKI that general would be much more likely to succeed in his attempt to envelop the left, or eastern, flank of KUROBATKY'S army.

But, although the retention of Port Arthur has imposed upon Russia in an important particular to avail herself of the opportunity, the time occupied in the siege has been ample for the St. Petersburg government, which should have recognized that the whole Japanese movement turned upon the control of the sea, to have dispatched from Europe a fleet which, by this time, should have reached the theatre of war, and might have turned the scale. Long are this the aggregate of Russia's naval forces in the Orient might have been much decidedly superior to that of Japan, and the problem of bringing the separate actions into cooperation against the concentrated enemy, though difficult, would not have been unsolvable. Captain MAHAN is not one of those observers who cast doubt, amounting to derision, on the proposed despatch of the Baltic fleet to the Far East. He has himself been too far away from sources of information to know how far it was possible for that fleet to reach in April or May, or what force, but he has always believed, he tells us, that, if properly equipped to start, it was perfectly feasible for the Baltic ships—so far as coaling should be concerned—to proceed to the scene of hostilities during the summer weather. Had it done so, and had the Port Arthur fleet been so far restored as it has since given demonstration of being, its enemy would have found on the sea, as on land, two divergent objectives, two mobile opponents, unitedly very superior to himself, cooperation between which might not have been averted.

Man and Nature

FAIR summer weather, when most of the time we can lounge or saunter in the open, is apt to awaken cynical reflections upon our forfeited relation to nature. There she stretches infinitely beautiful and wonderful, peace and health-bestowing, under our very eyes, and yet for some inefficient reason, some mistaken sense of obligation, some attempt to outdistance others in the race for possessions, we house ourselves: we limit the vision to four straight walls, we grow near-sighted, pale, unweaving, and unhearing. Once we throw aside the bonds that have held us prisoner all winter, and rise at dawn to bask in the long day through the sunshine, even until the stars come out one by one in the starry blue of night, we ask ourselves why this closest of all relations should lapse for half the year, so naturally, so utterly we seem to belong to the sunshine and the day and the day and the sun.

shine to us. We realize then that "the world is too much with us, late and soon," and we understand ourselves, life, and our part in creation better when we have lifted our eyes to gaze into endless distance, all sun-filled and breeze-freshened.

The limit of this complete understanding of nature, this alignment with all created earth, may be easily snapped. It requires only one good day's march from home or from any shelter, a sudden darkening of the sky, and the fond Mother Nature, so intimately and variously beautiful, is converted into a hostile force—alien, harsh, destructive. The realizers then that if man has carried civilization too far, and has snatched himself in his belongings, he has at least done so in mutual self-defense. If one is inclined to look rather contemptuously of the big athlete who confessed that it took just half a man's waking hours to keep his body clean and in order, one is yet brought to admit that there is a happy medium between savagery and the Waldorf. To wander forth at early dawn, to go on and on until eighteen miles from home—once one's own or any one else's,—to sit down at the end of a mountain gorge, with short, gray cliffs rising close on either side and a wild, frothing stream gushing in between, with an imperfectly blazed trail behind one as the only guide to distant shelter, and to watch a storm break awake the conviction that the world is not really so much our own as we had dreamed in the quiet morning. The breeze which fanned us then, freezes us; the heavens blacken and gloom malignantly; a deep, prolonged grumbling as of wild beasts after prey begins in the distance; sudden flashes of blinding light throw out the cliffs and forests in lurid, grotesque view; and all these are far from native and beautiful phenomena. Man becomes conscious of a universe created and active for some more unapproachable purpose than to add to his joy in living.

The unconsciously in the tragic-education is merely a way of enlarging a man's knowledge of possible human predicaments, so that no happening takes him wholly unawares. If a man desires to seem a cultivated person but him beware of thinking his experience unique. "A hot wet" is the proper attitude of mind when the clouds have laid and creation is drenched. And only a bit set will it seem to a lumbering tramp of men who habitually bear snow and storm, thunder and lightning, wild animals and loneliness unrepentant. In camp where whiskey and fire were plentiful, towels by some cultivated facility were dispensed with. The nearest approach to this adjunct of civilization was a gray and grimy dishcloth. It set me to questioning what THOMAS did about towels and dishcloths at Walden Pond. Doubtless his simple and detailed book tells, but there are no books for immediate consultation in the wilderness.

How innocent and round and shiny the moon looks, turning over the eastern tips of the mountains when earth has peaked aside her evil mood! It is not so easy for the chance sufferer, wrapped in borrowed blankets, with wet and streaming clothes pressed close to his burning skin to forget. He is apt to drive homeward a chastened and a saddened spirit. Even Nature can deceive. Willful, feminine, and capricious she smiles to trap him into a presumptuous fondness, the better to flout him. He remembered a certain friend who, taken suddenly ill at a far-away mountain hotel, wistfully demanded New York and the Holland House, exclaiming, weakly: "I don't mind dying; but I want to die where I can buy cologne and have the girls on my neighborhood faded!" The wailers who once felt only warm for such yearnings is apt to be converted. His heart will ever after fall him when he threatens to elope with a blanket and a book to a mountain top to live alone till the winter snows drive him down. He realizes that civilized man has given his heart and his peace to tubs of hot water, laundered clothes, scented soaps, bath-towels, cooked food, blazing, open fires, and softly tinted walls!

A lady philanthropist crossed the Russian frontiers to visit Turkestan, and, adherent into the presence of the great sultan, uttered the usual conventional greetings and explanations, while the sultan eyed her abstractedly and silently. "As if," she said—"as if" he were quietly turning back the top of my head and looking at the thoughts inside." When she ceased speaking, he touched her large and fashionable sleeve and said, earnestly: "Why do you wrap so much cloth on your arms? If you ripped it off it would make a good cloak for a little girl."

The great difficulty is in draw the line at sufficiency. Man thrown loose upon the caprices of nature is not man at his best. Man spending half his waking hours upon the care of his body is not man at his best. Wherever protection and necessary care are converted into luxury and superfluity, he is weakened. The time must come when beautiful dressing will be that which is most useful, most appropriate, most unassuming.

To awake after a night's dreamless sleep and find oneself so worse for four hours' tramp through blinding rain and hurtling wind and hours of driving in wet clothing is convincing enough of the robustness and power that accrue to a man when he lives in the open. Doubtless time will renew the bond between man and Nature, drawing him ever closer and closer to her, teaching him to extract health and peace and patience from her, and teaching him to thwart her caprices by his ingenuity.

The War and the Peace Congress From the Springfield "Republican"

PRINCE RAMSLEY of the Russian army, after escaping from Port Arthur with despatches from General STROUMEL, has given us one fleeting glimpse of the savagery of the warfare around that coveted stronghold. We may be sure that he revealed not a hundredth part of the horrors of the situation. Yet enough was told to show that toward each other the combatants, after all has been justly said of their splendid fortitude and courage, are lowered to the level of savages and brutes. Could anything be more brutal than that murky tale of the slope covered for days with wounded soldiers, feebly signalling for saviors, while the foe on either side callously let them perish from exhaustion, starvation, and thirst? Admit that, under the conditions, no other course was possible; still, in that one episode there is revealed the essential barbarity of war.

Since we all become students of strategy and rudeness of MACHIAVELLI, we have tended to forget or ignore the neither side of war. It is far away—this war—and it appeals to us mainly as a great international sporting event. As in "society circles in spring or autumn, it is largely a question of the championship. Is the same thing, our boys ask for the war news and the ball scores. The whims of banking movements indicate us vastly more than the Red Cross work, and if we would know how many more the Russians lost in a certain sanguinary affair, the reason is that we wish to compare the figures with the losses of the Japanese. Who stops to think of the agony, the waste, the destruction, the blighted future, the sheer barbarism involved in what goes on?

While these phases of the dark side of war are forgotten in the excitement of the combat, there are many who find that these are days ripe for cultivating in lands where peace prevails a keener appetite for the glory of head-on collisions. Everywhere the work of the hellfighters is being carried on as fully as before, so that other nations may be made the better fighting machines. The six sense talk of "lessons" in the art of smashing things. Have you heard that the Japanese commissariat, or their use of artillery, or their methods of blockading a port? Have you observed how the Japanese use their torpedo-boats in a naval action? Do you understand Kropotkin's mystery of the art of retreat? If not, it is evident that somebody's education is being neglected.

Then, too, we all have been profoundly impressed by the race and delight with which a Japanese soldier dies for his country. The fact that he would rather die on the battlefield than live away from it is that the least of the lessons of this war. The London Times now regrets that English patriotism has not reached quite the pitch of the patriotism in Japan. Over in Nippon the parents of a young man killed in battle are promptly heaped the congratulations of all the neighbors; and what would be thought of such a performance in England toward the parents of a British soldier lost in action? "I am afraid," says the writer in the Times, sadly, "it [the congratulations] would not be prudent. The spirit is not there, and until we go through the fire and learn to give death its proper value we shall remain as cowardly as the prudish in the apparently false situation this is, to be sure, when Western writers lament that Christian Occidentals have not been favored by a civilization and a religion that teach strongly a pagan contempt for life and the glorious privilege of being butchered on a battle-field. If the Japanese actually draw from their ancestor worship and their heathen rites an inspiration that makes them superior to us in the frenzied daring of battle, the military "lesson" is, apparently, that we should introduce their forms of religion.

Against such tendencies it may be useless to enter a protest, and yet at no other time could a protest be more opportune. Encouraging as are events to those who, believing in peace rather than war, see little progress in the world away from the ideals and standards of militarism, there is no time when their influence should be exerted more strongly than in a period of war. On this account the thirteenth international peace congress in Boston, week after next, merits a welcome more cordial than it usually gets. The tendency is to ignore such a gathering, for men are inclined to feel the apparent hopelessness of waging war against war, when the world seems as much given to the argument of the sword as ever in the dark days that are gone. The good that may be done, however, in holding up the contrary ideal, and in emphasizing the inhumanity of war in the last analysis is always a relief of civilized man to the barbarism from which he came, cannot really be overestimated. It needs to be pointed out again and again, even with "damnable iteration," and from every war these evils pregnant with more evils still, and that, however much war may display and cultivate certain heroic qualities in man, it is also fraught with endless demoralization and woe.

FRANK W. HIGGINS, REPUBLICAN NOMINEE FOR GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK STATE

The reader is referred to an interesting article on Mr. Higgins, giving an intimate view of his character and personality, on page 1474 of this issue of the "Weekly"

SENATOR FAIRBANKS AND THE NEW YORK STATE LEADERS AT SARATOGA CELEBRATING THE SEMICENTENNIAL OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY IN NEW YORK STATE

The 112th anniversary of the organization of the Republican party was celebrated at Saratoga on September 14. Frederick W. Stewart, the son of President Lincoln's Secretary of State, was presiding officer at the meeting, and at his side sat Jesse Benton Freeman, son of the famous "Pathfinder," John C. Fremont, who was the first candidate of the party for President. Speeches were made by Senator Fairbanks, Senator Tappan, and Ward Bellard.

Copyright 1912. New York Tribune. Photo. Phil. Vernon. Chicago.

Frank Wayland Higgins

Personal Characteristics of the Republican Candidate for the Governor of New York.—His Record in the State Senate.—Some amusing Anecdotes

By Earle Hooker Eaton

THE first day that Lieutenant-Governor Frank Wayland Higgins, recently nominated for Governor of New York by the Republican Convention at Saratoga, assumed his duties as presiding officer of the State Senate, he found on his desk a beautiful floral offering from the Democratic Senators. Many of them had served beside him in the Senate for years, and the gift was a tribute inspired by affection and respect. He has always fought fair as a Senator, and they felt that he would wield the gavel with justice and impartiality. And he did.

In the hour of defeat and disappointment at the State convention, Timothy L. Woodruff, facing the delegates who were soon to nominate his able rival, made this statement:

"I have known Frank Higgins for many years, and I never knew him to do a mean or an unkind act."

The two incidents illustrate the character of the man who is to lead the State's Senators back to the polls in November. He is a plain man of the people, unaffected, unapproachable, non-pretentious, amiable, and sincere; charitable in thought and act, temperate in speech and in conduct, honest as daylight, and cherishing high ideals as a public servant. During his eleven years of service in the Senate, part of the time as chairman of the important Finance Committee, he has been a staunch champion of economy in administration, of strict business system in the conduct of State affairs, and of honesty in appropriations. He was chairman of the Finance Committee for a longer period than any other man, and he has often worked for the light investigation which has laid bare the crookedness of the State. He has been the champion of the State's credit, and he has been the champion of the State's credit. He has been the champion of the State's credit, and he has been the champion of the State's credit.

The defunct appropriation bill was one of the first evils he attacked. Managers of State institutions and departments were making contracts for buildings, etc. in excess of legislative appropriations, and the contracts lawfully pledged the State to make good the difference. The present law, which originated with Mr. Higgins, prohibiting such contracts, and making an audit law, for which he is responsible, requires that any funds received by State departments, institutions, or commissions, and he paid over to the Treasurer of the State, and not paid out again except through legislative appropriation. Prior to 1893 many roads in the State were not paying their employees with any regularity, and sometimes pay-days were several months apart. The men were thus compelled to discontinue their time to get food and clothing for their families. When Mr. Higgins's intention was called to this incident he introduced and procured the passage of a bill requiring all railroads within the State to pay their employees not later than the 20th day of each month. While on the subject of railroads it is interesting to note that Mr. Higgins does not use passes.

The day a constituent who wanted to go somewhere wrote asking for one. "I do not ride on a pass myself," was the general tone of the reply. "I do not go out to ask for one, either for myself or my son now. However, if you so desire I will send you my personal check for the amount of the fare."

Mr. Higgins has been no ardent Republican since he was sixteen years of age—at which age he narrated for Grant, while his father supported Lincoln—but those who know him well declare that he has never been and never will be any man's son. Despite the strongest party pressure he refused to vote for Louis F. Ryan as Superintendent of Insurance, and on many other occasions he has demonstrated his independence.

Two weeks before the State convention Mr. Higgins did not believe that he would be nominated, and went away to the White Mountains.

"I hear you are going away," said Supreme Court Justice P. W. Krueger the day the candidate left Glen. "Where are you going?"

"To the White Mountains," was the reply.

"For how long?"

"Until after the State convention."

"Well?" cried Justice Krueger. "What going to stay home and keep your citizenship?"

Mr. Timothy Higgins, the grandfather of the candidate, and two brothers were among the early settlers of Albany County, New York, and Orlin T. Higgins, his father, was for many years the rich man of Bushkill in the same county. The strong, keen, thoughtful face of Orlin T. Higgins would have served as an excellent model for Shakespeare himself, and he was as thickly freckled, and busy as he looked. His wife, as an old resident of Bushkill describes her, was "the angel of the house," charitable, devout, and kind. She was an ardent admirer of Dr. Francis Wayland, the famous Baptist clergyman and author, and when on August 18, 1858, a son was born to her she named him Francis Wayland Higgins. From early youth, however, the future candidate for Governor was called Frank, and Frank is the name he chooses to be known by today. His early education was received at Brookfield Academy, Revue Military Academy, Poughkeepsie, and at a commercial college. This has been supplemented by much travel and study and by many busy years in the invaluable school of experience. At the age of nineteen he engaged in a profitable business at Stanton, Michigan, and several years later married Miss Kate C. Adde. Their eldest son, O. T. Higgins, is married, and resides at Boulder, Colorado. Harry, the second son, and Miss Josephine, their only daughter, live at home. The boys are bright, and the young men, and Miss Josephine is as charming in manner as she is beautiful in face. The children are as gracious, unaffected, and unpretentious as their parents, and their common sense being up could be equaled with profit by many families of wealth in America.

Twenty-five years ago Mr. Higgins made Olean, New York, now a thriving city of about 15,000 inhabitants, his home. He owns immense tracts of pine and mineral lands in the West; is interested in banking, glass manufacture, and many other enterprises, and is worth several millions of dollars. He is the principal owner and inactive partner in two groceries and two general stores in Olean. In this connection the following anecdote is told:

Some years ago he had a political controversy with W. G. Landish, then Congressman from his district.

"Higgins," cried the virile Landish, "you're a grocer and you sell rubbish; I'm a lawyer and I sell brains!"

But Landish is now one of the noble army of "rascals," and Higgins is his party's candidate for the Governorship of the Empire State.

Higgins has long been a personal friend and adviser of President Roosevelt, and in the various grounds which surround the handsome colonial mansion in Olean is a tree which the tough robber planted when he was Governor of New York.

One of the candidates Higgins's associates is his fondness for a "day snook." He is often seen with a cigar in his mouth but it is rarely lighted. He enjoys a good story, even when told at his own expense, and is himself an excellent storyteller.

When a friend asked him about his chances a few days before the State convention, he spoke feelingly about the trials and responsibilities of the Governorship. Then he added with a smile:

"Regarding the Governorship, I feel somewhat like the Irishman who heard that there was a run on the bank he patronized. Rushing up to the cashier's window, he cried, 'If I can get me money, I don't want it; but if I can't get me money, I must have it!'"

Mr. Higgins owns a pair of fast horses, but is rarely seen behind them. Motoring has never appealed to him, and he does not own a car. He is an excellent bowler, and plays in the annual tournament at the City Club in Olean. He was one of the founders of the Olean Golf Club, is an ex-president of the club, and plays whenever he has time and opportunity.

"I understand that you are a golf player?" he was asked recently.

"Yes, I am very fond of the game," was the reply.

"What do you go round in, what is your gear?"

"Well," said the candidate, with a dry smile, "as I am anxious to receive the support of all the golf players in the State, I don't think I'd better give out my score."

Frederick D. Kilburn, State Superintendent of Banks, and quite a wag, tells an amusing anecdote concerning Mr. Higgins. According to Kilburn, he and quite a party of Albany politicians met the Lieutenant-Governor at Park second Street and Broadway one day, and Kilburn offered the following resolution, and moved that it be adopted:

"Whereas, kind Providence has seen fit to bring about this pleasant meeting at Park second Street and Broadway in the great city of New York, and

Whereas, one of our number, Hon. Frank Wayland Higgins, of Olean, Cattaraugus County, New York, has recently been elevated to the high office of Lieutenant-Governor of said State; and

Therefore, be it Resolved, that the Lieutenant-Governor has a plain duty in the premises, and that he forthwith proceed down Broadway, graciously permitting the said Lieutenant-Governor to settle all the bills that he may be incurred, Second one seconded the motion, and it was adopted with but a single dissenting vote, that of the victim. The conspirators then decided that the first thing on the programme was a dinner at the Lieutenant-Governor's expense. They had the very best of the hotel afforded, and then moved on down Broadway. At Thirty-eighth Street they played bridge and pool for an hour, after which Mr. Higgins paid the check. At Thirtieth Street they took a violent trolley to a line of 83 50 neckties in a window and were speedily fitted out. Mr. Higgins didn't care for a 83 50 necktie himself, but he agreed to furnish the cashier. At Twenty-fifth Street the Albanians came out of smoking material, dragged Mr. Higgins into a tobacco-stall, and purchased the very best cigar in the place. Once more the Lieutenant-Governor saw the cashier.

The Albany men were having the line of their lives, but at the Fifth Street Hotel Mr. Higgins said, "I'll go home."

"I had a hundred-dollar bill at Forty-second Street, and now I only have $37 left," he said, ruefully, according to the veracious Kilburn. "If it cost a man $63 to come down from Forty-second Street to Twenty-third, what infernal heavens would it cost him if he went all the way down to the Battery?"

A Starboard View of the "Askold" as she looks in her berth at Shanghai

A Hole made by a Shell in the Side of the "Askold"

A View of the Bow of the "Askold," showing the Damage done by the Japanese Fire

PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE DAMAGED RUSSIAN CRUISER "ASKOLD" AS SHE LOOKS NOW IN THE HARBOR AT SHANGHAI

The photographs, sent by our correspondent at Shanghai, show metal striking ruins of the disabled Russian cruiser "Askold" as she looks now in the harbor at Shanghai. The "Askold" was one of the Russian ships injured in the engagement of August 13 of Port Arthur, after which the "Askold" and the "Hirovski" were taken to Shanghai and destroyed. The injuries to the "Askold" were serious. Her main-deck was badly damaged, her starboard bow was pierced, and there were other injuries to the cruiser due to exploding shells. There is also serious under-water damage, although the cruiser's engines and boilers are reported to be in good condition.

The Commanders at Port Arthur

By Charles Johnston

WE can all see that the fall of Port Arthur will be entered among the decisive battles of the world, and will practically decide the destiny of the Pacific for the coming century. Japan will achieve exactly those aims which she proposed to herself ten years ago, when Port Arthur was taken by her victorious armies, and will hold a far stronger position than she could have then held, had her advance not been blocked by Russia, Prussia, and France.

No little attention was paid to the details of the China-Japanese war, that most of us have not recognized the names of Japan's present victorious commanders as already renowned in the war against China. Yet it is a remarkable fact that every one of the Mikado's generals whose names are now familiar even to the man in the street gained high distinction in the war of ten years ago. Field-Marshal Yamagata was then in command of the first Japanese army. Field-Marshal Oyama, in like manner commanded the second Japanese army, which captured Port Arthur. Major-General Nogi, as he then was, made a name for himself at the fall of Kaiping. Lieutenant-General Kuroki was the hero of Wei-Hai-Wei, which was brilliantly assaulted and captured by the Japanese. Lieutenant-General Iku was the hero of the first capture of New-Chang. Similarly Vice-Marshal Togo, whose name is made first for actual achievement in naval warfare, gained high distinction in the Chinese war. Then a captain, he was in command of the Yasuda, one of the three swift war-ships, which led the attack against the Chinese battle-ships at the mouth of the war. He was the leading figure in the sinking of the transport Roonzang, which had on board a number of English officers and engineers, in Chinese service. When the Yasuda fired on the Roonzang and sank her, the English officers jumped into the water from the sinking ship. While struggling in the water, they were fired on by the Chinese, and were with great difficulty rescued by the Japanese under Captain Togo. Another Japanese commander, now famous, Lieutenant-General Adachi, made his mark at Ping-Yang, at the beginning of the China-Japanese war, while the contest was still being fought on Korean soil.

A Japanese Prophecy

Not only are the conditions the same, but the policy of Japan is exactly what it was ten years ago. The Japanese were singularly frank in giving out their views during the whole of this period, and, to illustrate them, so many quite two singular pronouncements made in the spring of 1900 before the first breaking of the Boxer storm. The distinguished Japanese statesman never so follows: A Russo-Japanese war, the issue of which can never for one moment be doubtful, must give to Japan Korea, the Liao-Yung peninsula, the military supremacy in Peking, and the possibility of the reformation of China. The price is the greatest that has ever been within the grasp of a nation.

About the same time it was in April, 1900, another distinguished Japanese statesman said: Korea must become Japanese. Japan must come into possession of Korea. Will she acquire it by peaceful means, or will war be necessary? My own opinion is, that unless Japan be given a free hand in Korea, war with Russia is inevitable, but that it will not occur at least within the period of another year. So long as Japan holds the command of the sea, the preparations now being made by Russia in Manchuria are in different to her. By the occupation of Port Arthur, Russia has made herself more dangerous than she was before. Even now, Russia can only be dislodged from Manchuria as the result of a victorious war. . . . There is time enough for us to act for years hence.

How Marshal Oyama took Port Arthur

The sentence quoted may stand as a remarkable political prophecy, both as to facts and times. Japan held precisely these views not only at the time of the Boxer outbreak, but many years ago. We see their first expression in the treaty of Tien-Tsin, made between China and Japan in April, 1895, in which Japan made her first modern effort to break the Chinese power in Korea, and to abolish the claims of Chinese suzerainty. This treaty contained the provision that neither China or Japan should send troops to Korea without informing the other, and it was the violation of this provision by China which led to the war of 1904.

We are familiar with the story of the landing of Japanese troops at Fusan, the naval battle off the Yalu, the advance of the Japanese army to Seoul and thence north to Ping-Yang, where they gained their first great and decisive victory over the Chinese, the also know something of the first advance of the Japanese into Manchuria, driving before them the vanquished but obstinately fighting Chinese troops. But most of us have probably forgotten the details of the taking of Port Arthur, and the part played in that decisive event by Marshal Oyama, General Siessens's chief opponent.

Port Arthur was then considered one of the most formidable forts in existence. Its fortifications had been planned by a distinguished German naval strategist, Admiral von Hansson, and consisted of twenty main forts and many lesser works, and were backed up by huge docks and iron works for the repair and fitting of the Chinese fleet which had its headquarters there. The second Japanese army, which was destined to take Port Arthur, had been at Kinkow since November 8, 1904. It was commanded by Marshal Oyama, the November 12, the march on Port Arthur was begun, and on November 20, Port Arthur was reached by the Japanese army. The attack was arranged by Marshal Oyama for the early morning of November 21. It was so cold that the Japanese soldiers slept in each other's arms, to keep themselves from freezing. Just after the rising of the sun, about 7 A.M., the Japanese soldiers began their advance, taking with them nothing beyond their rifles and ammunition.

The plan of attack devised on by Marshal Oyama was as follows: The first division was to attack the Kie-shan or "Chair Hill" forts. The Mixed Brigade was to storm the Erh-shan forts. The independent cavalry was to cover the right flank of the first division. Four batteries of siege-artillery were stationed to the north of Shimo-yung. The first attack was made on Kie-shan by Major-General Nogi, with the Third Regiment, with forty field and siege guns. The Chinese at first responded valiantly with their heavy Krupp guns, but after an hour their fire stopped, and the Third Regiment rushed Kie-shan at the point of the bayonet.

Meanwhile, the Chinese Pien-shan and Song-shan forts kept up a steady fire on the Japanese, but in spite of this the whole group of Kie-shan forts were in the hands of the Japanese by 4 A.M. The next attack was directed against the Nong-shan forts. The Chinese in these forts were preparing to die, when a shell exploded their powder magazine, and singed many of them. The group of forts fell about 11 A.M. The assault on Erh-shan and Kie-shan forts began immediately after this. The Mixed Brigade taking the lead. Seven great forts in this group were silenced by noon, and thus all the inland forts had fallen into the hands of the Japanese by midday, the port proper and the coast forts being still in the hands of the Chinese.

The attack on the town of Port Arthur and the coast forts was led by Marshal Oyama in person. Huang-shan, the most important of the coast forts, was well supplied by heavy artillery. The Second Regiment advanced and captured it, but the Chinese of the Huang-shan or "Golden Hill" forts were in the hands of the Japanese. This marked the close of effective resistance, for by the next morning the Chinese had deserted all the remaining forts and Port Arthur was in Marshal Oyama's hands.

It is impossible to be struck by the almost complete identity in order of the events of the two sieges, but here the analogy ends. If a series of pictures taken slowly with a kineoscope, the whole perspective of the event pictured is forced into rapidity, the whole carried into seconds. In this case the Chinese defence of Port Arthur compares with the Russian. It is hours against weeks. The numbers of the slain bear about the same ratio. Ten years ago, Japan, in capturing Port Arthur, lost only forty killed and ten hundred wounded, according to the official figures, while the Chinese losses are given as 2000 killed and wounded. The attacking and defending armies then numbered about eighteen thousand each. It is startling to compare with these figures the present numbers of the slain.

A few days after the capture of Port Arthur, the following incident occurred, with Marshal Oyama as its central figure. The Marshal saw a group of Chinese prisoners in a dilapidated hut, with the icy rain dripping in on them from the broken roof. "These are men," he said to his aide, "exclaimed: 'My horse, though he may die, if exposed to the rain, is not worth three men's lives. Quick, had them for any stables; turn the horses out, and see that the prisoners are warmly sheltered.'"

It is on record that the Japanese seemed to the Chinese to be utterly reckless, storming as they did under the first hail from the forts.

General Siessens's First Success

It may be recalled that General Siessens's heroic defence of Port Arthur will pass into history as the greatest of modern defensive operations. One's only regret is, that such a splendid fight should be waged for what is really foreign soil, and not genuinely a part of the Russian Empire. But the value of the Port Arthur position is one of the great things in modern Russian history.

General Siessens won his first laurels somewhat later than Marshal Oyama, namely, in the great Boxer outbreak of 1900. The Luo-chuan, or League of United Patriots, as the Boxers called themselves, began their systematic outrages in the middle of May of that year, and first directed their activities to the massacre of Native Christians, that is, the Chinese converts made by the Catholic and Protestant missionaries. Seventy-three native Christians, including women and children, were reported murdered, in the cities of May It. Four days later, the Diplomatic Corps at Peking began to receive the Chinese requests to supply the Boxers, but the Manchou court, from beginning to end, openly sympathized with the latter, and the armies of Generals Tseng-fung-shan, Ma, and Nien formed the backbone of the Boxers in Chih-li and Shan-tung. Before the end of May, the Legation Guards were summoned to Peking, and the Boxer outrages had reached the neighborhood of Tien-Tsin. A new feature was the destruction of foreign-built railroad property, and this was soon supplemented by attacks on European missionaries, railroad employees, merchants and others.

MEMBERS OF THE EIGHTH INTERNATIONAL GEOGRAPHIC CONGRESS AT THE FREE MUSEUM OF THE SCIENCE AND ART AT THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA

The right, before the Free Museum of the Science and Art at the University of Pennsylvania, the members of the Eighth International Geographic Congress, 1896. The group is composed of men from various countries, including the United States, Europe, and Asia. The men are dressed in formal attire, including suits and hats. The setting is a large, ornate room with high ceilings and architectural details. The photograph is a black and white reproduction of a historical image.

The Boerers began to shakedown Peking and Tien-Tsin, carrying murder, outrage, and pillage along with them, and at the same time international forces began to concentrate in the neighborhood of Taku. Then came the storming of the Taku forts, presided over by Admiral Sessell, and the departure of Admiral Sir Edward Seymour to attempt the relief of the Peking Legations. Tien-Tsin was now threatened by a destructive horde, and General Strowell, with a relief force of some two thousand Russians and an equal number of troops of other nations, undertook operations to defend the foreign settlement there. This settlement has been described as "presenting the character of a thriving English or American town," consisted of broad streets, substantial dwellings, banks, counting-houses, warehouses, clubs, churches, and schools, and possessed revenue valued at sixty million dollars yearly.

It was wholly undefended, and was the chief object of the fevered hatred of all foreign institutions and their works. For fully three weeks, this flourishing foreign settlement sustained a siege only to be compared, for its prospective horrors and outrages with the siege of Beth and Lachish, in the Indian Mutiny. On June 19, Colonel Ansheloff, whose name has since become familiar, wrote that Tien-Tsin was surrounded by Chinese hordes, who were forwarding it with heavy artillery, the houses in killed and wounded among the defenders being already very heavy. On June 28, General Strowell went to the help of Ansheloff, with all the men he could muster, leaving only a small garrison at Taku. He had five battalions of Russian riflemen, eight guns, and four mortars, and was assisted by a hundred and forty Americans, and a hundred Japanese. The distinguished Englishman who commanded the fortress at Taku declared, in a cable to his government, that "had it not been for the Russians, not a man, woman or child would have remained alive in Tien-Tsin."

General Strowell's Russian troops then, entrained Sir Edward Seymour from a position of great danger, into which he had been forced. When his attempt to relieve Peking ended in failure, and then General Strowell marched at the head of the international troops into the heart of opposing Chinese who had the way to the Peking capital and the beleaguered Legations. The Russians, according to the Times, had nearly six thousand troops in the international army, the Japanese coming next with under four thousand, the British and Germans having three thousand between them, the French, Americans, Italians, and Austrians together numbering less than a thousand.

The relief of Tien-Tsin and the famous march to Peking are among the most dramatic events in modern history. We all remember the weeks of apprehension during which the road of danger hung over the Legations, with daily rumors of their terrible fate at the hands of the Chinese. But it is not generally known, nor generally remembered, that the hero of both these great exploits, the relief of Tien-Tsin and the march to Peking, was the minor General Strowell, who has made such a name for himself at Port Arthur, against the combined armies and fleet of the Japanese.

John Morley

By Sydney Brooks

London, September 14, 1894.

YOD' are to be visited very shortly—I believe for the first time—by one of the most admirable of Englishmen, Mr. John Morley. Mr. Morley's hold on England, like his position in the public life of England, is peculiar to himself. One separates him instinctively not merely from the ordinary run of politicians, but from all politicians. His "atmosphere," his influence, and the ways in which he uses it, are all different from theirs. It would be hard to illustrate his character by the character of his power. Perhaps the nearest definition of it would be to say that it resembles the power that forty years ago John Stuart Mill wielded over England. Over the intellect of England it is less than Mill's; by the margin of difference that divides the creative mind from the critical, his English politics, on the other hand, it is greater than Mill's. Mr. Morley has been a member of two cabinets, has governed Ireland, has introduced and passed some crucial pieces of legislation. Mill was never in a cabinet, and his success, such as it was, in Parliament was rarely more than the reflex action of his success out of it.

It is rather as personal and moral forces and in their effect on the true of English public life that the two men stand on close together on a single pedestal. That pedestal one can but roughly describe as character. The character of John Morley's power is the power of John Morley's character. He has reached and holds his present great position because of his habit of always telling the truth exactly as he sees it. There are politicians, in England as in America, who hope to live by expediency and flattery, King James and hiding the unpleasant truths that may offend his august ears. That is not Mr. Morley's way nor was it Mill's. There is no reason why it should be anybody's. No position is so secure in politics as that of the man who says only what he means, and means only what he says. It is the source of Bismarck's strength, as it is the source of President Roosevelt's.

Every one remembers how Mill, just before peeling-day, and at a meeting mainly composed of working-men, was asked whether he had ever said that the working classes were given to lying; how he answered straight out, "I did," and how the meeting rose to his courageous frankness with thundering cheers. Mr. Morley has more than once been similarly tested. He was for some years one of the members of Stowe's, and Stowe's is a laboring and taming constituency. Local feeling among the miners was hotly in favor of an eight-hours' day. Mr. Morley with equal firmness was opposed to it. The Labor party accordingly withdrew its support and ran a candidate against him. Mr. Morley remained unshakable, his convictions had been honestly formed after an honesty of first-hand investigation, and to them he would stand, win or lose. He won; it was a narrow victory, but still a victory; and when a few weeks later Mr. Morley accepted office and by the English custom had to lay his constituents again he brought the election out more now on the same principles, abating nothing, compromising on nothing and was rewarded this time by a decisive triumph. "Horror John" was the nickname with which the Newcastle working men paid tribute to his courage and courage. This cold, austere, self-contained man, with some of the accomplishments that Englishmen ask of their leaders, accused of being a doctrinaire, known to be a philosopher, was yet able, through the influence of an upright and unswerving character, to reach and dominate the affections of the people.

That is a fine position to have won; and much may be forgiven to a man who has been able to win it. Much, I may add, has been forgiven Mr. Morley. Nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand Englishmen, for instance, believed that Mr. Morley's views on the Boer war were absolutely mistaken and his whole attitude towards the Boers was imperious and unbecomingly. Yet they took from him what they would take from no one else, because they knew that his opinions were his own, were held with apostolic fervor, and had been formed with the sincerest effort to get at the truth. The more imperious are the opinions he advocates the greater grows the national respect for his transparent candor. It is rare to find in one man that union of personal earnestness, powerful intelligence, and a high moral sense that Mr. Morley controls. He came late into politics; he was nearly fifty when he first entered Parliament. He was at once handicapped and aided by the reputation he had built up as a journalist and man of letters. He was a diffident and halting speaker. The average M.P. had as little instinctive sympathy for him as Don Quixote for Saint-Denis. Yet he conquered the House as he conquered Newcastle. I know to-day of no Englishman whose withdrawal from public life would be more widely deplored. Of his writings and the best of his mind this is hardly the place to speak. Mill, Burke, Coleridge, Wordsworth, and the French Revolution are I should judge, the greatest of the influences that have shaped him.

His function in letters has been preciously that of an interpreter and expositor. He has "read everything"; better still, he has turned everything over and over in his mind till it has become fused with all his thought. People call him simple, but I doubt whether that is the right adjective. No man can feel more strongly the duty to do what he can to better things, though at the same time no one is more conscious that improvement, at best, must be humbly slow. If there is preferably in his social and religious creed it is only because he thinks and feels so deeply and so intently. His reason may urge him to despair, but not so insistently as the ardor of his spirit prompts to hope and activity. Not is it merely as a man and a writer that America will interest him and that he will have claims on America. He is also, if not a great statesman, at least a great public force; and he has governed Ireland with the reconciling sympathy and justice that are the fruit of real understanding. Above all, he was the friend and biographer of Gladstone. No one in the latter years of his life stood so close to Gladstone as Mr. Morley; and one perhaps influenced the "Grand Old Man" so strongly. It was always, but wrongly, thought to be owing to Mr. Morley's advocacy that the Liberal leader became a convert to home rule. The two men met on the common ground of character rather than of opinion or temperament. Between Gladstone the leader, and Morley the agnostic, Gladstone the irrepressible optimist, and Morley the painful, unswerving doubter, Gladstone the impulsive, and Morley the self-repressed, Gladstone the free spirit, the sincere, and Morley the ascetic, there was a gift that only each man's recognition of the other's latrine latrine could bridge.

It is not less than a year since the great biography was published, but already it has done its work. The eclipse and the agonies of his life stand so close to Gladstone as Mr. Morley's have been dispensed. Heedlessly passed in his lifetime, he was heedlessly dispensed when he had passed away. It will not be the least of Mr. Morley's claims upon America that, simple-handed, he has placed the name and work of Gladstone upon a just and unassailable basis.

JOHN MORLEY, THE DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH WRITER AND STATESMAN, WHO IS SOON TO VISIT AMERICA

The reader is referred to the article on Mr. John Morley, by Sydney Brooks, on the opposite page of this issue of the "Weekly"

ON THE "PIKE" AT THE ST. LOUIS FAIR—SNAP-SHOT OF AN IGORROTE CHIEF SHOOTING THE CHUTES

[illegible]

The New York City Building at the World's Fair, modelled after the City Hall

NEW YORK—THE EMPIRE STATE

BY FRANKLIN MATTHEWS

NEW YORK day at the World's Fair in St. Louis—October 4—will serve to bring to the attention of the thousands who visit the exposition on that day, and of the thousands upon thousands of others throughout the country who take a special interest in the proceedings, the conspicuous position of New York State in the great American commonwealth.

So common has the characterization of New York as the Empire State become that it has a vague or general meaning to most persons, even to the residents of the State itself. Those who examine closely the exhibits at the Fair will understand the commanding position of the State in the arts and sciences, in manufacture, and, to a large extent, in agriculture. Many will recall the important part played by the State in the history of the country. Others will think of the State, and particularly the city of New York, as the chief centre of finance in the Western Hemisphere. The great mass of the people, however, will take the appellation of Empire State to mean that New York leads all the other States in population and in wealth, and, therefore, that it is a sort of an empire in itself.

It is true that in population, wealth, and general intelligence of the people and in the advancement of those things that stand for civilization, New York State will compare favorably with many so-called empires of the Old World. If it were set apart by itself and if monarchial ideas prevailed among its people, it might well do for an empire, and ground would be the ruler who guided its destinies. Most Americans think it one of the largest States in area in the Union. There are twenty-three States greater in size. People generally are surprised to learn that Florida, Alabama, Michigan, Kansas, Nebraska, North Carolina, Utah, Wisconsin, Iowa, Wyoming, to say nothing of great States like Texas, Montana, and California, are larger than New York. So far as size goes, New York, with its 50,000 square miles of territory, has no right to be called the Empire State.

In population, of course, New York leads all the others. The census returns for 1900 showed a population of 7,263,110. By this time the population is 8,000,000, in round numbers. This means that one-tenth of the people of the United States live in New York. In manufactures the State is first in the Union, the total value of the output being in the neighborhood of $2,500,000,000 a year. In agriculture it is one of the foremost, the value of its farm property being fully $1,200,000,000 and the product of this property being about $750,000,000 a year. In finance New York is rapidly becoming the money centre of the world and, of right, it takes imperial rank.

In the arts and sciences, in education and the publication of various forms of literature, the commonwealth is one of the leaders of the world. In the advancement of its people—the regard for the observance of law and order, the practice of what may be termed the humanities, the cultivation of the mind, the exercise of charity —the empire of the world can compare with New York State.

Therefore, although it may be vague, it is well to call New York the Empire State. How came it to occupy this rank in the league of States and in what does its supremacy consist? It was the largest in area of the thirteen original States in the North, but not until about 1825 did it have the largest population of all the States. It was always something of a laggard in the expression of patriotic feeling in the old days. It was not the Empire State at the beginning of the nation in commerce, manufactures, population, or wealth. Not until after the completion of the Erie Canal in 1825 did it begin to assume premier rank.

The opening of a water highway to the West and the fact that the harbor of New York city was the best in the country and easiest of access for the commerce of Europe, gave New York State its supremacy in trade and in population. Transportation by water, by means of the extension of its canal system and its many rivers led to a vast development of manufactures. A proof of this lies in the fact that of the sixteen great manufacturing centres of the State at the present time only two, Birmingham and Elkhart, are not situated on water routes of transportation.

The richness of the soil

The Louisiana Purchase Monument at the Fair

Great Britain

Belgium

Luxembourg

Brazil

A BALLOON-VIEW OF THE FAIR OF A HEIGHT OF

This remarkable photograph is one of the most successful balloon pictures ever taken. It was made by Google.

Tomb

Jerusalem

Ferris Wheel

Life-saving station

Forestry, Fish, and Game

OUND S AT ST. LOUIS TAKEN FROM F 1,000 FEET

by Mr. F. P. Stevens from a balloon at the height of 1,000 feet over the Fair Grounds at St. Louis

by J. P. Stevens

led to the development of agriculture in the first half of the nineteenth century such as no other State experienced. Few persons realize that although New York has a vast extent of mountain-land and a large proportion of forests to the entire size of the State, almost exactly seventy-five per cent. of the territory, or about 37,000 square miles, is given up to farming. These farms have an average of 100 acres, and their value, on the average, is $4000 each.

The improvement of transportation, encouraging such community of pretensions as to develop its own resources and exchange the products of its mills and factories with other centres of trade and manufacture, and the great arable wealth of the soil, composed mainly of the great glacial drift, lying like a sheet of irregular depth, from a few inches to several hundred feet, over the State—these brought wealth and increased population, in a climate favorable for their growth, and these also, in turn, brought in their train the spread of intelligence and the increase of the refinements of life.

Mountain regions, the Catskills and Adirondacks, in the eastern and northwestern parts of the State, mark the highest altitudes, but, fortunately for the State, the only natural break in the mountain chain of the eastern Atlantic coast was through the Mohawk Valley and the Ontario plain. This made the building of the Erie Canal possible. With this canal and its branches connecting Lake Ontario, Lake Champlain, and the group of beautiful smaller lakes in the interior of the State, and with the Hudson, Mohawk, Black, and Genesee rivers, there was a chain of water highways available for trade in agricultural and factory products such as no other State in the forty days possessed. Railroad building followed the course of these natural highways, and long before the first half of the nineteenth century expired New York had assumed the place of supremacy in the sisterhood of States, which it still maintains and probably will long maintain.

One has simply to glance over the record of the cities of the State to realize what this easy stream of access has done for New York. At the outset it is well to recall that there are twenty-one cities with a population of more than 20,000. No State of the Union has any such record or will have for many years.

What the Cities Produce

In manufactures what do these cities produce? One finds in New York city the making of clothing, the refining of sugar, the publication of newspapers and periodicals, the making of malt liquors, the refining of petroleum, the production of foundry and machine-shop outputs as chief of the industries.

Going up the Hudson, one finds at Yonkers that the manufacture of carpets and rugs, of hats, of patent-medicines, of electrical apparatus and photographic material are the leading industries. At Newburgh one finds ship-building, the making of clothing, the line and enamel and the silk industries in a flourishing condition. Poughkeepsie has iron and steel, in the shape of agricultural and machine-shop products, glass, and patent-medicines as her industries. Kingston makes rakes and street-railway supplies, line and cement, and shirts.

Then one comes to Albany. Here one finds the industries of cars and railroad-shop construction, the brewing of malt liquors, the printing business, the making of cigars and cigarettes, the packing of meat in a leading state of development. Still farther up the river is Troy, long the leader in the making of shirts and collars and cuffs and also in the making of stoves. The city also denotes much of its capital to the production of hosiery and knit goods, paper and wood pulp, and clothing and grist mill products. Passing to the westward along the Mohawk Valley, one comes to Cohoes, whose specialties in manufacture have long been hosiery and knit goods, the city being one of the foremost in the United States in that work. Iron and steel are transformed there into pipe on a large scale, and house-furnishing goods are also made to a large extent. Still farther west we find at Utica that the manufacture of cotton goods in various forms—hosiery, knit goods, clothing—forms a large part of the industries of the place. Lumber and planing-mill products also enter into the business life of the city. Next toward the west comes Syracuse, where foundry and machine products take a leading rank in the industrial output. There one finds typewriter factories, mills for making agricultural machinery, flooring and grist mill establishments, furniture factories, boot-and-shoe factories, and breweries.

Still farther to the west is Rochester, where the line of production is somewhat similar to that of Syracuse, except that Syracuse leads in machine-shop products. One finds in Rochester a highly developed condition of the trade in optical goods and photographic apparatus and materials. At the western end of the State is Buffalo, the second city in rank in manufactures and in population, where slaughtering and meat-packing, the smelting and refining of copper, foundry products, the manufacture of cars and railroad supplies, of malt liquors, soap and candles, flooring and grist mill outputs, iron and steel in various forms, constitute the leading industrial work. A few miles to the south is the wonderful transformed energy of Niagara Falls, where on the American side of the Falls a horse-power of 400,000 is produced, which is about two-thirds of the entire horse-power used from steam and water power in the factories of the State.

There are numerous manufacturing centres of smaller size all along the central part of the State, like Schenectady, with its tremendous electrical plants; Auburn, with its agricultural machinery, cordage, and twine; Iliac, with its gun-making; and on the western slope one finds at Dunkirk great locomotive factories, vying with those of Schenectady in this branch of manufactures.

Along the southern tier of counties we find in Elmira the lumber, bridge-making, tobacco-stemming and handling, hosiery and knit-goods industries. In Binghamton the tobaccos, sewing and grist mill, patent-medicine, planing-mill, and furniture industries are in flourishing condition. On the north we find that in Oswego the making of packing boxes, of starch, malt, and hosiery and knit goods comprises the chief manufacturing energy of the city.

Changes in Industrial Activity

It is interesting to note also how a great State's industrial activity undergoes certain changes in the march of events and with the increase of population. Certain industries grow faster than the increase in the rate of population. Among these industries in the State of New York are the refining of sugar, the making of electrical apparatus, the development of the patent-medicine trade, the paper and wood pulp, cheese, clothing, confectionery, jewelry, printing and publishing, hosiery, lithography, and especially the architectural iron-work trade. Fully a score of leading industries in the last ten years have increased at a faster rate than the population.

On the other hand, about a dozen great industries have fallen

A Bolo Drill by Filipino Scouts at the Reservation on the World's Fair Grounds

PRESIDENT FRANCIS AND NEW YORK'S WORLD'S FAIR COMMISSIONERS ON THE STEPS OF THE NEW YORK STATE BUILDING AT ST. LOUIS AFTER THE DEDICATION CEREMONIES

The New York State Building at the World's Fair is one of New York's chief exhibits. It is simple in design, with a large hall stretching from one end of the building to the other and reaching to the dome. Finishing the dome is the Quadriple, a group of statues by Philip Brulow representing the progress of art and science, and around the entrance of the entrance are statues of the four seasons. The building is a large, ornate hall, and there are various other rooms for exhibits and public functions. Among them, with an view of the building, there are many other rooms for exhibits and public functions. There are many other rooms for exhibits and public functions.

off decidedly in a similar length of time. Among these are the tanning and grinding of coffee and spice, slaughtering, the making of carriages and wagons, flouring and grist-mill products, chemical products, iron and steel making, and various forms of work on leather.

New York is not a State which produces raw material to any large extent for its industries. The State's natural wealth supplies this material for only the newspaper and publishing product, the making of cheese and condensed milk, the making of bricks and other products of clay. Practically all the rest of the raw material used in the great factories comes from the outside. Even the iron-mines, which once played a part of importance in the State's business, have ceased to be a factor of importance in supplying raw material.

Great Manufacturing Interests

The most important manufacturing industry in the State is undoubtedly the manufacture of clothing. More than ten per cent. of the wage-earners of the commonwealth are engaged in this work, and they produce in a year about $150,000,000 worth of goods. The invention of the sewing-machine and the market created by the needs of the civil war were what developed this industry in New York State. It requires a highly specialized kind of labor, and its needs are best satisfied in large cities, where a great foreign population seeks for this grade of work eagerly. There are few immense factories for this trade, most of the work being done in tenements.

Above of this system of working at home brought about the "sweat-shops." This evil called attention to the unsanitary conditions of the tenements, especially in New York city, and good has followed in the train of evil, for now a tenement house law is in effect which takes cognizance of the fact that these abode live in them are human beings and require, not only, for themselves, but for the good of the community, sunlight, fresh air, and wholesome sanitary conditions.

It may surprise many persons to know that the second industry of importance in New York State is that of foundry and machine-shop products. From the time that Robert Fulton had to send to England to get an engine to propel his steamboat Clermont on the Hudson, the manufacture of steam-engines, pumps, boilers, and the like has been most active. Fully 16,000 men are now employed in this machine-shop industry, which includes two great foundry-works.

Then the making of printing-presses soon developed into a great business. In 1822 a New York firm, still one of the leaders in this line of work, made the first iron printing-press, superceding the wooden presses of that era. Then came the revolving cylinder presses in 1847.

From the latter part of the eighteenth century the making of plates for stores, near the iron-mines in the northern part of the State, until the latter part of the nineteenth century, was a great industry, and the city of Troy held all the rest of the country as the centre of this trade. Troy held this primacy for many decades, but with the development of the West the trade followed the Western march, and other cities began to rival the city on the upper Hudson, one of them, Detroit, seizing the leadership. Still New York State ranks among the first in this work.

The output of the foundry and machine-shop industry of the State at the present time is worth fully $100,000,000 a year.

Practically equalling the value of the foundry and machine-shop output is that of printing and publishing. Here is an industry which surpasses every other in the New World in influence. Printing was established in Massachusetts and in Pennsylvania before it began in New York, but in 1803 the government of the colony induced William Bradford to leave Philadelphia and set up a press in New York, giving him the large sum of fifty pounds annually to set up and publish the "Society of Assembly and Publick Papers." In 1825 Bradford published the first newspaper in New York, the Weekly Gazette. The annual system of trades sales of books, begun by the booksellers in 1802, stimulated the printing industry in the city. The improvements of the printing-press and of the stereotyping processes and the setting of type by machinery also served to develop it in the city where capital was easiest to procure, and the result is that New York is now the centre of the periodical and book-publishing business of the country.

Another industry in which the State leads all the others is knitting by machinery. This is of New York origin in this country. Eliott Egberts in 1821 started this work in a dismantled cotton factory at Cohoes, where water power was available. Success was not certain until after twelve years, and it was not until 1860 that the business was really established on a large scale in the State. Now its output is nearly $40,000,000 a year. Supremacy in the making of hosiery went to Philadelphia, after a few years, but the towns of the Mohawk and upper Hudson valleys specialized in underwear and kept the leadership of the industry in New York State. New York makes two-thirds more knitted goods than any other State.

Probably no industry in recent years has increased to the extent that the refining of sugar has. From 1860 to 1890 the recorded increase in the business was 425 per cent. It is now one of the leading industries of the metropolis. The first sugar-refinery in the New World was Rheinlander's, established in New York city in the latter part of the eighteenth century. It is also interesting to note that the house of Havemeyer was founded in 1865, almost a century ago, with five employees. The products of sugar refining in New York State, including two beet-sugar refineries, amount to more than $100,000,000 a year.

The Iron and Steel Industry

The famous Sterling iron-mine in Orange County, near the New Jersey border, furnished the raw material for the first steel manufactured in the State. That was in 1776. From that place there was produced much of the iron that went into the cannon of the days of the Revolution. The most famous product of the mills at Sterling was the great chain that was stretched across the Hudson River at West Point in the time of the Revolution to prevent the British ships from ascending the river and getting control of the key to the military situation in the North.

Iron was discovered later in the Adirondacks, and iron-working mills were set up in that region about 1801. Troy, being practically at the head of navigation in the eastern part of the State, soon became the centre of the iron industry, and in that city, in 1865, the second Bessemer steelworks in the country were established. The making of nails had always been a leading industry of Albany.

The production of pig iron declined with the growth of the iron
(Continued on page 1209.)

The Hall of the New York State Building

Interior Views of the New York State Building at the Fair

The Staircase, showing Mutual Decorations

SOMETHING like eighteen years ago the late Colin P. Huntington, then approaching the zenith of his success as builder of railway systems which have made his name famous the world over, concluded to undertake the construction of ships. He chose Newport News, Virginia, as "the best location in the world," to use his own designation, and gave orders to have a ship-building plant of large proportions erected there.

His directions were put into execution, and in 1899 a dry-dock capable of serving the largest vessels afloat at that time was completed. Later on the shipyard proper, containing over 100 acres of land, with a half-mile of water-frontage and ten acres of substantial buildings, was put into operation, and the work of constructing naval and merchant vessels commenced.

While the plant has only been in operation a few years, it has made a very busy place of the lower end of the Virginia peninsula. Newport News, Virginia, from a small hamlet, has grown to a city of 25,000 population.

The reputation of the shipyard has become world-wide, and a very considerable portion of the modern ships of the United States Navy have been turned out from Newport News. A large number of war vessels are now in construction there for Uncle Sam; here is the list of them:

COMPLETED AND IN COMMISSION

		DISPLACEMENT
U. S. Gunboats.....	Nashville	1,371 Tons
	Illahunghou	1,392 Tons
	Heleus	1,392 Tons
U. S. Monitor.....	Arkansas	3,200 Tons
U. S. Battle-ships.....	Kearsarge	11,525 Tons
	Neutunk	11,525 Tons
	Illinois	11,525 Tons
	Missouri	12,500 Tons

NOW IN CONSTRUCTION

		DISPLACEMENT
U. S. Protected Cruiser.....	Charleston	9,700 Tons
U. S. Armored Cruisers.....	West Virginia	13,400 Tons
	Maryland	13,400 Tons
U. S. Battle-ships.....	Virginia	15,000 Tons
	Louisiana	16,000 Tons
	Minnesota	16,000 Tons
	Three Gunboats.....

FOURTEEN SHIPS IN ALL, VIZ.:

- One Coast-Defense Monitor
- One Protected Cruiser
- Two Armored Cruisers
- Seven Battle-ships

Total Displacement..... 137,930 Tons

The following vessels, purchased by the United States Government during the Spanish War, were built at the Newport News shipyard. It is no uncommon thing for these auxiliary cruisers to make the voyage from New York to the Philippines, 12,000 miles, without stopping the ships' engines.

	DISPLACEMENT
Auxiliary Cruisers.....	Yankee 4,659 Tons
	Dirig 4,664 Tons
	Yosemite 4,659 Tons
	Raffalo 4,665 Tons
Hospital Ship.....	Solace 3,801 Tons

With the exception of the Yosemite, which was lost in the Philippine Islands, the above-named vessels are still in service, running, largely, a United States and Philippine ferry.

Many merchant vessels have been constructed at Newport News, viz.:

	DISPLACEMENT	DISPLACEMENT
Korea	11,300 Tons	El Rio No. 2 4,604 Tons
Siberia	11,300 Tons	El Cid No. 2 4,608 Tons
El Sud	4,659 Tons	Conus 4,625 Tons
El Norte	4,659 Tons	Probus 4,625 Tons
El Rio	4,664 Tons	El Valle 4,605 Tons
El Cid	4,665 Tons	El Dia 4,605 Tons

Newport News	1,535 Tons	El Siglo	4,605 Tons
LaGrande Duchesse	5,017 Tons	El Alba	4,605 Tons
Creole	3,801 Tons	Mourne	4,300 Tons
El Sud No. 2	4,572 Tons	Francis H. Leg-
El Norte No. 2	4,605 Tons	gett	4,606 Tons

At times the aggregate value of ships under construction at the Newport News yard has exceeded $25,000,000.

A specialty is made of repair work, which comes from all parts of the world, merchant and war vessels as well. Of late the German Government has been repairing the vessels of its West India fleet at Newport News. So well pleased is the German Admiralty with the character of the work done at Newport News that it has repeatedly sent vessels there for thorough overhauling.

Recently, steamship Deutschland, of the Hamburg-American Steamship Company, on arrival at the port of New York was found to be needing paint on her underwater body. She sailed for Newport News shipyard on Friday, was put in the mammoth drydock on Saturday, was thoroughly scraped and painted, and arrived in New York for reception of cargo early the following Monday, much to the delight of owners.

Good work, promptly done, reasonable charges, and a spirit of fair dealing are the controlling motives. Write for our illustrated pamphlet; it will be found interesting.

Address C. B. OGCUTT, President,

NEWPORT NEWS SHIPBUILDING & DRYDOCK CO.

No. 1 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

Cable address at New York and Newport News, Va., "Drydock."

Marine National Bank OF BUFFALO

OFFICERS

STEPHEN M. CLEMENT	PAYMENT
JOHN J. ALBRIGHT	Vice President
JOHN H. LAMCELLEN	Cashier
HENRY J. AUBER	Asst. Cashier
CLIFFORD H. HUBBELL	Asst. Cashier

Capital, $2,300,000.00 Surplus, $1,500,000.00
Undivided Profits, $367,948.20

Goodyear Lumber Company

BUSINESS ESTABLISHED
1872

CAPACITY
60,000 FEET PER DAY

MANUFACTURERS

OF

WILSON
ST. LOUIS
ST. LOUIS
RAILROAD

Pennsylvania
White Hemlock
Lumber

No. 950 ELLICOTT SQUARE

BUFFALO, N. Y.

L. W. HENDERSON, President E. L. L. KAY, Secretary
Geo. H. CLARK, Treasurer

The Rochester & Pittsburgh Coal and Iron Company
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Miners of Bituminous Coal and Manufacturers of Coke and Iron

(Located on the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh Ry.)

Sole Agents for the Sale of the Jederson & Clearfield Coal & Iron Co.

CELEBRATED

REYNOLDSVILLE COAL

A Superior Steam Coal for Household and Manufacturing Use.
Unsurpassed for Use in Ashes and Stoves.

Controlling the REYNOLDSVILLE COAL REGIONS.
DAILY CAPACITY: 30,000 tons coal.
3100 tons Coke, 300 tons iron

OPERATING THE FOLLOWING MINES:

Adrian, Rochester, F. B. Rich, Eleazar, Ernest, Phoenix, Hamilton, Hertsford, Henry, Lehigh, Maywood, Fox court, Rathbone, Buchanan, Naylor, Dick, Sherman, Niles, Redden, Rich, Truitt, Hon. Virginia, West atom, Yonkers.

SHIPMENTS MADE DIRECT TO ALL PORTS

SUPPLYING WHARVES

New York Harbor, Philadelphia, Buffalo and Charlotte, N. Y.

HARRY VATES

General Agent for Buffalo and Canada
Buffalo, N. Y.

C. D. BRACKENRIDGE

Sole Agent for the Seaboard
1 Broadway, NEW YORK CITY

General Office, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

New York—the Empire State

(Continued from page 1564.)

industry elsewhere, especially in Pennsylvania, but still as late as 1900 New York led Pennsylvania in the production of iron ore.

All roads lead to Rome, so do all business currents ultimately sweep around to New York. One may pick out almost any industry of the country and find that its seat of power is in New York. Take the iron and steel or coal industries. Financially, all recognize that the steel business is centered in New York. The buying and selling of steel as a commodity also centers there. Then, too, there is an enormous demand for iron and steel right in New York city itself. So much iron and steel are used for making machinery in various forms—electrical companies, tools, engines, gears for construction, building supplies, and so on of all kinds—that the demand from a city like New York for its own needs alone here the business throughout the country is trending.

Just now, after nearly twenty months of depression, the iron and steel men are beginning to look cheerful. It seems to be the opinion that the upward lift has come in the trade. Since 1902 the city has been to cut down, and that policy has had its run. It is now the belief that it must stop, because it has been overdone. Go among the men devoted to the iron and coal trade in New York, and the prediction is made that the year 1905 will be prosperous in that line of business. Agriculture may be the basis of prosperity generally, but iron and steel seem to have a basic relation to prosperity in New York city.

A belief in the revival of this trade would seem to be reasonable when one considers what a State and a city like New York must demand in iron and coal in various forms. Consider the transformation that has gone on in recent years in the building trade in New York city. The labor troubles have checked it, but all that will pass away, and the rebuilding of New York will continue. That undertaking of itself makes a large demand in the iron market. The steel beams, the electrical supplies, the engine and boiler needs—all these are involved in the rebuilding of a city.

What is going on up New York in time must come to pass in all of our great cities. The day of wooden buildings is over. Those now standing in the crowded parts of our big cities must come down. An enormous demand for steel will result to assist in the work of transforming American cities. Then the railroad-improving must continue as the population grows; the output in tools cannot decrease—in fact, there must continue to be a constantly growing demand for iron products, and it is only natural to expect that the pendulum will swing that way soon. One of the leaders in the trade has this to say:

"Stocks have been used up, scrap piles have been used up, construction projects of every kind have been postponed, railroads have put off purchases of needed equipment, and the waiting spirit has prevailed everywhere. We all know perfectly well that some morning the American people will wake up and will want to go to doing business. There are signs that they are yawning now. When the election is over they will be wide awake, and New York city will hem again with business life."

An Important Branch of the Industry

So intimately is the iron and steel business related to the great commercial activity of New York, State and city, that it is worth while to dwell upon one branch of it that flourishes in this country to an extent not known elsewhere in the world. That branch is the architectural iron working, especially in the matter of decoration. It is only about thirty years ago that a young foreman in Brooklyn, named Paulsen, started out in this line of work, having obtained his ideas from Europe. He was an architect, and could develop the art idea in iron-working. He was practically the father of the industry in this country. It is now of vast proportions. The decorative use of iron is enormous.

The use of iron in building came from the desire to make the building fire-proof. The ornamentation was a secondary idea. The iron is now used in elevator-work, staircases, lamps, steel awnings, and in scores of ways familiar to all those who know something of the modern buildings of a great city. Indeed, in a great factory devoted to this kind of decorative work no less than thirty separate trades are employed.

The great improvement in architectural designs of buildings has led its influence upon the decorative work in iron, and on the other hand, this influence has had a reflex action, and the improvements in the working of iron and the constantly advancing artistic side of the matter have brought about higher ideals in architecture. The result is bound to be a greater approach to the city beautiful in the transformation of our cities that is bound to come within the next twenty or thirty years, and keep our house-builders and iron men and architects and all the others of those who have to do with the building of edifices extremely busy and advancing an idea of the beautiful as will as the world. There are more than two hundred architectural iron-works in New York State, and the value of their output is fully $14,000,000 a year.

A View of the Reading Room in the New York State Building

Battleship Oregon—Buffalo, New York

Ships and Ship-building

One would think that in the harbor of the great metropolis of the Western world, whose life is dependent, it might be said, upon its harbor and shipping interests, there would be vast ship-building plants in or near by. It is a curious state of affairs that there are no great shipyards either in or near New York city, and that the State, with its excellent system of rivers, and bordering on two great lakes on the west and the Atlantic on the east, has to go to other States to have its great American-made ships built. One reason for the absence of great shipyards in New York State undeniably is that in the early days, when ship-building was done entirely of wood, the yards were established where it was easiest to get the raw material, oak and pine. When the iron stage of ship-building came in the old yards were simply transformed. Many new shipyards have been established since the era of iron and steel ships arrived, but none in New York. In the first place, land fronting on deep water in New York city is so valuable for commercial purposes that the new yards have been established where cheap land fronting deep water could be secured.

There is a good deal of ship-repairing in New York city, and a good deal of ship-building on a small scale in the State, but the absence of the industry on a large scale simply serves to call special attention to its importance. One finds down on Long Island, at Greenvale and Port Jefferson, shipyards where wooden vessels of all kinds are built. On the Harlem, at Morris, the most pretentious ship-building establishment in the State. This concern builds fast for American vessels as one of its trophies. It is also building two gunboats for the navy, the Duquesne and Pedestal. There is another establishment on the Harlem where turbines and engines are made.

Going up the Hudson River, one finds at Newburgh a yard where steel and wooden boats are made. These include some of the some of the largest river boats in the State. Up at Poughkeepsie is another ship-building plant, but its work is confined chiefly to the hulls of tug-boats and canal-boats. Down at Staten Island, and over on Barren ship-building plants where tug-boats, ferry-boats, lighthouse tenders, barges, lighters, sailing vessels, sailing yachts are constructed. Every one recalls that it was on Shooter's Island that the German Emperor's yacht Meteor was constructed. The most important ship-building contract in the State of New York for the current year has been that providing for the construction of five large ferryboats for the city, to ply upon the city line between the Battery and Staten Island. The contract for these boats went to a Maryland firm, but it sublet one of the contracts to a Staten Island concern that has built ocean-going tugs and light-house tenders, and has made a specialty of ferry-boat construction.

Big as the shipping interests of New York city and State are, the commerce of the ports is such that those who use home-made vessels generally go to other commonwealths to have them constructed. That of itself tells a significant story of the commercial interests of the State's rivers and ports.

To sum up in a few figures what the manufacturers of New York mean in the State's development it may be said that there are about 80,000 separate establishments engaged in manufactures of various kinds; that the capital employed in this work is about $1,700,000,000; that the wage-earners number in round numbers 900,000, and their wages amount to about $425,000,000 a year.

Flourishing Condition of Agriculture

On the agricultural side of what the State has to show in the way of resources there has been a remarkable growth in recent years. In the last ten years the total value of the farm output in New York State increased fully fifty per cent. As a result one hears very little about the poor conditions of farming in New York State. The average value of the farms is a little over $4,000, and the average size almost exactly 100 acres. The number of farms in the State is, in round numbers, 227,000.

It is a curious fact that about 70,000 of the 227,000 farms of the State, or nearly one-third, are devoted to the dairy industries. That shows the great demand for other dairy products in the great city population, especially in the metropolis. Farms are devoted to the production of live stock number nearly 40,000, and those known as hay and grain farms number about 27,000.

The most valuable farms in New York are those devoted to nursery products. There are only about 250 of these, but they are worth, on the average, $100,000. Farms used for the cultivation of flowers rank next in value. They are worth $45,000 on the average. Those used for growing vegetables, chiefly for city consumption, are worth about $37,000 each, while those that specialize in sugar beets are valued at $34,000 each. Tobacco farms are worth, on

(Continued on page 1510.)

ROGERS, BROWN & CO

The iron industry naturally classifies itself into two great divisions. The purging of the way comes when the iron ore is changed into the blast furnace. One division of ores, and one form of treatment, produces the product for a later conversion into steel, the other division is for the multi-branch furnaces through which cast and wrought iron pass to make the machinery, the stoves, the car wheels, and the many articles which form the backbone of modern civilization.

It is in the latter field of foundry and mill iron that the firm of Rogers, Brown & Co. have been specialists for the past twenty-five years, during which time they have become the largest discharging firm in the great trade, handling at the rate of one-third of all that is consumed in the United States and exporting to all the principal countries of the world.

The firm and its individual members operate many of the best-known furnace plants in the country none so familiar to every foundryman, as, for instance, the Crane and Niagara in the East, the Hanging Rock and Cleveland in the Central West, the Ingersoll at Chicago and the Cherokee in the South. The two Susquehanna furnaces not completed at Buffalo (illustrated above) represent the most advanced step in blast-furnace construction. So completely have invention and advanced engineering skill been combined here that from the time the iron ore and fuel have the honors of Willesco and Prometium until the pig-iron is dropped below to convenient men, into cars for shipment, the touch of man's hand is not left except through the medium of electric bellows or steam lever.

Manner of Casting Pig-Iron on a Sand Floor

Owing to its direct, practically inexhaustible deposits in the Lake Superior district and large coal fields, and coke-ore plants within half a day's ride of Buffalo, this enterprise is destined to become a prominent factor in the iron and possible steel world.

The firm was among the pioneers in and have been the most active co-operators of Southern coke iron, which they have sent to every continent. They have offices in New York, Boston, Buffalo, Cleveland, Chicago, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, St. Louis and Birmingham.

ACHESON GRAPHITE PAINT

WHY do our engineers and investors spend $50,000,000.00

annually in structural iron and steel and then allow their purchasing agents or contractors to enter into a cat-in-the-hat competition for cheap paints of unknown quality with the certainty of this result in two or three years. The total cost of a standard paint is less than one per cent of the cost of the iron. Inset on the use of Acheson Graphite Paint and thereby assure the permanency of the $50,000,000.00 invested.

Acheson Graphite is manufactured in the Electric Furnace. It is pure, uniform, inert, and fully guaranteed.

Write us for full information

INTERNATIONAL ACHESON GRAPHITE CO.
MADISON PARK, N. Y., U. S. A.

(Continued from page 459.)

an average, $2,500 each; hay and grain farms, $1,000; fruit farms, $2,500; live-stock farms, $1,000.

In examining the returns of the dairy industry we find that more than 500,000,000 gallons of milk are sold annually in the State and about 60,000 gallons of cream. The sale of milk has increased faster than the proportionate number of cows, which number in the State about 1,300,000. This shows that there has been a decided improvement in the rate and the grade of milk producing cattle.

One may go over the entire State and find practically every kind of farming that is profitable anywhere in the country in successful operation in New York State, except the staples like cotton and rice and certain fruits that require a warm climate. Tobacco, hops, vegetables, flowers, nursery trees, hay and grain, dairy products—all the varied branches of farming that are practiced in the northern part of the United States flourish in New York State. The farmer of New York, as a rule, is a most prosperous person.

A Growing Industry

In considering the agricultural side of the State's yearly products we find that some interests have so developed that it is difficult to classify them as agricultural or as manufacturing. One of these is the canning and preserving business. This is on the border line between agriculture and manufacturing, and also has to do with fisheries, inasmuch as a great quantity of shell fish is preserved for future use. The money investments in preparing preserves, pickles, and soups have enlarged the business enormously in recent years, and has made it one of the State's notable industries.

There are more than 1,000 establishments engaged in this line of work in New York State, and they employ nearly 7,000 persons, paying almost $2,000,000 a year in wages. The value of the product of these factories is nearly $13,000,000 a year.

The canning of fruits and vegetables is really a comparatively new industry in the United States. In 1870 there were only sixty-seven such establishments in the entire country and none in New York State. In thirty years New York had practically one third of the 1,000 establishments in the United States. It is worth noting that New York State can every year 10,000,000 pounds of corn, 30,000,000 pounds of peas, 10,000,000 pounds of tomatoes, in the vegetable line; and 25,000,000 pounds of apples, 4,000,000 pounds of pears, 2,000,000 pounds of peaches, 3,500,000 pounds of plums, 3,000,000 pounds of strawberries, and 4,000,000 pounds of raspberries in the fruit line. The whole output in vegetables and fruits is worth about $9,000,000 a year.

With the growth in canning fruits and vegetables there came a development in putting up pickles, preserves, and soups. This branch of the general canning industry has now reached in New York State a total value in output of nearly $4,000,000 a year. Some of the most notable establishments in the United States are to be found in this State. There are fully 100 of these factories, large and small, and they employ a capital of nearly $2,000,000.

The excellence of their product is proved by the great growth of the business. In this topic the official report of the State Department of Labor throws significant light. It says:

"If the two industries (canning and preserving fruits and vegetables; pickles, preserves, and soups) be considered together, New York leads all the States except California, which ranked 53.7 per cent. of all the fruit canned in the United States. New York's park of canned vegetables (as well as fruits) is smaller than Maryland's, but with the inclusion of canned soups, stews, and preserves, New York's total production, as noted, slightly exceeds that of Maryland. New York leads all States in the canning of pumpkins, peas, and apples; ranks second in the canning of beans and pears, and third in small fruits (berries)."

Far more than manufacturers and agricultural interests are the forces that go to make up the activities of a great commonwealth. The element of commerce—the buying and selling of goods—encompasses the making and the growing of things that can be sold. No one knows and no estimate can be made, with any degree of accuracy, as to the amount of trade done in New York State. The great financial reports throw some light on the matter, but they are only indicative. What they mean and what the financial interests of New York mean are treated elsewhere.

An Instance of Development

In one branch of manufacture, that of optical goods and instruments, New York has shown a remarkable growth during recent years, and a large part of the output of the country now comes from this State. According to the government census reports and the reports of the State Department of Labor, there were in 1901 eight hundred establishments in New York State devoted to the manufacture of optical goods. The combined capital of these plants was $2,392,243; fourteen hundred and nine secured within two or three years as large deposits as old established banks have taken half a century to accumulate. The larger ones are generally operated in the interests of some life insurance company, profiting enormously by the connection. In New York city the trust companies carry almost as heavy deposits as the banks, and for that reason wield an enormous influence in the loan market. They are also invading rural territory, and through others to pay high rates of interest for deposits are taking from the banks much profitable business. This has led to sharp competition, but the recovery, for the most part, is friendly and without disagreeable features.

The New York School Exhibit in the Education Building

Most of the trust companies maintain safe deposit centers, which have become an important feature of banking development at centers throughout the State. The vaults are protected by every known contrivance for the safeguarding of valuable property, and in point of security, convenience, and absolute protection Wall Street's underground treasure-houses are the most superb steel fortresses in the world.

The State Mineral Exhibit of New York

By Frederick J. H. Merrill

THOUGH New York does not sink as a mining State and is not prominent in the production of metals, it is still rich in mineral resources and has a high place in the production of materials of construction.

ADVERTISEMENTS

The Monotype

It is exactly four centuries and a half since Johan Gutsburger arranged laboriously and by hand the clumsy characters which served to impress the first page known to be printed from movable type. For close upon four hundred and fifty years following all subsequent printers have, perforce, set up or "composed" this type in the same toilsome fashion. Now, however, one of the most noteworthy outcomes of modern mechanical ingenuity has come to the printer's aid, and the Monotype has forever relegated the hand composition of type to the limbo of the superseded arts.

Unlike the generality of labor-saving devices used in the crafts, the Monotype does not attain its celerity and economy at the expense of technical quality. Its product, indeed, is superior, from an expert's point of view, to that of the hand compositor. Indeed, it does not only set the type with mathematical accuracy and regularity, but it also automatically casts the individual types, separate one by one, from an expert's point of view, to that of the hand compositor. Indeed, it does not only set the type with mathematical accuracy and regularity, but it also automatically casts the individual types, separate one by one, from an expert's point of view, to that of the hand compositor.

The Monotype is now in general use in the printing-offices of those publishers who insist that any mechanical substitute for the hand compositor must equal if not surpass the quality of the hand product. It is, for instance, employed every week on the composition of the type from which Harper's Weekly is printed.

The Exhibit of the New York Forensic House Department in the Education Building

struction. Building stone, clay products, lime and cement, gypsum for wall plaster, and many other non-metallic materials much used in building and manufacturing tend to swell the annual aggregate value of the natural resources of the Empire State.

In small ratio of importance from area, petroleum, natural gas and salt have for many years been a source of commercial revenue.

Potential among the materials of reconstruction must be mentioned the building stones. Probably no State in the Union possesses so many of these as New York, owing to the variety of its geologic formations. They are illustrated by a series of large cubes, ten inches on each edge, dressed in each of the different kinds of finish. The dressing-stones are especially well shown in the various possibilities of their application, both for roads and for interior finish.

Clay products in the form of brick and roofing-tile are shown in an ornamental pavilion, and there is an extensive suite of porcelain insulators for electrical work.

The manufacture of Portland cement is shown by a very complete series of raw materials and samples illustrating the various stages of the process. Gypsum products, such as used for stucco and wall plaster, as well as in Portland cement, in relation to the setting, are shown in a detailed exhibit.

Besides the above are shown tale for paper, garnet for sandpaper, graphite for pencils, crucibles, tubulents and other uses, sulfures, glass sand and other minor articles.

Iron is represented by magnetic ores, red fossil ore, brown hematite from Dutchess and Catskill counties, and carbonate ore or siderite.

A large magnetic separator of the type used at Port Henry for removing phosphate of lime from magnetic iron ore is shown in operation.

Mineral paint made from the red and brown iron ores and iron slates of various colors is also exhibited.

Potassium of various kinds and its many-faceted products is well shown in a series of tall bottles, while natural gas can only be noted by marking on a map the localities where it is found.

Salt is shown in all its varieties from the solar salt-fields at Syracuse, the brine wells of western New York, and the mines at Bettsford and Livonia. There is an illustration of the processes and numerous chemical products made from brine in a large and instructive exhibit.

The geology of New York in its various branches is illustrated by maps and publications, and the distribution of its minerals, commercially important, is graphically shown by a series of maps prepared for the purpose.

The division of paleontology of the State Museum shows its large and famous series of reports, a collection of original drawings, and a large slab thirty feet by ten feet of Potsdam sandstone, bearing the trails of a prehistoric animal which made the old sea beach its haunt.

A large part of the material exhibited has been previously shown at Chicago and Baltimore, and a number of diplomas and medals were awarded at those exhibitions to the New York mineral exhibits.

The Graphite Industry

THE manufacture of graphite is one of the surprising and wonderful processes of Niagara Falls. The furnace is of brick construction, with a very refractory lining, outside of which are refractory fire-brick loosely placed. The raw material used is anthracite coal. When a furnace has been charged with the raw material the electric current is thrown on, and 1000 electrical horse-power is applied to the operation of the furnace. For many hours this large amount of power is gradually converted into heat energy, the heat being retained in the furnace without radiation. Thus it gradually accumulates until the temperature of the furnace reaches an almost unknown value. At this point the anthracite coal is converted into graphite. It is probable that in the graphite-furnace the highest temperature known to man is to be found, even going beyond 7500 degrees Fahrenheit.

Beyond question, the process is a duplication of the method Nature employed to make the natural graphite of the earth, for many natural graphites closely resemble coal in general appearance. The temperature attained in the furnace in which this graphite is made is such that all substances other than carbon are volatilized and are driven from the furnace like so much moisture or vapor. It is thus evident that graphite formed in this manner, and in such remarkable temperature, is very pure. The uniform quality of the product has commanded attention. It could hardly be otherwise, for the raw material used is always uniform, and the process of manufacture is under absolute control from the moment the electric current is turned on until it is cut off. This graphite is ex-

Some of New York's Exhibits
at the Fair

ly inert, being unaffected by any acids or alkalies, proof of combustion, and of abrasion, or other destructive elements in the atmosphere, and for this reason it is an ideal pigment.

Paint has been used for ages to protect steel pigments. The original wood interiors and exterior were painted with oil to protect it, and a drier was applied to hasten drying, time being an important factor in hardening. This was the important factor. With the modern wood, iron and steel plates of largely replaced wood and other materials, and with the coming of what might be termed the iron age, engineers and architects looked about for an inert body that would act as a pigment in the protection of steel. Finally they came to the conclusion that natural graphite was the material they sought. It would reduce to powder, and could be spread when mixed with oil. However, their enthusiasm caused them to overlook the impurities contained in natural graphite. This is especially true of the sulphur, and where natural graphite was used in paint, the sulphur developed sulphuric acid, and in this form it attacked the steel. The use of this inert material that electrolysis came in the rescue, and provided an artificially manufactured graphite that is pure. All paint manufacturers of what might be termed a perfect pigment should be inert, unalterable, and acid-resisting. Carbon is the only elementary substance that possesses such quality, and in the face of the fact that it meets these requirements. It should be remembered that any hardening agent used, such as oxide of lead, for instance, only serves to shorten the life of a paint by pointing iron and steel the main point to study is the protective qualities of the paint used. It is not a question of haste in drying it, it is the exposure and protection afforded. Up to the time of the discovery of pure graphite, the engineers and architects were between two evils. They either had to paint their work with a paint containing an artificial drier that would powder and peel, or they had to use a natural graphite and producing pigment. It is estimated that there are 300,000 tons of pigment used in paint annually, and of this amount 4000 tons are graphite.

Until the power of Niagara was available it was impossible to make a standard paint pigment, because pure carbon was not obtainable. The natural graphite found in the earth today might have been pure when originally formed, but they have since been attacked with sulphur, minerals, etc., and it is quite impossible to remove the impurities without incurring an expense the body is ground up, and enters into the manufacture of paint. Natural graphite is found in all countries.

Every year the annual expenditure in the erection of structural iron and steel, and the use of steel, it costs about $300,000,000 in paint required repainting from time to time. Wherever and wherever a paint of iron or steel is erected it should have the best possible protective coating, and this is a point made of graphite. Where natural graphite is used, the paint is necessarily of unknown quality. It is possible, of course, to get iron of known quality, and also a standard of drier, but where natural graphite is used as pigment it is not of known quality. This one of the elements that makes trouble is the sulphur in the paint. Wherever, would be converted into acid, and iron, or other metal surface on which it was applied. Where a standard oil and drier and known, giving a paint of standard quality and of definite and lasting results.

However, the value of graphite is not confined to the paint industry. It is proving to be of great value in the manufacture of dry lubricants, motor brushes, lubricating waxes, pencils, lead pencils, etc., and in the use of graphite may be used in which natural graphite has heretofore been used.

It is indeed strange that the same factor that puts the world in a better position to know where to go, should also supply a lubricant in place of oil.

NEW YORK State's participation in the Louisiana Purchase Exposition is intended to give an idea of the wonderful resources of the State, as well as to set forth what the Empire State is accomplishing in the various lines of humanitarian work. The New York State Convention started out with the idea of making exhibits only along the lines in which New York is preeminently the leader, but this account and for the reason that the opportunities were relatively limited, exhibits were planned to cover every distinct department. It was intended to make these exhibits representative in every detail.

The commission was of the unanimous opinion that the most conspicuous feature of New York's participation in the Exposition, especially so far as the impression which would be made upon visitors is concerned, would be her State Building. An excellent site was chosen for this structure, and an able architect was engaged to draw the plans. The building was erected in a conspicuous place on the Plaza of the State. While two other States, Missouri and Pennsylvania, have larger structures upon which a greater outlay of money has been made, the New York building is particularly worthy of attention for its beauty of architecture and the splendor and appropriateness of its appointments.

The New York Building

THE building is simple and dignified in design. Every detail has been carefully studied. In sculpture there are two notable pieces of work in Martiny's Quadriga flanking the dome, representing the progress of art and commerce, and in lead's soaring groups around the columns of the entrance. One enters a large hall running through to the dome. An interesting feature in the hall is the organ, which is designed for the building. The hall is flanked on the northern side by a large assembly hall, with a ceiling running up to the second story. In the building are four rooms for banquets, public functions, and so on.

The mural decorations of the large hall were done by Florio Piccolotto, and represent De Soto discovering the Mississippi, our showing the French and Indian occupation of the land, and others showing New York in 1603 and New York in 1803. The pendulums which support the dome have four emblematic pictures representing the four States most benefited by this purchase, the Mississippi in the background of each. Dining-rooms, with an electric kitchen and cuisine, have been provided. Altogether, everything possible has been done to make the building convenient for visitors and attractive in design.

Education and Social Economy

Education

THE education exhibit is composite in nature, and has been subdivided as follows:

- 1.—Administration.
- 2.—Kindergartens.
- 3.—Elementary Grades.
- 4.—High Schools.
- 5.—Normal Schools, Training Schools and Classes.
- 6.—Higher Education.
- 7.—Industrial and Trade Schools.
- 8.—Special Schools.
- 9.—Business Colleges.
- 10.—Indian Schools.
- 11.—Schools for Defectives.
- 12.—Summer Schools and Extension Schools.

There are elaborate exhibits from both the State Department of Public Instruction and the University of the State of New York. In the public school exhibit contributions have been received from twenty-four cities and various villages. There is also a comprehensive exhibit from the rural schools of the State. In the normal-school exhibit contributions have been received from every normal school, each school exhibiting the part of the curriculum assigned to it by a committee of normal-school principals, appointed to prepare the exhibit. The training schools and classes of the State are very generally represented. Exhibits are in place from Hobart College, Geneva; Manhattan College, New York city; Tulane University, Hamilton, and Syracuse University. Many interesting features are shown in the department devoted to technical and trade schools and also special schools. In the schools for defectives, the exhibits are in place from the New York State School for the Blind, Batavia; New York Institution for the Blind, New York city; Western New York Institution for the Deaf, Buffalo; New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, New York city. The exhibit from the Indian schools contains work from all of the seven reservations in the State, and was arranged by the State Inspector of Indian Schools.

Among the features of the exhibit may be mentioned a handsome collection of poetry from the New York State School of Clay-Working and Ceramics at Alfred University; an exhibit of house-made apparatus containing contributions from various institutions; a model of the New York State Normal and Training School at Fredonia constructed by the students in the school; doll house constructed and furnished by the children of the grammar school of the State Normal School at New Paltz; a series of charts bearing upon the educational activities of the State, prepared by the New York State Teachers' Association; and a large mural map of the State, showing and showing the grade of each institution of learning within the State.

Social Economy

Due to the plan of installation adopted by the Exposition authorities, the State exhibit in the Department of Social Economy is shown on several different places on the grounds. The State Commission in Lunacy makes an interesting exhibit in which are shown the ancient and modern methods of caring for insane patients, the history of the whirling chair and the perp-dore, shackles, etc., shows the torture to which they were formerly subjected, whereas a light, airy, pleasant room, containing an exhibit of furniture and appliances of every description, is in marked contrast, and shows the present method. This is supplemented by a complete exhibit of photographs of the various institutions, both exterior and interior, also a model showing the best system for the treatment of tuberculosis. The State Board of Charities makes a very complete exhibit.

(Continued on page 1515.)

ADVERTISEMENTS

DAUSCH & LOMB
LENSES AND SHUTTERS
SEND FOR BOOKLET
DAUSCH & LOMB OPTICAL CO.
NEW YORK, N.Y.

Correspondence

ENGLAND IN THE CIVIL WAR

BOSTON, MASS., September 21, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—The position of England in regard to the civil war is an interesting one, and the letter in your issue of August 27 gives the impression that Mr. Gladstone's influence was against any action prejudicial to the North. How can Mr. Gladstone's letter to Mr. Cleve be reconciled with the following statements from Norley's Gladstone, vol. 2, pages 70-77:

Lord Palmerston on September 24, 1862, wrote Mr. Gladstone that he himself and Lord Russell thought that the time was fast approaching when an offer of mediation ought to be made by England, France, and Russia, and that, if he was not mistaken, Mr. Gladstone would have approved such a measure. The proposal would be made to both North and South. If both should decline, then Lord Palmerston intended that they would declare the independence of the South. Mr. Gladstone replied that he was glad to learn what the Prime Minister had told him, and that he desired that the proceedings should be prompt.

This was only a few days before the Lincoln address, in which he said: "We know quite well that the people of the Northern States have not yet drunk of the cup . . . which all the rest of the world see they nevertheless must drink of. . . There is no doubt that Jefferson Davis and the other leaders of the South have made an army: they are making, it appears, a navy; and they have made what is more than either, they have made a nation."

I am, sir,

EDGAR F. BILLINGS.

ENDOWED ATHLETICS IN COLLEGES

THE STATE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA,
IOWA CITY, IOWA, September 4, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—In the issue of the WEEKLY for August 3 is an article by President Harper on the above subject that suggests thought, much of it along different lines than that followed by the learned gentleman. As a matter of fact the question today is not so much for shall college athletics be continued, as whether it is not best to discontinue it altogether. The subject is too large a one to discuss in the space limits the editor might permit, and can be approached from so many points of view that a volume would exhaust it. Still, I think I can and should be said that would be helpful to those engaged in college work who are vaguely dissatisfied with the status quo.

The doctor considers that the present situation is little short of scandalous, and that if reform is not possible it would be better to drop athletic contests. This is an interesting view. There is probably not a college in the country, in which athletics is practiced to any considerable extent, that is not scandalized by the dishonesty and low moral sense now and then discernable. We can not deny that the management of athletic affairs is a matter some of us are proud of, and the whole college world is now practically arrayed in two bodies, one for reform and one for abolition entirely. I believe the conditions surrounding so-called athletics make it impossible to reform: the "sporting" spirit that seems to be essential almost entirely negates the moral degradation of these who are connected with it. This view of the question, the moral one—is large enough for an essay, but far for the present must be passed. So, likewise, that which is related to individual considerations. It is not difficult to show—any of us in college life have an abundance of data—that a professional coach, gate receipts, association with "sporting" characters, to any extent of the carelessness of speech, dress, and manners that seem to be inseparable from athletic pursuits, must, it would seem, inevitably lead to moral degradation, if not on the part of the active participants, surely on their superiors.

No, also, as to the intellectual deterioration. It looks like "utter badness" to claim that good work can possibly be done in the classroom and laboratory by those whose whole waking moments seem to be given up to thought and work on athletics, who spend hours of their waking hours practicing the various games; who are absent from their classes days at a time on tours from field to field. So all these questions, while of the first importance, are for the present to be passed by, yielding place to one of even greater moment.

In the outset of the discussion, let us define terms. Physical culture and athletics are not synonymous. Not only are they two distinct things, but they are antagonistic. The systematic, scientific, intelligent cultivation of bodily health and balance, by systematic work or otherwise, is desirable, yes, even necessary for those who wish to do the best work possible. But the training for athletic events—and much of our physical culture is for an higher purpose—damages the body and weakens the intellectual faculties. Even were this not literally true, and I challenge you to contradict it, it is still true that such "training" is detrimental to any one who is not a professional athlete, why is it that the vast majority of the student body are denied it? Why should a couple of thousand students be denied such training in any single college, and from ten thousand to one hundred thousand dollars be spent in training fifteen or twenty?

Time and space, as well as other considerations, forbid attempting a thorough discussion of the subject; the statement must stand for a fact that athletic "training" is physical suicide: it is ruin to the individual, and it is ruin to the nation. It is a waste of time, and even then he must, in all probability, recognize himself to a short life, with a mere or less painful or tragical ending, and nothing left behind it all that has been of the slightest value to his kind, unless it be to establish a warning. So, with moral degradation, intellectual infirmity, and physical damage as the outcome of it all, is it not better to drop athletics out of our college life?

Some years ago—and not many either—the situation became so serious that colleges combined, in contiguous territory, and formed leagues of associations, of one kind or another, to eliminate the evils that had grown up, and we heard much of "clean athletics," and "amateurism," and "gentleman's games," and the like. But amateurs and gentlemen do not play games for money, and so it has been no surprise, to those who have watched the thing from the inside, to find that after a brief period of apparent decency, our college after another has been shocked by revelations of dishonesty, race-baiting, and fraud in connection with their athletics, until it seemed to many the thing itself is, in the nature of things, demoralizing and debasing. The outsider would be shocked if some of the things which are now being published. Those on the inside know the situation without being cited to instances. Therefore the question would seem to be, not are athletics to be "purified," should it be to "endowed," or any other question as to amateurism, but rather should it not be abolished entirely. But, let it be remembered, this discussion has nothing whatever to do with physical culture; that is a matter of an entirely different nature.

I am, sir,

JAMES G. GIERHART.

COEDUCATION AND MARRIAGE

NEW YORK AUGUST 21, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Dr. Van de Water's article on "coeducation" is interesting, but, according to my own experience, neither new nor just. I know, to be sure, the life of only two coeducational universities, both in California. During the years in which I was a student or in touch with these institutions, I found among the young women probably some of the most sincere and intelligent I have ever seen. Granted they were not fashionable, that their imaginations and senses were not heated by that continual immersion in excitement, which is certainly the massive influence of society's life of the childhood and theatre—nevertheless, I found that their occupations of both body and mind had kept them from knowing that there even was a "sex problem." Their friendships with young men were not the aim and end, but merely incidents of their college life. At home with their mothers (in the Western way) they had already been allowed similar friendships. At college I distinctly remember that my conversations with young men friends were on a distinctly better basis than those possible in the parlors or drawing rooms during vacations, where the young or easy men (who largely composed my abster's circle) hardly interested me with their continual hunt for flirtation and the varied excitements offered by the "sex relation."

I married a man who went to my college (though not at the same time), and later persuaded a very student manager (married after graduation), where the wife is in every way an intelligent and sensible helpmate to her husband. Perhaps culture does come later, but surely these colleges are as good a beginning as are a few words spoken at a distant's tea or dinner behind a conservatory pane. Fortunately, whether they are coeducational, young men and girls will be up to marry. A short time ago attacks were made on higher education for women on the plea that it made old maids of them, even statistics being adduced. Now that we marry too much! Ah, well, some of us are glad we read the same kinds as our husbands.

I am, sir,

A COHEN.

220 West 107th Street.

PURE-BLOODED AMERICANS

St. LOUIS, Mo., September 12, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Your remarks about "pure-blooded American" in September 10 issue much to be gratifying to great majority of the people of our country, since the most of them do not happen to be descendants of the Anglo-Saxon, and with all this recent talk about our being an Anglo-Saxon country we begin to feel ourselves crowded out and wonder whether we really are a part of this glorious country and whether we are included under our neighbor of English descent speaks of "our country." To judge from the newspapers, our position is doubtful, but when HARPER'S WEEKLY speaks out that way we feel encouraged that we may still pride ourselves on being Americans.

I am, sir,

H. B.

POETRY AND THE DOGSTAR

Worcester, Mass., September 20, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—The poem in a recent issue of the WEEKLY, entitled "1861 Glee," by Clinton Scollard, is all right in sentiment, but all wrong in its astronomy. He speaks of the dog-star blazing at night in August. I thought the dog-star rose and set with the sun in August, thus giving us dog-days, the superstition being that the heat of the great sun Sirius assisted our sun during the day in his scorching. Sir, the dog-star is a great star, but it is a red light, as Mr. Scollard puts it. Poets have undoubtedly license in many things, but it is questionable if they are privileged to interfere in the affairs of the sun, moon and stars.

I am, sir,

MILFORD KETTER.

(Continued from page 1512.)

plete exhibit of the several State institutions under its jurisdiction, first by means of photographs of exteriors and interiors, and, second, by specimens of work carried on in the industrial departments of the various institutions. They also make an elaborate photographic exhibit of the industries in the State, and also of the personalities. The State Labor Bureau sends a series of twenty-eight graphic charts bearing on labor conditions in the State, which give comparisons between New York and other States and countries. This is supplemented by a series of the reports of the Bureau. The State Department of Health furnishes an exhibit showing graphically the work under their jurisdiction. The State Excise Department furnishes a series of graphic charts upon the receipt and disbursalment of the various receipts of the State.

Under the Department of Social Economy are also exhibits from the Women's Institute of Yonkers, the National Consumers' League of New York city, the Bank of New York, and others of less importance.

The Agricultural Exhibit

THE New York agricultural exhibit differs from the other exhibits in the Agricultural Building in that the object sought is educational rather than spectacular. New York has a greater number of varieties and sample exhibits than any other State in the building.

In wheat, there are over five hundred varieties and about one thousand samples. In corn, New York has about one hundred varieties and three hundred samples. There are similar exhibits of the different varieties of the other agricultural products of the State, such as beans, peas, oats, barley, buckwheat, etc., in addition to exhibits of mineral waters and wines, including every variety made in the State; tobacco, salt, named fruits of every variety; named meats and fish, hops, flour, maple sugar, and vegetables.

There are on exhibit and in cold storage over three hundred varieties of potatoes and other vegetables in a smaller number of varieties, each sample of which, as of all the exhibits, is carefully labelled. While this exhibit required a long time for installation and a great amount of detail work, it has been found that the time and labor have been fully justified, in the fact that many farmers and those interested in the different exhibits have made numerous finds from the different exhibits for future use.

In these exhibits, including the large dairy exhibit, it is considered that, apart from its educational value, the resources of the State is graphically are completely represented.

The State Exhibit in Art

THE art exhibit of New York State includes the work not only of most of the best-known painters and illustrators of the State, but of many well-known architects, sculptors, and mural decorators. Following are the subjects covered by the exhibit. Oil and mural paintings, water-colors and posters, miniatures, illustrations, etchings, engravings and lithographs, wood engravings, sculpture, architecture, and applied art. While on account of the extent of this exhibit it is impossible in a short summary to enter into a critical discussion of the artistic value of the work here shown, it may be noted that nearly one-third of the total art exhibit from America at the Fair comes from New York State.

Exhibit of Horticulture

ON the opening day of the Fair, April 30, New York's exhibit of fruit was complete in almost every particular. In fact, New York was the only State of the thirty represented to have its exhibit installed and ready for inspection when the doors of the Horticulture Building were thrown open to the public.

The chief exhibits are of various varieties of apples, pears, and grapes.

New York has the largest exhibit in Horticulture Palace by several hundred plates, and also more than twice the number of varieties of any other State. New York is also the only State showing pears and grapes. At present the general exhibit consists of one hundred and fifty varieties of apples, pears, and grapes, covering a space of about four thousand square feet. Three hundred and fifty barrels of apples were placed in cold storage, sufficient to keep the exhibit complete until the ripening of summer and fall fruit. Consignments of fresh fruits were sent as the crops ripened from growers in different sections of the State. One special feature is a collection of a thousand plates of grapes, consisting of a hundred varieties, continuing from the beginning of the grape season until the close of the Fair, December 1.

Forest, Fish, and Game Exhibit

IN exhibiting the timber indigenous to the State, two specimens of each species are shown in panelled framework, showing both sides of the specimens. Only such species are represented in this manner as grow to a size permitting the cutting of boards five inches wide. One piece of each species is highly varnished on one side and planed but not polished on the other side. The other specimen of each species is shown rough, directly from the saw, on one side; the other side is hand-planed. Ninety species are shown in this manner, and, in comparison, nine species of introduced woods are exhibited in the same system of paneling.

This collection of specimens, not quite so (Continued on page 1517.)

AVENUE TO MORGAN.—Mrs. WILSON'S SHIRAZ, SHIRAZ should always be used for children feeding. It soothes the child, it tones the system, it is a good wind reliever, and it is the best remedy for diarrhoea. (Adv.)

FOR SALE

In the delicate process of feeding infants, HENNESSY'S EAGLE BRAND CONDENSED MILK is an essential element for good mother's milk, as it is prepared under the strictest supervision of preparation. Lay it to a supply for all kinds of exposures. (About unknown brands.) (Adv.)

SINGERS and Public Speakers will find PEARL CYAN FOR COLORED SONGS an effective one for instruction. (Adv.)

THE BROWN'S Complimentary Nominations DENTURE FOR THE THEATRE, all sorts of (Adv.)

ADVERTISEMENTS

Pears'
Don't simply
"get a cake of soap."
Get good soap. Ask for Pears' and you have pure soap.
Then bathing will mean more than mere cleanliness; it will be luxury at trifling cost.

Sales increasing since 1789.

High as the Alps
in Quality

PETER'S
THE ORIGINAL
SWISS MILK
CHOCOLATE

"Irresistibly Delicious."

Prepared by Dr. Peter, of Vevey, Switzerland, 37 years ago. Time has but strengthened its superiority over all imitations. Nourishing and does not create thirst. Wonderfully smooth and creamy.

UNIVERSALLY USED

By the Young and the Old
On the Long Sea Voyages
For the Sick and Weak
For the Traveller
For the Connoisseur

Free Sample and Illustrated Booklet, "An Access of Most Blanc," upon request.

LAMONT, COLLIER & CO.
New York, N.Y.
Sole Importers.

Dist. by: 75 Hudson St. New York.

50 Years
Established, the best in the world.
No. 1 and No. 2, 100% pure.
No. 3 and No. 4, 100% pure.
No. 5 and No. 6, 100% pure.
No. 7 and No. 8, 100% pure.
No. 9 and No. 10, 100% pure.

TORREY STROPS

Handmade of purest material. Made in all the best ways. No. 1 and No. 2, 100% pure. No. 3 and No. 4, 100% pure. No. 5 and No. 6, 100% pure. No. 7 and No. 8, 100% pure. No. 9 and No. 10, 100% pure.

"How to Illustrate" AND "ART OF CARICATURE"

With 100 original drawings and 100 original caricatures. Price $1.00. Sent by mail. No. 1 and No. 2, 100% pure. No. 3 and No. 4, 100% pure. No. 5 and No. 6, 100% pure. No. 7 and No. 8, 100% pure. No. 9 and No. 10, 100% pure.

Sound and healthy lives are accepted. There are no conditions as to sex, color or culture—even millionaires are insured in the

PENN MUTUAL LIFE,
621-2-3 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

THE TRIUMPHS

BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS

In the opening chapter Pamela Marlowe is introduced to the reader as a young society woman of London, beautiful and of rare personal charm. Late one night Pamela met Alan Warriden, who is in love with her, sneaking a peep into the room of the opposite house. They are Tony and Millicent Stretton, who live in a gloomy house provided over by the rich but absent father of the young man. They are in reality kept prisoners by the whims of the tyrannical old man, and it is only by playing truant and going out by stealth late at night that they are able to enter at all into the life of the outside world. But finally they both weary of their monotonous life, and Tony determines to go to America to make his fortune. In the absence Millicent becomes infatuated with Lionel Callon, a gentlemanly adventurer. Pamela wishes to help her. She sends Warriden on a mission to find Tony and bring him home.

Warriden finds that Tony, having lost all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the North Sea on a trawler. Warriden goes every argument to prevail upon him to come back, but he refuses. Tony reaches on the trawler with the crew of his cruise is over seasickness having learned of his father's death, and then decides to sail in the Fewer's Foreign Letter, as no other career seems open to him. John Madge, a friend of Pamela's, hears from her of the peril little is in from Callon. He lays up all Callon's debts and places them in the hands of a single firm of solicitors, who insist on a settlement within twenty-four hours. Callon receives a proposition from Madge to superintend an important expedition of the Letter's to Madagascar, which his friends will difficulties compel him to accept. Callon returns from Callon and persuades Millicent to go south with him. They are seen drifting together late at night in Regent's Park by Mr. Madge, who tells Pamela that he was in danger for himself. Pamela, the second time, compels Warriden to go in search of Tony, and he gladly accepts. Pamela goes to Regent's Park, where she had visited as a young girl, and while there learns of the presence of the Letter's at Regent's Park, where she was with a troop of soldiers on an expedition across the Desert of Sahara, and on his return to Morocco is given the commission of lieutenant. At that moment Warriden arrives with a letter from Pamela. Tony reads the letter, and decides to desert the army, with which he has enlisted for five years, and they return to Europe together. Tony leaves Warriden at Monte Carlo, and goes on to Regent's Park, arriving there in time to meet Pamela, who informs him that Millicent has also just arrived. Tony suspects that Lionel Callon is there too, and goes there. Pamela, the confidante, and he leaves her at nine to find Callon. Pamela then hastily writes a note to Callon, and starts for the village with it. She calls on M. Almond, an old schoolmaster whom she had known during her first visit to Regent's Park, and requests him to deliver her note to Callon.

CHAPTER XXXI

AT THE RESERVE

TONY STRETTON walked quickly down from the Villa Panigiano to the station. There he learned that on your next departure before a train in five hours' time. In action was at this moment intolerable to him. Even though he should get to Eve not a minute the sooner, he must hurry upon his way. He could not wait upon this platform for an hour, however so hurried he was. He went out upon the road and began to run. He ran very quickly. The road turned sharply round the shoulder of a hill, and Stretton saw in front of him the lights of Monte Carlo. They were lined in great white clusters, they were strung in festoons about the square and the streets. They made a golden crescent about the dark quiet waters of the lake. Looking down from his shoulder out of the hill upon the town at such an hour one seems to be looking upon a town of fairyland: one expects a sweet and delicate music to float upwards from its houses and charm the ears. Tony's one thought was that beyond that glare of lights lay Eve. He came to an electric tram which was on the point of starting. He entered it, and it rattled him quickly down the hill.

At Monte Carlo he sprang into the first carriage which he saw waiting for a fare, and bade the coachman drive him quickly out to Eve. The night had come; above his head the stars shone very brightly from a dark sky of velvet. The carriage passed out of the town; the villas grew more scarce; the open road glimmered ahead of him a ribbon of white; the sea murmured languidly upon the shore.

At this moment, in a lonely restaurant towards which Tony was driving in such haste, Lionel Callon and Millicent Stretton were sitting down to dinner. The table was laid in the small, dimly-furnished room which opened on to the terrace. The windows stood wide, and the lazy murmur of the water entered in. The white cloth alone with silver, a great bowl of roses stood in the center and delicately perfumed the air. Thither Millicent had come in fulfillment of that promise made on a midnight of early spring in Regent's Park. The color turned prettily on her cheeks, she had dressed herself in a pink gown of lace, jewels shone on her arms and at her neck. She was, perhaps, a little feverish in her gait, her laughter was perhaps a little overbold. Indeed, every now and then her heart sank in fear within her, and she wished herself far away. But here Lionel Callon was at his ease. He knew the methods by which victory was to be won. There was no suggestion of timidity in his manner. He was considerate, and most deferential, and with no more than a hint of passion in the defence.

"You have reason," he said. His eyes rested upon hers, and he led them to observe his gratitude. He raised her hand to his lips and gently took the clasp from her shoulders. "You have had a long journey. But you are not tired." He placed her chair for her at the table and sat opposite. He saw that she was uneasy. He spoke no word which might alarm her.

Meanwhile Tony was driving home. He reached the hotel at Eve, and drove in at the gate at the door.

"Is Lady Stretton in the hotel?" he asked.

"No, sir. Her ladyship went out to dinner nearly an hour ago."

"Thank you," said Tony. "She arrived this afternoon, I think."

"Yes, sir. What name shall I give when she returns?"

"No name," said Tony. And he ordered his coachman to drive back to the road.

When he had reached it he directed the man again.

"Towards Beaulieu," he said; and in a little while, on his left hand, below the level of the road, he saw the lights of the Esplanade. He stopped at the gate, dismissed his carriage, and walked down the winding drive to the door. He walked into the restaurant. It was empty. A waiter came forward to him.

"I wish you to take me at once to Mr. Callon," he said. He spoke in a calm, matter-of-fact voice. But the waiter, nevertheless, hesitated. Tony wore the clothes in which he had travelled to Regent's Park. He was covered with dust, his face was haggard and stern. He had nothing in common with the dainty little room of lights and flowers and shining silver, and the smartly-dressed couple who were dining there. The waiter guessed that his intrusion would be altogether inconvenient.

"Mr. Callon!" he stammered. "He has gone out."

Tony heard the rattle of a metal cover upon a dish. He looked in the direction whence the sound came—he looked to the right-hand side of the restaurant. A door stood open there, and in the passage beyond the door he saw a waiter pass carrying the dish. However, the man who had spoken to him made yet another mistake. He noticed the direction of Tony's glance, and he made a quick movement as though to bar that passage.

"He is here," said Tony; and he thrust the waiter aside. He crossed the restaurant quickly and entered the passage. The passage ran parallel to the restaurant; and, at the end towards the terrace, there was another door upon the opposite side. The waiter with the dish had his hand upon the door-handle, but he turned at the sound of Tony's step. He too, noticed the disorder of Tony's dress. At the same moment the man in the restaurant shouted in a warning voice:

"Jules!"

Jules stood in front of the door.

"Monsieur, this room is private," said he.

"Yet I will take the liberty to intrude," said Tony, quietly.

From behind the door came the sound of a man's voice which Tony did not know. He had, indeed, never heard it before. Thus a woman's laugh rang out, and the sound of it as fall as in this representation, was exhibited at the Universal Exposition at Paris in 1900, where it was awarded a gold medal.

(Continued on page 1218.)

(Continued from page 1515.)

In connection with the specimens of timber are exhibited a series of photographs of trees of New York, eighty in number. Each tree is shown in leaf, and also as it appears in winter. A life-size photograph of the bark of each tree is shown, and, in most instances, specimens of the leaves, flowers, and fruit of the same are also attached.

In connection there are exhibited, in small glass jars, seeds of all the important forest trees of New York; also by-products of the forest, such as masts, sugar, pulp, wood-alcohol, and many other commodities.

Sections of trees, indicating the limit of growth of some important species, are shown, and with them are exhibited sections of spruce and pine.

A collection is shown of all the insects injurious to the trees of New York, prepared by the State entomologist.

The outside exhibit of New York consists of a nursery and plantation of forest trees. Here it is shown how tree seeds are planted, germinated, and protected; and many species of both conifers and hard woods of various ages, up to the size for transplantation, are displayed. An actual plantation of several species is also shown, to demonstrate how a forest is started.

In a part of the inside exhibit, in cabinets of special design, are shown specimens of substantially all the food and game fishes of New York. In preparing this exhibit of fish no attempt is made to show abnormally large specimens. The collection includes both fresh and salt water specimens of the fishes of New York. Some interesting specimens of oyster growth and of the varieties of the oyster are also shown.

A part of the inside exhibit is a typical hunter's camp under the name of "Camp Adirondack." It is constructed of square logs and roofed with spruce barks from the Adirondack forest by Adirondack guides, who are also hunters. The furnishings are of the most approved design for summer life in the forest. The "Camp" was first erected in the Adirondacks during the winter, then taken down and shipped to the Fair. Blasting and fishing implements of approved pattern are shown, and grouped at the side of the "Camp" are exhibited trophies of the chase in the form of a winter forest scene, which includes all of the animals, game birds, and other feathered life of the Adirondacks in winter. In front of the place is a tree carrying specimens of the prevailing and song birds of New York in the spring season.

In front of the "Camp," in cabinets, are displayed specimens of all the game-birds of the State, in number as follows: Forty-five wild ducks, six acid geese, thirty-three shore birds, and six quail, grouse, and ptarmigan. There are also exhibited, in connection with the water game birds, forty specimens of marsh and sea birds, making in the whole exhibit two hundred and eighty-five birds.

In this manner are exhibited specimens of substantially all the fur, fin, and feather life of the State.

Special Forestry Exhibit

An outside exhibit is located at the north-west corner of the Forestry. Fish, and game building. It consists of a nursery and plantation of forest trees, showing the method by which the Forest, Fish, and game Commission of New York is re-foresting the denuded, non-agricultural lands of the State. The plot, which is surrounded by a most rustic fence, is 120 feet long by 60 feet wide, and contains 80,000 trees. There are thirteen beds of seedlings—one showing how the seeds of evergreens are sown and germinated; four showing how the seedlings are protected, until they are two years old, from the intense heat of the sun; and eight showing how seedling trees from two to four years old are transplanted and cared for till ready to be placed in the forest. Running across the plot are ten rows of hardened trees suitable for the farmer's wood lot or for planting as shade trees.

(Continued on page 1519.)

Many social leaders in New York and other large cities—people who demand and have the best of everything—are users of COLUMBIA Electric Broughams, Landaus, Landauets, Hansoms, Coupes, Victoria Phaetons and Opera Busses. These vehicles are built from exclusive designs and are sold for private service only. Let us send you a handsomely printed list of prominent purchasers and our special Town Carriage Catalogue.

ELECTRIC VEHICLE CO., Hartford, Conn.

NEW YORK, 121-123 West 30th St. CHICAGO, 1413 Michigan Ave. BOSTON, 74 South St.

Member Association Licensed Automobile Manufacturers

READ "A Ladder of Swords" By GILBERT PARKER

THE EQUITABLE

HENRY B. HYDE
PRESIDENT

J. W. ALEXANDER
TREASURER

J. H. HYDE
VICE PRESIDENT

HARNESS THE POWER!

Why not utilize that part of your income now going to waste? By taking an Endowment policy in the Equitable you will protect your family and provide for your own mature years.

Splendid opportunities for men of character to act as representatives. Write to GAGE E. TABBELL, Vice President.

For full information fill out this coupon, or write:

THE EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES
120 Broadway, New York

Please send me information regarding an Endowment for $..... If issued at..... years of age

Name..... Address.....

(Continued from page 1518.)

geered Tony beyond endurance. He recognized it beyond the possibility of mistake. It was his wife who was laughing so freely there behind the closed door. He thought of the years he had spent in the determination to regain his wife's esteem, to live himself from her contempt. For the moment he could have laughed bitterly at his persistence as at some egregious folly. It seemed all waste—waste of time, waste of endeavor, waste of suffering. She was laughing at him, at his foolishness, at his weakness. The cold, black nights of the North Sea and its gales, the arid sands of the Sahara, all his long service for her ending in that crowning act of desertion—the story was clear in his mind from beginning to end, detailed and complete. And she was laughing in there with Lady Arden! Her laughter was like some biting epigram epitaphizing the way in which she had spent the years of his obscurity. This anger got the better of his self-control.

"Stand away," he cried, in a low, strange voice, to the waiter. And since the man was not instantly gone, he seized him by the shoulders and dragged him from the door.

"Monseur!" the man cried aloud, in a frightened voice, and the dish which he was carrying fell with a clatter on to the floor. Inside the room the laughter suddenly ceased. Tony listened for a second. He could not hear even a whisper. There was complete silence. He smiled rather grimly to himself; he was thinking that this, at all events, was not the silence of contempt.

Could he have seen through the door into the room he would have been yet more convinced. All the society vanished in an instant from Miller's face. She was sitting opposite the door, she sat and stared at it in terror. The blood rushed from the cheeks, leaving them as white as paper.

"Monseur!" she repeated, in so low a whisper that even Callon on the other side of the table hardly heard the words. Her lips were dry and she moistened them. "Monseur!" she whispered again, and the whisper was a question. She had no definite suspicion who "Monseur" was; she did not define him as her husband. She only understood that somehow she was trapped. The sudden clatter of the dish upon the floor, the loudness of the waiter's cry, which was not an acute protest, but also a cry of fear, terrified her; they implied violence. She was trapped. She sat paralyzed upon her chair, staring across the table over Callon's shoulder at the door. Callon meanwhile said not a word. He had been sitting with his back to the door, and he twisted round in his chair. To both of them it seemed ages before the handle was turned. Yet so short was the interval of time that they could hardly have reached the terrace through the open window had they sprung up at the first sound of disturbance.

Thus they were sitting, silent and motionless, when the door was pushed open, and Tony stood in the doorway. At the sight of him Miller uttered one loud scream, and clapped her hands over her face. Callon, on the other hand, started up on to his feet. As he did so he upset his wine-glass over the table-cloth; it fell and splattered on the polished floor. He turned towards the intruder who so roughly forced his way into the room. The eyes of that intruder took no account of him; they were fixed upon Miller Stretton, as she sat cowering at the table with her hands before her face.

"What do you want?" cried Callon; "you have no right here!" "I have every right here!" said Tony; "that is my wife!" It was still his wife at whom he stared, and he was fixed. Callon, who had started out of his seat, detection he had always feared; he had sought in grand avowed, by the use of every precaution known to his device strategy. But it was detection by Pamela Marvale and her friends, who had once already laid him by the heels; the husband had never retired into his calculations. He had accepted without question Miller's version of the husband—he was the man who did not care. In some part of the world he wandered, but where no one knew, cut off from all his friends—indifferent, neglectful, and a fool. Even now he could not believe. This might be some new trick of Pamela Marvale's.

"Your wife?" he exclaimed. "That is not true."

"Not true?" cried Tony, in a terrible voice. He stretched out his arm and pointed towards Miller. "Look!" Miller flinched as he looked at the living. She dropped her head and hid her face. He held her finger over her eyelids, closing them tightly. She had looked once at Tony's face, she dared not look again. She sat in darkness, trembling. One question was in her mind: "Would he kill her?" Callon looked at her as he was looking at Tony. He was not speaking to her husband, in difference, and a suggestion of scorn. Yet he was her manhood terror which now remained Callon that the husband was indeed before him. Here the man was, spring suddenly out of the dark upon him, not forgetful, for he had the look of one who has suffered from after very quickly, and slept but little on the way; not indifferent, for he was white with anger and his eyes were aflame. Callon raised the luck which had for a second time brought him into such ill straits. He reassured himself with Tony, and knew, in the instant he was no match for him. There was a rush, a dash, no doubt, and worn, but hard as iron, a couple of muscle and limb, and finely trained to the last superfluous ounce of flesh; while he himself was soft with luxury and good living. He sought to trip him.

"That is no proof," said he. "Any woman might be started—"

And Tony broke fiercely in upon his stammered argument: "Go out," he cried, "and wait for me!" The door was still open. Outside it in the passage the waiters were clustered, listening. Inside the room Miller was listening. The order, roughly given, was to leave the room, which Callon for very shame could not obey. He would have liked to obey it, for comforting husbands was never to his liking; all his art lay in eluding them.

"Go out," Tony repeated, and took a step forward. Callon could not get so poor a figure as to shrink from the room like a whipped whinny. Yet it would have gone better with him had he eaten his look and gone. It could not be safe to leave him, he hissed, And suddenly Tony caught him by the throat, drew him forward, and then flung him violently away.

Callon reeled back through the open windows, slipped, and fell his full length upon the terrace. His head struck the stone flag with a horrible sound. He lay quite still in the strong light which poured from the room; his eyes were closed, his face quite bloodless. It was his business, as Bludge had said, to fight against the troops.

Tony made no further movement towards him. The waiters went out on to the terrace and lifted him up and carried him within. Then Tony turned towards his wife. She had risen up from her chair and overturned it when Tony had flung the intruder from the room. She now crouched shuddering against the wall, her face fixed in terror upon her husband. As he turned towards her she uttered a sob and dragged upon her knees before him. That was the end of all her scorn. She knelt in deadly fear, adoring him in the very frenzy of her fear. She had no memory for the contemptuous letters which she had written and which he had read under his pillow on the North Sea. Her little devoirs and plots and trickeries to bewitch her friends, her little pastime of passion for Lionel Callon—she knew at this moment that it never had been more than a pretence—these were the matters which now she remembered, and her cheeks she dreamed of punishment. She was waiting, quick that night—jewels which Tony had given her in the past just days when they lived together in the house in Deane's Street. They shone and glittered upon her hair, about her neck, upon her bosom, and her arms. She knelt in her delicate finery of lace and satin in this room of luxury and bright flowers. There was no need for Tony now to work to reestablish himself in her thoughts. She reeled out her hands in him in supplication.

"I am not guilty," she moaned. "Tony! Tony!"

To be Continued.

A Story of Cleveland's First Defeat

By Frank H. Brooks

A PECULIAR mission fell in no in Cleveland's second run for the Presidency. As the publication which sent me out is no longer in existence, and as the proprietor and editor are dead, there is no propriety in stating the facts.

The paper had assumed the high attitude of independence, although the editor was a Cleveland Democrat, while the proprietor was on the fence, without bias, sane, or insane.

I was sent to New York State to find out the "truth," regardless, etc. I started in at Washington. I had no difficulty in finding Democrats who were bitter against the party's candidate. It was not a part of my instructions to quote them even under the thin guise of "an anonymous Democrat," and so I was not named. I only asked that they give me the names of influential Democrats in New York State who would, conditionally, give me the information I sought. I jumped from Washington to Albany. I was instructed to skip New York City. I visited the political centres of the State and called upon those whose names had been furnished in Washington. In some instances the men whom I visited upon the State were appointees of Mr. Cleveland, but each had some grievance against the President.

From each of these individuals information that was gratifying to the correspondent and surprising to the individual was received. My instructions were to compile my information, without reference to any person, drawing my conclusions as to how the State would vote, and file the same by wire from Buffalo.

This I did. The forecast, the defeat of Cleveland upon the State, was correct. The editor of the paper I represented on this mission was sent of town when the dispatch was laid down in the home office. The proprietor, however, was not so easily frightened, and the special was made the feature of the paper the next day.

I reached the home office twenty-four hours later. The editor, enveloped in a cloud of fury, thundered at me as I entered his room. He said that every member of his club, and every Democrat in the State, had believed him, and he threatened him. He said it reminded him of my instructions.

When his wrath was exhausted I told him my story. I gave him the names of the men from whom I had received information. He was much less unsympathetic than I had expected. He said his face felt its color. He walked miles, and to his room. He dismissed me with the injunction to go out of town and rest for three days, and then report for further duty. When I returned the frontier front had lost its terror. He was as placid as the surface of an unruffled lake. He informed me that my information had prompted him and many of his friends to hedge on their bets.

When the election was over the editor told me that the dispatch sent from Buffalo had enabled him and his friends to save $50,000. Four years later, when Cleveland was elected to his second term, he appointed the editor to the most lucrative office in the editor's State, and soon after I was appointed to a good place, the only office I ever held, without any solicitation upon my part.

(Continued from page 1317.)
along the highways of the State. An actual plantation of several species is also shown, demonstrating the method of making and taking care of a planted forest.

Mines and Metallurgy

In this section are important exhibits from the New York State Museum and from individual exhibitors showing the complete mineral resources of the State. One exhibition has been erected by the State of New York in order to display the clay products of the State. The collection of the products was undertaken by the director of the New York State School of Clay-working and Ceramics, who sought to secure type specimens rather than a great mass of similar products. New York State produces roofing tiles of excellent quality, and several styles have been wrought into the roof of the pavilion. The bricks are of several styles, and colors, from the classic Roman red pressed to the rough Rockfleece clinker which forms the base course of the structure.

The large cities of the Eastern States naturally demand a quantity of fireproof technically termed hollowware, and for the manufacture of this commodity the clays of New York are well adapted. A further industry has been developed by local conditions, comprising the enormous available water-power and the demand for electrical energy. This is the manufacture of high grade electrical porcelain, consisting of insulators for high-pressure transmission, and the numerous porcelain fittings required for incandescent wiring.

More than one manufactory is engaged in producing hotel china of a superior quality, and the State School of Ceramics exhibits specimens of fine vases made by the students.

How Sherman Put the "Lid On"

A new Sherman anecdote which instantly revivifies the general's much-quoted dictum,
"War is hell," was sprung upon the visiting thousands at a regimental reunion during the recent U. S. A. R. encampment at Boston.
The raconteur, Captain Robert Flaherty, of the Second Massachusetts, was himself at Antietam in the war.

During the siege of Atlanta some of the Confederate batteries opposing Sherman on the west front of the city were sheltered from attack by a mountain which could not readily be scaled by Federal artillery.
After long delay and tedious labor the light field pieces of the Eleventh Indiana Battery were hauled in the crests of the mountain, where the men of the Second Massachusetts had cut a roadway and constructed earth and log pits to shield the guns. A day was the least feasible, to open fire upon
R. Thomas the "Rock of Chickamauga,"
"Fighting Joe" Hooker, and General J. M.
Bresnan, Thomas's chief of artillery, were on the ground to witness the effect of the fire, which was expected to open the way for a successful attack upon Confederate positions which baffled the advance of Thomas's troops.

The Crisis on the Mountain-top
The time was August, and the heat, or fading atmosphere inclined the men of both armies to suspended activity. The stillness of death reigned everywhere except around the isolated battery on the mountain top. There soldiers moved with the grim energy of men facing a crisis, those were trained upon the most conspicuous and vulnerable targets; Sherman and his lieutenants stood apart, scanning with dead-glances the ranges where the shots were to strike.

At last the signal was given: battery men went forward to pull the howitzers and send the shots home when attention was diverted by the soft pealing tones of a bell travelling on the heavy air across the valley.
Loud and still louder the measured clones sounded over the city, over the camps, up to the mountain crest. Sherman raised a warning finger to guessers, who looked into

The foundation of photography is the lens.

A poor lens makes poor pictures

—a good lens makes good pictures.

The best photographs in the world are taken with the GOERZ LENS.

The best photographers use them. Catalogue Free.

Main Offices, Berlin-Friedenau, Germany.

Branch Offices, 4 and 5 Holborn Circus, London,

England. 33 Rue de l'Entrepot, Paris.

C. P. GOERZ, Room 33, 52 E. Union Square, New York

FOR MEN OF BRAINS
Cortez CIGARS
—MADE AT KEY WEST—

PISO'S CURE FOR
CURES WETTER ALL RISP FALLS
THAT CURE WETTER, TONIC CURE, CURE TO TONIC, PISO'S CURE FOR CONSUMPTION

Lackawanna Railroad

Says Phoebe Snow, about to go
Upon a trip to Buffalo,
"My gown stays white from morn till night Upon the Road of Anthracite."

People who like clean things and clean ways appreciate cleanliness when traveling. Lackawanna locomotives burn hard coal; Lackawanna tracks are ballasted with stone; Lackawanna Pullman cars run through without change between

New York, Chicago and St. Louis

Financial

THE AUDIT COMPANY OF NEW YORK

THOMAS A. LADD, President, 100 Broadway, New York.
 JOHN A. HEDGECOCK, Vice-President, 100 Broadway, New York.
 GEORGE W. TAYLOR, Treasurer, 100 Broadway, New York.

Investigations for Merchants, Banks, Corporations, and Committees.
 NEW YORK.
 Mutual Life Buildings, 41 Cedar Street.

Philadelphia, 400 Market Street.
 Chicago, 111 N. La Salle Street.
 St. Louis, 111 N. La Salle Street.

Letters of Credit.

Bills of exchange bought and sold. Cash Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travelers' Letters of Credit. Collections made. International Cheques. Certificates of Deposit.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, NO. 20 WALL STREET.

MORTON TRUST COMPANY

38 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK

Capital - - - - - $2,000,000
 Surplus and Undivided Profits - - - - - $6,000,000

OFFICERS

LEVI P. MORTON, President
 THOMAS P. RYAN, Vice-President
 CHARLES H. ALLEN, Vice-President
 JAMES K. CORBIERE, Vice-President
 H. B. BERRY, Trust Officer
 H. M. FRANCIS, Secretary
 CHARLES A. CONANT, Treasurer
 T. B. MINAHAN, Asst. Treasurer

Counsel, ELIHU ROOT

DIRECTORS

JOHN JACOB ASTOR, G. G. HAYES, LEON F. MORTON, FRED ROST, JACOB J. BAKER, JOHN C. HENRIE, LEON F. MORTON, WESTON RUTHERFORD, JACOB J. BAKER, JOHN C. HENRIE, LEON F. MORTON, THOMAS J. KEAR, JACOB J. BAKER, JOHN C. HENRIE, LEON F. MORTON, JACOB J. BAKER,
 JACOB J. BAKER, JOHN C. HENRIE, LEON F. MORTON, JACOB J. BAKER,
 JACOB J. BAKER, JOHN C. HENRIE, LEON F. MORTON, JACOB J. BAKER,

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

LEON F. MORTON, G. G. HAYES, JACOB J. BAKER, LEON F. MORTON, THOMAS J. KEAR, JACOB J. BAKER, LEON F. MORTON, JACOB J. BAKER,
 JACOB J. BAKER, JOHN C. HENRIE, LEON F. MORTON, JACOB J. BAKER,

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

October, 1904

- Czarism at Bay KARL BLIND
 Conditions in the Congo Free State Baron MONCHEUR, Belgian Minister to the United States.
 Sanity and Safety in Relation to Public Office, ALLAN McLANE HAMILTON, M.D.
 Literature in the New Century BRANDER MATTHEWS,
Professor of Dramatic Literature in Columbia University.
 The Making of Modern Races Dr. P. CHALMERS MITCHELL
 How Good City Government May Be Had LUCIUS F. C. GARVIN, Governor of Rhode Island.
 What the Prohibition Party Stands for SILAS C. SWALLOW, Prohibition Candidate for the Presidency.
 Masculine and Feminine Occupations MARION FOSTER WASHBURN
 The Reform of the Calendar CHARLES HARVEY GUNING
 Higher Education in the West WILLIAM R. HARPER, President of Chicago University.
 Canada's New Transcontinental Railway JOHN CHARLTON, M.P.
 Reminiscences of War CARMEN SYLVA,
The Queen of Romances.

WORLD POLITICS

London; Berlin; Paris; Washington

50 cents a copy

$5.00 a Year

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

the eyes of their officers for explanation of this strange posture. The officers, equally mystified, looked to the generals, and Sherman spoke out calmly, but in tones for all to hear, "Gentlemen, we will not open fire to-day." Then, turning to the chief of artillery, he said, in the same quiet tone, "General Sherman, you will open fire to-morrow."

"To-day" was the Sabbath, a day, according to Sherman's orders, not to be interrupted by the infernal din of guns and shells.

Good News

MR. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, leader of the minority in the House, tells the following as illustrative of the honors of the spoils system in office.

"Years ago, before the passage of the Civil Service Act, when every Congressman's life was made a burden by the importunities of constituents seeking office, a friend of mine, then representing an Alabama district in the House, was approached by an old acquaintance who desired a clerkship in the Treasury Department.

"The Congressman informed the man that but a day or two before the head of that Department had advised the statesman that there were no vacancies. Nevertheless the constituent persisted in his efforts to obtain the coveted clerkship and for weeks haunted the quarters of the Congressman.

"One evening, just as the member was sitting down to dinner he was a little tired, to say the least, by the annoyance of his servant that the persistent applicant for preferment at the hands of the Treasury Department desired to see him.

"On entering the drawing-room the Congressman said:

"Well, what's up, now?"

"Good news, sir!" exclaimed the office-seeker, in great excitement, "I think you can get that place! A clerk in the Treasury Department died this afternoon!"

Salvation with Food

FOR SEVEN YEARS OLD Emma, who had come home from her first day's schooling in elementary physiology, was questioned by her parents as to what she had learned.

"Papa," she complained, "I don't think I like physiology."

"Well, teacher was explaining digestion to us to-day, and she said we had to mix salvation with every mouthful of food."

A New Way to Preserve Food

AN ingenious method of preserving food has recently been devised which is based on the fact that powdered gelatin, or this shriveled bit of material, not only does not rot, but are capable of protecting incorporated substances from bacteria, moisture, and other agencies which bring about decomposition. Thus to make a concentrated beef extract, tea or coffee extract, soup, etc., the liquid is mixed with one per cent. of primary gelatin, which differs from the commercial article in not having the glue-like taste of the latter.

After cooling a jelly is formed, and this is cut into thin films and dried by a current of cold air until it becomes brittle. When this condition is reached the sheets are then reduced to a fine powder, which will keep indefinitely. While it will absorb moisture it does not do so to a degree to occasion decomposition, and the moisture is subsequently given off in dry air. The powder, while likely to cake, forms a brittle cake, not interfering with its use, while it is too hard for insects. When placed in warm water it dissolves immediately, and is thus ready for use. If heated above the temperature of boiling water before packing all disease or other germs will be killed, and to secure the best results the powder should be packed airtight. Such a concentrated food possesses many advantages, and is susceptible of wide applications, as upon explorations.

THE ORIGINAL STORIES OF Sherlock Holmes

By A. CONAN DOYLE

The Immortal Detective's First Exploits

These are the original Sherlock Holmes stories which made Sir Conan Doyle famous and gave to literature the unique character of Sherlock Holmes, now a household name the world over. You have probably read some of these stories—everybody, at one time or another, has read some of them; but now for the first time they are gathered—twenty-five in all—and published in

A Uniform Set—Three Volumes

They are printed in large type, beautifully bound in cloth, with gilt tops, untrimmed edges, and cover decorations in gold—suited to the finest library, yet sold on small monthly payments at a price within the reach of all.

Twenty-Four Full-Page Illustrations

including the latest portrait of the author, reproduced upon ivory-tinted paper, are an attractive feature of the books, and picture the most interesting and crucial moments of the great detective's thrilling career. An introduction by James MacArthur tells how Sherlock Holmes came into being.

Contents of the Three Volumes

INTRODUCTION BY JAMES MACARTHUR		SILVER BLADE
THE SHIN OF THE FOUR		THE STOCK-BROKER'S CLERK
A STUDY IN SCARLET		THE MUGGRAVE RITUAL
A SCANDAL IN BOHEMIA		THE COOKED MAN
THE RED-HEADED LEAGUE		THE GREEK INTERPRETER
THE FIVE ORANGE PIPS		THE YELLOW FACE
THE BOSCOMBE VALLEY MYSTERY		THE "GLORIA SCOTT"
THE MAN WITH THE TWISTED LIP		THE REGATE PUZZLE
THE ADVENTURE OF THE BLUE CARRIAGE		THE REMEDIAL PATIENT
THE ADVENTURE OF THE SPECKLED BAND		THE NAVAL TREATY
THE ADVENTURE OF THE ENGINEER'S THUMB		THE FATAL PRODIGY
THE ADVENTURE OF THE NOBLE BACHELOR
THE ADVENTURE OF THE BERYL CORONET
THE ADVENTURE OF THE COPPER BECHEN

A Harper Periodical for One Year

On receipt of $1.00 we will send you THE SHERLOCK HOLMES STORIES in three handsome volumes, and we will enter your name for one year's subscription for either HARPER'S WEEKLY,

OUR OFFER

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S BAZAR, or THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. WE PAY ALL DELIVERY CHARGES. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $1.00 every month for five months. The total cost to you for the complete set and the periodicals for one year is Six Dollars. In writing state which periodical you wish.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Write for Booklet

BLUE LABEL
TRADE MARK
TOMATO KETCHUP

SOUPS - 20 Varieties
Canned Fruits and Vegetables

CURTICE BROTHERS CO.,
ROCHESTER, N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER BROTHERS

NEW YORK

Every user of Locomobile will testify to the fact that it is Easily the Best Built Car in America.

THE LOCOMOBILE CO., Bridgeport, Conn.

THE GIVERS

MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

Sir Mortimer

MARY JOHNSTON

NEVER before has the dignified title of "Memoirs" graced so funny a book as this latest title of Josephine Daskam's—a writer widely known for her clever child studies. The sorry sale of life—the tribulations of the little tots—have no place in this irretrievably amusing record of the home-life of a typical American couple. The baby refuses to develop psychologically or scientifically according to the theories set down in his Aunt Emma's books, but he grows to robust boyhood after a fashion of his own. All the various incidents of a lively youngster's boyhood here find laughable portrayal. The unceasing arguments between the common-sense young father and the theoretical "Aunt Emma" not only afford such amusement as Josephine Daskam alone can give us, but go to make a clever satire on "modern" methods of rearing children.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, October 8, 1904

NO. 424

Copyright, 1904, By HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved. Entered at the New York Post office as second class matter

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO HUMPH!

Although we have searched Judge PINKER's letter of acceptance for a positive statement that he does accept the Democratic nomination for President in vain, we assume from what he says that he is willing to serve if elected. In fact, he plainly intimates in the last paragraph that, in that event, he would greatly appreciate the help of the Almighty in an attempt to do his best. This expression is appropriately designated by unflinching Democratic organs as a solemn consecration and there is, of course, no question of the Judge's earnestness and sincerity. In view of the fact, however, that the phrase has been overworked by DANA, HILL, CUCKERAN and even, if our memory serves us, by ARNOLD himself, it has a tiresome ring, despite the belief that, in this instance, like WAGNER's music, it is really better than it sounds. Mr. ROOSEVELT anticipates, although he seems to feel less strongly the need for, like assistance, so doubtless all will be well, whatever happens.

In point of diction, the Judge's letter is not comparable to the Colonel's. But this is not surprising. Mr. ROOSEVELT is an old hand at writing for the public and possesses a really extraordinary capacity for concise, stinging, epigrammatic expression. The Judge, if we may say so without imputation of being trapped and kidnapped by some faithful FANFAN, is more thoughtful and less certain that everything he says is so, whether it is or not. And yet there is much more ginger in this document than in the wet blanket that preceded it, and the fighting journalists are correspondingly pleased. On the whole, we cannot see how the Judge could have done much better. He comes out good and strong for the traditional fundamentals of his party, gets in several judiciously worded digs at his aggressive antagonist and winds up with a summary of points at issue that makes supporters of the MARSH HENRY type dizzy with enthusiasm. This is it:

Shall economy of administration be demanded or shall extravagance be encouraged?

Shall the wrong-doer be brought to bay by the people, or must justice wait upon political expediency?

Shall our government stand for equal opportunity or for special privilege?

Shall it remain a government of law or become one of individual caprice?

Shall we cling to the rule of the people, or shall we embrace beneficent despotism?

The NEW YORKER long enough in its consideration of the grocery business as applied to affairs of the State—not of the nation—in pronouncing these questions pointless. So indeed they might seem if considered academically, but taken in connection with and as logical deductions from the arguments previously advanced, they present very fairly and with unexpected concision, the Judge's idea of the issues involved. Having demonstrated extravagance on the part of the present administration, he proposes to substitute "economy of administration." The typical "wrong-doer" is undoubtedly the thief—standing for many thieves—concerned in the post-office scandals. "Equal opportunity" as opposed to "special privilege" involves favoritism through the tariff. A "government of law" contrasted with "individual caprice" suggests pickled sheepskins. The "rule of the people" as against "beneficent despotism" (the probably meant to say "benevolent") despotism" calls to mind intervention in strikes, executive management of so-called colonies, pension legislation by relief instead of by the vote of chosen representatives, and so on. It might be better—more specific and at the same time more comprehensive—and it might be worse—less sharply defined and less concise. But it is not bad. In any case, it is an accurate reflection of the Judge's thought and expression. That, after all, is what was wanted and neither extravagant praise nor unwarranted criticism can affect the public's judgment of its quality.

The section of Judge PINKER's letter which has attracted most attention is that relating to President ROOSEVELT's famous pension order, to the effect that the age of sixty-two be regarded as presumptive evidence of disability. His acceptance of this one of Mr. ROOSEVELT's many pointed "challenges"—coupled with his declaration in favor of the passage by Congress of an age-limit pension law, has been so variously construed that it is well to examine his exact words. Here they are:

On the assumption that the order as stated by the administration is revocable at the pleasure of the Executive, if having been an attempted though perhaps unexecuted encroachment upon the legislative power, and therefore unwarranted by the Constitution, I accept the challenge and declare that if elected I will revoke that order. But I go further and say that that being done, I will contribute my effort toward the enactment of a law to be passed by both Houses of Congress and approved by the Executive that will give an age pension without reference to disability to the surviving widows of the civil war; and under the provisions of which a pension may be accepted with dignity because of the recognition that it comes as a just due from the people through their chosen representatives, and not as largess distributed by the Civil Executive.

The Judge had previously expressed a "suspicion" that President ROOSEVELT issued this order for the purpose of winning votes. Republican defenders of the act of their candidate naturally, and perhaps necessarily, repudiate this suspicion with scorn. If one were to believe all they find to say in exculpation of the officer—for that is what it was—such a motive is in no way actuated Mr. ROOSEVELT; in fact, it never really occurred to him that an election was approaching. This nonsense may be brushed aside without argument. Mr. ROOSEVELT, we have no doubt, considered that this order given to the old soldiers only what they were fairly entitled to, but he also was quite well aware that his party might need all the votes it could get this autumn. That certainty had lain imprudently upon his mind for some time and undoubtedly influenced his action, consciously or unconsciously, to a greater or less degree.

With the excuses hurriedly put forward by the President's apologists to meet the unexpected attack our readers are, of course, familiar. Secretary TART's brother, the chief defender, states them as clearly as one can while dodging round an untenable position, substantially as follows: 1. He had a technical right to do it. 2. CLEVELAND and McKINLEY advised precedents for doing it. 3. Congress confirmed the action by appropriating money for its execution. 4. PINKER is another. That the President did have the technical legal right we dare say the Supreme Court would admit, although of course it never has. Could he have made the age forty-two and thus taken in everybody who rendered a day's service in the war with equal verities of approval? And if he had, would he not virtually have enacted the service-pension law which Congress has persistently refused to place upon the statute-books? That CLEVELAND authorized the recognition of seventy-five as the age of presumed total disability and McKINLEY sixty-five as the age of presumed half disability is indisputable. But, disregarding the far cry from seventy-five in sixty-two, the difference in expenditure between two or three hundred thousand dollars and goodness knows how many millions, neither CLEVELAND nor McKINLEY was called upon to meet the situation that confronted Mr. ROOSEVELT.

and no sane person can believe that either ever would have met it with the audacious disregard of, at least, the intent of the Constitution, displayed by President ROOSEVELT. They did no more nor less than authorize reasonable assumptions on the part of the Pension Commissioner; there was no question of prerogatives at issue, no necessity or thought of reversing the will of the people as voiced by their representatives in Congress.

President ROOSEVELT, on the other hand, definitely requested Congress to enact legislation to the effect subsequently wrought by his order, and Congress as definitely refused to do so. Thereupon the President, availing himself of an indirect method of doubtful legality and flimsy precedence, did it himself. The fact that the House subsequently appropriated a sum of money, grossly inadequate, of course, for effectuating the order, is of no consequence whatever. A Republican majority could not fail to do so without discrediting the official head of their party beyond recall. They were in a corner and had to act accordingly, as the President very well knew. Now, then, disregarding the question of constitutionality or unconstitutionality—any number of people, from Secretary TAYLOR's brother to J. STUART FOSBETT, can answer that offhand—did President ROOSEVELT have a moral right to thus inflict this additional burden upon the people without their consent? We fail to see how any candid mind can regard his action as other than a flagrant perversion of Executive authority.

We come now to consideration of Judge PARKER's attitude. Two able, antagonistic minds—the Suo, which supports ROOSEVELT, and the Springfield Republican, which supports PARKER—reach the same conclusion, viz. that in declaring for the enactment of a straight-out non-pension law, Judge PARKER not only vindicates his previous intimation, but goes even further than his antagonist in bidding for votes. We can endorse this view only in part. The Judge makes two promises: first, that he will revoke the order, thereby putting the whole matter back to the House of Representatives, where it belongs, and, second, that in so doing he will recommend the enactment of such a law as would afford adequate relief to veterans not now sufficiently provided for. The precise terms of an act so designed he does not define. The age limit might, in his judgment, be fixed at sixty-two or sixty-five or seventy, but at whatever figure, it would be fixed, in conformity with the constitutional provisions, by Congress, and not by the Executive. It would be wholly consistent with his general position, in case the situation should arise, to make no suggestion respecting the precise age to be recognized, but to leave that determination to Congress, reserving his own opinion for expression in the regularly prescribed way in approving or vetoing the bill. Thus far Judge PARKER's declaration merits no just criticism. That his pronouncement in favor of a service pension at all is at least a step to our jampered veterans, even though a less flagrant bid for their votes than the unwarranted act of his rival, seems too evident to admit of doubt.

The truth, as we perceive it, is that both candidates have thrown up their hands before the well-known fetish of the "old soldiers' vote." That being our belief, we are more than pleased to record the impression that, from a political viewpoint, both blood-red. Mr. ROOSEVELT sacrificed an small portion of the respect which he had won by straightforwardness, and enhanced the apprehension of danger in his apparent disregard of restraint of any kind. Judge PARKER deprived himself of the advantage which he might have reaped from an unqualified intimation. And neither gains a vote. Any veteran who has so long survived the temptation of largess as to still remain a Democrat would vote the Democratic ticket though the heavens fell in jagged chunks all about him. There may be a few such left, but not enough to justify a sacrifice by Mr. ROOSEVELT to win or by Judge PARKER to keep.

On the other hand, there is a much larger proportion of the people of this country opposed to and disgusted with the multiplying of pensions for political effect than most statesmen suppose. Just twenty-five years ago, JAMES A. GARFIELD declared in the House of Representatives that high-water mark in expenditure for pensions had been reached, and that thereafter there would be a steady diminution in the amount required. The total sum expended in that year—1879—was $33,780,526. The disbursement last year was $138,800,000, more than four times the "high-water mark." When we look at these astounding figures, accompanied by a growing deficit in the Treasury, and yet see a President arbitrarily giving the output another boost of unknown proportions, we begin to realize what is going on, and what sort of political issue could be made if the line could be plainly drawn. It cannot be so drawn this year, of course. The Judge and the Colonel are on the same side of the fence, shivering at the sight of the same old scorpions. But, brethren, the day will come!

What on earth has become of Secretary PATTER?

The Colonel was hardly happy in his selection of a first pupil in his new school of jurisprudence. He might be able to pass a few useful hints to the Judge respecting special edicts applying to other nations, but when it comes to plain, old-fashioned common law for every-day use by the entire community, he should tread softly. The Judge has been working at that a good many years and has cultivated a habit of thoroughness which is likely to prove disquieting to a beginner. His original assertion that "the common law, as developed, affords a complete legal remedy against monopolies," was new and broad, but the unlikelihood of its having been gravely set down without due consideration would have deterred a cautious person from venturing an unqualified denial. In the delight of controversy, however, the Colonel forgot how he should tread, took down the big stick, and smashed the declaration to bits with a single blow. His rule "There is no common law of the United States. Its rules can be enforced only by the State courts and officers. No Federal court or officer could take any action whatever under them." Whereupon the Judge put on his spectacles, took down Vol. 181 of the United States Supreme Court, and, turning to page 92, read the decision in the case of the Western Union Telegraph Company vs. The Call Publishing Company, to the effect that, in the absence of United States statutes specifically covering a case, common-law principles should be applied in cases involving interstate commerce. There were other grounds aplenty upon which he could have justified his opinion, but this was so specific, simple, and conclusive that he contented himself by citing it, only adding, with a gravity of humor approaching grimness, that "The determination of this question was left by the people in framing the Constitution, to the judiciary and not to the Executive," and that the question of enforcement and application must be decided by the Federal courts and not by a President or even "a candidate for the Presidency." We think it was in New Hampshire, in the days of RUFUS CHASE, that a contemptuous epithet was first applied to a man who insisted upon being his own lawyer. But why is MORRIS? Is he, like PERROW, so busy campaigning that he has to neglect his regular business altogether?

A people cannot withhold freedom from another people and themselves be free.

This is not a CROCKERianism. It is from the Democratic candidate's letter of assumed acceptance. Why can't they, Judge!

Among the good men who do most of their thinking aloud, General O. O. HOWARD has been conspicuous ever since he retired from active service. Only the other evening we were thinking that it was about time the General seized upon his quinquennial opportunity to put a few thoughts into print, when along came a report of his address to the Commercial Travellers' League, composed chiefly, we suppose, of drummers, at No. 201 Broadway, this city. The General had just returned from the West, where he had found so much enthusiasm that it couldn't be measured, and "it all centered on the best President we ever had, THEODORE ROOSEVELT." (Cheers.) WASHINGTON, JEFFERSON, the ADAMSSES, MADISON, JACKSON, LINCOLN, GRANT, et al., were, of course, well enough in their way, but when it comes to serious consideration of true greatness—let let the General continue: "It is wonderful to see the two men, President ROOSEVELT and JOHN HAY, at the head of things." . . . Well, mybow, go on, and be gone thus: "We know that ROOSEVELT has the executive ability; he has found out what the law is and then he has enforced it." Maybe so; maybe so. Some think that in a few instances he has found out what the law isn't and enforced that. However, ROOSEVELT did the same thing that McKinley did and that GROVER CLEVELAND did, God bless him! It was over the good General's habit to speak somewhat authoritatively on behalf of the Deity, and we dare say his assurances will be confirmed in this case, but if so it won't be because he did what McKinley and CLEVELAND did, for he didn't. Nevertheless, finishing, with tearful emphasis, "In life, in death, he will be where McKinley was—on the side of right and justice." It is only fair to our readers to say that we publish these excerpts from the General's powerful argument by request of many voters.

Mr. PARKER thinks broken-down soldiers of the civil war ought to work until they are at least seventy-five years old.—The Press. We have about reached the conclusion that the case of this particular precarior is absolutely hopeless.

Indignantly repudiating the charge that Mr. ROOSEVELT does not lie awake nights trying to preserve peace and good-will throughout the world, the Evening Mail triumphantly quotes from the speech of THOMAS LORCH, M.P., of England, member of the Peace Congress, as follows:

We who are visitors here regard your President as the ruler of one of the mightiest powers of the earth, who has taken a more distinct part in the interests of peace than that which has been taken by any other ruler. He is not only a great ruler himself, but is a worthy representative of a great line of rulers who have done much for the liberties of mankind.

Mr. LORCH probably meant to say "founder" instead of "representative" of a great line of "rulers," and then there are Congress and the Supreme Court; but being a stranger and an M.P., Mr. LORCH should not be blamed for seeing only what was in sight.

Now that SENATOR GORMAN has consented to play a supervisory part, we may expect to see more cord and energy displayed at the Democratic national headquarters. One of the things which he is likely to suggest is that, while the efforts of that committee should be mainly concentrated on the election of its party's nominee for the Presidency, some attention should also be given to the House of Representatives. To that end, he need only direct notice to an admission lately made by Representative JOSEPH W. BARNETT, chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee. Mr. BARNETT dwells with emphasis on a fact that we lately pointed out, the fact, namely, that a loss of fifteen Congress districts by the Republicans will throw the next House of Representatives to the Democrats. Moreover, Mr. BARNETT in a published statement concedes that, "if an election were held right now," the Republicans would probably lose the House. He acknowledges that there are at least twenty-five districts scattered over the country from one ocean to the other which the Republicans will forfeit, if they allow the election to go by default. Mr. BARNETT feels deeply on the subject, for the LA FOLLETTE Republicans are opposing him fiercely in his own district, and he is by no means certain to go back to the House. It would be a curious state of things if the Republicans should retain ROOSEVELT in the White House, while the Democrats carried the House of Representatives. At the hour when we write it seems quite possible, if not probable, that the Republican majority of twenty-nine in the present Chamber will be cut in half.

All our advices from New York State indicate that PARKER and HAYS will carry it by a majority not less than fifty thousand, and it may go to a hundred thousand.—Leavenworth Courier-Journal.

Why not two hundred? But remember HOMER BROWN!

Democratic stump speakers may find it difficult to reconcile their assertion that ROOSEVELT's election will lead to our entanglement in foreign wars with the promise made by the President to the Inter-Parliamentary Union that he will presently call a second peace conference to continue the work begun at The Hague. A man who is depicted as going about with a chip on his shoulder would scarcely be anxious to minimize the chances of warfare, which is, of course, the purpose of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. It is true that the CAR NICHOLAS II., who, out of a professed devotion to peace, brought about the Hague Conference, evinced soon afterwards no great eagerness to avoid a contest with Japan. By those who know him, however, the Car is not credited with persistence of purpose or stability of character, whereas the possession of those qualities by THOMAS ROOSEVELT is disputed by nobody. The Inter-Parliamentary Union can hardly have had any wish to play a part in an American political campaign, yet the request addressed by it to the President could not have been better timed or calculated had it been prompted by a desire to give him a chance of proving that his intentions are by no means bellicose.

Did General COMUS confer with his boss before prescribing race suicide in the army?

LAWYER MARCUS T. HEN, of Albany, Supreme Court reporter for New York State, has given Judge HENRICK a notice that ought to be of value to him. Recalling that Judge HENRICK succeeded DANIEL MANSUET as recognized leader of the Albany Democracy, and remained in control until he became a Supreme Court justice in 1892, Mr. HEN says:

Since that time there has been, by the opponents of the former HENRICK supporters, vehement and continuous clamor and complaint at Justice HENRICK's alleged activity and interest in party politics. I cannot recall, in the entire period of Mr. Justice HENRICK's judicial career, any instance of his appearing in an attitude of partisan prejudice or activity, and I cannot but believe that it has been the persistence, rather than any substantial foundation in fact, of this criticism which has led many people to believe that Mr. Justice HENRICK has conducted himself in this respect with unwisely or unsuitable ardor.

Furthermore, Mr. HEN avers that while Mr. HENRICK continued in control of the legal machine (before his election as judge), his influence was "in favor of a policy which best subserved the public as well as his party's interests." How far his former associates in political management may have appealed to him for advice after he became judge Mr. HEN does not know, but he says that "if his advice to them partook of the quality of his aid to the Committee of Thirteen in its struggle to introduce a clean administration of affairs in this city, the public has certainly not been the loser if that advice has been followed."

Mr. HEN, who is very well known throughout the State as a lawyer and court reporter, was counsel for two committees of the Citizens' Association of Albany, which labored with efficiency, and not without success, to improve the government of the city. There is probably no man in Albany better qualified than he to give an expert opinion as to the conduct of Albany politicians during the last twenty years. He describes himself as a member of no party.

The New Jersey Democrats have some hope of electing the Governor on the issue of equal taxation, but they admit that Mr. ROOSEVELT is likely to carry the State. The situation in Delaware is similar. It looks as if the Democratic nominee for Governor there might be elected, while the State's electoral votes will almost certainly be captured by the Republicans. About carrying Connecticut Republicans are less confident than they were some weeks ago, and they are almost ready to concede the loss of Colorado. If it be true that General JOHN S. CLARKSON, Surveyor of the Port of New York, has entered into an agreement at Salt Lake City by which the influence of the Mormon Church is secured to the Republican party, the States of Utah, Idaho, and Wyoming should be no longer in doubt. We find it hard to believe, however, that General CLARKSON has been authorized to promise that Senator SMOOT, in the contest for his seat, shall have the support of the Federal administration. In Wisconsin the bitterness of the federalism quarrel between Governor LA FOLLETTE and the so-called "Stalwarts" shows no sign of abatement, and, accordingly, the Democratic managers still regard the electoral votes of that State as worth fighting for. That Indiana is reasonably safe for the Republicans seems to be taken for granted by Senator FARMAN, as who, instead of confining his efforts to his own State, is making campaign speeches all over the country.

As aggravating, but, it is hoped, not permanent, indisposition has prevented the Honorable BUSSA COWLEY from addressing the populace on behalf of Judge PARKER since the report was printed that Mr. AUGER BARNUM had $100,000 on deposit in Mr. THOMAS F. RYAN's trust company for use in the campaign.

It would be a mistake to underestimate the possible effect upon Judge PARKER's prospects in certain close States of the diversion which is being made with considerable showmanship and energy by Mr. THOMAS F. RYAN, the Populist nominee for the Presidency. While it is true enough that Mr. WHARTON PARKER, the nominee of the Populists for the Presidency in 1900, obtained only 20,000 votes, the fact should not be overlooked that Mr. RYAN, who is a well-informed and eloquent man, could do much better if he were provided with funds enough to create the semblance of a party organization in such States as New York, New Jersey, Indiana, and Kentucky. There are signs that the funds will be forthcoming. We understand, for instance, that in the State of New York the Populists propose to put forward as a nominee for Governor Mr. A. J. BARTON, who, as a candidate on the Fusion ticket a year ago for County Clerk of Kings County, polled nearly 100,000 votes. Of course, he cannot hope to obtain more than a fraction of that number next November, but if he could secure even a few thousands, he might effect seriously some political calculations. Suppose, again, that Mr. RYAN should be able to get some thousands of votes in New Jersey; might he not be able to turn the scale against Judge PARKER, whose most sanguine supporters only hope for a small plurality, if any, in that State. In Indiana, also, it is by no means certain that the genial TOM TACKETT will be able to persuade all of the Bryanite Democrats to vote for PARKER and DYER. His task would be rendered more difficult, if not impossible, should Mr. RYAN induce from five to ten thousand of Mr. RYAN's friends to support the Populist nominee. There, too, is Kentucky, which Mr. RYAN has invaded. He purposes, it is said, to make a thorough canvass, not only of the First Congress district, where he has already made a speech, but also of the Third and Fifth districts. There are those who predict that Mr. RYAN may draw from the Democrats in Kentucky more than 20,000 votes. The prediction seems ominous when one considers that Mr. RYAN's plurality in the State four years ago was only about 3000, and that the aggregate plurality for the Democrats in the Congress election of 1902 exceeded 25,000 but slightly.

The appearance of the Populist nominee in the field with the aim of weakening as far as possible the Democratic nominee is not the only side taken also in the Republican campaign. Measures have been taken also to make the negro vote play an important part in the campaign. It is true, as the Democratic nominee for the Vice-Presidency pointed out at the West Virginia Democratic Convention, that, if the State elections of 1902 and the official figures of the returns of 1900 are to be accepted as a trustworthy basis for calculation, the negroes hold a balance of power in the pivotal States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Indiana, and California. In the seven States named, there are, in the aggregate, 135,000 negro voters, whereas in those States the Republicans had two years ago a total plurality of less than 44,000 votes. Some of the data are striking. For example, in New York, where the Republican plurality for Governor in 1902 was but 8865, there are, or were in 1900, no fewer than 215,649 negroes of voting age. In New Jersey, which, two years ago, gave a Republican plurality of 6621, there are 21,240 negro voters. In Delaware, the negro vote is 8254, and the Republican plurality in 1902 was only 3249. In Maryland the Republicans had a plurality of 2541 in 1902, but the negroes of voting age number upwards of 60,000. In West Virginia there are 11,774 negro voters, whereas the Republican plurality in 1902 was only 11,753. The state of things in Indiana also deserves careful attention. There the Republican plurality in 1902 was only 7282, while there were 18,149 negro voters. Even in California, the Republican plurality was smaller than the whole number of male negroes of voting age. Such are the facts, and as no one will deny that, so far as they go, they make for Mr. ROOSEVELT's success. On the other hand, we hear much less than was expected about the Prohibitionists in this campaign. If their nominee, Dr. SWALLOW, were to make a vigorous canvass, he could probably divert from the Republican ticket in the doubtful States almost enough votes to neutralize those cast for the Populist nominee and those polled by negroes. But for one reason or another, the Prohibitionists seem indisposed to make an earnest effort at this time.

There are those who believe that Dr. McKELWAY at heart prefers Mr. ROOSEVELT's election, and that his support of PARKER is a mere beating of the drums and a flaunting of war umbrellas. But that is an injustice to Dr. McKELWAY.—Springfield Republican.

It has occurred to us once or twice, in the progress of journalistic events, that the Doctor's "fairness" was a trifle ostentatious, but, in all us, gentle men, if you consider the suspicion unjust, upon what ethical ground do you justify this shocking publicity?

Senator STEVENSON finds himself unable to credit all the statements made by Mr. LINDLEY STEPHENS in a recent magazine article. Mr. STEVENSON is quoted as saying that Mr. STEPHENS's piece is "absolutely false and filled with malicious slanders and base fabrications." The article tells of the rise of LA FOLLETTE in Wisconsin politics, and represents LA STEVENSON as mentioning to Senator SWAYNE that Mr. STEVENSON's election to the Senate in 1894 cost him (STEPHENSON) $22,000. "I have never been called upon to buy my way into any kind of office," Senator STEVENSON says, and swears as he says it. But Mr. STEPHENS does not say that Mr. STEVENSON spent money to be Senator. He says that Mr. STEVENSON spent the money. If every twenty-two thousand dollars expended to promote the selection of members of the United States Senate had secured to the country the services of a man of the quality and usefulness of Senator STEVENSON, what a galaxy the Senate would be! If Mr. STEVENSON spent the money, at least, for once, the country got good value.

The Evening Post would rather be wrong than be President.

When Mr. HENRY BROOKS, now of Montgomery, Alabama, formerly of Washington, read in the papers that ROBERT TAYLOR PINE, Jr., the descendant of a signer, etc., whom we touched gently last week, had come out against PARKER because the Judge might not ask BENJAMIN WASHINGTON to dinner, he snickered. He also informed the Baltimore Sun that, a while ago, ROBERT "bought a piece of land in Virginia near Fort Myer and Arlington, laid it off into town lots, named it Chardon, and sold to people with a hindling contract that said lots should never be sold to a negro." Mr. BROOKS added that he acquired three of these lots, and has the contracts and deeds ready for anybody to look at. From which it would seem that ROBERT's blue blood boils more quickly in politics than in business.

Will the Quakers and other non-combatants constitute a factor of any importance in the coming political campaign? Some light upon the question may be thrown by the following incident. Rockingham County, Virginia, contains about one thousand voters who are Quakers and Dunkards. It is well known that both sects preach and obey the Scriptural injunction that, if thine enemy smite thee upon the one cheek, thou shalt turn to him the other. Now in 1896 Rockingham County gave Mr. KINKLEY a majority of 526, but in 1900, when Mr. ROOSEVELT was a candidate for Vice-President, some of the Democratic leaders in the Shenandoah Valley took pains to make his views about non-combatants known to the Quaker and Dunkard voters. The result was that the county, normally Republican, gave a Democratic majority of 486. The views that proved so offensive to the Quakers of Rockingham County were set forth by Mr. ROOSEVELT in his Life of Thomas H. Benton, which was published some years ago in the "American Statesmen Series." In the course of the biography, he took occasion to say, "A class of professional non-combatants is as harmful to the healthy growth of a nation as is a class of fire-eaters, for a weakness or folly is nationally as bad as a vice, or worse; and, in the long run, a Quaker may be quite as undesirable a citizen as a duellist." Mr. ROOSEVELT ailed, "No man who is not willing to bear arms and to fight for his rights can give a good reason why he should be entitled to live in a free country." It has occurred to Mr. THOMAS TASCART, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, that the experience of Rockingham County, Virginia, might be turned to account in Indiana, and that it would do the Democratic ticket no harm to place the words we have just quoted under the eyes of every one of the ten thousand Quaker, Dunkard, and Mennonite voters that are known to exist in that State alone. In Illinois and Ohio those peace-loving sects are also largely represented. They are numerous, too, in Pennsylvania, but there, of course, under any circumstances, the Republicans are certain of securing a large majority in a Presidential year. In Indiana, on the other hand, or even in Illinois, the change of many thousands of non-combatant votes from the Republican to the Democratic side might possibly have a decisive effect.

Professor HENRY LOUIS NELSON has finally reached the fairly obvious conclusion that "what the Democrats need now is a four years' course of education, and such a course is likely, in the end, to give the country an intelligent opposition to the Republican party." Some people think that is what they have needed for some time. Whether they will profit from their opportunity during the next four years may depend upon the kind of teaching they get. If the present master be continued in the Washington schoolhouse, they need only keep awake to acquire a vast fund of knowledge. He'll "learn 'em!"

Up to this time the World has neither retracted its story nor professed any proof or attempted proof whatsoever tending to confirm its truth and discredit the President's comprehensive denial. In discussing this remarkable publication, HARRIS WEEKLY takes the view that the World has been imposed upon and that it is screening the identity of the impostor. But if this be true, should not the World manfully retract and confess its fault? Can it afford to remain silent with the brand upon it placed there by the President of the United States in declaring its assertion "a lie from beginning to end"? To be imposed upon is not an uncommon misfortune of newspapers, but to decline to withdraw a false statement made as a result of such imposition is dishonorable in any case and notably so when the person chosen as the target is the highest official in the land and when the misstatement accuses him of an act of perfidy. Mr. FELTZER has the best—Confession Tribune.

He has had it for some time. But let us be patient! Maybe he is writing an open letter on the subject.

GEORGE MEXICOTT, the English moralist, a thoughtful man of mature years, who has long been a student of human relations, has been discussing the marriage question with a representative of the London Mail. As reported by cable, he predicts a change in the legal conditions of marriage, and a time to come when marriages for limited periods will be allowed under State regulations as to provision of money for the care and education of children. Mr. MEXICOTT recognizes that his forecast will be highly disturbing to the notions of many of his contemporaries. "There will be a devil of an uproar," he says, "before such a change can be made. It will be a great shock; but look back and see what shocks there have been and what changes have nevertheless occurred in the marriage business in the past." If by "the past" he means the long, long past in the earth's history, there have indeed been changes, but in Christian countries for the last thousand years or so marriage has held its form and quality pretty well. It is true, though, that in the United States divorce has grown so prevalent in the last generation as almost to constitute a condition of limited marriage for those who want it. We notice that in the State of Ohio 4316 decrees of divorce were granted during the six months ending July 1, 1904, leaving 11,368 applications pending. That looks as though unwilling couples were under no very hard compulsion in that State to continue in their bonds. Yet Ohio is not especially notorious as a State in which divorce is easy. It is certainly the rule in this country at present that the lawmakers, reflecting the sentiment of the general public, show little solicitude to constrain married folk to continue in the married state when they want to get out of it. Theoretically, marriage in the United States is still for life. What its actual average duration is is a matter of statistics. The period is still far more than ten years, but it must be considerably less than the average period over which the lives of both parties to marriages continue. The great defense of permanent marriage lies not in the law nor even in the churches, but in the enormous inconvenience of changing partners, and in the fact that the permanent marriages are so much the best.

On September 26 Justice PIERCES of Lenox, fined the Third Secretary of the British Embassy $25 for driving his automobile too fast, and $25 more for contempt of court because he refused to plead to the charge. The Secretary, Mr. GERNY, refused to plead because he was a member of a foreign embassy, and as such not subject to the jurisdiction of Justice PIERCES's court. Justice PIERCES has since said that he found nothing in the Massachusetts common law which exempted any one from breaking the laws of the State. It is to smile, and smiling to conclude with Justice PIERCES as with a brother in affliction. At this writing information is on the way to him from the State Department, by way of Boston, to the effect that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts long since ratified a Federal Constitution which provides that the Supreme Court of the United States shall have original jurisdiction "in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls." Mr. PIERCES's court will have to give up Mr. GERNY's money, and throw in an apology, but there is nothing in the Constitution to hinder Justice PIERCES from going out behind the barn and giving relief to his feelings. The timely moral of it all is that no American officer of government can afford to forget or to ignore the Constitution. No, not one!

General LUIS E. WAGNER, Governor of the Philippines, testifies in a letter dated August 15 to the ill effect on the Filipinos of the renewed discussion in this country of their capacity for self-government and ultimate independence. What is said and written in this country is printed, General WAGNER says, in the Filipino newspapers with injurious effects, its tendency being to restore the influence of the old intervention leaders and quicken their activity, and to demoralize and weaken the more conservative Filipinos, who fear to speak out what they think for fear of being considered enemies of their people. All this, General WAGNER says, "makes our task more difficult than it otherwise would be."

No doubt that is all true. No doubt, furthermore, General WAGNER is an officer fit for his task, and deserves all the help and consideration in his work that we at home can give him. But republican government cannot be carried on without free discussion. The government of the Philippines is republican in the sense that it is government by a republic. It is bound to be discussed by the voters responsible for it just as much as though it were the government of their own republic. There are great objections to such discussion, but there is no help for it. The fact that the status and administration and future of the Philippines must always be publicly discussed in the United States, and must become a political issue at least once every four years, is one of the great drawbacks to the administration of such a dependency by the United States. Ever since the Philippine burden was laid upon our backs it has been urged upon us at short intervals, not only that we must carry it, but that we must carry it with our mouths shut. It has never been acknowledged that the time was ripe for full discussion of the problem. Discussion has always been held to be injurious to our control of the islands, and highly inconsiderate of the labors of our agents. And so it has been. Yet discussion has always gone on more or less, unobtruding for a time and then breaking out again, and it always will go on, until the Philippines are either turned loose to shift for themselves, or admitted to Territorial rights with a prospect of Statehood.

The general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, which will be called to order on October 5 in Boston, will have to discuss, if not decide, some interesting questions. Before marking what these questions are, we should point out that the decision of the approaching assembly cannot easily be foreseen, owing to the material change in the composition of that body. Even in the House of Bishops there are many new members, while the long familiar figure of Bishop HENRY CHURCHILL of central New York, Bishop CROSBY of Rhode Island, and Bishop DUNSTON of Kentucky will be missed. It is, however, the radical transformation of the House of Deputies which renders the attitude of the convention problematical. The whole number of delegates will be 496, of whom only 123 will be old clerical deputies, and 122 old lay deputies. On the other hand, there will be 125 clerical deputies and 126 lay deputies, not one of whom has ever before taken part in a general convention of the Church. One of the first questions which will come up at Boston is the proposed change of name. A good many American Episcopalians maintain that the Church of England, of which their own Church is an offshoot, cannot properly be described as "Protestant." The adjective, they say, is inapplicable, on either historical or theological grounds. They contend, therefore, that their religious organization should no longer be denominated "Protestant Episcopal," but be officially known by one or the other of the five following names: The American Catholic Church, the American Catholic Church in the United States, the American Catholic Church in the United States of America, the Church in the United States of America, and the American Branch of the Catholic Church in the United States. Any one of these names is open to obvious objections. The committee appointed by the last general convention to consider the subject will report, it is said, that any change of the name of the Church at this time is inexpedient. It will be observed that the report, as outlined, does not undertake to enter into the merits of the question. As to the mere inexpediency of the proposed move, that seems to have been demonstrated when conventions in the various dioceses and missionary districts of the United States were consulted. The vote was 696 for a change of title, and 1101 against it.

Another committee will report on a question affecting the organization of the Episcopal Church in the United States. It is well known that, at present, there is no archbishop in the American Episcopal Church—no hierarchical authority immediate between a bishop and the general convention. Owing to the vast expanse and complexity of the United States, the utility of dividing the Episcopal Church into provinces has long been patent. It is proposed to create seven provinces, each of which would have its metropolis, to be chosen by the provincial bishops; its synod to legislate for the clergy of the province, and its courts for the trial and punishment of transgressors of the canon law. Of course appeals would lie from provincial synods and from provincial courts to a general convention. It has been suggested that one province should consist of the whole of New England, and a second of the States of New York and New Jersey. Five other provinces, each of which would be made up of contiguous States, could be established within the Union.

Another question certain to be raised is concerned with the position which should be taken by the Protestant Episcopal Church with reference to the marriage of divorced persons. It is well known that at present clergymen are allowed by the canon of the Church to perform the marriage ceremony in the case of two persons, one or both of whom may have been divorced, provided he or she, or both, shall not have been adjudged guilty of adultery. If, on the other hand, a man or woman has been adjudged guilty of adultery in a decree of divorce, he or she cannot be married under the existing canon by an Episcopal clergyman. A new canon is now proposed to the effect that no clergyman shall solemnize a marriage between any two persons unless he shall have satisfied himself that neither person has been, or is, the husband or wife of any other person then living; unless, indeed, the former marriage was annulled for a cause existing before such former marriage. It will be observed that, even under the more rigorous canon proposed, a clergyman would be at liberty to marry a man and a woman who had been divorced for the misconduct of one or the other. The attempt to place the canon law of the Protestant Episcopal Church with regard to divorce on a footing substantially identical with that occupied by the canon law of Rome might, perhaps, have succeeded had the House of Deputies remained virtually intact, for the movement in favor of the change seemed to be gaining ground in that body. Now, however, that more than half of the deputies are new men, the action of the convention cannot be predicted. For still another reason this year's general convention of the American Episcopal Church is fraught with unusual interest. One of the questions fixed for discussion is, "What shall be done with the negro at the South?" The views of Bishop HAYES of Arkansas, who will submit a report upon the subject, are well known. He is a convinced and outspoken defender of the course which the Southern whites have adopted with relation to the colored race. From what we have here said it is manifest that the proceedings of the Episcopal general convention will be watched attentively on grounds more relevant and important than the attendance of the Archbishop of Canterbury in the capacity of an onlooker. We observe that some of our newspapers describe Dr. Davidson as "Primate of England." That is the title of another hierarch. Officially and legally, the Archbishop of York is "Primate of England"; the Archbishop of Canterbury is "Primate of all England."

There was a kind of blizzard of railroad accidents last month. The average daily allowance of victims conceded to the railroads of the United States may be computed from the Statistical Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1902. For every day in that year the American railroads killed one passenger, eight employees, and fourteen other persons, and injured eighteen passengers, one hundred and forty employees, and twenty other persons. That makes a daily average of about twenty-three homicides and one hundred and seventy-seven injuries. Of course such an average as this would not be maintained except by very unobtrusive methods. If we had one railroad accident a day in which twenty-three persons were killed and one hundred and seventy-seven injured, it could not go on a month without creating a strong impression that our railroads were extravagant in their consumption of human life. Last month this impression began to be felt because the railroads did a good deal of killing and maiming by wholesale. Sixty passengers were killed in one accident on the Southern Railway, which was two months' allowance of passengers for all the roads in the country. That was appalling, but the same number of fatalities spread out over two months do not appall any one except the statisticians.

Another thing that impressed our minds last month was that the President, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Mr. J. P. Morgan were all in railroad accidents within twenty-four hours. That demonstrated, at least, that the railroads are no respecters of persons. Not all the care that is taken in transporting the President was able to prevent the tire from bursting off his locomotive wheel, but happily the machine that hauled Cæsar's fortunes was just then going very slowly. In the case of Mr. Morgan's special that smashed into a freight locomotive, somebody was to blame, but the heavy Pullman cars protected their passengers, and luck saved ruffian-men. Stand on a small station platform and watch a fast train rush by, and you will wonder that any fast train gets anywhere unsmashed. They go by like projectiles. They will always be railroad accidents, but we have too many—far too many—in this country. There is something amiss; something notional, and possibly temperamental. Our railroads ought not to kill or injure 75,000 persons a year, even though they carry annually (as they do) 750,000,000 passengers.

Clay County in Mississippi seems to have been teut to the labor of making votes for Colonel ROOSEVELT. The Evening Post (New York) reports that the Rev. C. G. BUCHANAN, colored, preacher and editor at West Point in that county, has been driven out of the county with his family by a mob. According to the Post's informant, the chief complaint of the mob against the BUCHANANS was that they lived too well for negroes. It seems that they had a decent house with a piano in it, and kept a horse. The mob held, as reported, that the possession and use of these luxuries by the BUCHANANS had a bad effect on the other negroes. So they drove BUCHANAN out, and he is trying to arrange with the sheriff of Clay County for a chance to return to West Point, to wind up his business and remove his effects. We commend this story to the attention of those of our Southern white brethren who are fighting hard now in every State to put down mobs and mob-violence, and to secure for all citizens the protection of the law.

labor at seventy-five, nearly all men are at sixty-two. The CLEVELAND order was based upon a fact attested by experience, the ROOSEVELT order on an assumption which, as a general rule, is not well founded. Judge PARKER, however, evidently thinks that the CLEVELAND order, though relatively defensible and harmless, was wrong in principle, for he holds that our people need more tolerate the citation of one act of usurpation of power as an excuse for another. The first act may possibly have been due to mistake; the second, being based on the first, cannot be thus excused.

We have left ourselves space to note only in the most cursory fashion what Judge PARKER has to say about the immediate expenditures of the Federal government since the last Democratic administration, and about the new and economic version of the Monroe Doctrine presented by Mr. ROOSEVELT in his Cuban letter. He points out that there is not a sentence in the Republican platform recommending a reduction in the disbursements of the government; not a line suggesting that an increase in the cost of the War Department from $240,000,000 in 1890 to $155,000,000 in 1901 should be made the subject of inquiry; not a paragraph calling for a thorough investigation of those departments of the government in which dishonesty has been recently disclosed. Judge PARKER, on his part, suggests that the people, by their votes, can, if they desire it, cause such an investigation, and inaugurate a policy of economy and retrenchment. So far as his personal convictions go, he holds that the liberality, patriotism, and national pride of the American people should not be made an excuse for waste of the public funds. In a word, official extravagance is pronounced official crime. Turning the extraordinary expenditure of the Monroe Doctrine advocated in Mr. ROOSEVELT's Cuban letter, Judge PARKER says that the Democratic party, of which he is the nominee, repudiates the rôle of policeman for the American Continent, and refuses to act as a collector for foreign states or their citizens. He closes his letter of acceptance with the solemn declaration that, if called to the office of President, he will consider himself the Chief Magistrate of all the people, and not of any faction, and shall ever be mindful of the fact that no many questions of national policy are mere differences of opinion.

A Setback for Mr. Chamberlain

THE English Trades-Union Congress has paid King EDWARD a high compliment and has dealt Mr. CHAMBERLAIN the severest blow he has received since the ill-starred fiscal ship was launched. In general such extremely democratic notions as the English Trades-Union Congress "have no use for" kings and queens, and in theory at least treat them as commoners as do their continental brethren, the socialists and doctrinaire anarchists. In Hyde Park and Regent's Park they are to be met protesting and venting their newly acquired feeling both on the wrongs of the British workman, and pointing the finger of scorn at kings, princes, and aristocrats, inabilities in general. But not so the English Trades-Union Congress. It is true that body has a high contempt for many high placed persons and institutions, and holds even Mr. Balfour in light esteem. But it is quite a different matter when it comes to his Majesty. One of the members of the congress, Mr. JOHN WARR, of the Navvies' Union, who is, therefore, presumably one of the hardy band, arose to address the assembled brethren, and seconded Mr. ARNOLD FORSTER, most unobtrusively. He sneered at the Premier as a vainglorious nonentity, and denounced both Houses of Parliament as rich man's assemblies. Then he went on to say that the King was not a vainglorious nonentity, not the summit of the rich man's pyramid, not the representative of militarism, but the only state-man that England possessed. And when he said this, Mr. JOHN WARR was applauded to the echo. He further declared that the King was the real fount of peace, and then the whole congress rose and cheered, and cheered again. It was the most remarkable demonstration of the present reign. Hardly less noteworthy was the open condemnation of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and his protective tariff. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has directed his most glowing tropes at the British workman; he has tried to persuade him that dear bread will make a cheaper breakfast; that costly meals will bring high wages. He has done some of the most wonderful arithmetic seen in modern days, to support his thesis, but the British workman heathen not the value of the character, whom he never so wisely, Joseph is denounced in the very men he relied on to pull his policy through. As a comment on his pessimistic predictions, it is interesting to note the testimony which that un-constitutional institution, the income tax, bears to the present prosperity of England. The latest returns show that while just ten years ago every penny in the pound of the income tax yielded about ten million dollars, every penny in the pound now yielded not ten million and three-quarter million dollars. In other words, taxable incomes have increased almost one-third, a very hopeful showing, since small incomes are not taxed at all. The total increase in taxable incomes, as compared with ten years ago, is over a billion dollars, not so bad for a country which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN declares to be at the last gasp.

Pension Order Number Seventy-Eight

We by no means say that it will be generally accepted as conclusive, but we do regard as by far the most effective defence of Pension Order No. 78 yet offered, that which is embodied in the reply made by Mr. HENRY W. TAFT, a brother of the present Secretary of War, to a report of the PARKER Constitution Club on the subject. Mr. TAFT begins by pointing out that, by the Pension Law of 1890, Congress approved of a permanent service pension system, under which any person, who had served in the army or navy during the rebellion for a specified period, would become entitled to a pension of not less than $40, nor more than $12, per month, provided he could prove that he was suffering from permanent disability. Incorporating him from performing manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn his support. The amount to be paid was graduated by the law according to the degree of disability, and it will be observed that the kind of disability was defined only as that which "impairs the capacity for manual labor." The Commissioner of Pensions was designated as the officer who, in his judicial discretion (subject to review by the Secretary of the Interior), should determine whether disability to perform manual labor had or had not been proved to exist in the case of a given applicant for a pension, and if so, to what extent. What Mr. TAFT wants to bring out with sufficient emphasis is the fact that, under the Pension Law of 1890, the burden of proof of the existence of total or partial inability to perform manual labor rested on the applicant for a pension. There was no presumption in his favor, and the rules and regulations which the Commissioner of Pensions was authorized to issue for the making of proof related solely to the kind and effect of the evidence to be submitted by the applicant upon whom the burden of proof rested. It may be true, as Mr. TAFT asserts, that if every individual case were to be considered upon its particular facts, administration under the Pension Law of 1890 would have become, if not impossible, at least most cumbersome. It should be obvious, however, though Mr. TAFT does not admit it, that, if experience had shown the existing law to be entirely or nearly unworkable, a remedy should have been sought from Congress, which alone was competent to shift the burden of proof from the applicant for a pension to the Commissioner of Pensions, by establishing a presumption in favor of the former. In case he should have reached a given age. As a matter of fact, a bill was introduced in Congress, mandatory in form, and making age the sole qualification for the several grades of pension. But Congress did not deem it wise to withdraw from the Pension Commissioner the right to introduce rebutting evidence to show that, in a particular case, age alone did not create the disability contemplated by the act of 1890. It does not follow that Congress might not have sanctioned a rebuttable presumption of disability in favor of an applicant for Pension Order No. 78. On the contrary, there is reason to believe that Congress would have sanctioned the substance of the order, because, after it was made, an item was inserted in an appropriation bill for the specific purpose of meeting the expense incidental to the execution of that order. As regards the question of principle involved, it is quite immaterial whether, as the Constitution Club alleges, no less than fifteen million dollars will be added to the Pension bill by Order No. 78, or whether the Pension Commissioner is right in putting the additional amount as low as $3,400,000. The point is whether the shifting of the burden of proof from the applicant for a pension to the Commissioner of Pensions did not, as a matter of constitutional law, require the sanction of an act of Congress, instead of depending exclusively upon an Executive fiat. It is true, as Mr. TAFT reminds us that, during Mr. CLEVELAND's second administration, an order was made that, in the case of a man who should have attained the age of seventy-five, "a disability" should be regarded as conclusive evidence of total disability to perform manual labor, within the meaning of the Pension Act of 1890. It is also true that, during the McKINLEY administration, an order was made that an applicant for a pension, who should be sixty-five years of age, should be conclusively entitled to at least the minimum amount prescribed by the Pension Act of 1890—that is to say, the amount prescribed for one-half total disability. Mr. TAFT is justified in saying that, from one point of view, Pension Order No. 78 is less objectionable than the CLEVELAND and McKINLEY orders, because the two latter created conclusive presumptions of fact, whereas the former established only a rebuttable presumption. Mr. TAFT has no warrant, however, for assuming that the PARKER Constitution Club has undertaken to defend, or is bound to defend, the CLEVELAND and McKINLEY precedents. On the contrary, the club would doubtless condemn both precedents as violations of the constitutional principle that Congress alone has power to establish a presumption, either conclusive or rebuttable, in favor of the proponent of a claim upon the Federal Treasury. In the absence of a law establishing such presumption, the burden of proof must rest upon the applicant. Mr. TAFT's defence of Pension Order No. 78 is the most skillful yet presented, but we do not believe that it would meet with the approval of the United States Supreme Court.

D. CADY HERRICK, DEMOCRATIC NOMINEE FOR GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK

Judge D. Cadz Herrick, of Albany, who was nominated for Governor by the Democratic convention at Saratoga on September 21, has been a Justice of the Supreme Court for the Third Judicial District since 1891, and an Associate Justice of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court for the Third Department since 1883. Judge Herrick was born at Exeter, Schoharie County, New York, in 1846. He took a course in the Albany Law School, during which he was a roommate of William McKim, and was admitted to the bar in 1867. He has been prominent in politics for many years, serving from 1880 to 1885 as District Attorney of Albany County, and from 1885 to 1891 as Corporation Counsel of the city of Albany.

This "Freeholders"—Riding from Left to Right, the Players are Messrs. Devereux Milham, R. L. Agnew, Foxhall Keene, and Joshua Couse, Jr.

Miss Alice Roosevelt (in the White Automobile) watching the Match

The Winning Team, the "Wanderers"; the Players, riding from Left to Right, are Messrs. C. R. Snowden, J. E. Cusdin, J. M. Waterbury, Jr., and Laurence Waterbury

THE OPEN CHAMPIONSHIP POLO MATCH AT VAN CORTLANDT PARK

The first championship polo match that has been held in the neighborhood of New York since 1860 took place on September 20 at Van Cortlandt Park before 7,500 spectators. The match was open, the teams being composed of players chosen irrespective of their home clubs. The championship was won by the "Wanderers," who defeated the "Freeholders" by a score of 4 1-2 goals to 3. The make-up of the contrasting teams, comprising some of the best-known players in the country, is given above

Photographs by Foxhall

The Rapid-fire Gun on the Deck of the "Lena"

The Russian Auxiliary Cruiser "Lena" in San Francisco Bay

Crew of the "Lena" at Target Practice

SNAP-SHOT OF THE RUSSIAN AUXILIARY CRUISER "LENA," WHICH HAS BEEN DISMANTLED IN SAN FRANCISCO HARBOR

The photographs show some interesting views of the Russian auxiliary cruiser "Lena," when arrival in the harbor at San Francisco raised the question of neutrality between Russia and the United States government. The "Lena," which arrived at San Francisco from Vladivostok, was not allowed to remain in the harbor of San Francisco for extended repairs before sailing out again for service in the Russian army, but, by order of the Russian government, has been dismantled. She will be detained at San Francisco until the close of the war.

The Campaign in Maryland

By Senator L. E. McComas

THE Republican campaign in Maryland was opened in Baltimore on September 20 by a meeting at which Senator Fairbanks was the attraction. At that date the Democrats had not yet held public meetings.

In this State, as elsewhere, the campaign has been quiet. The party workers on both sides have been diligent in the routine work. Judge Parker's telegram created enthusiasm for him. After his speech of acceptance a feeling of disappointment took the place of enthusiasm. Judge Parker was stronger the first ten days after the convention than he has been since.

The Democratic attack upon President Roosevelt personally, on the contrary, has spent its force. It is presently growing stronger in Maryland. Many Democrats and independents are inclined to Roosevelt now who leaned toward Parker six days ago. All Republicans will vote for Roosevelt and Fairbanks.

A very considerable vote which Mr. Kinsley added to the Republican total still doubts whether the Democratic party is safe. The percentage of business men, ordinarily Democrats, who will vote for Roosevelt because they fear to risk a change, is considerable, though less than four years ago.

In Baltimore the people are busy in rebuilding the burned district. The city has not lost, but has lost the trade. The recent calamity has postponed political discussion. The Reform business men of Baltimore are a large and influential body. Some of them, ordinarily Democrats, are literally to the President because of his intervention in behalf of their constituents in Kinsley and in Kinsley. Many of them are unwilling to risk a change of administration, and will therefore vote for Roosevelt.

The main effort of the Democrats is to arouse race prejudice. Maryland is a white State, nearly four and one-half white to one black person. Annually the Democrats raise the negro cry. Republicans do not expect much injury from it this year. This is a national campaign for President and Congress. There are no candidates for State or local offices. In Maryland, and especially in Baltimore, are thousands of voters who are Republicans only in a Presidential year. If they vote they are numerous enough to carry the State for Roosevelt and Fairbanks.

President Roosevelt is very popular with the young voters. They admire his courage, sincerity, and great ability. His personality and his Americanism attract them. I am informed that among the conservatives of Maryland, and among the Republicans of many countries, many Democrats will vote for Roosevelt, and that many ardent Bryan men will vote for him. He is very popular among the railway men, and skilled labor is very friendly to him. The assault upon protection as robbery will give our ticket a strong vote among the working men. The farmers are the most prosperous people in this State as a whole. They have been hurt here and will get high prices. The majority of the farmers are Republicans.

Maryland has been growing more and more Republican. Each year the Republicans receive a smaller advantage from the black vote and an increasing percentage of the white vote. Election has contributed to regress or nullify the Republican increase have only partially succeeded. During the last thirty-seven years there has been a steady gain for Republicans in Congressional years and on even greater gains in Presidential years. All State and local offices are elected in the odd-numbered years, and the even-numbered years are Presidential and Congressional years. The average Democratic majority at State elections during this period is sixteen thousand. The average Democratic majority during the same period at Congressional elections is eight thousand, and the average Democratic Presidential majority during these years is seven thousand. If the Republicans receive this average increase of nine thousand votes in the Presidential year, we ought to carry the State again, as we carried it in 1900 and 1908.

The Republicans have always been united in a Presidential year, and are united now. Democratic divisions are most noticeable this year in the first and second Congressional districts. It is a fact that in each of the six Congressional districts Republicans are in the lead of winning the fight. This indicates an average Republican belief that the State can be carried for Roosevelt and Fairbanks. If we were left alone we would win the State. What the Democratic National Committee may do to change conditions and what it can do is discussed hopefully by Democrats.

To sum it up, conservative Republicans expect to carry the State for the national ticket and elect four or more of the six Congressmen. In Maryland during the past ten years we have learned to endure the outside superficial observer, who always begins with the belief that Maryland is a Democratic State and always ends with that. During the past ten years the Republicans have carried Maryland seven times, the Democrats twice, and the truth time each party elected one of its State candidates. During the same period at every national and Congressional election, Maryland has been carried by the Republicans. Our State and our national ticket is very strong with the people. Our hopefulness is justified.

Progress in the Use of Electricity

By Louis Bell, Ph.D.

THE deliberations of the International Electrical Congress at St. Louis were for the most part of rather less technical character than in the case of general interest, but now and then they disclosed a laudable use of electrical progress than in usual in scientific discussions. In particular, the enormous advances which have been made in the electrical transmission of power based upon contemporary, not only in achievements recorded, but in the very topics left unmentioned. At the time of the last international congress in Chicago there was no art of power transmission, and therefore no section set apart for its consideration. Even in the brief discussion there occupied the topic a note of skepticism was predominant.

Within two weeks of the close of that congress, however, the first modern transmission plant in America was put in operation, and from that time on progress has been immensely rapid. The figures quoted at St. Louis showed that the great manufacturing companies have already put a million and a half horse power in capacity of electric supply for industrial purposes. The very magnitude of the work demands instant attention, but even more striking has been the swift improvement in apparatus and in method. The key to success in the larger work of power transmission is the employment of very great electrical pressures to force the energy economically over the long lines which span the distance between the power station, perhaps in a mountain valley, and the far away cities that utilize the power. The few hundred volts of pressure used in ordinary lighting or railway plants are hopelessly ineffective when the distances covered must be scores of miles.

In the very beginning of power transmission the pressures were put up to two or three thousand volts, and thence advanced by leaps to five, ten, fifteen, and twenty thousand. At the last named figure there was a brief pause. Up to this point it is comparatively easy to insulate the wires at every point of support either by insulators so that the electric current will not escape to any insulator. But at increased pressure the very air about the lines begins to play the electrician false. A faint blue glow surrounds the wires at night, rising at every point of support into pale, shimmering halos. To control this little brother of the lightning now and intricate forms of insulating supports had to be devised. Ingenious structures of porcelain sometimes nearly a foot and a half in diameter and weighing twenty-five or thirty pounds.

Strand with these the engineer could hold the current, scattering and protecting as it would, down to business, and his services in no wise more forcefully attested than in the following bland announcement which opened one of the papers read at St. Louis: "In discussing the conditions which affect and limit the constant and operation of high-tension lines, pressure of over 20,000 volts and lines of over fifty miles in length only will be considered." At the present moment there are ten or a dozen plants working regularly at 20,000 volts or more, three or four of them at more than 50,000 volts. And in discussing this topic one of the most experienced engineers at the congress then in Louisville laid the cards of the more conservative by stating that he considered operation at 30,000 volts actually easier than at half that pressure. The vicious fact was then elicited that when adequate insulation has been provided for these very high pressures, with a proper margin for safety, the system is actually more safely insulated against a large proportion of the minor lightning discharges that might work havoc where less precautions had been taken.

The distances covered have kept pace with the voltage employed. The fifty-mile limit was passed half a dozen years ago in a line plant near Fresno, California, which operates its water wheels, by the way, under a vertical head of something over a quarter of a mile. Since then line after line has stretched out to similar distances, until at present two great plants are delivering power to the vicinity of San Francisco from stations in the mountains 150 miles away. The farthest regular customers on branch lines are nearly 200 miles from their source of power. There, indeed, owing to an accident in one power-house, power was supplied for some days down a main line and backed over another to customers separated from the working station by no less than 250 miles of circuit. Power transmission today is not cut short by the physical limitations of distance, but only by the competition of other power when the cost of lines becomes too great.

Quite apart from all questions of capacity, working pressure

Mr. H. E. Borden's "Mercedes," N.Y.

Mr. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr. in his "Mercedes VI."

Mr. C. L. Seaborg's "Speedway"

MOTOR-BOAT RACING ON THE HUDSON—THE MATCH FOR THE AMERICAN POWER-BOAT ASSOCIATION'S CHALLENGE CUP

The three-day motor-boat contest for the gold challenge cup offered by the American Power-boat Association began on September 22 with a thirty-foot course on the Hudson. Mr. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr.'s "Mercedes VI," was the winner of the first day's contest, covering the course in 14.25m. The best time was made by Mr. W. K. Vanderbilt's "Violet of the H," 14.12m, 52s, which would have won her the cup but for the breakdown she was repaired to give the "Mercedes VI" and other contestants, on the second and third days of the contest the "Violet of the H" was the winner, covering the course in 14.25m, 1s, on the second day, and in 14.30m, 25s, on the third day—thus winning two out of the three races.

and length of lines are the great advances which have been made in operative conditions. Power transmission circuits are now built and safeguarded are, in spite of their great voltages and lengths, singularly reliable. It is rarely that they fail through lack of care in construction and inspection. Were one to make a list of the causes of the casual interruption of service which occur it would read like a chapter from the annals of Anatolia. A load of wire tossed into the fire by a juvenile whiffwind, an owl perching winged upon one of the wires, a predatory cat discharging a paw and stretching amiably near an insulator, a flock of pelicans suddenly rising and knocking a telephone circuit over the power wires, these some of the recorded examples of the mischiefs of Fate. Many of the larger systems have from tag or three to half a dozen generating stations, all operated in unison, and insuring a complete shut-down of the system highly improbable. This cooperation of stations less, too, a very important bearing upon the economies of the transmission. A river here which runs low in July and August may be linked with another a hundred miles away which falls only when freshets in April or May flood the available head of water, and both may be joined to an auxiliary steamplant, which can be put into service to meet unusual demands or to take up the load if accident has crippled a line. The desire of necessary apparatus has gone forward to meet the increasing requirements of service. A few years ago power switching apparatus to the extent on an off circuit at 50,000 volts if need be was unheard of, and devices to protect new high-tension circuits from lightning were hopelessly ineffective. To-day the former is regularly manufactured, and the latter, while still far from perfect, are in process of rapid evolution. And now the use of power lines has changed so much that the old lines have become commonplace and the impossible every-day routine. Much still, of course, remains to be done; engineers are looking forward to still higher pressures and to the commercial practicability of greater distances. It has taken but a single decade to bring the art to its present state—what may one not dare to hope for the future?

A Cowboy Carnival in Wyoming Celebrating Frontier Day in Cheyenne

By John Dicks Howe

ON August 30 the city of Cheyenne, Wyoming, donned its holiday attire, both the business and residence portions of the town being joyfully decorated with flags, lanterns, and flaming pyrotechnics. Early in the morning the streets were crowded with cowboys attired in red and yellow shirt-waists, chaps and moccasins, handkerchiefs tied loosely around the neck, their spins, talking to the rhythm of their prancing horses, as they dashed here and there on various errands connected with Cheyenne's "Frontier Day" celebration. At night the scene on the streets changed. Vast crowds thronged the thoroughfares, throwing confetti, tossing tin horns, and yelling like wild Indians, while the staid Stockade laid aside his savage frown, point, and leathers, and came into town to join the festive procession.

The events took place at the fair grounds, a mile north of Cheyenne. Near the west end of the arena were constructed huge, semi-circular, or stockade, in which were imprisoned the wild horses and steers that were to take part in the contests. Reaching south from the corals a strongly built fence extended towards the centre of the oval, so that running steers or wild horses would take the proper course when their two came. Back of this fence were gathered hundreds of cowboys and cowgirls, who acted as aids and assistants in carrying out the various features of the programme. In the stand reserved for guests were noticed the faces of many prominent men of the West, leading railroad officials, the proprietors of the great Denver saloons, and scores of other notables.

To the man from New York or Boston who has never followed the round-up or seen a steer roped, the riding contests were treats of a high order. In contests of this kind the success of the winner depends as much upon the horse he rides as upon the skill of the hand that throws the rope, for a trained cowboy that knows what is expected of it will do as much for the rider as he can do for himself. When all is ready the central gate is opened and out dashes a wild steer. He runs straight for the arena, and the moment he crosses the boundary line the flag is waved—the signal for the cowboy to begin operations. Like a shot out of a cannon the man and with a snarl he dashes after the animal, slowly circling his lariat around his head. The moment he can get the steer in position the lariat shoots out and settles around the neck or over the head of the stubborn animal. The instant the lariat is around the horse stops and spreads its four feet wide apart, bracing itself for the pull that long experience has taught it is soon to come. A second later the rope becomes taut, and the steer is thrown high in the air, coming down with a thud plainly heard in the grand stand. As the rider hurriedly dismounts and runs to the steer to "hogtie" it, the pony stands like a statue, every muscle drawn taut and with its weight against the rope, to keep the steer from rising to its feet. A steer goes up from the spectators as the rider throws both hands in the air, the signal that his task is finished.

The maverick branding contest was a novelty, as it had never been attempted in the arena, and attracted a great deal of attention. Five rearings were turned loose of one and were pursued by ten cowboys, the condition being that the last cowboy who first roped a maverick, dragged it to the fire and branded it, should win. The animal was caught 150 yards from the fire, his captor succeeding in driving it almost to the traps before it balked. He dragged it the remainder of the distance, his assistant applying the iron to one minute and twenty-three seconds after the first drop. As the red-hot iron sank into the maverick's side and a wreath of smoke, coupled with the smell of burning hair and flesh, ascended, many of the spectators turned their heads away in horror, but the great majority were too much interested to feel at all squeamish. The animal did not appear to mind the operation, nor did those that followed.

When the last steer was turned out, roped and tied, and the echoes of the storm of cheers that greeted the contestants had died away, the mounted assistants rode to the corral to rope the remaining lot of "cut-outs." For the next ten minutes there was war in the corral, for it became a confused mass of kicking, plunging, plunging horseflesh. The dust arose in clouds from the hoofs of the "cut-outs," and for a time the cowboys who had roped their horses rested with loose ropes. When the lariat finally reached the horse, the rope was tightened and the horses dragged to the gate, which was quickly swung open. This comes the first round, plunging and rearing, contending for every foot of the ground. If he is a horse that has been ridden before and has gained a reputation, the cowboys from his old friends seem to recall former scenes, and he appears to remember the events of a year ago, when he was last sold. It is a whole year since a man has put a rope around his neck, and he fights like a tiger until the cowboy and his helper tie his feet, blindfold him, and leave the buckskin over his head. The instant the rider puts the saddle on his back, he rears on his hind legs and strikes at the two men with both feet. When he is finally saddled and the blindfold is removed, he gathers himself for a final effort, and goes straight up in the air like a rocket, coming down with his legs like stilts, stiff and boundedly unrelaxed, but the men do not leave the saddle, being so firm and so slowly as though tied there. For five minutes they fight, and when they stop in front of the grand stand and the rider bows in response to a storm of applause, the horse realizes that he has been subdued. Rider after rider performs his feat in these exciting events, and at the same time the spectators catch their breath, thinking the man has surely been crushed to death under the rolling buckskin. Again and again when the plungers rise on their hind feet and fall backwards, the embankers are hurled into confusion, expecting to see a mangled body where the horse lay; but those who fear for the cowboy are those unacquainted with his skill.

The great event of the celebration this year was the remarkable feat of Will Pickett, a negro hailing from Taylor, Texas, who gave his exhibition with 20,000 people watched with wonder and admiration. Pickett was a negro man, narrow of build, a severe appearance of any kind, attack a fiery, wild-eyed, and powerful steer and throw it by his teeth. With the aid of a helper, Pickett chased the steer until he was in front of the grand stand. Then he jumped from the saddle and landed on the ground, grasped the grazed horse's horns, and held it tight to stop within a dozen feet. By a remarkable display of strength he twisted the steer's head until its nose pointed straight into the air, the animal braced with pain and its tongue protruding in its effort to secure air. Again and again the negro was jerked from his feet and tossed into the air, but his grip on the horns never once loosened, and the steer failed in its efforts to gore him. Cowboys with their lariat's rushed to Pickett's assistance, but the action of the combat was too rapid for them. Before help could be given, Pickett had forced the steer's nose into the ground and about of its wind, slipped, and was tossed aside like a piece of paper. There was a scattering of cowboys as he jumped to his feet and ran for his horse. Taking the saddle without touching the stirrup, he ran the steer a short opposite the judges' stand, again jumped on to its back, and threw it. Twice more he negro lifted from his feet, but he held on with the tenacity of a bulldog. Suddenly Pickett dropped the steer's head and grasped the upper lip of the animal with his teeth, threw his arms wide apart, in show that he was not using his hands, and sent slowly upon its back. The steer lost its footing and rolled upon its back, completely cutting the negro's body with its own. The crowd was speechless with horror, many believing that the negro had been crushed; but a second later the steer rolled to its other side, and Pickett rose unharmed, bowing and smiling. So great was the applause that the darkey again attacked the steer, which had staggered to its feet, and again threw it after a desperate struggle.

Cowgirls and Cowboys at the Carnival at Cheyenne Cowboys throwing an unruly Steer

Putting a Saddle on an unruly Steer

A Street Scene at Cheyenne on Frontier Day

SNAP-SHOTS OF EVENTS AT THE RECENT "COWBOY CARNIVAL" AT CHEYENNE, WYOMING

An interesting phase of Western life is the "Cowboy Carnival," known as "Frontier Day," recently held at Cheyenne, Wyoming. The event is a field carnival lasting three or four days, in which the cowboys and cattlemen take part, giving exhibitions of rough-riding, and taking part in open-air sports and contests. The reader is referred to an article on the opposite page of this issue of the "Weekly" for an account of the recent "Frontier Day" celebration.

Czar Parker. "Be steadfast, faithful,
Kuropatkin Taggart. "Don't hurry,"

Digitized by Google

"I am hastening to the front,"
Judge, we are backing up."

A Valley from the Japanese Mountain Gun—the end Gun has been upset by a return shell

With the Japanese "First" Army in Manchuria

The Story by an Eye-witness of the Battle of Kwan-Sui-Ten, on the Western Side of the Manchurian Divide

By William Dinwiddie

Toward from Liao-Yang, Manchuria, August 1, 1904.

GENERAL KUROKI'S army fought the battle yesterday which put his forces fairly within striking distance of Liao-Yang and over the Manchurian divide, well on their way to the open plains of the Liao Valley.

It was important as a struggle for possession of strategic position, for news reaches us today that Mukden has been occupied by General Kato's army without any resistance, and that a fourth army is nearly in position, so that an arc of Japanese soldiers, many divisions strong, now striches from the railroad on the east in the Mukden road on the north.

The battle of July 31, at Kwan-sui-ten, has an additional interest in that the Russians fought better and with greater skill than in any previous combat, and that, though flanked from both sides, they were able to retire with few losses in men, and with the loss of only two guns, both of which were disabled.

General Kurapatkin is said to have been present in person, and General Keller was killed by a Japanese shrapnel during the desperate artillery duel.

For twenty-six days we had held Moutien-ling Pass in the centre with a division. Bi-hwei and Pa-pin-wei passes on the left with another division, while a third held the extreme right, near the great divide.

We were within two days' forced march of Liao-Yang, where one day Kurapatkin was said to have a great army waiting for us; the next we heard that he had evacuated and was retiring south to Mukden, and on the third that he was moving still greater masses of men southward of Liao-Yang. The other occasions the rumors came that, in our immediate front, a great Russian force was gathering, or that it had completely disappeared, and, finally, near the very last of July, the story ran that there were at least four divisions confronting us and a great attack was imminent.

True, the Russians did attack the centre in force on July 17, and on the 18th the right wing made an advance to secure more favorable positions, both of which actions almost reached the dignity of battles, so fast and furious was the fighting, with losses aggregating nearly a thousand for the Japanese, but, outside of this, the Japanese army on the east simply held its position, waiting patiently—as only Japanese troops can do—for the advance of General Kato's army and other forces from the south, to shorten the combined striking distance of the arc of the great body of soldiers who are creeping toward Liao-Yang and the Russian prey with all the stealthiness and cunning of a poacher.

On July 30, following, within an hour, the official report that the Russians were holding a very strongly entrenched position in our front, at Tusan and Kwan-sui-ten, came the order that the military attacks and war correspondents must be prepared to move lag and baggage at 3 A.M. the next morning.

Not an atom of information, beyond the fact that we would make a short advance, could be extracted from Japanese sources, and two correspondents, John F. Bass and the writer, who were visiting the centre division, were sorely troubled because they were assigned to the left wing, which had not yet had a fight, and they were desirous of knowing whether or not they should stay with the centre, or return over twelve miles of road back to their own division.

However, the tip came in the friendly advice that we must at once return to our division, and that it was too late to secure permission from the main headquarters to remain with the centre. As a matter of fact, there was sufficient time to get back, and this decided us.

On we pushed, as the long summer twilight faded into darkness and the stars brightened in the skies, a trifle fearful lest snorters might fire upon us in the night. A Korean messenger met us, on the way, with an urgent note informing us how to connect with our baggage and servants if we should not return. At ten o'clock we were at home. At eleven we had received permission to move forward at 2 A.M. One hour's sleep was all we had that night.

The Battle of Kwan-sui-ten, from the Front of the Japanese Mountain Battery

General Hasegawa and his staff began the advance at 1 A.M., shortly after the decadent and mist-covered moon had raised itself above the mountain crests of the narrow valley. With a battalion as his guard, he was to move around the left-hand road over Pu-pin-ri Pass.

An hour later, leading our horses over the fitfully moonlit road, we pressed ahead. The night was silent and damply chill, for the larger transportation of the army had not commenced to move, and the ammunition pack-trains, the artillery, and telegraph cars must have gone forward at midnight.

The clusters of Chinese houses, crowded with soldiers the day before, were now deserted by all except a lonely sentinel, guarding great piles of soldiers' shoulder-packs. This indicated plainly that a battle was to be fought off of no great distance away.

We studied the road to Pu-pin-ri, and saw the empty Japanese trenches, breaching away for several miles to the right, like lines braided into the high hillsides. Here not even a sentry had been left behind.

At this point the well-made highway of the Japanese gave place to the native roadway, a narrow, rock-filled ditch, down which you and your horse stumbled together in the deceptive half-darkness as we slowly approached, and the purplish light of the east was blending overhead with the yellow rays of the morning moon to give the sky a greenish tinge. Half an hour yet before the gunners could see the enemy's position.

Almost on the dot at six o'clock a piece of Japanese artillery boomed in the valley to our right, and the air was filled with the shriek of its impact, as the shell moved away toward the distant hill-tops, and sent its hateful cloud of shrapnel upon the ground, while a tiny circle of white smoke curled upward, ever expanding and fading away, to show where it had struck. The battle was on. The writer will give a personal narrative of what he saw, though before doing so the general plan of the battle, given on officially, must first be briefly told, that the reader may gain an intelligent idea of the whole.

The left-wing division was to force the fighting and execute a big flanking movement around the Russian right. The center division was to follow, a little later, along the main road to Liao-Yang, through Mo-tien-tung Pass, and strike the enemy's position nearly at right angles to the left-wing division, but not until the latter had well forwarded its flanking movement. The right-wing division, farther to the north and east, was to begin a general attack along its front, and drive the enemy backward toward Liao-Yang or toward Mukden on the northern road.

As the sun came up, one battery after another got into action, and, on our right, several Japanese field-batteries could be heard booming away, while to the front and right we caught the duller crash of the little mountain guns, and away and beyond all these seemed to be noisy Russian guns replying.

The rippling puff-puff of the Japanese thirty-four-year rifle grew stronger and stronger as we approached the front, and was answered by Russian volleys, like the rumbling, jarring sound of a string of loaded, loose-wheeled carts.

General Hasegawa and his staff, including an imperial palace, were at the foot of Pu-pin-ri Valley, and, as they watched developments, Russian shrapnel burst fast behind them in the little valley, doing slight harm, but filling the narrow, rock-walled ditches with deafening echoes, which multiplied and reverberated until it seemed that the Russians had turned loose a dozen batteries, instead of the half-battery of four guns which was really playing upon us.

From a perch-hole on the rocky ridge we could see the little Japanese soldier engaged in his usual game of climbing; swiftly and silently, up the back side of hills, or scuttling upward along tortuous ravines, to gain a vantage-point where he could enfilade his enemy.

Three clumsy companies of Russians had been placed at the extreme left, as a mobile force to hold the hills against their athletic and cunning foe. They were hopelessly out-placed in the game of trying to place themselves between the coming foe and their main positions, because they must move in bodies and about in valleys, there seeming to be no individual initiative whatever.

Here, there, everywhere about them—literally from every hammock to their right, left, front, and, I was about to say, rear, came the steady roar of the Japanese rifles; not many from any given direction, but all shooting with deliberate accuracy.

The fear was being passed to death by hand-to-hand, and he groined, rubbed his nose, rolled on the ground, and ran away. The lers were swarming up the hollows, and soon appeared just under the crests of half a dozen sugar-loaf hills. Here the swarms gathered, rolling itself up in numbers until it became a company, then a battalion, in strength, actually lying in the same ridge of hills occupied by the Russians, in the trenches farther to the right.

White fogs—given to the soldiers by the Emperor, each decorated with the red sun of Japan and a cherry blossom—broke out in hundreds, and, perched high above us, we saw the spectacle of hundreds of hot and perspiring warriors fanning themselves with perfect unconcern.

It was a matter of less than half an hour before the Japanese held the main ridge to the left, or west, of the village of Not team, and the great flanking movement over the hills was ready to begin, from the point gained, about nine o'clock.

It was heading but at this hour, and the sunless air and the glaring sun seemed to make the land a veritable furnace below midnight. The dirty khaki uniforms of the stockily-built soldiers were shining with sweat, but they marched forward briskly and with no display of exhaustion, though they had been up all night and had already worked three hours in a similar of heat.

The fourteen hours' march made by that regiment of the Guards, in the flanking movement, would have killed off half the men in any European or American force long before the Japanese had finished it and were still keen to fight, and, notwithstanding this, the official report says that the left-wing division did not do so well as was expected! Only volunteers could have survived the heat and toil.

Thirty-five hundred fighting-men, with their guns and heavy knapsacks (for they did not know where they would camp at night), a battery of mountain-artillery, and all the necessary ammunition thereon in a hundred led pack-horses, with sixty more led animals carrying small-arm ammunition for the soldiers, marched into the high-walled hills, away from all roads, and away, even from foot-paths.

It was a marvelous performance, and one which, at first blush, seems impossible, for it necessitated travelling beneath the crests of the mountains, in order to be screened from the enemy. They moved ahead on mountain slopes whose angle was often sixty degrees. They toiled through thick underbrush and around the bases of rocky plungers five or eight hundred feet above the valley. One would have believed the feat impossible for loaded men, let alone heavily laden pack-horses. The left-wing regiment marched six miles in this fashion, and threatened Yo-shi-ri

Kuroki's Mountain Battery in action during the Battle of Kuan-shan-tai (Yangtze), in the rear of the main position, at five o'clock in the afternoon.

A few horses crossed narrow-shoulder down hill, and now and again a soldier, with his pack and gun, would turn turtle and take a headlong flight downward until he hung up somewhere on the stiff, scrubby brushwood, but there were few such accidents, and the advance was fairly constant.

By the time the flanking column had moved a mile along the hills to the left, a pandemonium of war had broken loose in the valleys behind. Japanese batteries were pounding the entrenched hillside back of Sui-tuan-zu and Chu-jia-pu-tzu, and were being pounded in return by Russian batteries far in the rear.

While the Japanese were not yet ready to push the attack, they had, to their surprise, met a resistance which could not be overcome. In either small-arms or artillery fire, indeed, their own guns were being silenced under a storm of shrapnel, and the weight of the aerial which was being thrown with such accuracy was certainly twice that which they could return.

All the Russian gun positions were built for four guns each, while there were places prepared over the field for forty-eight pieces of artillery, but twenty-two guns were ever actually in position and firing. The left wing division had, including the mountain-artillery, several dozen guns, or seven batteries, of which at least five were in action, while later in the day the entire division brought several additional batteries into play.

There was a most marked difference in the speed of serving the artillery of the combatants, as the Russians began the work of rapid-fire, delivering at its full capacity, several shells a minute. The Japanese gun has about half this effective firing speed. As a matter of fact, then, the Japanese, with twice the number of guns, were only on an equal terms with their antagonists.

To go back to our mountain guns, they crept around the backward curve of a jutting spur, to a point almost facing the nearest Russian battery, and, on a ridge whose crest measured not more than ten feet across, the gunners began the work of secretly building gun pits. It was with fascinated thrills that one watched the Japanese soldiers carefully plant a few green branches in the ground, to screen them from view, and with every movement one expected them to be discovered, for the mountain battery was shelling the very ridge we were on, at its highest point, a few hundred yards away, in a futile effort to fill an attack on the Russian infantrymen lying in the trenches on the same divide, but shut off by a rocky plateau which rose between.

The Russians saw nothing. The Japanese worked like Trojans with pick and shovel, until level ground, six feet high and a little wider than the track of the gun, were laid, and a deep hole for the ammunition boxes had been finished on either side of the gun position. Then, placing green branches upright over the front of the guns, they slipped them gently into position one by one.

A gunner, on his stomach, crawled ahead of each gun and ran a narrow pathway close before the muzzles. They were ready, and so were the gunners, as they sat down behind the hill and faced themselves, waiting for the ammunition trains to take position in safe places, and then on the steep hillside, warning was sent to the men and pack-train leaders who stood on a hill to the rear, that, in a few minutes, their position might be alive with the enemy's shrapnel.

Every gun and a man showed home behind the breech-block, every gunner, had carefully sighted for his given range. The captain of the battery, stood on the highest point to the right, and the little lieutenant held on tight behind a small rocky ledge which jutted up between two of the guns. He almost danced with excitement, and his face was wreathed in smiles. In ten minutes he had told us, half a dozen times, in broken English, that it was "a very hot day," but his joy at the prospect of a fight hid his statement, so far as any discrimination to himself was concerned: it had been twice as hot as he would not have cared a rap.

Every gunner stood with upraised hand—the signal that his gun was ready to fire—the lieutenant stood with upraised hand and head just peering over the edge of his stock screen. The captain slowly raised his arm and shouted "Fire!" when, with one roar and some smoke, the guns came kicking back into the arms of the men, who tacked them as a football-player down a man, and the shells went screaming into the enemy's earthworks. Five seconds, ten seconds, fifteen seconds, and the repeated guns belched away at the Russian battery, but before the second and smoke and dust and kicking guns had subsided a second time a screamer came back, just clearing the top of the hill and bursting in the air with a ringing crack, at the same time scattering a ring of shrapnel on the backward hillside.

Now things grew fast and furious: mountain battery against mountain battery—for it was afterward learned that the Russians had here four small guns. It was difficult to say which side had the best of it for the first ten minutes, but, again, the four guns of the Russians fired twice as rapidly as did ours, and the wicked big guns, four hundred yards to the eastward of the Russian small-gun position, took a few cracks at us, when they could spare a moment from the business in their front, on the other side of the big spur. One dragnet from the enemy burst fairly in the face of the plucky Japanese gunners and went down; another man a short distance away picked up a fragment of shell in his back. It was time to take a few minutes' rest and let the Russians forget the accuracy of their aim. Time passed in all these activities, but hours seem like minutes to those engaged, and it was now 11:15 a.m.

The flanking column was pushing ahead. We could see it from behind the ridge, filing away in a long sinuous line, passing a crazy peak here and there, disappearing behind the curve of a hidden hillside, and coming out again on the other side. A company had been detached, and slid downward over the crest of the ridge, and climbed a small sugar-bush eight hundred yards nearer the enemy than the mountain battery's position. There they sat, and waited and fanned, watching for the Russians, who hung doggedly to the forward trenches, to return along the road which they were blocked.

Part of the Third and Fourth regiments were trying to cross the river between Sui-tuan-zu and Chu-jia-pu-tzu, and for two hours the fighting was very severe. The volleys of fire of the Russians seemed to be entirely directed at this point, and a perfect fusillade of individual shooting broke loose. First it would be the Japanese, growing in volume steadily, and then, in a new and more continual note, the Russian rifles would take up the song of death, increasing to a roll which seemed to smother the fire of the Japanese and cause it to die away to a few solitary pie-pans, pie-pans.

The silence of the Japanese small arms provoked a reopening of the Japanese artillery fire against the position, but this, too, would die down under the stream of shells and shrapnel from the rearward Russian batteries. Plainly the Russians were holding their own fairly well in the center.

At noon, as if provoked by the horrible sweltering heat, both combatants seemed to struggle, and almost perfect silence reigned, broken only by the cawing of magpies in the alder and the low-balling his fellow. The Japanese men, tucked under the lee of hillsides, among their little baskets of cooked rice, and, with chopsticks working, ate their lunch. They had come into the field with one day's ration of freshly cooked rice and two days' rations of dry rice.

At two o'clock the flanking part of the left-wing division broke loose two or three miles away, almost in our front, and was answered by the swelling roar of the Russian volleys. A Russian mountain battery was plainly seen to jump on top of the equipments and frantically wave his arms. He ran past way down the front slope of the hill and back again, and then the heads of infantrymen could be seen moving along the line of trenches which led toward the point from which the Japanese fire was coming, and over the crest of a very ragged hill.

After a few minutes' hard small-arm firing, there was silence again, and then the sound broke forth anew, with redoubled fury. The Japanese fire ceased first. They were out, this day, to take the main Russian trenches in flank, but while certain Japanese detachments fought here, there were larger bodies pushing steadily onward, to positions in the rear far.

Before we came that the Russians had withdrawn their mountain battery, and the Japanese shelled the position for several minutes without receiving a reply, when the various little Russian guns woke up suddenly, and sent shells so fast and accurately over the edge of the Japanese battery's position on the hill that the men were glad to lie down out of harm's way for a few minutes, and carry their wounded to points of safety. I saw one gun sputter, but whether it was hit by a shell or kicked over from its own recoil, it is difficult to say positively.

Japanese Soldiers with Pans resting after the Battle of Kwan-sui-tzu

At 2:15 p.m. a Russian four-gun battery and all the gunners came creeping down the steep, zigzagging roadway, from the top of the roof-shaped hill, where they had been firing steadily most of the day on the Japanese infantry and artillery in the center. We thought they were retiring for a few moments, but, instead, they swung around the edge of the hill and made straight for the enemy.

They took a fresh battery position, on a very low ridge which we had not seen before, and five minutes from the time they disappeared, four flashes of fire and one column of dust came out of four embrasures, and they were pouring shrapnel into a Japanese battery in the plain to our right.

From 2:30 until five o'clock the battle waged fever and ferver. Every battery of both sides seemed to be in action at the same time, about three o'clock, and the air buzzed and moaned and screamed in the pain of it.

The Japanese shrapnel covered the Russian batteries with white puffs of smoke, while solid shells rumbled the landscape along the trench-lines until a dozen odd pieces of red and yellow earth were suspended in the air at the same moment. Curiously enough, we could never see the Russian soldiers in these trenches; either they were not there, or they have learned the importance of protecting themselves.

Our little battery could not keep in action. The Russians had scored its range accurately, and, while the Japanese gunners showed their equipments with their shrapnel, the Russians fired the faster. Our mountain battery lost sixteen men during the afternoon.

The left-wing division advanced to the attack several times after three o'clock, but they were driven back or held in check by the Russian individual fire from the high-placed trenches. The Japanese artillery could apparently make no impression on these trenches, and a few minutes devoted for them to shelling the trenches was sure to result in their being overwhelmed with Russian shrapnel well placed on their guns.

Japanese Troops on a Flanking Movement during the Battle of Kwan-sui-tsu

The soldiers are said to have begged their officers to permit them to charge the trenches with bayonets—they could at least die, they exclaimed—but General Hasegawa sent word that they were to wait. It was best, for the spirit of these particular Russians was such, and their position so good, that hardly a third part of the Japanese would have arrived.

Looking up the valley for miles, one saw, both to the right and left, clusters of shrapnel smoke-rings hovering in the air, and from the valley rose fountains of earth and dust, indicating how severe was the artillery duel.

At four o'clock the main body of the center division began advancing on Kwan-sui-tsu, and a little earlier, to their left, the right wing of the tinards was pushing in to the attack.

The center division met a terrific fire from a coastal hill held by one company of Russians, who would not retreat, though pelted with artillery and small-arm fire until the hill was a haze of dust. An hour passed before this hill was taken, by the almost complete annihilation of the Russian company.

The right wing of the left-wing division played their first battery along-side of the Hsueh-tai road in a corn field, where they could see the main positions of the Russians, and opened fire. They occurred here the most sanguinary duel of the day, between two batteries. The Russians had four guns on the mountain ridge, five hundred feet above the plain and overlooking the large valley, and from this vantage of vantage they peppered the battery of the Japanese from the westward it went into action. Our Japanese gun was smothered by a shell, which struck it fairly, and several men were killed. The brave lieutenant of the battery had his head completely covered from his body by another shell, as he stood, with upraised hand, ready to give the signal to fire.

But the Japanese battery, in turn, played havoc with the Russians, bursting shrapnel after shrapnel squarely in their faces, killing and wounding a large number among their gun crews. Their star performance was when a well-aimed shell just skinned the embrasure, smashed the gun wheel, and sent the entire gun spinning out of the pit, down hill. It turned over a dozen times in its flight, and sent fire a shriek, three hundred feet below the gun position, with an unspun shell still in its breast. The Russians took away the firing pin and sights.

The battle of the Russians' left wing was nearly over. Not that

(Continued on page 157.)

A Russian Gun upset by a Japanese Shell in the Battle of Kwan-sui-tsu

Mr. Henry James at Home

By Sydney Brooks

SEVENTY miles from London, on the southeast of Sussex, stands the ancient town of Rye, "Ancient" by royal prescription, for Rye is one of the Cinque Ports whose bounden duty it was to keep the narrow seas clear of pirates, French and Dutch. I know an quarter townlet in old England. It has a history that goes back with scarcely a break for nearly nine hundred years, and no spiritless history either, but vibrant with handsome deeds by land and sea, great victories, and great disasters. Even now, for all its antique peacefulness, there is a whiff of old battles about the place and something more than a whiff in towers and bastion and huge battlemented gateway. A topsyturvy place, of narrow climbing streets and uncarpeted alleys, all rich in spell for the antiquarian explorer, crowded with the sheer charm and delights of immemorial quietude. It is here, in this "past of stranded pride," which the sea has ungraciously abandoned, that Mr. Henry James has made his home, far enough away from the distractions and multitudinous harrows of London life. Here he can work and Rye is peace and peace himself. The last spot, on the whole, where one could expect to find an American entrenched; perhaps, therefore, the first where one would look for Mr. Henry James. No more an American townlet, at any rate, exists in Great Britain. To go from it, as Mr. James has done, to America, most, one would think, he like laying down Matthew Arnold's poems to enter a power-house. There is no higher word to be spoken for Rye than this—that it is all a Jamesite would have it. And this, but with even more emphasis, is all that one can say of his more immediate surroundings. At the top of a twisting cobble street and within a stone's throw of a six-hundred-year-old church, stands Lamb House, a tawny-bricked early Georgian mansion, with the Flemish simplicity and spaciousness of its admirable period. It, too, like all things else in Rye, has its little bit of history. George I., returning from one of his too frequent visits to Hanover, and compelled by a gale to put in at Rye, stayed there for a night—the very night that the Mrs. Lamb of the day chose to give birth to a son. The royal christening head that followed is still an heirloom in the Lamb family. The Jamesite may best conceive the interior of the house by imagining it a combination of Staleybridge and Poynton, with all the virtues that make a house—workings, doors, panels, balustrades, and so on—perfect in form and appearance, and all the appointments, pictures, rugs, and furniture chosen and arranged with the assured instinct of an artist. "My humble possessions," says Mr. James of his Sheraton chairs, bookcases, tables, settees, and buffets, while the eye of the furniture-hunter grows curious, taking in the cool, calm exquisiteness of it all.

Mr. Henry James in the Garden of his Home at Rye

Nor is the outside less pleasing and refreshing—the mint-sauce lawn and flower-beds, the ivied garden wall, the conservatory and the copper-covered house. But it is to a little outbuilding on the right of the house and joined to it by a wall that, from the garden, one's eye turns oftenest. It is the same building that topped the vista as one climbed up the stone street to the house. "The Banqueting Hall," says Mr. James, with a twinkle, apologizing for the name by a reference to the Georgian past. Put now, at any rate, to finer uses, for this one-roomed annex, white-paneled inside, is where Mr. James weaves and dictates his meticulous, incomparable tales. Altogether it will be odd if he finds anything in America during his present visit to remind him of his English home.

The Library at Lamb House, Mr. James's English Home

The Dining-room of Lamb House

The Author's Writing-room of Lamb House

Lamb House from the East—the Building to the Right is the Author's Writing-room

The Author seated on the Porch-step of his House in Rye

VIEWS OF "LAMB HOUSE," THE HOME OF HENRY JAMES, AT RYE, SUSSEX, ENGLAND

The center is referred to the article in Reveries on the opposite page of this issue of the "West-ly" describing the English residence of Henry James. The distinguished author makes his house of Rye, a little town on the sea coast, and, as noted in the "West-ly" at the time of his arrival, it was waiting for him for the past time to a number of years.

Correspondence

COEDUCATION

BRISTOL, N. Y., August 26, 1914.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me a little space for two or three comments on the article entitled "The Education of Women with Men a Failure" that appeared in the Weekly of this date?

First, I desire to correct a misstatement of the author. After telling us that coeducation of the sexes first began at Oberlin College in 1833 he declares that "forty years elapsed before the idea was adopted elsewhere." Colgate College began its coeducation in 1843, and Yale University in 1845. It was open to men and women on equal terms, and graduated a fair proportion of women in the years of its existence, before its removal to Syracuse, it became Syracuse University. The author's foundation of facts is quite defective if this uncorrected necessary to a sample.

As a fellow townsman of the author and one who holds him in kindly esteem, I am surprised that he signs himself "Commissioner of Education at Syracuse, New York." As every one in SYRACUSE knows, Dr. Van de Water is not a Commissioner of Education, and has not been for some years. I presume the idea was that the incumbent of such an office would be popularly thought especially well qualified to speak with authority on college education. But is this quite honest? As a matter of fact, the Commissioner of Education at Syracuse has charge of primary and secondary schools only, and are in no way related to collegiate education. His former commissioners had not in any way whatsoever put him in touch with higher education nor in the slightest degree qualify him to treat of it.

No but as I have the author knows nothing by personal experience or observation of education in colleges. He is a pure theorist. It is true he gave a few lectures on artistic anatomy in the College of Fine Arts of Syracuse University in its early days, but this afforded him no opportunity to study coeducation in an academic college. Of this he knows no more by contact of experience than a four-year-old knows of chess and algebra. It is quite noticeable that the men who attack coeducation with a great show of wisdom and display of so-called facts are almost, without exception, men with no practical knowledge of the subject. I could name several—honorable men—able men, but simply theorists. But this is an age of science, and one fact outweighs any amount of speculative theory.

The writer has been thirty years a teacher in a coeducational college, with excellent results, and an observation. He has carefully studied the problem while actually engaged in the work, and engaged every feature of it, and ought to be able to speak with some authority on how it works in practice in one college at least. His sincere and honest conviction is that nothing is more natural than coeducation of the sexes in college. Nothing out of the ordinary happens in the process. The sexes associate in family life, they associate in primary school and in high school, they associate in business and in society—in fact, everywhere, except in college. There is no good reason for this exception. Why separate them the next year in college more than in the preceding year, the last in the high school?

It would not be at all difficult to meet and refute in detail every point made in the article under consideration, but it would be labor lost, and I call attention to two or three only. The author remarks that women have been made to believe "that if she were educated after the manner of men she could do man's work after the way that men do it." It is very certain that no woman in ten thousand has such a thought or purpose in her mind when she seeks a college education. And, further, it is an entire misconception of the scope and object of a college education. That education is not professional, but cultural, and differs little from the high school course, except that it is more advanced. All men who take the same course do not do the same work nor in the same way. One subsequently desires himself to one profession, another to another, some to business of various kinds. The argument has no validity; in fact, no application at all.

Again, the author objects to coeducation because it stimulates this untoward sentimentality. It is true that young men and women—the last in the world for it is the choicest of every community that go to college—become acquainted in college, and now and then, after graduation a marriage results. Well, why not? Is it not entirely natural? Young people thrown together in families also marry. In my thirty years' experience I have seen a number of such matches, and am happy to say that I have never yet known a mismatch or an unhappy marriage between such college men and women. They know no other way proper for life.

Dr. Van de Water is very fond of picturing the terrible social relations of the sexes during a college course. His imagination runs wild. He assumes that there must be great social disorders, and then, as though that were ground, he goes on to talk about such as well-known facts. But they are not facts. The assumption is unproved, and so far as SYRACUSE is concerned, is, in my knowledge, false. One of the most remarkable facts in education's history is that for the thirty years this university opened its doors in this city there has been no scandal, no serious disorder that have called for serious treatment at the hands of the faculty. It is able to say that in almost any boarding school for girls alone there have been in that time more instances that have called for firmer handling than have occurred here. At times sensational reports appear in the papers—and of immorality, but they are in fact—excesses—but these are simply the efforts of the reporters to print a stirring story. But our author accepts as gospel truth all such fabrications. A little honest investigation on his part would in every case show the absurdity of his gullibility. The usual harmless and simple incident can be written up in such a way as to create a sensation, and that is just what the average reporter is always eager to do. The sensational stories in the Chicago papers about men and doings at the University of Chicago and the Northwestern University, every one now understands are not solely in sensational reporting that does not hesitate to invent facts.

Finally, the college world is challenged to produce a fair body of young men and women, one more orderly, more honorable, or more devoted to high ideals than the 250 students that graduate the undergraduate body of Syracuse University. Nothing has occurred in the history of the institution to which we do not enter the most searching scrutiny of every parent.

Coeducation is here to stay, and for the simple reason that no man can bring any valid indictment against it.

I am, sir,

FRANK SNAPEL,

Dean of College of Liberal Arts, Syracuse University.

FORTYNATE MR. POTTER

New York, September 12, 1914

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I enjoyed your witty comments on my New York Herald article, "Round the Mind of Judge Parker," and the letter of Frances Safford in the last issue of the Weekly on "Paul Potter's Fall in Chevreuse."

Since the original article and your own comments were printed I have received many letters expressing surprise that Paul Potter should be a painter as well as a writer of plays. The writers state that while they have seen his version of "Trilby," and his "Conquerors," the latter produced by Charles Frohman at the Empire and have enjoyed his libretto to "The Schoolgirl," none running at Daly's, the Herald's and your own reproduction of "The Young Bull" was their first intimation that he could paint. Furthermore, they express indignation that one of his pictures has been acquired by the Metropolitan Museum of Art, but attribute this to that institution's notorious neglect of American genres.

However, I met Potter the other day, and he tells us the museum has been won by the fame which has come to his "Young Bull" through yours and the Herald's efforts, to order a painting of him, and he now is at work on a large canvas. Needless to say it is one of those unusual subjects, in which even he excels, and I understood him to say that it will be entitled "The Democratic Donkey." He added that it would show a scene at Democratic national headquarters, but he did not go into details.

Potter also informed me that Charles Frohman has commissioned him to paint all the scenery for his next dramatic production. Thanks to us, this talented man now has his hands full of work.

I am, sir,

GUYTON KORM.

RAISING A FAMILY—WHY NOT ADOPT A CHILD?

San Diego, Cal., September 8, 1914

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—In a recent issue of Harper's I noticed a letter from "a modern mother" in which she justifies American parents for having so few children—in most cases on the ground that they "can't afford."

She, however, makes the following allusion to people who yearn for children and apparently could afford:

"The world never knows how many childless couples long for a little one."

"The world never knows of the misery who, having one or two, have for more, but are denied it."

Now, sir, these cases are deserving of no sympathy whatever. They are thousands of childless couples who are abandoned by human parents, or maybe left on the hands of a mother who can't attend to them. Why, then, don't more couples adopt children? Any one who really loves children could never become so much attached to an adopted child as if it were their own, and I am satisfied that the risk of hereditary evil traits can easily be counteracted by the influence of good environment upon children taken young enough—in fact, any child under ten can be moulded into a good man or woman.

I am, sir,

F. A. BINSKY.

AN APPRECIATIVE READER

BRATTLEBORO, September 22, 1914

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—Enclosed find one dollar for which please send me the Weekly for a period for which that will pay. I have been reading the paper at a public library this summer, and have become convinced that your articles relative to the exposure of the Weekly are not out of reach of the library I wish to get the paper till next election. My interest in these editorials is not due to any regard with the editor. I am a Roswellton of the Roswellton. My admiration for Theodore Roosevelt has transcended any respect that I may have for a mere party. Yet understanding any possible difference from the editor I like what he writes.

I am, sir,

ALBERT E. WHITE.

Digitized by Google

you, as many a man has done for his wife, only where they had succeeded I had failed. If I thought anything at all—" he said, with an air of hesitation.

"Well!" said Millie.

"I thought you might have expressed your contempt with a little less of unkindness, or perhaps have hidden it altogether. You see, I was not having an easy time in New York, and your letters made it very much harder."

"Oh, Tony," she said, in a low voice of self-reproach. She was sitting with her hands clasped in front of her upon the table-cloth, her forehead puckered, and in her eyes a look of great pain.

"Never mind that," he replied; and he resumed his story. "I saw then quite distinctly that with each letter which you received from me, each new instalment of my record of failure—for each letter was just that, wasn't it?—your contempt grew. I was determined that if I could help it your contempt should not enshrine all our two lives. So I ceased to write. For the same reason I stayed away, even after my father had died. Had I come back then I should have come back a failure, proved and self-confessed. And your scorn would have stayed with you. My business hereof was a destiny in, in spite to you that, after all, I was some good—if not at money-making, at something else. I resolved that we should not live together again until I could come to you and say: 'You have no right to despise me. Here's the proof.'"

Millie was burning now, even so Tony had learned a minute ago. All that he said in her was utterly surprising and strange. He had been thinking of her, then, all the time while he was away! Indifference was in no way the reason of his absence.

"Oh, why did you not write this to me?" she said. "It need not have been a long letter, since you were unwilling to write. But just this you might have written. It would have been better, kinder"—and she passed upon the word, uttering it with hesitation and a shy deprecating smile, as though aware that she had no claim upon his kindness. "It would have been kinder than just to leave here, not knowing where you were, and thinking what I did."

"It is true," said Tony. "I might have written. But would you have believed me if I had? No."

"Then you might have come to me," she urged. "Three—just for five minutes—to tell me what you meant to do."

"I might," Tony agreed; "in fact, I very nearly did. I was under the windows of the house in Berkeley Square one night." And Millie started.

"Yes, you were," she said, slowly.

"Yes, I knew it the next day." And she added, "I wish now, I think, that you had come in that night."

"Suppose that I had," said Tony; "suppose that I had told you of my fine plan, you would have had me faith in it. You would merely have thought: 'Here's another folly to be added to the rest.' Your contempt would have been increased, that's all."

It was quite strange to Millie Stretton that there ever could have been a time when she had despised him. She saw him sitting now in front of her, quiet and stern; she remembered her own terror when he burst into the room, when he flung Colburn howling through the windows, when he turned at last towards her.

"We have been strangers to one another."

"Yes," he replied; "I did not know you. I should never have left you—now I understand that. I trusted you very blindly, but I did not know you."

Millie lowered her eyes from his face. "Not if you," she answered. "What did you do when you went away that night from Berkeley Square?"

"I enlisted in the Foreign Legion in Algeria."

Millie raised her head again with a start of surprise.

"Serving was my trade, you see. It was the one profession of which I had a little of that expert knowledge which is necessary nowadays if you are to make your living."

Something of his life in the Foreign Legion Tony now told her. He spoke deliberately, since a light was beginning dimly to 1854-1904

WALTHAM WATCHES

ALWAYS FAITHFUL

The WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY was the first company in America to make watches, the first to be organized, and at the present time is the first in the quality and volume of its product.

For sale by all Jewelers

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY,
WALTHAM, MASS.

Read Blaikie's HOW TO GET STRONG and How to Stay So
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

"Yes, we use

BAKER'S BREAKFAST COCOA

Samples of other cocoas have been sent us, but when we try them we always find that Baker's—the genuine Baker's with the chocolate girl trade-mark—is the best."

WALTER BAKER & CO. LTD.

Established 1780 Dorchester, Mass.

41 HIGHEST AWARDS IN EUROPE AND AMERICA

shine through the darkness of his perplexities. Of a set purpose he described to her the arduous perils of active service and the monotony of the entrenchments. He was proud that she should understand in the spirit and in the letter the life which for her sake he had led. He related his expedition to the Fingy ones, his march into the Sahara under Tavernay. He took from his pocket the medals which he had won, and laid them upon the table—each before her.

"Look at them," he said; "I earned them. These are mine. I earned them for you; and while I was earning them what were you doing?"

Millie listened and looked. Wonder gave upon her. It was for her that he had labored and endured and succeeded! His story was a revelation to her. Never had she dreamed that a man would so strive for any woman. She had lived so long among the little things of the world—the little emotions, the little passions, the little prejudices and rivalries, the little aims, the little methods of attaining them, that only with great difficulty could she realize a simpler and a wider life. She was overwhelmed now. Pride and humiliation fought within her—pride that Tony had so striven for her in silence and obscurity, his mission because she had fallen so short of his example. It was her way to feel in superlatives at any crisis of her destiny, but surely she had a justification now.

"I never knew—I never thought! Oh, Tony!" she exclaimed, twisting her hands together as she sat before him.

"I became a sergeant," he said. "Then I brought back the remnants of the geographical expedition to the Sahara." He taxed his memory for the vivid details of that terrible retreat. He compelled her to realize something of the dumb, implacable hostility of the Sahara, to see, in the evening against the setting sun, the mounted figures of the Touaregs, and to understand that the day's march had not shaken them off. She seemed to be on the march herself, wondering whether she would live out the day, or, if she survived that, whether she would live out the night.

"But you succeeded!" she cried, clinging to the fact that they were both here in France, with the murmur of the Mediterranean in their ears. "You came back."

"Yes, I came back. One morning I marched my men through the gate of Ouzgla—and what were you doing upon that day?"

Talking, perhaps, with Lionel Calton, in one of those unfrequented public places with which London abounds! Millie could not tell. She sat there and compared Lionel Calton with the man who was before her. Showers of the kind of talk she was wont to hold with Lionel Calton occurred to her. Riling her with shame, she was glad to think that when Tony led his broken weary force through the gate of Ouzgla Lionel Calton had not been with her—had indeed been far away in Chile. She studiously placed her hands before her face and burst into tears.

"Oh, Tony," she whispered, in an abatement of humiliation, "Oh, Tony."

"By that humdrum march," he went on, "I gained my commission. That was what I aimed at all the while, and I had earned it at the last. Look!"

He took from his pocket the letter which his colonel had handed to him at Ain-Sefra. He had carefully treasured it all this while. He held it out to her and made her read.

"You see?" he said. "A commission won from the ranks in the hardest service known to soldiers, won without advantage of name, or friends, or money. Won just by merit. That is what I strive for. If I could, even that I could come back to you with a great pride. I should be no longer the man who was no good. You yourself might even be proud of me. I used to dream of that—to dream of something else."

His voice softened a little, and the smile for a moment relaxed the severity of his face.

"Of what?" she asked.

"Of that there among the sand hills, under the stars at night. I used to dream that we might perhaps get hold again of the little house in Deveney Street, where we were so happy together once. We might pretend almost that we had lived there all the time."

He spoke in a voice of great longing, and Millie was touched to the heart. She looked at Tony through her tears. There was a great longing still within her at this moment. Was that little house in Deveney Street still a possibility? She did not presume to hope so much; but she wished that she could have hoped. She pressed the letter which she held against her breast; she would have loved to hold it to her lips, but that again she did not dare to do.

"At all events you did succeed," she said. "I shall be glad to know that. I shall always be glad—whatever happens now."

"But I did not succeed," Tony replied. "I earned the commission, yes—I never held it. That letter was given to me one Monday by my colonel at Ain-Sefra. You mentioned a song a minute ago, do you remember? I had lost the associations of that song. I laughed when you mentioned it, and you were surprised. I laughed because when I received that letter I took it away with me, and that song, with all that it had ever meant, came back to my mind. I lay beneath the palm-trees, and I looked across the water past the islands and I saw the lights of the yachts in the bay. I was on the deck, again, high above the sea, the lighted windows of the house were behind me. I heard your voice. Oh, I had got you altogether back that day," he exclaimed, with a cry. "It was as though I held your hands and looked into your eyes. I went back to the barracks to write to you, and as I went some one brought me news of you to wake me out of my dreams."

Just for a moment Millie wondered who it was who had brought the news; but the next words which Tony spoke drove the question from her mind.

A few more weeks and I should have held that commission, I might have left the Legion, leaving behind me many friends and an honored name. As it was I had to desert—I deserted that night."

He spoke quite simply; but, nevertheless, the words fell with a shock upon Millie. She uttered a low cry:—"Oh, Tony!" she said.

"Yes," he said, with a nod of the head. "I incurred that disgrace. I shall be ashamed of it all my life. Had I been caught it might have meant an ignominious death; in any case, it would have meant years of prison—and I should have deserved those years of prison."

Millie shut her eyes in horror. Everything else that he had told her—his sufferings, his perils—all seemed of little account

He had his triumph then. . . . His triumph was not in his thoughts

Drawn by William Charles Lawrence

inside this crowning risk, this crowning act of sacrifice. It was not merely that he had risked a shameful death or a shameful imprisonment. Millie was well aware that his whole nature and character must be in revolt against the act itself. Desecration! It implied dishonesty, untruth, deceit, cowardice—just those qualities, indeed, which she knew Tony most to hate, which perhaps she had rather despised him for lacking. No man would have been more severe in the punishment of a deserter than Tony himself. Yet he had deserted, and upon her account. And he sat there telling her of it quietly, as though it were the most insignificant action in the world. He might have escaped the consequences—he would certainly not have escaped the shame.

But Millie's cup of remorse was not yet full.

"Yet I cannot see that I could do anything else. Tonight proves to me that I was right, I think. I have come very quickly, yet I am only just in time." There was a long stain of wine upon the table-cloth beneath his eyes. There Callon had upset his glass upon Tony's entrance.

"Yes, it was time that I returned," he rejoined. "One way or another a burden of distress led to be borne—if I stayed, just as certain as if I came away; I saw that quite clearly. So I came away." He forebore to say that now the disaster fell only upon his shoulders that she was saved from it. But Millie understood, and in her heart she thanked him for his forbearance. "But it was laid on me, I think," he said. "You see, even now I am on French soil, and subject to French laws."

And Millie, upon that, started up in alarm.

"What do you mean?" she asked, breathless.

"There has been a disturbance here tonight, has there not? Suppose that the manager of this restaurant has sent for a policeman!"

With a swift movement Millie gathered up the medals and held them close in her clenched hands.

"Oh, it does not need those to convict me; my name would be enough. Let my name appear and there's a deserter from the Foreign Legion laid by the heels in France. All the time we have been talking here I have sat expecting that door to open behind me."

Millie caught up a lace wrap which lay open on a sofa. She had the look of a hunted creature. She spoke quickly and feverishly, in a whisper.

"Oh, why did not you say this at once! Let us go!"

"No," said he, with his eyes fixed upon her. "I have given you an account of how I have been apart. The years during which we have been apart."

"He waited for her answer in suspense. To this question all his words had been steadily leading: for this reason he had dwelt upon memory, by memory alone truthfully and without reverse the story of her years."

"If she did, why, that dim light which shone amid the darkness of his perplexities might perhaps shine a little brighter. He uttered his question. Millie bowed her head, not answered."

"I will."

"Oh, don't, then, and tell me now."

"Oh, no," she exclaimed. "Not here! It is not safe. As we go back to Ess I will tell you everything."

A look of relief came upon Tony's face. He rose and touched the bell.

A waiter appeared.

"I will pay the bill," he said.

The waiter brought the bill and Tony discharged it.

"The problem," M. Callon, the waiter said, "A doctor has been. He has a considerable time before he is able to be moved."

"Indeed?" said Tony, with indifference.

He walked with his side out of the little vestibule. A single light faintly illuminated it. They crossed it to the door and went up the winding drive on to the road. The night was dry and clear and warm. There was no moon. They walked in the pure twilight of the stars round the gorge towards Ess.

To be Continued.

DuPont Smokeless

Is made by a company which has been in existence over 100 years in America for its Powder

E. I. DuPont Co., Wilmington, Del.

The GAME Sherlock Holmes

THE LATEST
LAUGHABLE, EXCITING
ENTIRELY NEW.

SOLD EVERYWHERE. PRICE 50c a PACK
PARKER BROTHERS, INC.
NEW YORK

Copyright Notice

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS
OFFICE OF THE REGISTER OF COPYRIGHTS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Class A. M. No. 91780—In will be re-registered, Third on the 14th day of June, 1904, Mr. Mary E. Henderson, of Washington, D. C., has deposited in this office the title of a book, the title of which is in the following words, to-wit:
"Practical Locking and Throwing Filing, a treatise containing practical patterns on in cooking, in the construction and setting of dishes, and in the technique of modes of preparing of breakfast, lunch and dinner, by Mrs. Mary E. Henderson, Illustrated," the title of which she claims as proprietor in conformity with the laws of the United States, respecting copyrights.
(Signed) Harper & Row, Editors of Copyright.
By deposit in the Library of Congress, at Washington, D. C., on the 14th day of June, 1904.

BOND & LILLARD
WHISKEY
IS THE BEST

MOTOR BOATS

LAUNCHES, STEAM AND SAIL, TUGS, ROW BOATS, CANOES

SPEED—PLEASURE—BUSINESS

Beautiful, Reliable, Economical, Simple, Safe
In design, in style, in the quality of the hull and in the construction of the engine, the motor boat is a RACINE BOAT MFG. CO. (Inc.) 173, MUSKOGEE, ALA.

THE ONLY SALESROOMS IN GREATER NEW YORK FOR THE CELEBRATED

SOHMER
PIANOS

ARE LOCATED IN THE SOHMER BUILDING
FIFTH AVENUE CORNER 234 STREET
THE "SOHMER" HEADS THE LISTS OF THE HIGHEST GRADE PIANOS

The Inventions of the Idiot

by
JOHN KENDRICK BANGS

Author of "A Home Visit to the Gods"

The Idiot is one of Mr. Bangs's most successful and best-known characters. In this book he has all sorts of impossible schemes for bettering things generally. The book is full of good-humored fun, and upholds Mr. Bangs's established reputation as a humorist.

Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

The Hunting of the Snark

AND OTHER POEMS

By Lewis Carroll

PETER NEWELL ILLUSTRATED EDITION

This book includes all of Lewis Carroll's poems, illustrated with many full-page drawings by Peter Newell, and brought out uniform with the Newell illustrated edition of "Through the Looking-Glass," and "Alice in Wonderland." The volume is handsomely bound, and makes a new nonsense-verse classic, with pictures such as only Peter Newell can paint.

Six, Dashed Edges, Gift Top, with Over-Cover of Green and Gold. In a Box. $1.00 net (postage extra)

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, N. Y.

A RECORD DAY AT THE WORLD'S FAIR—CROWDS AT THE EXPOSITION ON
"ST. LOUIS" DAY

"St. Louis Day," which was recently celebrated at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, was remarkable for its record of attendance—the largest since the Fair was opened. Four hundred and four thousand persons visited the Exposition, and the number of admissions received was the largest ever recorded. The day was also notable for the fact that on the same day of the Columbian Exposition, Bang 80, Louis business houses closed their establishments on this day to allow employees to attend the Exposition.

Mark Twain's Six Funniest Books

Tom Sawyer

Innocents Abroad

Vol. 1

Innocents Abroad

Vol. 2

Hudd'nhead Wilson

Roughing It

Vol. 1

Roughing It

Vol. 2

Six Beautifully Bound Books

With Illustrations by E. W. Kemble, Peter Newell, B. West Clinedinst, and J. G. Brown

Of all the books of the great humorist these are the ones that have made his name a household word wherever the English language is spoken.

Their Fun is Immortal—Worth Reading Twice

This is the first time that these volumes have been put within the reach of any but the rich, and published in a uniform low-priced set.

Everybody Can Afford Them

OUR OFFER—We will send you the entire set of six volumes, charges prepaid, on receipt of $1.00. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $1.00 every month for 11 months. In order to keep you in touch with us during these months, on receipt of your request for these books we will enter you as a subscriber for one year, without additional cost to you, for either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, HARPER'S BAZAR, or THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. In writing, state which periodical you want.

Harper & Brothers, Publishers, New York City

You Value Your House and Insure its Contents.

You Value Your Life, too—
Then why don't You Insure it? Its Loss Would be Far Greater to Your Family.

Write for Information of Policies—Dept. T

The Prudential

INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA.

JOHN F. DRYDEN, President.

Home Office: NEWARK, N. J.

"Visit The Prudential's Exhibit, Palace of Education, World's Fair, St. Louis."

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER BROTHERS

NEW YORK

ST
4
M

Copyright 1894 by Harper & Brothers

RESULTS are what tell—

THE HOMER W. HEDGE COMPANY
INCORPORATED
ADVERTISING AGENTS

SUITEABLE BUILDING
109 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

PUBLISHING ASSOCIATED SUNDAY MAGAZINES
September 22d, 1904.

GENTLEMEN—For some time we have been telling, through our advertising columns, of the merits of PANTAGON. I feared that it might create considerable interest in our office. We take pleasure in saying that the same interest is due you in an advertising proposition—that you are high grade, not mediocre, are well received and very well.

You may also be interested to learn that of all the list of persons, high class mediums used by us for this advertisement during the last year, the largest number of our publications used.

We find you may naturally continue to down-drop satisfactory results for your clients, and with hearty appreciation of the good work kindly done, we are,

Yours very truly,

THE HOMER W. HEDGE COMPANY,
HOMER W. HEDGE.

C. B. & C.

THE ASSOCIATED SUNDAY MAGAZINES

A Part of EACH SUNDAY'S ISSUE of

THE CHICAGO HERALD EXPOSURE

THE ST. LOUIS REPUBLICAN

THE PHILADELPHIA PRESS

THE PITTSBURGH POST

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE

THE BOSTON POST

For advertising rates address:

HENRY DRISLER, Advertising Manager

31 Union Square - - - New York
Marquette Building, Chicago

A Pocket Revolver with a Grip

Other "Pocket Revolvers" fail in one of the most important features of an arm. There is no grip—the handle is too small to afford a firm and at the same time an easy grasp.

The COLT NEW POLICE REVOLVER has all the features of any pocket arm AND THE GRIP.

Colt's Patent Fire Arms Mfg. Co.,

HARTFORD, CONN., U. S. A.

London Office, 26 Glasshouse St., London, W.

Catalog mailed on request.

THE GIVERS

BY

MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title-story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS - NEW YORK CITY

Sir Mortimer

By

MARY JOHNSTON

Author of "To Have and To Hold"

THE love of Sir Mortimer for the fair Damaris Sedley, a lady-in-waiting, holds unwavering course through a narrative alive with stirring incidents of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh, when all England loved, sang, adventured, and fought, in the flush of youthful power. Herein is a love story of uncommon charm cast among stirring scenes—love in the lap of adventure, set forth with rare imaginative power.

Readers of "To Have and To Hold" will welcome in this tale of love and gallantry the distinct advance Miss Johnston has made upon her former success. The romance is instinct with new life and color, like the golden days with which it deals.

"The witchery of romance pervades its scenes, and once in the grasp of the story the reader will be swept along the current to the end."—Chicago Chronicle

"Her thousands of admiring readers will thank her for the book—a strong, vigorous, original story, with honor as the theme."—Sprague Herald

"May be classed among the gems of modern novels."—Livingston News

"She has reproduced in a wonderful manner the time of Elizabeth, with all its greatness and its littleness."—N. Y. World

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, October 15, 1904

NO. 191

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

THE LION-TAMER

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XXVIII

No. 295

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER 15, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Iouma, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post office as second-class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO HARM!

However the election goes, the campaign will have been useful to the country. It is serving pretty well the important purpose of political education, which is the great compensation for the trouble and expense of electing a President every four years. If President ROOSEVELT be elected he will have a country which knows his record better than it did before, and which contains thousands of informed observers, on the lookout for manifestations of the tendencies they have learned to look for in an administration of which he is the head. No President can continue long to act counter to an aroused public opinion. This campaign has at least afforded to intelligent voters the means by which opinions may be formed. There have been some excellent speeches and some excellent letters on the Democratic side. Whether the points that they have made have been brought home to the mass of the people we do not yet know. But the attentive readers all over the land have taken note of them and pondered them.

If the Democrats are again to be the Opposition, they will certainly constitute a stronger, more intelligent, more attentive, and definite Opposition because of the work of the campaign. Such letters as that of Mr. SCHURZ to the Parker Independent Club, such speeches as Mr. STREETER's, such deliberances as those of the Lawyers' Constitution Club, and of Mr. CURTIS to the Parker College Men's Club, have a great deal of merit in them, and we believe that much of it is being digested. If the campaign could be kept going hard—harder than it has gone yet—for another six months, it might be possible to make a vital issue of tariff revision. For there is an issue there, and it has got to be tackled out, unless the surgery of its friends can save the drooping patient. Whoever wins, the very important concern of economy in governmental expenditures is bound to get more attention. More votes than before will insist upon knowing why the annual cost of administering our government should exceed half a billion dollars. Even tariff taxation can be felt if the victim knows enough to trace his pains to their true source.

Commenting upon the probable political effect of Mr. ROOSEVELT's "important and defiant letter" three weeks ago, we expressed the admiration evoked by his daring, but questioned the wisdom of his tone, and ventured a prediction that, when the first outburst-on should have subsided, the prodium would "swing back quite a little way." This has happened. When the letter was written Republican certainty was at top notch. The movement of the opposition was timid and the ammunition was so scattered as to produce no effect. One element was making tariff reform the issue, another the Philippines, a third the Constitution, one even the race problem, and so on. But Mr. ROOSEVELT, in his letter, invited a direct personal attack, and got it. The leading journals opposing his candidacy, along with the writers and orators from SCHURZ to STANLEY, promptly dropped the minor issues upon which they had been wasting so much energy and concentrated a savage response to the defiant invitation. Mr. ROOSEVELT made himself the issue in his letter, and it will be his personality, not his party nor his party's policy, that will be passed upon at the polls. Frankly, although doubting, as we did, the wisdom of departure from the line marked out by Mr. ROSS in Chicago, we are glad to see this. Mr. ROOSEVELT is bigger than his party because he has completely subjugated it, and he is better than the Senatorial clique which formerly dominated it. Indeed, as we have observed many times during the past year, he is its chief asset. He has ideals, even though at times in his zealous pursuit of big game he lets them rest temporarily on the party shelf. And what he does, he does in the open. There is no concealment or attempt at concealment of purpose or method. Contrasted with the guilefulness of the secretive, selfish oligarchy under the direction of Senator ALDRICH, the ingenuities of ROOSEVELT are refreshing and healthful. Moreover, it is fitting that he should be recognized as the issue, because he is. The party and the oligarchy are in the hollow of his hand. Never having been committed of the former as an aggregation of special interests and always having detested the latter as representatives thereof, we consider it a happy circumstance that at last they have not only met their match, but found a master.

The chief accusation made in response to Mr. ROOSEVELT's invitation is of insincerity in that he proclaims a determination to check and, if need be, antagonize the trusts, while, at the same time, his representative, Mr. CORTLEYON, makes terms with them. Mr. JOSEPH PLETZER makes the first charge in eight columns of infantry. It is impressive, although chiefly deductive, and can have but little effect while the Wald's (Clyde) Bay tale to the same end remains disavowed. His chief point is that nearly six hundred days have elapsed since the President got from Congress an appropriation of $500,000 for use in determining the legal status of the big corporations, and nothing has been done. The deduction is that the appropriation was obtained to be utilized as a menace by Mr. CORTLEYON, then Secretary of Commerce and Labor and now chairman of the National Committee, but not to be touched in case the corporations should make suitable responses to requests for campaign subscriptions. In any case, the fund lies idle. To that extent, Mr. PLETZER stands upon an indubitable fact. Anybody is at liberty to draw whatever inference he finds most satisfying.

The Times is more explicit. On Saturday, October 1, it published a two-column, double-headed editorial under the head-line, "Baying a President." After denouncing the President's transference of Mr. CORTLEYON from the Department of Commerce to the chairmanship of the National Committee as "a public scandal, a national disgrace," it proceeds as follows:

Concrete instances are more impressive than statements of general principle. Here is one: Chairman CORTLEYON goes to one of the officers of a large corporation, and informs him that the Republican National Committee expects a substantial contribution from his company. The officer in question is surprised; he is not of Mr. ROOSEVELT's party; neither he nor his corporation have been mentioned to public with politics; he asks for time to think it over. In the solitude of his office his thoughts run in this wise: "I do not want to give money to the Republican National Committee. But I am trustee of the interests of the stockholders of this corporation. I may soon have to appear before this man as a representative of my corporation in a matter affecting its business, as to which he will have, if not official discretion, at least very great personal and official influence, which I would dislike to have used against me. I cannot let my personal disinclinations stand in the way of the company's interests. I will make this forced contribution to Mr. CORTLEYON's fund."

The Times then definitely declares that "Chairman CORTLEYON will readily recall many concrete instances of this nature; it is typical."

In most cases, the Times says, the demand is met gladly upon the belief that the President will not attack a trust that has landed his former private secretary "a great check" to further his own ambition. It continues:

One of the chief corporation men in this city who is now gathering in money for Mr. Roosevelt was his letter for ten months ago. It was the death of HANNA that wrought the change. After that they could not beat Mr. ROOSEVELT. They resolved to buy him. They thank now that they are buying him with the great sums they fling into his campaign chest.

It closes with a declaration that Mr. CORTLANDT's "pressure in the office of a corporation amenable to Federal discipline is a scandal, an implied invitation to bribe the Executive, an offer of immunity from prosecution for pay, a degradation of the Presidential office through its accredited agents, a humiliation put upon a sensitive people, a stain upon the honor of THOMAS ROOSEVELT."

The Tribune, recognizing the seriousness of the accusation, which it describes as "an attack upon the morality and integrity of President ROOSEVELT," insists that the Times should not stop half-way, but "urges it to the public to make a complete exposure of any such transaction." It pointedly adds:

Who is the man who in this "concrete instance" was so exposed and victimized? What are some of the many other "concrete instances" of extortion of which this is said to be typical? If the President and Mr. Cortlandt are guilty as charged, the people should know it specifically and have an opportunity to pass intelligent judgment upon the evidence. If this is mere reckless insinuation, shamelessly uttered without any proof, the people should likewise have the opportunity to pass appropriate judgment upon the malicious insinuation. What concrete evidence of any "concrete instances" has the Times to offer? Has it any, or is it simply talking at random?

We heartily endorse the position of the Tribune. The Times has no moral right to induce its readers to believe that the President is a public criminal unless it has the evidence to substantiate its assertion, and is prepared to produce it. To-day and until it does so its reputation for truthfulness must rest under a cloud. It will not suffice to invite Mr. Cortlandt to "deny it if he dare," or to defy him to prove that it is not so. The burden of proof rests upon the Times when it accuses the President of a crime as heinous, brazenly speaking, as the World charged him with when it declared that he had definitely and personally betrayed his party and his country. The World still permits its readers to believe that it considers President ROOSEVELT a traitor and a liar. Can the Times afford to do likewise? Its own, not the President's, use Mr. Cortlandt's character is in question, and must there remain until it confirms or repudiates its accusation.

Needless to say, to those of us who had hoped that this campaign might be conducted upon high lines, even with good nature and an occasional splash of humor, such occurrences are most disheartening. But Mr. ROOSEVELT would be taken at his word and be held strictly accountable for everything done after he uttered his defiance was, as we have said, to be expected. That, at some stage of the proceedings, the appointment of Mr. CORTLANDT to be chairman of the National Committee would evoke severe criticism he doubtless anticipated, but probably felt that he could rely upon the previous good repute of both himself and his friend to break the force of the blow. That it was a mistake he must now clearly perceive. It could not have been otherwise. The situation was too delicate. The reputation of the Angel Gabriel would have suffered under such stress. It is true that the World made a pitiable exhibition of itself, and quite likely the Times will lift its head. But the fact is that the aroused suspicion will not down. The public is bewildered, uncertain. While requiring positive evidence of the truth of the reports, it cannot and does not ignore that which is circumstantial. Every mail brings in our table letters of personal inquiry from honestly troubled readers of this journal who think we ought to be able to find and willing to tell the truth. But we cannot. All we do know positively is that the first charge of this nature, brought by the Philadelphia Public Ledger, to the effect that Mr. Cortlandt had visited the leading manufacturers of that city and demanded a heavy contribution, had absolutely no foundation in fact.

Whether or not Mr. CORTLANDT personally has sought contributions, with, of course, the approval of President ROOSEVELT, we cannot say. There seems to be little necessity for his doing so. It is a fact, we believe, that the corporations as a whole are contributing freely and voluntarily, although not in great amounts, to the Republican campaign fund, and are carefully refraining from lending aid to the opposition. We also believe it to be true that a large proportion of them are doing this, not because they want to, but because they dare not do otherwise.

Nobody, so far as we have observed, has ventured to accuse either the President or Mr. CORTLANDT of having promised immunity to any one. They simply are convinced that Mr. ROOSEVELT is sure to be elected anyhow, that they could not beat him if they tried, and that he is likely to feel more kindly disposed towards them if they help along the good work. So they send their good money to Mr. CORTLANDT or Mr. BLISS or Mr. ALDEN, and send word to Mr. BLUMONT and Mr. RYAN that they needn't come around. The money is accepted, of course, gratefully, just as it would be by the Democratic managers, and we dare say somebody enters up the names and amounts in a book for future reference. That, according to such information as we have at hand, is about what is going on. Maybe some of the contributors require a little urging; it would be surprising if they didn't. Whether Mr. CORTLANDT does any of the urging we do not know. If he does, he will be sorry some day that he did. But when asked whether we believe that GEORGE B. CORTLANDT, with the connivance of THOMAS ROOSEVELT, has engaged in a great blackmailing crusade to satisfy the latter's lust of power, we declare with all the emphasis at our command that we do not. If they have, those who have been making these charges will experience difficulty in finding some one who will tell. This they have not done as yet—and they deserve no further consideration until they do. By "they" we wish it understood—we mean more particularly the New York Times, the New York World, and the Brooklyn Eagle.

There isn't he two ROOSEVELTS, as Mr. CARL SCHURER declares, because if there were, the other one would have been nominated for Vice-President.

Secretary PERCIVAL finally came back to Washington and registered the desire of the great and good father in the case of Clear Importer vs. Clear Importation. This differed from the pickled sheepskins affair in that the pockets of two parties, instead of the political prospects of the faithful LORRE, were concerned. The circumstances were these: It has been the custom of the Treasury Department to paste upon the cover of each box containing imported cigars a light-reddish stamp which evidenced primarily that the import duty had been paid and incidentally that the cigars had really been imported. Manufacturers of domestic cigars protested against this custom of long standing and demanded an immediate ending, for the reason, as their spokesman brusquely declared, that "if we don't get it changed before election, we never will." The importers opposed a change naturally. Thereupon, this being a political year, the President took the matter in hand himself in order to see that perfect justice be recorded all parties, irrespective of the views of presumably incompetent subordinates. The domesticists insisted that this stamp really constituted an advertisement, which served a discriminatory purpose against their Connecticut product, and should be changed to a less glaring color and stuck on the bottom of the box. Moreover, the importer was a Trust, anyway, and a clutch in the nostrils of the people. The great and good father—blessings of Allah, etc.—mindful of the mandate contained in the Constitution of the realm that the imperative duty of deciding where the stamp should be stuck devolved upon him and him alone, struck a balance and declared that it should go on the bottom, out of sight, though the color should not be changed. Both parties to the controversy seem to have acquiesced politely in this sagacious determination—the one because it had profited by striking while the iron seethed, the other because, although a Trust continued by men, it was permitted to breathe a while longer.

Whereupon we who occasionally smoke imported cigars murmured greatly. Why should the domestic manufacturers have insisted upon hiding the stamp exact for the purpose of enhancing the sale of their own goods by deceiving the purchaser! And why, if the importer, even though a Trust, has really paid the absurdly large duty upon his product, should he be deprived of whatever advantage might accrue from the conveyance of that information to the consumer in the manner established by usage? And why, in reconditioning a custom which has maintained so many years, should not the interests of those who do the smoking and pay the piper and get deceived or not, in proportion to their willingness to get out their glasses and scrutinize the bottom of a box, have been considered? And why hurry Secretary PIERCE back to Washington to register the decree forthwith? Was there vital necessity for so great haste in the determination of a matter of real importance to various millions of men who are willing to pay for what they get, but would like to feel reasonably certain, without being compelled to do detective service, that they get what they pay for? Is this Protection or Rascality? But, brethren, ticklish times are upon us. Let us, therefore, forbear!

Cheer up! The pullback is off the lips of the official herald of the Treasury Department. He can see three dollars in the goal for September.

We are haunted by pickled sheepskins. The Boston Commercial Bulletin also has them on the brain, and rudely takes us to task for having made the following assertion:

The pickled sheepskins all cut down. The Boston Commercial Bulletin has run in earth the thoughtless official who made a ruling in conformity with his judgment without regard for political exigencies. Assistant Secretary C. H. KERR is the scapegoat person, and, speaking for the Massachusetts manufacturers who know from past experience what a tariff is between "friends," the Bulletin demands his instant dismissal on the broad ground of incompetency.

The Bulletin finds this statement not only "erroneous in fact," but "extraordinary in expression," which pains us, and is surprised that "such a highly respectable paper" should have made it. It then goes on in the course of a rambling column to say that the ruling was "in defiance of the evidence," and "its correction is not a matter of politics, but simply a return to established law." That may be; we don't know. What we do know is that HENRY CUNY wanted it changed, and the President acted accordingly. The Bulletin naively continues:

The order arbitrarily transferring sheepskins to the dutiable list was signed L. H. KERR, Assistant Secretary. Mr. KERR being thus responsible for this arbitrary defiance of law, the Bulletin demanded his removal. . . .

It is well that justice is restored, and that the permanent interpretation of the law has been made known before election. After election, when personal matters can be discussed with a greater measure of judicial calmness, we expect, as we expected a return to the law, a serious investigation of the Customs Division, with some unpleasant consequences to the offenders. There is not the slightest suggestion of graft in the Treasury Department, but even incompetency should not exist there.

It beats all how people wanting tariff rulings changed are hurrying up to get them made right away instead of waiting until after election, "when personal matters can be discussed with a greater measure of judicial calmness." Incidentally, accepting the Bulletin's revised version as correct, we confess our utter inability to find anything "erroneous in fact" in our original statement. We guess it was only "extraordinary in expression."

That was a fine certificate as a peace-maker that Mr. Secretary HAY gave to Mr. ROOSEVELT in his speech of welcome to the delegates to the International Peace Congress. "President ROOSEVELT," he declared, "has the same tireless energy in the work of concord that he displayed when he sought peace and ensured it in the field of battle." That is nice language, but it is not accurate. On the field of battle he sought various objects, all particularly set forth with maps and diagrams in an autobiographical work to that end devoted. We have not freshly consulted the work in question, but if Mr. HAY can find concord enumerated among the objects pursued, we will send him a new hat if he will communicate the proper size. And between fields of battle the Colonel pursued canned beef, and got it, and was much disappointed in it. He also pursued the War Department with a round-robin. He pursued something every minute and usually caught up with it, but his "tireless energy in pursuit of concord" was, and presumably is, of exactly the same quality as that of Scotty Briggs in Mr. TRUMAN's story, who got a spanner and personally dispatched the roughs who were stoning the Methodist meeting-house. Scotty insisted upon having peace just as the Colonel does; and when there was a sudden demand for peace, he cried ha, ha, like the war-horse of Scripture, and got out his weapon and sailed in. In expounding temperaments, Mr. Secretary, it is necessary to distinguish between persons who like to harvest their peace with impassioned physical exertion, and those who promote it by diplomacy, forbearance, self-restraint, and other forms of head-work. "Tireless energy in the work of concord!" Well! well!

The Republican candidate got a little excited the other day over a letter on labor-unions and strikes, signed THOMAS ROOSEVELT, and printed in the Mines Magazine out West. He pronounced it a forgery by telegraph, and called for the detection and punishment of the perpetrator. Then it came out that the offender was none other than the old Evening Post of this city, which had composed the letter itself and printed it as one which "might well have been sent." Which fulfills the reflection that our esteemed contemporary will do well to return to the mines and stop trying to crack jokes at the toothless age of one hundred and three.

The Tribune thinks it's smart. It set a trap for the Judge by submitting a snap question in writing as follows:

In view of the activity of the Parker Constitution Club, do you believe that colored voters should be allowed to enjoy the voting privileges which the Federal Constitution guarantees them?

The Judge with his usual courtesy told the reporter that the fact that he was not giving interviews was well known, and referred those desiring to acquaint themselves with his opinions to his letter of acceptance. Whereupon the Tribune shouts Hallo! Its conduct is on a par with that of the World when Mr. ROOSEVELT pronounced as a forgery the Evening Post's imaginary letter containing this phrase:

Your implication that I would do for you as a Presidential year what I would not do at another time is an insult. If I cannot be elected without getting down on my knees to labor-unions, then, in the spirit of my distinguished opponent, let the election go.

Now then, triumphantly shouts the World, "Does Mr. ROOSEVELT's heated denial mean that he will 'get down on his knees to labor-unions' if necessary to his election? By his disclaimer does President ROOSEVELT mean to say that in similar circumstances he would not do what President CLEVELAND did in 1894?" No, hanger of to-morrow, he doesn't mean to say that; he doesn't mean to say anything. Neither did Judge PARKER, in reply to the Tribune. And they don't have to. Although candidates and gentlemen, they are not obliged to answer every snap fool question that comes along.

The "D" before CUNY HERRICK stands for nothing; it is just D. To Mr. HILL, it now signifies Dear; it once stood for another word more graphic. Let us hope it will never spell DAVU.

MRS. HENRY continues to be cross because the New York papers did not print his underdone speech to a lot of editors in full, and seizes upon any pretext for a fresh dig at them.

We wholly agree [he writes] with HARPER'S WEEKLY as to the editorial page of the Springfield Republican. But why discriminate? What have the New York leading writers done, or left to do, that they should be thus denied their primacy? Do they not sufficiently proclaim it? Do they not constantly advertise their own wares? "It is truly interesting," says the WEEKLY, "to learn from the series of military orders that now pervade metropolitan journalism," which is equivalent to saying that brass buttons, not inspiration or integrity, is the rule in the New York newspaper offices, which is equivalent to saying that they get their opinions from where they get their grub, which is equivalent to saying that they lack independent judgment and representative character.

Which is equivalent, nevertheless, to saying nothing of the sort. We do not know a single New York newspaper whose nominal editor does not control its policy. The silly Press brought similar charges against its contemporaries some weeks ago, and the bill of particulars we asked for at the time has not yet been filed. No; what the editorial pages of New York newspapers lack is pith. They seem to be overwhelmed by a tone realization of their traditional defects. The Sun has to be excepted. The Evening Post crumples, the Times plucks, the American dictatorial, the Tribune bigoted, the World primitive, the Herald vacuous, the Mail and Globe inconsequential, the Expter verbose, the Press insipid. Each is kept so busy maintaining its peculiarity that it has no time for the exercise of either the sweet reasonableness which permeates the columns of the Republican or the abundant knowledge and exquisite logic which characterize the other journal—not the Century—to which we referred. Each is honest; none suffers; that is all.

GRANDPA GARNER'S figures are more phibetically than his wies.

The good, old-fashioned partisan papers ought to save the wear and tear of original thinking by getting together and swapping editorials. Here is a sample leader from the Evening Mail:

FACTS TO KEEP IN MIND

Does any one deny that HILL controls the Democratic party of this State? Does any one deny that if he could elect his State ticket and a Democratic Legislature he would be more than ever the supreme influence in Democratic councils?

Would he or would he not steal another Senate seat if the result in November should make such a thing possible?

Would he or would he not have another willing "tool" like MAYNARD to help along the conspiracy?

Would he or would he not doubtless the Legislature rather than present an investigation of his canal administration?

These are questions that can be answered by recalling HILL's career in politics. If the people want a restoration of that kind of government, they will vote for HILL's State ticket. Otherwise not.

All a true-blue Democratic editor need do to produce an equally cogent and convincing argument is to change "Democrat" to "Republican" and "Hill" to "Orrin."

Last week presidents of two great Western railroads, said to a man of prominence, also identified with railroads, and which presidents had not contemplated making any contribution to political funds, that they saw no escape from yielding to the British, for the reason they could not afford to antagonize CANTON. If he were to be Postmaster-General, for they could not, in the interests of the corporations in their care, afford to see the mail-carrying contracts go to their competitors over the way, and so would make their contributions.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Who were the presidents? Who was the man? No humbug!

For broken face comment us invariably to old Doctor Sanctionism. The Reverend SILAS CANNON SWALLOW, Prohibition candidate for President, asks Judge PARKER to accompany him "on a joint stumping tour up Salt River," and adds:

Though I have not had the pleasure of your personal acquaintance, yet, in view of our being travellers toward the same goal, which at the best but one of the numerous candidates can reach this year, and in view, further, of the possibility that both you and I may miss the mark and that "misery loves company," I am sure you will pardon the seeming intimacy of this communication.

If somebody should slap Doctor SWALLOW's face, he, too, would have an excellent opportunity to pardon a "seeming intimacy."

When Senator HOAN died the Senate lost its most interesting figure. He had been a Senator from Massachusetts for twenty-seven years, and had come to rank as a national institution. No considerations of party restrained him in his later years from speaking his mind freely on all great subjects that interested him. His answer to Professor NEWTON's lament at the time of the Spanish war was a great solace to persons who were doubtful of the righteousness of our course at that time. Still more lately his eloquent opposition to the course of his own party in acquiring the Philippines and governing them as a colonial dependency gained a degree of attention and respect which could scarcely have been accorded to any other speaker. His age, his character, his abilities, the length and distinction of his public service, his descent from old New England families that had bred famous thinkers, and his position as the leading representative of Massachusetts, combined to make him finally the most authoritative representative of American traditions of the generations that are gone.

He was also our foremost example of the educated man in political life. His education, begun at Concord Academy, and continued at Harvard, where he graduated in 1846, went on as long as he lived. Dr. EDWIN EXAMPT HILL, who spoke at his funeral, quoted some one's remark that Senator HOAN seemed to have read everything. Dr. HILL spoke of his familiarity with the best English religious writers, especially of the time between the Puritan emigration and now, and he added: "If you caught him when he was not at work . . . you found him strolling at his desk, perhaps writing his careful translation of Thucydides." He was a scholar, and a scholar of a very broadly intellectual type. Professor BARNETT WENDALL, in writing recently (in the North American Review) about modern educational methods, said that the old-fashioned classical system of education found its justification in the extraordinary mental abilities of the American lawyers whose minds were trained by it, and who were leaders and masters in public affairs in the earlier days of the republic. Senator HOAN belonged to the class of leaders that Professor WENDALL had in mind, and the quality and vigor of his mental powers must be held to bear testimony to the efficiency of the system that trained them. He began to practice law in Worcester in the late forties, as soon as he got out of the Harvard Law School, and was immediately successful as a lawyer, and promptly acquired a valuable practice, but his political career began so early (1851) and continued so steadily that his reputation as a lawyer is almost forgotten in his wider fame as a Senator and publicist.

In his later years he was the Old Man Eloquent of the country. We have not left—at least, not in sight—a conscience so obstinate, proved to a mind so resourceful, so unyielding a purpose, and a voice of such grace and authority. Perhaps he was behind the times. Certainly he was at odds with some tendencies of the times that find their foremost champions in the high places of the party with which he acted so long. Justice BURMAN, another man of Puritan derivation, has obstinate opinions and is ready to speak them, but he has neither the oratorical opportunities of Senator HOAN, nor his oratorical gifts.

Mr. ROBERT CURRIE is still adding to his reputation as being the monumental political provocateur of the present quadrennium, at least.—Danvers Herald.

Isn't he still for PARKER?

Everybody has read the story of ADAM BUCK, the Englishman who served long terms of imprisonment for felonies committed by another man. In his case juries were careless and overbearing, witnesses were careless and mistaken. Only by luck was the mistake found out after an innocent man had spent years in jail. Our courts do little make occasional mistakes, but they are more likely to err in discharging the guilty than in convicting the innocent. Nevertheless, they are not proof against being misled by prejudiced witnesses. Last week the papers told of the confession of a child twelve years old, on whose testimony a young man, LUKE GLENN, of Jersey City, has been in jail since last July. She accused him at that time of criminal assault. Three weeks ago he was indicted. He pleaded not guilty to the indictment. When his case came up for trial the court assigned him a lawyer who advised him to plead guilty and get a lighter sentence. But when the prisoner came to plead again he said to the judge: "I am pleading guilty because my lawyer says that is best, but I tell you I never did it." Judge BLAKE was not satisfied and asked Miss DAY of the State Board of Children's Guardians to investigate the case. To her the child confessed that she had lied about GLENN. Of the witness Miss DAY said: "I don't think the poor child is capable of telling the truth about anything. She is a degenerate, as any one can see, and she appears to be destitute of moral sense. She ought to be committed to an institution to protect the community and to protect her from herself." The child said to Miss DAY, when questioned: "I just couldn't help being bad. I am bad whenever I want to be bad, and I can't help telling lies."

In this case an awful miscarriage of justice was avoided because a judge was vigilant and took pains, but the accused youth suffered seriously as it was. Two months ago we heard in detail the story of an analogous case, in which a man accused by a girl of misconduct was sentenced to spend six months on one of the penal islands in the East River. The case was like Thouless's case in that an incompetent lawyer advised the accused to plead guilty to get a light sentence, although he denied the crime. There were complications in the case that made it hard for the accused to establish his character as a reputable man, but there were other circumstances that made it extremely probable that he was a victim of blackmail, and innocent of the offence charged. The man was a teacher. Of course he lost his place and all the income which maintained his family, and when he is discharged his character will be hopelessly damaged. A friend of his, a lawyer, put an inquiry about and had the girl's character investigated. She promptly disapproved. The desire to protect girls, and especially young girls, against scoundrels has resulted in strict laws, raising the age of consent, and facilitating convictions. For the sort of scoundrel who debauches youth no one has any sympathy. But some young female children are exhaustively bad, and capable at a tender age of various forms of misconduct, including highly imaginative forms of perjury. Such a girl as the one in the Gottus case, as described by Miss Day, is really a terrible menace to any community. Proportionate to the desire to convict and shut up the scoundrel who corrupt young girls should be the zeal of the courts and prosecuting authorities to protect decent—and even half-decent—men against perjured witnesses.

Attorney-General CANNON seems to embody most of the stunk in the Democratic party in New York.

Sir WILLIAM RAMSAY, K.C.B., F.R.S., Professor in Chemistry at the University College, London, was entertained at dinner last week by some of his scientific brethren in Brooklyn. He had spent six weeks in these States and was about going home. He told his entertainers as the result of his observations that men employed in this country in a scientific capacity—especially those engaged in teaching the sciences, as well as law and medicine—were underpaid. He found them earning "less than they would if they were engaged in commercial pursuits," which impressed him as a condition that needed to be remedied, and remedied soon. If not, he thought it would react on the training of professional and scientific men in this country, "for if trained by third-rate teachers—as they must be—it is unlikely," he said, "that they will take the rank which they would have taken if their teachers had been men of first-rate ability." He took it for granted that third-rate salaries would not attract first-rate men. It was necessary, he held, that those professors who fill the most important positions in the leading universities of the country should be well paid. About the others it made less difference. He urged that rich Americans who give so generously to educational uses should—instead of erecting buildings and founding new institutions—increase the endowments of existing professorships. His remarks were received with hearty approval by his scientific brethren who were present.

They were interesting remarks. It is the habit in Great Britain to offer considerable prizes to public servants in various callings, and in that way to attract first-rate men. There are many places of great dignity and emolument in the English Church; some British schoolmasters have incomes of substantial respectability, and British judges, law officers, and high officers of government are paid salaries on which they can live comfortably without scripping. What is the salary of Sir WILLIAM's professorship in the University of London, and whether it helps him much to support the dignity of knighthood, he did not say. What is the salary of the Regius Professor of Medicine at Oxford—a post lately accepted by the foremost American medical man—we do not know. But the salaries of American professorships range from two or three thousand dollars up to six or seven, reaching the higher figures only in great cities like Chicago and New York. Sir WILLIAM must have in mind salaries as large as ten or fifteen thousand dollars. Even the latter sum is not regarded in New York as an income so blasted as to be immodest, except for a teacher. In great cities the medical and law schools, and doubtless the schools of science, enjoy the services of first-rate professors, who supplement their salaries by professional labors. Nevertheless, Sir WILLIAM's point seems very well taken. If we are to develop first-rate scientific men, we must make it worth the while, peculiarly, of first-rate men to follow scientific pursuits; and if we expect to have first-rate men become teachers and professors, there must be professorships with attractive incomes to which they can be called.

The World in its issue of October 4 accepted responsibility for inventing the Subway, and submitted documents to prove that it did it on April 8, 1883. Responsibility for discovering the North River remains, as yet, with HENNING HUPPO.

President ROOSEVELT is the only man we ever happened to know who really enjoys talking over the telephone. Whenever the bell rings his fingers seem to itch for the transmitter. There was nobody quick enough to answer the other day when JAMES JEFFERY ROUSE was calling at the White House, and the President—as Mr. HENRY JAMES would say—delightedly went. This conversation ensued:

"Well, what is it?"
"Hello! Is Archie there?"
"No, he's not."
"Who's this I'm talking to?"
"The President."
"Well, you'll do. Tell Archie to come over and play ball."
"Right away!"
"Yep!"
"All right!"

And the chat perforce was discontinued until Archie could be found.

Police Commissioner McANIS need feel no hesitation in administering a severe rebuke to the burglars who broke into a South Brooklyn police station and stole a typewriting machine. It was an uneventful act.

The college girls began the year with excellent advice from their preceptors. Dean BOWEN charged the Radcliffe girls, "Stand up straight, don't look at the boys, and keep your shoes tied"—a counsel full of path and inspiration. President THOMAS told the Bryn Mawr girls of seeing British Tommy Atkins sitting with his arm around 'Arrie in London's parks, and warned her young women to do otherwise and to be continually watchful. President ELIOT told his Harvard Freshmen to be democratic zealotmen, and gave them some of his views on the kind of deportment that befits that status. Our schools, great and small, public and private, are among other things, schools of manners. We believe that they are increasingly effective in that important department, and are making us a more polite and considerate people. A London cable said last week that the American "jockies" from the Olympia and other war-ships who were on shore leave in London were "winning golden opinions for themselves by their handsome appearance and correct demeanor." They were reported as "going about the city with their Radebreds, visiting points of interest." Think of that. Men-of-war's men going about with guide-books, visiting points of interest! Carry the news to Mr. KLOXON and his Mr. Precoft. It is astonishing—if true.

Now the World is an important paper, and interesting, politically, especially in this campaign, yet we can't but think that HARPER'S WEEKLY overrates the delicacy of its reputation in supposing that to be caught in a single lie would do it so much harm. Surely the World is a great deal harder than HARPER'S WEEKLY thinks—Life.

We hope not. Yet we must admit that Mr. PUTTICK's earnest silence indicates a like suspicion on his part. And he ought to know.

Now that Tammany has finally, though reluctantly, nominated Mr. HICKER for Congress, certain unquestioned—but unmentionable—papers are becoming very active in support of the Democratic ticket.

Ex-Archbishop-General Knox Defends the President

THE most effective speech made in the campaign on the Republican side, since Mr. Roosevelt's opening address at the Chicago convention, was delivered in the Philadelphia Academy of Music on Tuesday 14 by United States Senator Knox, lately United States Attorney-General. The principal purpose of the speech was to refute the charge that President Roosevelt has exceeded his constitutional authority. Mr. KNOX proceeded upon lines different from those which have been followed by many Republican speakers and writers. Far from maintaining that the Republican party "stands upon its record," he began by assuming that the great mass of thinking Americans are not to be deluded into the belief that it is safe to entrust the administration of national affairs into the hands of a party solely upon a record, or solely upon a prospect. He met undilutingly the issue of Mr. Roosevelt's personality. He purposed, he said, to solicit support for the Republican candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency on the score of their loyalty to their party's principles, as attested by their characters and their performances; on the score of the capacity exhibited by them for administering national affairs so as to promote the common weal at home and respect for our people and their flag abroad. He declared roundly that THOMAS ROOSEVELT ought to be supported by the country for what he has done and for what he is. The Senator went on to consider two of the grounds on which the President is accused of transgressing his constitutional authority. He said, candidly enough, not a word about Mr. ROOSEVELT's intervention in the antitrust-coal strike, except to ask his auditors whether they believed that, under the Constitution, the Federal government could have acted and regarded the antitrust-sinners of Pennsylvania, as was proposed in the New York Democratic platform of 1902. This was clearly an evasion of the issue, which is not whether the author of the New York Democratic platform in 1902 committed an act of lunacy, but whether Mr. ROOSEVELT had any constitutional warrant for appointing the Anthracite-Coal Strike Commission. But, while Mr. KNOX passed over that one of Mr. ROOSEVELT's deeds which a constitutional lawyer would naturally find it difficult to explain away, he boldly undertook to justify the course pursued by the President in the matter of the Panama Canal and in the issuance of Executive Order No. 78 relating to the payment of pensions. He stated fully and fairly the charge that Mr. ROOSEVELT violated the Constitution when he constituted an act of war against Colombia by forbidding that state to assert its authority on the Isthmus of Panama; and that he violated the law of nations when, in the face of the treaty of 1846 between the United States and New Granada, he recognized the independence of Panama, and negotiated a treaty with the new-born republic. To both allegations Mr. KNOX replied that it is an Executive function to recognize the existence of foreign powers and to negotiate treaties, and he denied that any rule of international law was infringed in the President's exercise of either of those Executive powers. He failed to explain, however, how the refusal to permit Colombian troops to proceed to Panama could be reconciled with the treaty of 1846 just mentioned. He contended that the President might be regarded by some persons as impetuous and unwise in executing the law of Congress requiring him to take steps specified by Congress for securing the junction of the two canals, but the Senator insisted that Mr. ROOSEVELT was safely within his constitutional powers when he adopted those methods. As to the policy and wisdom of the act, what, asks Mr. KNOX, would have been the verdict of the American people if the President had defied his hands and closed his eyes, and have executed the law, had waited until some economic disaster as in his constitutional powers should have resulted in the minds of his well-constituted citizens?

The ex-Attorney-General next examined the accusation that Mr. ROOSEVELT appointed a power which did not belong to him constitutionally when he issued Pension Order No. 78. Mr. KNOX held, on the contrary, that the President lawfully exercised his right to obey the Constitution. In order to carry out a new law which he was sworn to execute, he used his discretion in order that, in consequence with common sense and human experience, it should be a rebuttable presumption that a soldier at sixty-two had deteriorated by fifty per cent. in his ability to perform physical labor, and, at seventy, had become wholly incapable. It is pointed out that the order did not appropriate to soldiers their pensions. The appropriation was made in Congress after the order, and for the sole purpose of covering its own requirements. It was not the President who directed that disabled soldiers should receive a monthly stipend. Congress did that by a law duly enacted, and the Constitution put upon the President the duty of carrying out the law by seeing to it that the government's bounty reached the intended beneficiary. Mr. KNOX found it easy to refute the theory of the Constitutionists (that Mr. CLEVELAND's order of 1903, making the age of seventy the conclusive proof of incapacity, was constitutional, while Mr. ROOSEVELT's order, that the age of seventy should be taken as an evidential fact in determining disability, is unconstitutional). The risk discriminates between the two orders, on the ground that Mr. CLEVELAND's was unimportant, and, moreover, was in accord with common knowledge, whereas Mr. ROOSEVELT's is not. The Pennsylvania Senator dismissed with the epithet "curious" the hypothesis that the question of the existence of a constitutional power is to be determined by the discretion with which the power is exercised. He also pointed out the absurdity to see how the act that Congress once saw fit to give a service pension to Mexican veterans when they should reach the age of sixty-two throws any illumination on the President's power to use the rights of experience to help him ascertain the fact of total or partial disability under a law which does not give a service pension at any age, but a disability pension, regardless of age. We opine that this defense of Pension Order No. 78 will be looked upon by many independent as more satisfactory than the attempt to justify the course pursued by the ROOSEVELT administration on the Isthmus of Panama.

It will be remembered that in his letter of acceptance, Judge PARKER replied to Mr. ROOSEVELT's challenge to say what he would do about Pension Order No. 78 by declaring that, if elected, he (PARKER) would revoke it. Concerning this reply, Mr. KNOX admitted that it is within the power of any succeeding President to revoke an order made by a predecessor if he is not in sympathy with it. The Pennsylvania Senator contended that the President's order was legal, and that the wisdom of President ROOSEVELT's exercise of discretion was conclusively attested by Congress when it appropriated the money needed to meet its exigencies. It could, therefore, be only on the ground of want of sympathy with the purpose that the order could be revoked. Mr. KNOX submitted that it would be an extraordinary and high-handed performance on the part of a successor to President ROOSEVELT to revoke an order approved by the people's representatives, and to thus lack the subject matter of the order upon Congress to take his chances of being reproduced in legislation. He insisted that such a policy, carried to its logical end, would make chaos throughout the land, and that laws would remain unexecuted, or be delayed in the execution, because Executive inability failed to proceed with further legislative direction. This, he added, would inevitably be the result, unless the Democratic drive of Executive usurpation only extends to cases where aged soldiers are the beneficiaries. This defense of the President's pension order may not be decisive to the eye of a constitutional lawyer, but there can be, we think, no doubt about its effect upon a popular audience.

One of the charges brought against Mr. ROOSEVELT is that, while he unquestionably used the power of the Federal government to enforce the antitrust act in the case of the Northern Securities Company, he failed to pursue a vigorous and effective interference to the "Beef Trust." According to the ex-Attorney-General, the facts are these: As early as May 10, 1902, the United States filed a petition in equity against seven corporations, one partnership, and twenty-three persons constituting what was commonly called the "Beef Trust," engaged in the business of purchasing live stock, converting the same into fresh and cured meats, and selling the products throughout the United States. The Federal government charged the defendants with being engaged in a combination to restrain trade in the articles mentioned among the several States, and to monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, the same in divers ways. The defendants filed a demurrer, but the court decided against them, and by a decree enjoined them from entering into or taking part in any combination the effect of which would be to restrain the trade in fresh meats between the several States. The defendants, however, appealed from this decree, and their appeal is now pending in the United States Supreme Court. Mr. KNOX adds that, since this injunction was obtained up to the present time, the Federal government has done what it could to see that the decree was not violated. It has employed skilled men to watch the defendants continually, but it has thus far failed to obtain proof that the injunction has been disregarded. Those who have published assertions to the contrary have replied, when requested in furnish evidence, that they had none, but hoped to hear when the Federal government should that the government would act promptly when evidence was forthcoming. So much for the charge repeatedly brought by the Herald newspapers. Still another point in Mr. KNOX's speech merits notice. It will be remembered that Judge PARKER, when speaking of the trusts to the notification committee, expressed the opinion that "the common law, when developed, affords a complete remedy against monopoly." It will also be recalled that President ROOSEVELT, in his letter of acceptance, said, "There is no common law of the United States." To this assertion Judge PARKER, in his recent letter of acceptance, rejoins that the United States Supreme Court had decided in a case called that common-law principle could be applied by Federal tribunals in cases involving interstate commerce whenever an United States statute specifically covered the case. Mr. KNOX, referring to these three propositions, said, "The first two sound, but denied the soundness of the first. He maintained that the common law does not afford a 'complete' legal remedy for trusts, but that supplies mentary legislation is needed for the purpose. He contends, also, that President HERRICK's declaration that "there is no common law of the United States," when read in connection with its context, simply means that no common law of the United States furnishes a complete legal remedy against monopolies and restraints of trade. As for the decision rendered in the case cited by Judge PARKER, viz., Mr. KNOTT, does not mean what the traders of Judge PARKER's letter of acceptance would naturally think it meant, namely, that the common law can prevent persons from making combinations in restraint of interstate commerce, and that the United States could proceed against them at common law. According to the Pennsylvania Senator an agreement in restraint of trade is not, and never was, unlawful at common law in any such sense as that the agreement could be nullified by public authority, or that persons not parties to it could maintain an action against it for damages. State law is needed to confer such remedy, and, consequently, Mr. KNOTT contends, the President was right in saying "there is no common law of the United States for any such purpose." Where lawyers disagree—especially such lawyers as an ex-Chief Judge of the New York Court of Appeals and an ex-Attorney General of the United States—a layman will scarcely venture to decide. We would not take leave of Mr. KNOTT's speech, however, without remarking that we do not understand what he means when he says that "everybody knows" that "the underlying principle is the equality of all men." DISCREPANCY are a few men who refuse to bend to their country's laws." We must confess that what "everybody knows" is to us entirely unknown.

Judge Herrick's Speech of Acceptance

EDWARD JUDGE HERRICK, the Democratic nominee for Governor of New York, does not believe in long speeches, yet it would be difficult for his intentions to be expounded more distinctly and effectively than they were expressed by the few words in which, at Albany on October 1, he accepted the nomination. That is evidently the Judge's own opinion, for he announced that, in the future, he should devote no time or labor to the preparation of any formal letter of acceptance. What he might have to say in the campaign would be said on the platform, where the people and the speaker can look each other in the eyes. He declined, of course, from referring to the present Republican Governor, THURMAN, but there was no mistaking the allusion to the impopularity of a Chief Magistrate of the Empire commonwealth figuring as the chairman of the State Campaign Committee of a political party. Judge HERRICK declared that, for his part, should he be elected, he would recognize that his first duty was to the people and not to the Democratic party. In that event he should expect to receive advice and assistance from party leaders, and should gladly listen to them, but they must not look forward to controlling his official actions for party purposes. On the other hand, Judge HERRICK pledged himself not to attempt to control the Democratic party or its actions, but to content himself with being one of its advisers. By the promise to be the thorough, not of the Democratic party, but of the whole people of the State, Judge HERRICK paved the way for an appeal for the support of, concessions and wise Republicans. He reminded them that it is a natural tendency of a party long in power to become extravagant and corrupt, and of the conductors of a long successful political machine to become arbitrary and dictatorial. It is not in such cases, he asks, the greatest service that even a party owes, to help to bring about its party's temporary overthrow, in order that the existing leaders may be displaced and the party organization be purified and strengthened. He commends to Republicans and Independents, as well as Democrats, the anxious consideration of the indisputable fact that there is today a widespread feeling in the State of New York that many of its highest officials are unworthy to their trusts, and that the leaders of the party in power treat the government of the State as a commercial asset, and politics as a pursuit to be followed for private gain. Judge HERRICK points out, what also is undeniable, that the pervasive feeling of distrust cannot be dispelled, neither can the truth or lack of charges injurious to the fair name of the Empire commonwealth be determined until the books are opened and examined before the public, not by the men who have made and kept them, but by new accountants appointed by the people for that purpose. Neither does Judge HERRICK omit to note the disastrous consequences of the blunder made by Governor CUGLER, when he challenged Mr. CLEVELAND, the Democratic Attorney-General of the State, to say why, if there had been wrong-doing in the State administration, he had not taken official cognizance of it. The testimony given by the witness, thus audaciously summoned to the stand, indicates, as Judge HERRICK suggests, that there is something graver than mere serious wastefulness in the expenditure of the people's money. No law is he personally concerned, the Democratic nominee for Governor declares that, if elected, he will endeavor to confer the officers of the State to their lawful salaries and legitimate audited expenses, and not to permit such salaries to be swelled by gross allowances for expenses which are never incurred, and the amount of which is never audited. Moreover, if entrusted with power, the fate of the HERRICK administration will be set against constant efforts to discover new sources of revenue, as well as new methods of disposing it. Instead, therefore, the constant endeavor will be to decrease the expenses of the State, and to resume the losses piled upon the savings of widows, mechanics, and farmers deposited in the savings-banks of the State. It will be his duty, lastly, to superintend with watchful care the outlay for rural improvements, so that on repetition may be witnessed of the corruption and scandal that characterized the last attempt to improve the State's highways. We repeat that there is nothing diffuse, vague, or evasive in the speech. Those who have read the few and brief sentences in which Judge HERRICK outlines his programme, and who know the character of the man, are disposed to think that, if elected, he would make a better Governor than Mr. HORTON.

Sir William Harcourt

WITH SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT passed away the last of the old Whigs, a statesman who, with every grace and talent, left almost of supreme greatness. He was regarded as the ablest debater in the House, with, perhaps, the exception of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, as a consummate lawyer, as a master of finance, he stood next in succession to Mr. GLADSTONE, and came within reach of the Premiership. Yet, with all this, Sir William failed to realize his countrymen that he was entirely in earnest; he lacked the note of pure moral power which distinguished GLADSTONE and HARCOURT, and that lack kept him always in the second place, almost attaining greatness, yet never gloriously great.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT in many things resembled that great archetype, the ideal John Bull. In every point of his career he fulfilled the large and normal English ideal of what a British statesman ought to be and do. He united by birth the two strongest powers in the realm—the landed aristocracy and the Church of England. His royal pedigree, traced from the house of PLANTAGENET, was as much a part of trade with the aristocracy as was his double title, and his descent from an archbishop guaranteed his orthodoxy as a sound Churchman, loyally supporting the establishment, just as he supported the crown, because both were part and parcel of England's life. A gentleman by birth and caste, prejudices and privileges, SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT ever more fulfilled the English ideal by greatly distinguishing himself at his university as an excellent classical scholar, one of the best that ever entered the House of Commons. RECKEN well described the great English universities as designed to make such students "gentlemen and scholars," as he felt that he had in the making, "either," and Hased his university training early by followed this ideal. Socially, he was one of the most brilliant and polished men of a brilliant and scholarly speech, whose conversation was a fine art, almost as perfectly developed as under LOUIS XIV. of France.

There was one weak point in the jolly "Squire of Malvern," as the Parliamentary cartoonists loved to call him. He had very little real creative power, very little genius; only talent of a high order, and standard physical energy and vitality. In the thirty years which followed his first appointment to office, he has hardly be said to have had a single great original idea of the creative kind, comparable, let us say, to the Irish land policy, or the Balkan campaign, or the noble power after Majuba, or the home-rule bill of Mr. GLADSTONE; or, to take the opposite party, the Irish policy of the BALFOURS and WYNDHAM, the Indian policy of CURZEN, the reconciliation with France inaugurated by LAMOURIN. Of creative ideas like these, SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT produced none, nor did his consummate legal knowledge and label avail to solve the one great legal difficulty which lay in the way of GLADSTONE's home-rule bill, the knotty question of the presence or absence of the Irish members at Westminster. Had he been able to suggest an acceptable solution of this crisis, HARCOURT would unquestionably have saved the Liberal party, and succeeded GLADSTONE in the Premiership; but while overflowing with fine debating power, making brilliant cuts and thrusts, dazzling and charming his audiences within and without the House of Commons, he was really barren of sound content, a good party gladiator, but in no sense a general or a leader.

His finest public achievement was probably his budget of 1904, which lifted a burden of taxation from the shoulders of the poor and set it on the rich, first by equalizing the death duties on real and personal property, and, second, by exempting moderate incomes from taxation, thus removing a galling burden from the poorer business and professional classes, and adding joy to the lives of a mass of small-salary holders. HARCOURT was remembered as a fine and robust social figure, the financial descendant of some of the jolly personages in the Canterbury Tales, rather than as a man of genius and inspiration, a bringer of light and new ideals.

PAUL MORTON, THE NEW SECRETARY OF THE NAVY

Mr. Morton, recently appointed Secretary of the Navy by President Roosevelt, is the eldest son of the late J. Sterling Morton, who was Secretary of Agriculture during President Cleveland's second term. Mr. Morton has been in the railroad business since his youth, and before his appointment to the cabinet was vice-president of the Atchafalpa, Tropic, and Santa Fe. He assumed his duties as Secretary of the Navy on July 1, succeeding Mr. Moody, the present Attorney-General.

THE RAILROAD DISASTER AT KNOXVILLE, TENNESSEE, IN WHICH MORE THAN FIFTY LIVES WERE LOST

Fifty-four persons were killed and more than one hundred and twenty injured in a collision which occurred between two passenger trains on the Southern Railway several miles from Knoxville, a town near Knoxville, Tennessee, on September 23. The trains were ordered to pass each other at a point near Knoxville, but the order was disregarded by the west-bound train, and a head-on collision at high speed took place. The wreckage of the two trains, and the bodies of many of the passengers, were scattered all over the scene of the accident, showing the appalling loss of life. The photograph is a general view of the scene of the accident, showing the wreckage of the two trains, and the bodies of many of the passengers, were scattered all over the scene of the accident, showing the appalling loss of life.

The "Connecticut" as she entered the Water from the Hoys

The "Connecticut" being hoisted Back to the Navy Yard after the Launching

LAUNCHING THE "CONNECTICUT," THE LARGEST BATTLE-SHIP IN THE UNITED STATES NAVY

The battle-ship "Connecticut," the most powerful vessel in the United States navy, was successfully launched September 25 at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. The "Connecticut" has a maximum displacement of 17,200 tons, is 161 feet over all, with a draught of 24½ feet, and an estimated speed of eighteen knots. She will have two main and four secondary turrets and a central battery. Her armament will consist of four 12 inch turret loading guns, eight 8 inch guns, twelve 7 inch rapid fire guns, twelve 2 pounders, six 1 pound anti-aircraft guns, two 1 pound anti-submarine, and eight 2½ inch machine guns.

Photographs by Fred A. Foley

Two Kinds of Tenderfeet

By Stewart Edward White

Author of "The Blasted Trail," etc.

FROM time to time you meet in social circles a youth who is introduced to you as a great runner. In due course, if you are sufficiently humble and adverting and happen to frequent his haunts, you will learn, both from his admirers and from himself, that he is leared to hardships. "Born on an umbrella!" No, indeed, old man. I never pay any attention to that. "Born with a laugh!" I smile. "I never led the cold." No, not hungry. "I've often gone a whole day with nothing but a piece of hardtack." This sort of talk wins a great deal of admiration from girls, and is harmless. Sooner or later you will attend a gathering where the Tough Youth and a former camping companion are present. Then you will assist at a very longhose scene.

The Tough Youth is gently clucking in unison. He mentions a rubber pillow carried in his companion. That rubber pillow under his entirely amiable gaiting becomes a symbol of effeminacy. The poor companion is overwhelmed with implied ridicule, his status as a tenderfoot is irreversibly fixed, the doors of true woodcraft-manship are firmly and forever closed against any man who would enjoy such a thing. By implication, of course, he who indulges in such luxuries is excluded to a plane of superiority.

Perhaps in this manner you get an idea that the Tough Youth is all wind and brag, and that his worn is launched from no solid support of achievement. That is where you are fooled. I have been out with many of the species, and as far as senseless physical endurance goes they are the real thing.

The Tough Youth always throws his blankets down on the hardest, roughest bit of ground within reach, and then snails a few little miles at your efforts to make through enough pine-needles for a good foundation. He loads his tongue with a staggering burden rather than make such trips. He runs through the forest at an exhausting speed with all that before him. When it rains he remains motionless and superciliously waits where it happens to catch him. The water drops from his hat and soaks down his body, but he is unconscious of anything except the comfortable fact that the others have not their backs to slanting tree trunks, or craved under logs. At meal-times he insists on eating the roughest cooking of the coarsest foods, because so civilized an effort as a good meal is beneath the notice of a true woodsman as he understands that individual. When he encounters a river he plunges in waist-deep without even trying to find a log, or a riffle,--that would save to him like a concession. One thin blanket does him at all times, even when he is travelling with horses. And actually, as a matter of preference, time and again I have seen him boldly go into camp on a bleak side-hill when other travellers offered a scant quarter of a mile ahead.

"Oh, you tenderfoot make me tired!" he laughs. "Why don't you bring a leather bed? This is good enough for anybody."

And markedly that deluded effort, scrubbed, unshaved of being considered tenderfoot by the largest tenderfoot of them all.

For this youth is a tenderfoot in the sense that he is playing the game unskillfully. I say this in full appreciation of those who argue that such excesses of brute force are valuable in the development of the mental qualities, that they serve as antidotes to overcivilization. In a certain sense it is desirable to state our own problems for the mere sake of solving them, to set up obstacles for the sole purpose of knocking them over. Probably a true perception of this fact is just what bullies the companions of the Tough Youth into submitting in his point of view.

But in the last analysis such an argument does not count. If a man wants to go out simply for the sake of exercise, for the sake merely of proving to himself what he can or cannot stand, very good, truly, wilderness travel and what it means in the bringing out of a man's quality are a broader matter than that. The problem of the skilled woodsman is not simply how to get through a difficult country, but how best to get through with the means at his disposal.

These means may have in it very simple: so simple that their deficiencies will entail a certain amount of hardship. No woodsman, travelling as light as he should on a long hike, would dream of taking a mattress with him; and the possession of a mattress on such a hike would actually mean "softness," and pretty the Tough Youth's scorn. Again, often the nature of the country is such that he must sleep on stones, and when such an occasion arises he will proceed to do so as cheerfully as the Tough Youth himself. But that is absolutely no reason why he should ignore the advantages of pine or balsam, moss or whatever other expedient his trained woodcraft may yield him. Also he may have to tread in the rain.--I've done it, many a day and many a mile.--but that does not excuse him for the ignorance or laziness that leaves him shelterless when not on the march. So with poor food, poor camps, poor anything.

No, look at it from any point of view you will, the Tough Youth is not quite the real thing, because he is indulging in a pose. Here, he is shrinking the very thing he believes himself accepting. The wilderness opposes him. This is the obligation, by strength, experience, and the virtus in its art, to maintain not only her dangers, but her discomforts as well. The toll of a good camp when good camping facilities offer is not to prove yourself tough, but ignorant or lazy. For the posing of a problem offered equally to your intelligence is the rankest laziness.

No need you fear but the attention to the comfort of your body will deprive it of due toughness of fibre. If you are in reality running the forest, opportunities will not lack for the testing of your mind and the exercise of all your vital forces. For never, never, never must you lose sight of the fact that to this question, as to all others, there are two extremes, and that the very ethics of the game demand not only that you shirk no problems, but also that you reduce your equipment to the bare necessities. Only, we have much you can get out of these necessities.

It seems strange that so simple a principle should require explanation at all. Certainly any one who would take the trouble to get acquainted with the professional travellers of the wilderness--such as, for instance, the hunter and pack-trail men--would find this hypothesis fairly doubted before his eyes. In the moment of necessity each of these men travels as light as may be. As to the single question of warmth, the cowboy has his slicker, the land-lubber his half-blanket, the voyager his woollen shawl, to wrap about his shoulders, while his feet stretch exposed toward the fire. Yet on the round-up, when the chuck-wagon is used to transport the outfit, the cowboy takes a "roll" composed of a huge canvas tarpaulin, two washed undercoats, and a pair of blankets. Similarly, in his permanent camp, the land-lubber, become a sealer, has his mattress ticking and his three or four pairs of blankets; while your voyager, when relieved of the necessity of transportation, fairly wallows in bare-kick and four-point coverings. If you or I should do such things the Tough Youth would never let up on us, and yet, even that engaging person could hardly escape the irony and his kin of "softness."

There seems to me to have been an excess of glorification of the merely physical. The best part of woods life and camping is, of course, the fact that it rests on a broad basis of the physical. But it does not stop at the physical. Its challenge is one that demands strength and endurance, to be sure, but not strength and endurance alone. The skillful application of them constitutes the real test, the real value to a man, brings about his true development. To ignore one element is to qualify the test. He who knows the physical--by the hiring of many packers, the transportation of many "conveniences"--is no more of a tenderfoot than he who wades the challenge to his wits and breaks through by main force.

A man need not whine when he runs against hardships; he may even encounter and overcome them with a certain joy; but he need not run to meet them and put his head down and butt into them. What would you think of a man who would sail his boat smack into every counter? You'd be likely to conclude he did so for some reason to last, wouldn't you? How about the chap who yanks his trout out with a "pole"? You don't imagine for a moment that he does it because he considers a silence red indicative of self-efficacy, do you? To get through a difficult country is a triumph; but to get through a difficult country with but a light equipment and without serious discomfort is an intellectual as well as a physical triumph.

As for the Tough Youth, in spite of the cackling admiration his scorn of comfort evokes, he seems to belong to the engaging category of those who do not know enough to come in when it rains.

Oxon versus Cantab

By Louise Imogen Guiney

OXFORD, ENGLAND, September 21, 1914

COMPARISONS between the two English universities must be at least as old as the disputes between Nominalists and Realists; that is, as old as the foundation of themselves. The Middle Ages have left behind in the detected in them, as if in some sublimated gene of Hunt the Skipper, in Oxford the Word, and in Cambridge the Thing. While merely complements and opposites they have stood so long crying each other that they have come to look somewhat alike, and in the finish, to see them alike at heart. Their points of difference, too, are so perfectly subtle that one dare forget to notice them; and the two strange subtle antipodal processes, in the non-res-dent millions, are merely two of a kind. The all-intelligent Bachelor, on whom our tourists batter, actually adorns you, if you cannot see both universities, to visit Oxford; and the inference is that you become thereby complete master of the situation, and are fitted, as Mr. Long would say, to write a book on Cambridge. This pillar is about as illuminating as a candle to talk back in variety. If you cannot see the works of Sir Walter Raleigh: both being smokers, the mental result of them is you, therefore, must be pretty much the same. But a large ended one, sure with Oxford first, then with Cambridge, does indeed set me unalizing.

It may safely be said that the second of these, at first sight,

The Canadian steamer "Lucania," showing the Arrangement of the Receiving Wires on the Masts.

Receiving a Wireless Message on Board the "Kaiser Wilhelm der Gross."

The Wireless Station on Board the Holland American Steamer "Rhynan."

RECEIVING WIRELESS MESSAGES ON SHIP-BOARD 2000 MILES FROM LAND

The Marconi wireless telegraph system is now in general use on many of the large transatlantic steamers. The system is used in conjunction with passing ships, and with the various shore stations and the inland telegraph and international cable systems all over the world. It is now possible to send messages from shore to ships over 2000 miles at sea. On the Canadian liner "Campania" a newspaper is published daily containing important news of the world received by wireless telegraph.

Photographs by Peter A. Foley has the aspect of a contented market-town rather than of a metropolis, yet to the impatient traveler: fresh from Oxford it presents many of the features of the finest Western World; so much is announced by the electric cars which whirl up to the station, and distill the senses accustomed to late to the noise and glare of the train, which ply up and down meditatively, and with heroic infrequency. You are conscious, then, of exchanging your gray environment of yesterday, with its motionless air, and its sky ranging through all shirs, mauve, and yellow tints, and never beyond them, for an environment of molten red, with a certain brokenness and freedom in the light winds coming in from the fen-country, and a certain compassiveness of good blue in the loveliest sky. There is an insistent note of splendor about the colleges which whips up the spirits, or does not do so, according to your measure of response to the kingdoms of this world and the glory thereof. These great Tudor gateways, with their wide openings and massive walls, belittled, give vistas of prodigious space; rising gravelly grounds, or fireless lava broken by square-walled walls, and porticoes and clusters of the Renaissance, round-arched, and totally watered. As all the world knows, the face of Oxford is other than this: darker shades, simpler fronts, with small quads, and ivy-covered gardens for the entrance to which the eye has a momentary halt. Corpus, Peterhouse, Jesus, Halls, certainly have their beautiful touches of sweet quietness; the interior of St. Mary's is lovely by far more subtly excessive than that of St. Mary the Virgin; and yet, on the whole, the "note" even of something consciously intellectual, something regulated, systematic, and almost manchester, beside the æsthetic tenderness and tenderness of the sacred stones of Oxford.

Each foundation at Cambridge stands up proudly alone: there is no useful building together of towers or cloisters, looked down upon from rising ground laid by, they seem but a cluster of historic hills on some one giant stair. The "drawing spires," you remember, were wonderfully gregarious. One could not wander into All Souls's but the tall church and the domed library over the gate rose up together in half-learned friendliness to question one's purpose there; one could not pass good measure on some ghostly morning with the cataplectic of New College gardens without becoming aware how Magdalen tower had crept up, white as Egeria, before her questioning hour, on the farther grass. Always and everywhere these mystical conspirators in air informed after, in two and threes. But in Cambridge architecture the unit asserts itself. Woe in her generation, she has put her long strain in the picture; structure everlastingly are the green hills, the leafy canopies of the bridges and their reflection below; and the leafy buildings successively solacing the passing boat from their vast reviewing-stand. So far as continuous effort goes, the winding waters of Isis and Chert have been wondrously thrown away on scullers and punts.

The demarcation of kings, and of women of kindly blood, is over all the magnificence of Cambridge; Trinity, the incomparable chapel to the south of it, the viciated completeness of St. John's, are aptly, almost aptly, royal. They speak of the later medieval days when monarchies began to be foundations. But in Oxford the head of "pious formers" were nearly inconspicuous in well-being, and shirk individual in motive. Little red gables sprang up and were endowed, not for learning's and glory's sake, but for learning and love's. This one stands for a pleasure, and that for a hope; but in vain; here is a memorial of a dead husband's cherished dream, and under a moving plea that the English saint at Agincourt should have their request at home forever. The wise chancellors, the forgotten monastic lands, the seditions by scholars, live on like an enclosed fragrance at the heart of British alterity. The more potent element is, by contrast, almost purely Oxonian. There the human past is inseparable. Modern tablets along the cloisters show young men on name, chiefly filii decesserunt; priestly brasses in the ante-chapels are thick as forget-me-nots in spring; Irish masonry, bounding over graves, marks out at every turn of the street; one walks everywhere beside, or alone, the carved dates of the dead. In this bright laster still community, nothing is so singular and significant as their absence. Spraking relatively, and speaking roughly, an epitaph must be sought for, in her products, as if it were a casual and the circumstance helps to derive from her the overpowering pathetic charm of antiquity, the inspiring spirit of place by means of which Oxford captivates every sensitive heart. Cambridge, however, cannot be touched with neglect of the medieval past; the monuments deposited there, indeed they are: in one day's round, what with manuscripts and aureoles, portraits and statues, it is possible even to weary a little of Milton, Gray, Wordsworth, Byron, and Tennyson. The impression left is that Cambridge loves her celebrities and Oxford her children. The latter has been the mother of many a genius, purposeless and unsuccessful, as also of matrons of all schools, and of statesmen who had more often than not their Cartesian spirit of detachment and of preferred solitude. The broad imperial of English literature was born here, but her rival: Cambridge has the poets, perhaps because she needs them and paradoxically evokes them; their poetry is like a rebellion against her, for all of her stately loneliness. But romantic Oxford is herself a Platonist and a poet and being such, has ever been, and is, only too likely to kill itself in the satisfaction of her own in her romantic idiosyncrasy of look and speech, the energy of artistic expression in themselves. She is most truly obsessed to this day, with "lost causes and impossible ideals"; no belated dreamer who comes to her knee, searching for letters, the philosophy of history, the cure for cynicism, or for cynicism, need from an echo and blast of the ancient faith, shall go away quite disappointed. But the other university is the beautiful mistress of sciences, and the given of things practicable: does she not say so, year by year, in her triumphant Protestant protest? May they both be preserved in peace and domestic harmony, and hang as England has long enough in her to her fatter both of the brain and of the spirit!

Training Horses for War Service

By H. G. Roberts

THERE are very few of the great powers of the world—our own is a notable exception—who possess within the confines of their own territory a sufficient number of horses suitable for the requirements and constant re-requirements of the cavalry arm. Accordingly the various War Offices of the world have recourse to various known markets in foreign countries, and the result of the usual mass of animals which it is so much task to train and educate so that they may act together with some degree of uniformity.

Cavalry horses have first and foremost to be accustomed to the sound of rifle and artillery fire; and while many possess the first of these examinations, the few really the finest of the best of the world are a supreme and severe test for equine nerves.

Then, again, the recently acquired mounts must overcome their aversion to water; for it is obvious that an enemy will blow up and burn bridges wherever possible; thus the mounted forces have to be forced, frequently enough—in the case of the Russians retreating before the Japanese—in great disorder and extreme haste.

For this reason the military powers of the world establish regular training schools for cavalry horses, and in the system of very much the same in all nations, we will consider the equine training school at Aldershot, in England, as typical of all.

For Great Britain is a power that has to go ahead for her cavalry horses, and it is well known that when the magnitude of the first war was fully revealed, British officers of the veterinary branch were despatched in urgent haste, and with practically unlimbed credit, to buy up tens of thousands of suitable animals wherever they could procure them, from Nijni-Novgorod to the Argentine provinces.

It is pretty well known, too, that many of these buyers betrayed their country; and though they were allowed an all-round fifteen pounds (seventy-five dollars) for each horse, they bought a vast number of old "cows," which on more than one occasion brought disaster to the British cause.

Aldershot is, of course, the great military centre of England, just as Portsmouth is the naval headquarters. This great rolling expanse of the Hampshire Downs, however, has of late years grown somewhat too small for great operations, mainly by reason of the great range of modern small-arm fire, as well as that of artillery. The British War Office has now acquired very extensive manœuvring grounds on Salisbury Plain.

Many and varied, and extraordinarily even, from a civilian point of view, are the sights to be seen at Aldershot, these ranging from moving targets, in short-necked soldiers, to extensive factory chimneys, where the well-known military command, "Charge! Charge! Charge!" is given, and the result of aerial observation, and the use of a camera may be mapped and photographed and his movements observed.

But the most interesting and amusing of all the sights of Aldershot is the big review, or take, where cavalry horses from all parts of the world are trained in the most thoroughness that exists even the Italian system of horse-training.

It is well known, by the way, that cavalry horses in the Italian army go through almost as much training as though they were intended for a circus; and the prize has often been aimed to see which of the officers can bring their fine charges down the flights of stone stairs, and down especially constructed precipices which look as though they were especially invented to encompass the destruction of both horse and rider.

Again, the writer has witnessed the outstanding army maneuvers of the Italian troops in the River Arno at Florence, and also at Spezia, the great naval arsenal of Italy, where H. R. H. the Count of Turin may often be seen leading his regiment "out to sea"; the prince often dismounting and himself swimming with one arm above his head, and the other a mark.

The newly received horses at Aldershot, however, coming as they do mostly from inland regions, have a deep-water baptism to the water, and as their riders may be seen from the accompanying photographs) are for the most part very much alarmed at the strange behavior of the "pools" are ludicrous in the extreme. If it is found absolutely impossible to coax the animals into water deeper than their knees or thighs, collapsible boats are used, and the refractory animal dragged by main force beneath the depth, when he has to be taken out.

As might be supposed, after this experience, his objection to the water is stronger than ever, but he is conquered by being kept in a somewhat slender diet, and then covered out by a man in a

(Continued on page 1292.)

Forcing Cavalry Horses through the Water by Boat

Overboard riding near shore

Forcing an unruly Horse into the Water

Rescuing an entrained Horse in the River at Aldershot

PHOTOGRAPHS SHOWING THE METHOD OF TRAINING HORSES FOR WAR SERVICE.
The reader is referred to the article on the opposite page describing the method by which English cavalry horses are accustomed to the water and taught to swim to prepare them for some of the most arduous duties demanded in the article in addition to the training of the horse in the water. The method of training is described by some of the best authority persons of the world.

JAPANESE MOUNTAIN GUNS IN ACTION

The battle of Kwan-Sui-Tan, fought on July 31, was fully described in the "Weekly" of October 3 by the fighting. It was this battle which put General Kuroki's forces fairly within striking distance of 1

AT THE BATTLE OF KWAN-SUI-TEN

Mr. William Dinwiddie, one of the "Weekly's" correspondents in the Far East, and an eye-witness of the battle at Kwan-Sui-Ten, and made possible the Japanese victory at that place in their advance toward Mukden

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

WHEN Mr. Barrie wrote Old Lady Topsy and before he had written A Window in Thorne, it was doubtful whether he would ever be more than a picturesque observer and general coxswain. He had fancy and wit, sentiment and humor, freshness and originality of manner, but so far he had pictured Scots life merely as a spectator, without the kindling spark of sympathy that cheers and ennobles the heart, and claims kinship for one little parish with the whole world. With A Window in Thorne this was all changed, though, with the exception of Margaret Thorne, no other work of Barrie's has been so deeply charged with human feeling and sincerity. It is, first of all, always the playful humorist, sporting whimsically with the imiles and sentimental tendencies of his characters; in Topsy and Lucy the whimsical humorist is soon at his worst, in The Little White Bird at his best. No such charge can be brought against Mr. J. J. Bell, the latest Scots humorist to occupy the field. From the first he has understood and loved his characters with a new affection and an artistic conscience. He has made himself and his creations one with his kind. Not only Woe Macgregor, but his "paw" and "maw," his "grampaw" and his Aunt Purdie are, despite their local environment, characters that thrills wherever human affection and simplicity of life abound, and the appeal is consequently world-wide. Edith, which followed Woe Macgregor, is not to be taken less seriously; it was the clever work of a young journalist with a gift for amusing dialogue. Mrs. McFie again showed him in his best vein, but it was not more than a series of humorous sketches, severely handicapped by the monotony level of its commonplace study and the difficult Scots dialect in which it was narrated. But with Jess & Co., Mr. Bell has made a distinct advance, and has given us a book that is even better than Woe Macgregor. While evincing no levity, wit and fertility of resource, and striking a fresh note in fiction, there is nothing of the improbable or fantastic about his story as in so many of Barrie's tales. Quaint and fond in its simplicity and freshness, original in conception, entertaining in its delightful humor, and touching in its pathos, Jess & Co. appeals by its very truth and sincerity, and by its fidelity to human nature. Its genuineness stamps the picture with reality. There is no conscious effort to cause laughter or tears; there is no attempt at fine writing, no brilliant passages that arrest the progress of the story and halt its natural development. But when you close the book, you feel that you have been refreshed and uplifted, and that it has been good to know Jess and David and Aunt Wallace and the grocer and even Miss Perik.

It is a very unpretentious tale, and you wonder that it took three hundred pages to tell it; yet it is with respect you reach the last page, and you will find yourself turning back the leaves and rereading some of the chapters for the sheer delight of their humor and wholesome sentiment. In a word, the story tells how Jess, newly married, finds that her husband has been neglecting his trade because of his passion for gardening, and through carelessness and inefficiency leads him back to competency and prosperity. But it is the way in which he accomplishes this, unknown to him, that constitutes the originality and charm of the story. Jess, with her ambition for her goodness, her hopes and fears, is in very real touch with the daily occupation, and therefore with sympathy. David Houston, her husband, joiner and plumber by trade, gardener by nature, is an excellent study of a good-natured, affectionate, unimaginative type of man whose passion for his garden runs counter to his daily occupation, and threatens to make havoc of his future prospects and happiness. Mr. Bell's humor is inherent in his characters, and finds play in their kindoms and in the dialogue rather than in any comic contrivances, though his story does not lack telling and sometimes dramatic situations. It is the most amusing and lifelike character in the book is Aunt Wallace, who, as a widow, is, but for a kind heart, her watchful interest in the domestic progress of her niece affects many a laughable scene. One day she picked up a pair of David's socks that Jess had been darning.

"I'm afraid I've got a very neat darning," said Jess, partly irritated and partly amused.
"I would be willing to let it if I said so," returned her aunt. "Maybe you've heard tell of the sons—I mean said a better he was a snail of a son, that said as he had as it that, Mrs. Houston laughed good-naturedly. "I've heard that he said the same first."
"My! my! I suppose you're intruding for his little new socks!" she said, "This, indeed, is not so much as to say for her's. Mrs. Houston looked at her as if she was a snail of a son, that said as he had as it that, Mrs. Houston laughed good-naturedly. "I've heard that he said the same first."
"I don't know how you do it, Aunt Wallace," cried Jess, at last, her slight resentment giving place to honest admiration. "You could hardly tell it was a darning."
"Havers," muttered Mrs. Wallace, trying not to look pleased. "But you see how it's done?"

The young woman nodded.
"My goodness, used to say he performed the darning in the pot of the sock. He was as good as a brother, was my goodness, when he was living," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark.

"Ah, yes, he was as good as a brother," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark. "My goodness, used to say he performed the darning in the pot of the sock. He was as good as a brother, was my goodness, when he was living," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark.

"Ah, yes, he was as good as a brother," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark. "My goodness, used to say he performed the darning in the pot of the sock. He was as good as a brother, was my goodness, when he was living," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark.

"Ah, yes, he was as good as a brother," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark. "My goodness, used to say he performed the darning in the pot of the sock. He was as good as a brother, was my goodness, when he was living," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark.

"Ah, yes, he was as good as a brother," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark. "My goodness, used to say he performed the darning in the pot of the sock. He was as good as a brother, was my goodness, when he was living," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark.

"Ah, yes, he was as good as a brother," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark. "My goodness, used to say he performed the darning in the pot of the sock. He was as good as a brother, was my goodness, when he was living," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark.

"Ah, yes, he was as good as a brother," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark. "My goodness, used to say he performed the darning in the pot of the sock. He was as good as a brother, was my goodness, when he was living," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark.

"Ah, yes, he was as good as a brother," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark. "My goodness, used to say he performed the darning in the pot of the sock. He was as good as a brother, was my goodness, when he was living," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark.

"Ah, yes, he was as good as a brother," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark. "My goodness, used to say he performed the darning in the pot of the sock. He was as good as a brother, was my goodness, when he was living," said Mrs. Wallace, smiling at her niece's coldly received remark.

J. J. Bell
Author of Jess & Co.

Another amusing personage is Mr. Ogilvy, the village grocer, whose long and laugh-inducing courtship of Mrs. Wallace, tempered with bar and meekness, is a constant source of merriment.

"I think a man's the spiciest thing in the kale of creation," said Mrs. Wallace. "I've heard a hump while now, an—"
"I've heard that said," put in Mr. Ogilvy, quickly. "I've heard it said, 'I've heard a hump while now, an—'"

"I've heard that said," put in Mr. Ogilvy, quickly. "I've heard it said, 'I've heard a hump while now, an—'"

"I've heard that said," put in Mr. Ogilvy, quickly. "I've heard it said, 'I've heard a hump while now, an—'"

"I've heard that said," put in Mr. Ogilvy, quickly. "I've heard it said, 'I've heard a hump while now, an—'"

"I've heard that said," put in Mr. Ogilvy, quickly. "I've heard it said, 'I've heard a hump while now, an—'"

"I've heard that said," put in Mr. Ogilvy, quickly. "I've heard it said, 'I've heard a hump while now, an—'"

"I've heard that said," put in Mr. Ogilvy, quickly. "I've heard it said, 'I've heard a hump while now, an—'"

AN INTERESTING SNAP-SHOT OF KING EDWARD VII. AND SIR GILBERT PARKER TAKEN DURING A RECENT VISIT AT MARIENBAD

The photograph is a snapshot showing King Edward and Sir Gilbert Parker, author of "A Land of Angels," standing together at a recent meeting of the King and the distinguished scientist during a visit to Marienbad. The well-known knight seems very cheerful. (Lewin)

The "Lebaudy I," just before its destruction at Châteaubleau, in November, 1901

A Year's Progress in Flying

By Wilfred de Fonvielle

Author of "Paris Vu et Vol d'Oiseau pendant la Siège," "Aventures Célèbres des Grands Aéroplanes," etc.

IN spite of the public interest of late in the question of aerial navigation, and of the many experiments in this line, little has been said to date of the present state of that sector at the present time. Since 1903 nothing new has, indeed, been introduced, save for the attempts of the Comte de La Vaulx with his balloon Medicæna II, and the recent experiments of the Lebaudy II. Time has been allowed, nevertheless, for a comparison of facts in the previous history of aerial navigation, modifying certain theories as now applied, and conveying some idea of the principles on which the conquest of the air may eventually be attained.

At the Academy of Sciences numerous reports have been read, emanating principally from Colonel Renard who was for nearly twenty years head of the French military balloon park at Châteaubleau. His latest report was to show that the theory of machines heavier than air is possible on the one condition that the weight shall not exceed two grams, or three-hundredths, per horse power. These conclusions were, however, vigorously contested by M. Paul Pacher in the Annuaire Journal of Vienna. Colonel Renard retorted that speed, in which Santos-Dumont devoted himself entirely, is not the only question, but that stability, which Santos-Dumont neglected, is an important factor. Consequently, in a second report, Renard advised adding stability to elongated balloons by providing them with plane surfaces, generally horizontal, intended to decrease the extent of the oscillations. The method seems excellent; though the Colonel forgets that this principle was applied by M. Julliot in building the Lebaudy I, which Renard saw at Meudon, and the wreck of which he, Renard, unwittingly caused. Colonel Renard also dwells upon abstract experiments made by means of cat's-paw measuring instruments. Yet it is known that such experiments signify nothing, since, to be useful, they must be made in the bosom of the aerial ocean itself, and not on the ground.

The successes of the Medicæna II, this year had unhappy results, as might have been foreseen. The Comte de La Vaulx, who directed the expedition, is a daring, intelligent, and clever aviator. But for four years he has been pursuing experiments whose object cannot easily be made clear. Inspired by M. Hérif, de La Vaulx has constructed what he terms a "striated balloon." The experiments made with so much success by M. Béch, the leased director of the Blue Hill Observatory at Boston, proved that the only possible comparison for steamers is the meteorological kite. The Comte de La Vaulx's experiments at Frouin Bay, in the south of Finistère, have unintentionally served further to demonstrate this truth. A spherical balloon provided with a motor and an abnormally large screw, seven centimeters in diameter, was fastened to a torpedo-destroyer. Owing to some unknown circumstance the motor would not work. Consequently, the inner compensating balloon could not operate. The spherical balloon, emptying, offered such energetic resistance to the wind that the destroyer had to release it. Once above terra firma, de La Vaulx opened the valve. As it happened, this was done in a spot difficult of access, surrounded as it was by salt marshes, so that refilling the balloons offered serious difficulties. It appears that de La Vaulx will profit by this costly lesson, for it is said that he intends to build a moderately elongated balloon which he will provide with a screw. If he resumes his former hybrid combination he may reach useful results. It is probable, at all events, that the Minister of Marine, having been bitten once, will not lend official assistance to a second attempt.

Spherical balloons have been regarded to an unwarranted degree by inventors in the line of aerial navigation. Well rigged, they can render great services, and will not spin round if provided with a sufficient rudder. Privately stable, and with none of the drawbacks of elongated balloons, they have against them only the fact that they are exceedingly resistant to the atmosphere, and can therefore attain only a slight degree of velocity. But if, to begin with, one were content with a small speed, say two or three miles per second, a long voyage could be undertaken, permitting the balloon to rise or fall without any great loss of fuel for the motor. These balloons allow for appreciable deviations in the path of the wind, affording opportunities for observing the currents. They resist solar action, enabling the aeronauts to study cataracts. They can also furnish means for resisting the action of rain, fog, snow, etc., and thus the action of all meteorological agents can be ascertained. Moreover, a landing place can more readily be chosen with this model, but as a slow velocity is inevitable, it is unnecessary to load down these balloons with powerful machines, as Hérif did. As the atmospheric resistance is almost nil for a speed of four or five miles per hour, there is a sufficiently wide margin left to operate it without seeking an alliance with torpedobombs.

Many designs for dirigibles are made annually, although few are ever completed, and fewer yet deserve even passing mention. The inventors are prone to forget the fundamental rule for building any automobile balloon—the principle, proven by experience, that the motor must be attached with absolute firmness to a rigid pipe in which the balloon itself is definitely bound. Nor does this essential condition suffice. The shape of the balloon itself must be rendered rigid so as to offer the same resistance it would offer if it were portable. This requisite preoccupied the first engineers who dreamed of realizing mechanical aerial navigation. By the aid of sheet-iron, brass, or steel, they had attempted to solve the great problem. But the absolute impossibility of making appliances of this nature was soon seen, because the envelope would bend and break in all directions. To prevent this result of the considerable dimensions of the balloon, an extreme thickness would have been required for the envelope, and the weight would have prevented the airship from ever leaving the ground. The true and practical solution was indicated in 1793 by General Meunier in a project for dirigibles, and consists in adding to the balloon an inner

Santos-Dumont sitting on Terminus in an Aero Club Balloon, the smallest which ever carried a Passenger

The "Lebaudy II." leaving the Ground.

The "Lebaudy II." in full flight

The "Lebaudy II." coming to Earth with the Aid of the Landing Crew

SNAP-SHOTS OF THE FRENCH FLYING-MACHINE "LEBAUDY II." SHOWING THE MACHINE AT THE START, FINISH, AND DURING THE COURSE OF A TRIAL TRIP

The reader is referred to the article beginning on the opposite page of this number of the "Weekly" for a description of several progress in flying balloon into which air is blown so as to give the envelope sufficient pressure to resist the effects of the atmosphere against which it is driven. But the pressure which can thus be attained without causing the envelope to burst, is limited by the resistance of the smaller envelope. The consequence is that the dirigible balloon driven by a powerful motor can never exceed a certain velocity which depends not only on the motive power and the shape and weight of the propellers, but also on the resistance of the material forming the envelope. These conditions must be fulfilled absolutely. In 1871 they were attempted unsuccessfully. Incredibly, by J. de la Motte. The same arrangements enabled J. de la Motte and Kiech to execute with relative success their experiments at Châteaumeun in 1882 and in 1884-85. But several essential elements were lacking in their balloon, La France, which was not in any respect practical, in spite of the allegations of its authors and of certain members of the Academy of Sciences. To begin with, the propeller was driven by an electric motor too heavy in itself and provided with an electric battery incapable of working for more than a quarter, or, at best, half an hour. Second, having obtained permission to put the model of this battery on the market, could not sell it, and the company which he had organized disappeared after a few years.

The principal advance made by Santos Dumont consisted in replacing the impractical electric motor by a petroleum motor. The experiments made by General Zeppelin over Lake Bodensee, and the accident to Dr. Wellfleet, who was burned to death at Berlin, had shown the dangers of this method. The official arguments at Meudon had not attempted it, and Santos Dumont gave evidence of praiseworthy daring and perseverance in applying it. As he himself has said, he had been an aeronaut, then an automobilist, and finally combined as best he could the two specialties in which he had served his apprenticeship.

But Santos Dumont, like his predecessors, ignored the conditions of aerial stability, and followed the form of the Benard balloon. Instead of a car, he substituted a car in which the balloon of La France was fastened and in which the motor was situated. Santos Dumont merely substituted an armored beam, as he called it—that is to say, a device of several wooden or steel struts joined by cross-pieces of the same material. He thus obtained the remarkable machine which enabled him to win the Deutsch prize, only since that memorable day—October 12, 1902—has the possibility of directing balloons with a velocity of at least eight or ten miles per hour towards a given point been definitely established. The experiments made by the Meudon aeronauts did not occur under such strictly verified conditions, and consequently cannot be accepted as absolutely. The services rendered by Santos Dumont are considerable, and assure for him a lasting reputation, whatever may happen in the future.

Yet while replacing the car by an armored beam very superior in build, the South American aeronaut carried away by the spirit of imitation, and thought fit to use a large screw, situated sometimes before and sometimes behind the balloon, without assuring sufficient stability for it. He endeavored also to attain an increased stability by making two screws, one fore and the other aft; but it is probable that this combination would have proved defective, and that the two distant propellers could not have been synchronized or the rapidity of their rotation suitably modified. The difficulties are quite all the greater by the fact that Santos Dumont insists upon navigating alone, and the number of different things requiring his attention have made it awkward to manage even the small model with which he won the Deutsch prize. He had to survey the position of the guiding-rope which maintained his equilibrium; to watch the inflation of air for the balloon to retain its form; to attend to the cooling obtained by means of a special stream of water; and to see that his motor did not stop, which might have meant death. The presence of a second motor in his machine would have insurmountable obstacles, in that which were already insurmountable. Whatever may have been the origin of the misfortune which occurred to his balloon in the shed at St. Louis, it may be attributed to the special protection of St. Francis, whose death Santos Dumont always weeps, and who may have sent angels in the night to prevent his protégé from running to his death. Apart from this supernatural explanation, another far simpler may be advanced, and that is that the salt air encountered in crossing the sea destroyed the elasticity of the silk and caused it to cut when subjected to the slightest strain. The similarity of the two accidents—whereas Santos Dumont took a dirigible out of France across salt water, first in the Crystal Palace in London and then at St. Louis, would lend some plausibility to this hypothesis. At present it is not known with any certainty whether or not Santos Dumont crossed in Paris his interrupted experiment; but if he does begin again, he should seriously consider assuring the equilibrium of his airship. It is doubtful if he can making an opening in the building and introducing the airship without accident, gas having been lost because the ship ran too or three hundred metres in the air, the necessary appliances for refilling were brought to the Garage des Machines, an admirable balloon house and a week later the Lebadey II came triumphantly out and sailed towards Châteaumeun, as had been decided. The Benard brothers had supplied the necessary gas at cost price from their reservoirs, and the directors of the balloon shed gave the pilot a complimentary visit only day. The wind was blowing from the side, but neither the pilot, M. Juchacz, nor the engineer, M. Julliot, felt any apprehension, the Lebadey having successfully faced such conditions before.

The "Lebadey II" at the Ballonshed at Meudon

The principal difficulties of dirigible ballooning are, as may easily be understood, starting and alighting. The airship must have its head or tail to the wind so long as it is held in the ground, and it must be released under favorable conditions, as the rigging can work only when the balloon is free. Consequently, the Lebadey had sent to Meudon a group of men in an automobile to receive the balloon according to rules. Since airships cannot yet compete with automobiles, the men naturally arrived first on the ground, and stood so as to catch the ropes thrown from the car.

Soon after the airship drew near, battling bravely against a wind whose direction was contrary to that of the Meudon aerodrome. This tailwind, he said in passing, could not have been more unavailingly battled. The inequalities of the soil create a series of air channels which render any maneuvers difficult. No other official aerodrome is similarly placed. In Russia, England, Germany, Spain, Switzerland, and Italy balloon parks all lie in plains. When Juchacz, the pilot, reached the appointed spot, near the forehead of the military balloons, he saw the ropes waiting to the men to catch them. At this critical moment, acting on some inexplicable impulse, Benard, who was in no way concerned in the evolutions, ordered the men to do nothing. Discouraged by this interference, the men shut their eyes, Juchacz had left the engineer to sing, as mine workers do, but when the balloon, left to itself, drifted off and was dashed against a clump of trees.

This accident was very instructive technically, for it shows how great are the precautions necessary in handling dirigibles. Since the wind was of considerable velocity, the tension of the air in the inner balloon, and consequently that of the gas, had notable value. Without this precaution a pocket might have been produced. It is this pressure of air against the balloon which most regulates the progress of the airship. But when the air is exposed to any great internal pressure it becomes fragile as glass, and the least shock causes it to explode. As it struck, the Lebadey II ripped open from one end to the other, and the two men aboard were thrown to the ground, sustaining only slight bruises, since the engine, which fell with them, was extremely heavy. The envelope being destroyed, a new one had to be made, which figures in the 1904 model. The inventors have profited sufficiently by their experience to increase the capacity, so that the Lebadey II may have some 1200 pounds of net aerostatical power. The Benard brothers believe that, with the equipment they have assembled, continuous voyages of six hours. The speed of eleven metres per second seems sufficient, and no effort has been made to increase it.

All the attention of the running aerial campaigns will be concentrated on facilitating the manoeuvres of starting and alighting; and adding further stability by the aid of plane sur-lines as already described. Moreover, the facts of the Leboudy I are noted last year only approximately on maps. M. Julliot has had constructed a photographic and planimetric apparatus so as to decide the position of the air-ship at different determined periods.

The trajectory, with all its variations, will thus be known, according as the propellers are at rest or in movement. By the parallelogram of the power, the absolute value of the mechanical propulsion will be geometrically established. As the number of rotations of the screws can also be registered, the law of efficiency resulting from the resistance of the air can also be determined.

Between the end of July and the middle of August, 1904, the Leboudy II executed seven flights without having a single accident. No particular result was sought, only numerous evolutions being made in the domain selected by the Leboudy brothers for their experiments, who wisely contented themselves with studying all the details of management. In this way M. Julliot may ascertain what improvements could be introduced into the model itself or its handling. Save for the ascension of August 16, in which the ship rose to 120 metres, all the ascensions have been limited to 70 metres, preserving at that altitude a perfect stability. If frightful accidents started the world in 1905, it must be admitted that the victims had neglected all the measures indispensable to assume some degree of security in aerial voyages, which are always filled with difficulties. For it must not be forgotten that gas, with which the balloon is filled, is extremely inflammable.

Sailing the most approved dirigible is like smoking a pipe on a heap of powder. But the ill-starred Severo had built his air-ship so as inexorably to approach the envelope and the engine; the motor occupying a tunnel into which gas poured from all sides. Furthermore, he was totally incompetent in aeronautics. As for Bradsky, his armored hull was defective, his tires were carelessly constructed, and neither he nor his companion, Morin, were aeronauts.

What characterizes in an absolute manner the Leboudy's flights is that they were not calculated according to abstruse analytical reasonings of the Academy of Sciences, but on the practical considerations of an experienced engineer. Julliot separates the different problems one from another. In 1903 he was several times compelled to change his level and rise some hundreds of yards before falling to the earth again. Instead of accomplishing this by the vertical movement, he simply used ballast and his valve.

Messrs. Jachnina and Julliot, the Pilot and Engineer of the "Leboudy I," ready to make a trial trip ity in spite of an ardent sun. On August 16 the Leboudy II sailed round the peninsula in which Mouzon is situated, and covered sixteen kilometres in forty minutes. The screws, it must be said, were not at their maximum speed, making only 1000 revolutions in the straight portions of the trajectory and 800 in the curves, whereas they are capable of 1200 or 1500. On August 17 the ascension also lasted forty minutes, and M. Leboudy, following in an automobile all the movements of the air-ship, preliminarily determined the precise speed and the influence of the winds.

What constitutes the success of the Leboudy models is that the builders have not been contented with placing a screw at the extremity of the long ear, but have adopted a system of two propellers turning in the main plane of the balloon and separated by a considerable distance. The propulsion thus has a basis of operation, the two centres of movement separated one from another giving the balloon two parallel directions. Messrs. Leboudy did not allow themselves to be influenced by the calculations of mathematicians, who condemn, a priori, all models which can be handled.

Their air-ship has, moreover, remarkable intrinsic stability, and is fastened to a circle like a tube of hollow steel to which the material of the envelope is firmly bound. To lend yet greater strength the ear itself is fastened by a system of metallic threads. The air-ship is in this way a uniform whole.

as with an ordinary balloon. In 1904 he will try to replace this costly mode of rising and falling by a more refined and inexpensive method, which can, however, only be used when the horizontal movement has been assured.

If the horizontal movement were overlaid to the vertical, and if a screw were applied to a spherical balloon, the problem would be approached otherwise than by Julliot, and interesting conclusions might be reached. When the vertical has been mastered, it will be time enough to think of the horizontal. Of two methods, one would be to use a screw similar to that of ordinary dirigibles.

The second, still using the old spherical balloon, would be to combine the horizontal and the vertical by rising and falling on inclined planes. All these ways, if slow and tedious, would be sure, no step being taken before the results of the last were realized.

Methodical, systematic, and successive trials, in which the best circumstances are noted, are all that can bring success. It must never be forgotten that in experiments of this nature any error may cause death. This is not a reason to draw back before the conquest of the air. A nobler object is in view—that of competing with air-ships against trains or steamers or automobiles. We must study at close range the phenomenon of the atmosphere, whose laws we are, whose causes we ignore, and which we shall know only when we have solved more fully the problems of aerial flight.

Correspondence

A DISMAL OUTLOOK

NORTON ARABIAN, CHICAGO, ILL., 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—It is a glorious reflection that every State of this Union contains Presidential and Senatorial timber; that every district holds able, conscientious men fit for Congressional honors; that every county has men outside by education and morals to become legislators, magistrates, economists, etc.; men who are modest, devoted to a sense of duty, and incorruptible.

It would seem that after should always seek such men, but it is not so. That such men are so often overlooked or rejected, while the thoughtless majority of voters shows a preference for sharp scheming adventurers; for men who ponder to their vices; who are in the market for votes and ready to sell their influence to the highest bidder. Thus we find in legislative chambers and in executive positions men who have bought or sneaked their way into office, and continue to hold them, not by obedience of duty, but by polling influence where it will do most good—for themselves. The election of this class does not dispirit from the part of the highest office of the government, an applicant is expected to make positions of future payment for present service.

Another shameful condition is that of our jury system, which excludes men of intelligence from the jury box. A crime is committed and evidence is given by witnesses, which is weighed by people read, and from which they form opinions more or less correct. Such people are ready and willing to change their opinions upon satisfactory evidence, but the law and practice of the courts say no. An opinion once formed cannot be altered, hence juries must be composed of illiterate men who do not read, or who, having once formed an opinion, cannot possibly be induced to change it; men who have no skill in analyzing evidence and who naturally side with the advocate of their preference. Unfortunately our lawmakers, generally of this class, deprive themselves the opportunities for fame and fortune depend on eloquent elucubrations of intricate statutes, and the more intricate and perplexing these are the more room for glory and profit.

We can foresee no cure for this unfortunate condition except in the moral and intellectual elevation of the people and in the restriction of unit voters; either of which remedies is a long way off in the distant future. I am, sir,

JAMES R. CRADDOCK.

PRaise for MR. ROOSEVELT FROM TEXAS

MEMPHIS, TEXAS, October 3, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—I have been mainly interested, and to some extent benefited by your very able summary of Mr. Pulitzer's arraignment of the present administration, but I cannot but feel that a certain injustice is accomplished therein to Mr. McKinley's administration. I honor constitute themselves the supporters of Mr. Roosevelt for a second term, by a tacit approval of Mr. Pulitzer's deductions. If not the major premise, upon which he bases his arguments. We are too prone to overlook the basic principle that the "other side" is not entirely untrue.

Now without oversteering the superiority or inferiority of either candidate, without asserting the existence or the value of a permanent issue, I should like to have your opinion as to the ultimate value of any production in one either candidate is elected. Do you think the actions of the present chief have been such that actions almost diametrically opposed would have been more beneficial? Or do you believe that the Democratic nominee can possibly fully satisfy the wishes of his party without becoming even more revolutionary in character than his predecessor?

Referring to Mr. Pulitzer's charges, could any sane man expect a man of Mr. Roosevelt's personality and record to descend or even exert forceably to such subjects as "Economic Retrenchment, and Reform" without giving equivalent? Mr. Roosevelt is indeed certainly a man with the courage of his convictions. If this is a trait to be deplored in a Chief Magistrate, then I think that Mr. Roosevelt erred in omitting the word "reform." Granting the excess of national expenditures over those of Mr. McKinley's administration, we must not overlook that Mr. McKinley's administration was uniformly red. It does not go without saying that the expenditures would not have occurred had Mr. McKinley lived. It is not at all unlikely that deepened complex economic causes effected certain conditions, favoring the rise of the present administration. It might be well to explain what portion of the national expenditures during Mr. Roosevelt's administration might be properly termed pure extravagance; such expenditures by which the nation at large is in no particular benefited, and never can be, and against which the vast majority would have voted had the question been proposed to them, or would now vote to relegate the results to complete oblivion.

It may be that the President is personally responsible for the actions of his cabinet, which constitutional responsibility is now being hurled upon exclusively by those who at the same time accuse him of most flagrant disregard of constitutional limitations, but I see no just reasons for laying at his door the actions of certain employees towards employees, or vice versa, as the case may be. If I understand aright, our free-trade advocates attribute labor dissensions, reduction in wage schedule and similar economic conditions which are unfavorable, to protection, as the resultant evil. I believe that Mr. Roosevelt entered upon his administration under the misapprehension of a party advocating such protection, and would actually have been in entirely like view, which he can be expected to renege at the will diametrically opposed. Whether Secretary Morton may not have done some entering the cabinet, or Secretary Metcalf, or Postmaster-General Payne, it is of little consequence what business they were engaged in previously, for what body of men capable of occupying such important positions, have not corruptly yielded to high political influences, the attitude of which luxuriously regards in an optimistic light any legislative government favorable to themselves. Also why not weigh Mr. Moody's inaction against Mr. Knox's very cynical activity, while he held the position of Attorney-General during the tenure of Mr. Roosevelt's administration?

I have not read the letter of the Cuban dinner, but if I am to infer that the letter extracts which you quote may serve as a fair example of the whole, then I would say that the power of the Executive is being steadily and to the extent Mr. Roosevelt never dreamed of stretching the Monroe Doctrine.

Now I believe that Mr. Roosevelt is as much more as politician, and such a being, who, as I said before, has the courage of his convictions, can be expected at times to allow his humanity to submit to transcendent law better judged than his policy. If ever persistence his policy in the race question may seem to me, as a Southerner, I admit that he must have acted as he thought best, and as every President of these United States must think as long as "Equal rights to all, and special privileges to none" is embodied in our Constitution. The same virtue are held, and the same indiscretions are being committed by some of our greatest statesmen, and educators, who might be supposed to be in position to exercise greater freedom of action. This is all admitting to the Southern, but not the Northern, side of the question, on ill-considered policy. You would find very few of the South's younger generation who would be willing to go into a reunion of Confederate veterans and express a candid view of their opinions as to the late civil war. It would be bad policy. Also a certain feeling which it might be in good taste for our Northern friends to misimulate.

Believing that, in any event, there can be no radical reforms that will perpetuate peace and good-will as a rule,

I am, sir,

S.

THE "COMMON LAW" REMEDY

WILLIAM A. BROWN, CHICAGO, ILL., 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Judge Parker, in his speech of acceptance, said: "The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court of Appeals of this State, and the courts of last resort in many other States, warrant the assertion that the common law has developed a complete legal remedy against monopolies."

President McKinley, in his speech of acceptance, said: "There is no common law of the United States. Its rules can be enforced only by the State courts and officers. No Federal court or officers could take any action whatever under them."

The Supreme Court of the United States differs from President McKinley and agrees with Judge Parker.

The case of Western Union Telegraph Company v. Call Publishing Company, 181 United States, page 92; the plaintiff sued the telegraph company for unjust discrimination against it, and in favor of the State Journal Company. The telegraph company, among other things, contended "that there is no national common law." The Supreme Court, in answering this contention, used this language: "There is no body of Federal common law separate and distinct from the common law existing in several States, in the sense that there is a body of statute law enacted by Congress separate and distinct from the body of statute law enacted by several States. But it is an entirely different thing to hold that there is no common law in force generally throughout the United States, and that the countless multitude of interstate commercial transactions are subject to no rules, and bounded by no restrictions, other than those expressed by the statutes of Congress."

In this same case the court referred, with marked approval, the decision of Judge Shiras, in the case of Murray v. Chicago and Northwestern Railway, 22 Federal, page 34. Judge Shiras, in questioning doctrines of 1 Peters, 441; 1 Howard, 314; 100 United States, 219; 102 United States, 14; 21 Howard, 481; 17 Wallace, 357; 22 United States, 367 and 270; 110 United States, 167; 149 United States, 368, showing that there is a common law existing in the Federal courts and officers, used this language:

"Citations of this character, from the decisions of the Supreme Court might be continued almost without limit. From them it appears, beyond question, that the Constitution, the judiciary act of 1789, and all subsequent statutes upon the same subject are based upon the general principle of the common law, and act to a large extent the legislative and judicial action of the government would be without support, and without meaning, if they were not interpreted in the light of the common law. When the Constitution was adopted, it was not the design of the framers thereby, but to create a system of government, and the system of rights already in existence. At that time there were in existence, and in force in the colonies, or States, and among the people thereof, the law of nations, the law of admiralty and maritime commerce, the law, including the law, including the law, and the system of rights. Upon these foundations the Constitution was erected."

Further along, in the same opinion, Judge Shiras says: "The Constitution does not place under national control the law of nations, and of admiralty, and under State control, common law, and equity, which are the subject of government control, and each subject carries with it the law or system appropriate thereto."

Possibly the President had in mind the well-known doctrine "that there are no common-law offenses against the United States."

See actually Shiras v. Call Publishing Co., 184 United States, 167. It is certain that he is in error when he says "there is no common law of the United States."

I am, sir,

WILLIAM A. BROWN.

THE TRIANGLE

BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS

In the opening chapter Pamela Marple is introduced to the reader as a young society woman of London, beautiful and of rare personal charm. Later one night Pamela and Alan Warburton, who is in love with her, observe a young couple, waiting the spouse alone. They are Tony and Millie Keston, his life is a always have preceded over by the rich but unjust father of the young man. They are in reality kept prisoners by the wishes of the tyrannical old man, and it is only by taking flight and going out by stealth into the night that they are able to share in all bits the life of the outside world. But finally they learn of their momentous life, and Tony determines to go in America to make his fortune. In his absence, Millie becomes infatuated with Lionel Colton, a gentlemanly misadventurer. Pamela takes to help her. She sends Warburton on a mission to find Tony and bring him home. Warburton finds that Tony, hidden but all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the North Sea on a steamer. Warburton now every attempt to prevail upon him to come back but he refuses. Tony remains on the steamer until the term of his cruise is over, immovable having learned of his father's death, and then decides to return to the French Foreign Legion, his only other career open to him. John Madge, a friend of Pamela's, learns from her of the peril Millie is in from Colton, the large son of Colton's debt and gives them in the hands of a group of his soldiers, who include on a settlement within twenty-four hours. Colton receives a proposition from Madge to participate in a business enterprise of the latter's in Cuba, which his financial difficulties compel him to accept. Colton returns from a visit and persuades Millie to go with him, with the understanding that she will have an official to report to her. Tony, who is in the North Sea, learns of this and decides to go in search of Tony, and he gladly accepts. Pamela goes to Bournemouth, which she had visited as a young girl, and with these letters of the press, she returns to Bournemouth, where she is met with a group of soldiers on an expedition across the forest of Bournemouth, and on the evening of the same day she is taken to a room at the hotel. At that moment Warburton arrives with a letter from Pamela. Tony reads the letter, and decides to desert the legion, with which he has enlisted for five years, and he returns to Bournemouth. Tony leaves Warburton at Madge's house, and goes on to Bournemouth, arriving there in time to meet Pamela, who informs him that Millie has also just arrived. Tony suspects that Lionel Colton is there too, and he goes to see Pamela. She confesses, and he leaves her at once to find Colton. Pamela then herself writes a note to Colton, and starts for the village with it. She calls on it, and finds an old woman who she had known during her first visit to Bournemouth, and requests him to deliver her note to Colton. Meanwhile, Tony goes to see in search of his wife and Lionel Colton. He surprises them dining together in a private room at the hotel and orders Colton out, telling him that he is Millie's husband. Colton refuses to leave, and Tony knocks him down. Millie protests that she is guilty, Colton is an assassin, and is removed by the soldiers, while Tony, left alone with his wife, tells her of the events of his life since they have been separated. He then asks her for an account of her own life during the same period. She says she will tell him everything on their way back to Eton, and they leave the restaurant together.

CHAPTER XXIII

MILLIE'S STORY

THEY walked for a while in silence, side by side, yet not so close but that there was an interval between them. Millie every now and then glanced at Tony's face, but she saw only his profile, and with only the glimmer of the starlight in white hair for a reading lamp she could guess nothing of his expression. But he walked like a man under a heavy burden, and his steps were slow and heavy. The hopes, so stoutly cherished during the last few years, had all crumbled away to nothing. Perpetually his thoughts returned to that question, which now never could be answered—did he really go into the French Foreign Legion at that distant evening, when he had been contented to pass for a little while beneath the windows, would he have averted the trouble which had reached its crisis tonight at the Bournemouth? He thought not—he was not sure; only he was certain that he should have gone in the street, and turned back, looking into the eyes of the man who was looking steadily into his eyes. The story will sound very trivial, very contemptible, after what you have told me. It fills me utterly with shame. But I should have told you it none the less had you not asked for it—I rather wish that you had not asked for it, for I think I must have told you of my own accord."

She spoke in a quick, troubled voice, but it did not waver; nor did her eyes once fall from his. The change in her was small, no doubt, but that down there in the Bournemouth, where the lights were out, and the sea echoed through empty rooms, she had had stern and savage thoughts. Terror, humiliation, and the spectacle of violence had torn away a veil from before her eyes. She saw her own life in its true perspective. And that she might see it the more clearly and understand, she had the story of another life, wherewith to compare it. It was a quality of her performance, whether in art or life, that while they surprise when first apprehended, they appear upon thought to be so simple that it is astonishing surprise was very little. Something of that quality Tony's career possessed. It had come upon Millie as a revelation, yet, after all, she was thinking: "Yes, that is what Tony would do. How is it I never guessed?" She put him side by side with that other man, the warrior of the drawing-rooms, and she was filled with shame that she could ever have preferred the latter even for a moment of madness.

They walked slowly on again. Millie drew her face more closely about her throat.

"Are you cold?" asked Tony. "You are lightly clothed in talking here. We had better perhaps walk on, and keep what you have to tell me to yourself." "I am not cold. And I must tell you what I have to tell you tonight. I want all this bad, foolish part of my life to end tonight, to be extinguished just as these lights were extinguished a minute since. Only there is something I should like to say to you first." Millie's voice wavered now and broke. "If we do not walk along the road together any more," she went on, timidly, "I will still be glad that you came back tonight. I do not know that you will believe that I do not, indeed, see why you should; but I should very much like you to believe it for it is the truth. I have learned a good deal. I think, during the last three hours. I would rather go on alone if it is to be so—in this dim clean starlight, than over her back again in the little room with its lights and flowers. Do you see devoted me?"

"I think so," said Tony. "At all events, the road is visible ahead," she went on, "the sea is glimmering, one can keep between the banks; while in the little lighted room it is easy to get lost."

And thus in Millie's way, as in Pamela when she rode back from her last interview with Warburton at the village of the three poplars, the rhododendron of white road stretching away in the dusk became a parable.

"Yes," said Tony, "perhaps my path was really the easier one to follow. It was direct and plain."

"Ah," said Millie, "it only seems so because you have traversed it, and are looking back. I do not think it was so simple and direct while you walked upon it." And Tony, remembering the denials and perplexities which had besieged him, could not but assent.

"I do not think, too, that it was so easy to discover at the beginning."

"These two before Tony's eyes the picture of a ketch-rigged boat sailing at night over a calm sea. A man leaned over the bulwarks, and the bright glare from a lightship ran across the waves and flashed upon his face. Tony remembered the moment very clearly when he had first hit upon his plan; he remembered the weeks of anxiety of which it was the outcome. No, the road had not been easy to find at the beginning. He was silent for a minute, and then he said, quietly:

"I am sorry that I asked you to tell your story—I am sorry that I did not leave the decision to you. But it shall be as though you told it of your own accord."

The sentence was a reassurance, so less in the manner of its utterance than in the words themselves. Millie took heart, and told him the whole story of her dealings with Lionel Colton, with all excuses and without conclusions.

"I seemed to mean so much to him, so little to you," she said.

"You see, I did not understand you at all. You were away, too, and he was near. I do not defend myself."

She did not spare herself, she taxed her memory for the details of her days; and as she spoke the story seemed more utterly complete and small than even she in her absence had imagined it would be. But she struggled through with it to the end.

"That night when you stood beneath the awning in Berkeley Square," she said, "he was with me. He ran in from Lady Millingham's party and talked with me for half an hour. Yes, at the very time when you were standing on the pavement he was within the house. I know, for you were seen, and on the next day I was told of your presence. I was afraid then. The news was a shock to me. I thought, 'Suppose you had come in!'"

"But, look there, in the room," Tony interrupted, "you told me that you wished I had come in."

"Yes," she answered, "and it is quite true. I wish now that you had come in."

She told him of the drive round Regent's Park, and of the consent she gave that night to Laurel Callan.

"I think you know everything now," she said. "I have tried to forget nothing. I want you, whatever you decide to do, to decide knowing everything."

"Thank you," said Tony, simply. And she added:

"I am not the first woman I know who has thrown away the substance for the shadow."

Upon the rest of that walk little was said. They went forward beneath the stars. A great rain lay upon sea and land. The hills were dark and high upon their left hand, the sea murmured and whispered to them upon the right. Millie walked even more slowly as they neared the hotel at last, and Tony turned to her with a question.

"You are tired?"

"No," she answered.

She was thinking that very likely she would never walk again on any road with Tony at her side, and she was minded to prolong this last walk to the last possible moment. For in this one night Tony had transformed her. It was not merely that his story had filled her with amazement and pride; but she had seen him that night strong and dominant, as she had never dreamed of seeing him. She loved his very firmness towards herself. Not once had he spoken her name and called her "Millie." She had watched for that and longed for it, and yet because he had not used it she was the more to worship. Once she said to him with a start of anxiety:

"You are not staying here under your own name?"

"No," he replied. "A friend has taken rooms in Monte Carlo for both of us. Only his name has been given."

"And you will leave France to-morrow?"

"Yes."

"Promised?" she cried.

Tony promised, with a look of curiosity at his wife. Why should she be so eager for his safety? He did not understand. He was wondering what he must do in this crisis of their lives. Was he to come, in spite of all his efforts, to that ordinary compromise which it had been his object to avoid?

They reached the door of the hotel and there Tony halted.

"Good night!" he said; he did not hold out his hand. He stood confronting Millie with the light from the hall lamp falling full upon his face. Millie hoped that he would say something more—just a little word of kindness or forgiveness—if only she waited long enough without answering him; and she was willing to wait until the morning came. He did indeed speak again, and then Millie was sorry that she had waited. For he said the one really cruel thing among all the words he had said that night. He was not aware of its cruelty; he was only conscious of its truth.

"Do you know," he said—and upon his tired face there came a momentary smile—"to-night I miss the Legion very much."

"Good night," he said.

This time Millie answered him; and in an instant he was gone. She could have cried out; she could hardly restrain her voice from calling him back to her. "Was this

1854-1904

WALTHAM WATCHES

ALWAYS FAITHFUL

Everyone knows that WALTHAM watches are standard. Few people realize the variety or volume of the product of the AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY. There are more than forty varieties of movements, each designed with reference to its use or the occupation of the wearer.

For sale by all Jewelers

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY.
WALTHAM, MASS.

A NEW EDITION

How to Get Strong and How to Stay So

By WILLIAM BLAINE

A valuable book, with practical, common-sense directions that can be followed by any one. HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, NEW YORK CITY. $1.00 net (postage extra)

THE EQUITABLE

HENRY B. HYDE
PRESIDENT

J. W. ALLEN
VICE PRESIDENT

J. B. HYDE
VICE PRESIDENT

STRONGEST IN THE WORLD

HARNESS THE POWER!

Why not utilize that part of your income now going to waste? By taking an Endowment policy in the Equitable you will protect your family and provide for your own mature years.

Simplified opportunities for men of character to act as representatives. Write to GAGE & TAYLOR, 222 West Broadway.

For full information fill out this coupon, or write:

THE EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES
120 Broadway, New York Dept. No. 20

Please send me information regarding an Endowment for $... I am ... years of age.

Name, ... Address, ...

the end!" she asked. "That one cruel sentence and then the commonplace good night, without as much as a touch of the hand. Was that the very end?" A sharp fear stilled her. For a few moments she heard Tony's footsteps upon the flags in front of the hotel, and then for a few moments upon the gravel of the garden path; and after that she heard only the murmur of the sea. And all at once for her the world was empty. "Was this the end?" she asked herself again most pitiously: "this, which might have been the beginning." Slowly she went up to her room. Sleep did not visit her that night.

CHAPTER XXIV

THE NEXT MORNING

THERE was another she kept a vigil all the night. In the Villa Pontgarden Pamela Maridale saw from her window the morning break, and wondered in dread what had happened upon that lonely terrace by the sea. She drew and went down into the garden. As yet the world was gray and cool, and something of its quietude entered into her and gave her peace. A light mist hung over the sea, lands sang sweetly in the trees, and from the chimneys of Roquebrune the blue smoke began to curl. In the lonely song, genuine of that blue smoke Pamela found a comfort. She watched it for a while, and then there came a flash of rose upon the crests of the hills. The mist was swept away from the face of the sea, shadows and light suddenly ran down the hillside, and the waves gleamed with a sparkle of gold. The sun had risen. Pamela saw a man coming up the open slope from Roquebrune to the villa. It was M. Girard. She ran to the gate and met him there.

"Well?" she asked. And he answered, sadly:

"I arrived too late."

The color went from Pamela's cheeks. She set a hand upon the gate to steady herself. There was an expression of utter consternation on her face.

"Too late, I mean," the schoolmaster explained hurriedly, "to help you, to be of any real service to you. But the harm done is perhaps not as great as you fear."

He described to her what he had seen—

Lionel Colton lying outstretched and insensible upon the pavement, Tony and Missie Station within the room.

"We removed M. Colton to his bedroom," he said. "Then I fetched a doctor. He will be ill for a little time, but he will get well."

"And the man and the woman?" Pamela asked, eagerly. "The two within the room? What of them?"

"They were standing opposite to one another." The schoolmaster had not seen Missie on her knees. "A chair was overturned, the chair in which she had sat. She was in great distress, and, I think, afraid; but she spoke quietly." He described how he had offered Tony the letter, and how Tony had closed the door of the room upon the waiters.

"The manager did not know what to do, whether to send for help or not. But I did not think that there was any danger to the woman in the room, and I urged him to do nothing."

"Thank you," said Pamela, gratefully. "Indeed, you were in time to help me."

But even then she did not know how much she was indebted to the schoolmaster's advice. She was thinking of the scandal which must have arisen had the police been called in, of the pale face of Missie's folly to the world of her neighborhood. That was prevented now. If Tony took back his wife—as with all her heart she hoped he would—she would not, at all events, take back one of whom gossip would be speaking with a slighting tongue. She was not aware that Tony had desisted from his efforts to keep his trust upon the thirty-first of the month. Afterwards, when she did learn this, she was glad that she had not looked warmly when she had expressed her gratitude to M. Girard. A look of pleasure came into the schoolmaster's face.

"I am very glad," he said. "When I brought the doctor back the two within the room were talking quietly together; we could hear their voices through the door. So I came away. I walked up to the villa here, but it was already late, and the lights were not—except in our room on an upper floor looking over the sea—that room," and he pointed to a window.

"Yes, that is my room," said Pamela. "I thought it was likely to be yours, and I hesitated whether I should ring up a stone; but I was not sure that it was your room. So I determined to wait until the morning. I am sorry, for you have been very anxious and have not slept—I can see that. I could have saved you some hours of anxiety."

Pamela laughed, and the laugh told her surely that his distress had gone from her.

"That does matter," she said. "You have brought me very good news. I could well afford to wait for it."

The schoolmaster remained in an awkward hesitation at the gate; it was clear he had something more to say. It was no less clear that he found the utterance of it very difficult. Pamela guessed what was in his mind, and, after her own fashion, she helped him to speak it. She opened the gate, which up till now had stood closed between them.

"Come in for a little while, won't you?" she said; and she led the way through the garden to that narrow passage in the bluff of the hill which had so many associations for them both. If M. Girard seemed to say what she thought he did here was the one place where utterance would be easy. It here they had interchanged, in other times, their innermost thoughts, their most sacred confidences. The stone parapet, the bench, the plot of grass, the cedar in the angle of the corner—among these familiar things memories and throbs for him even as they did for her. Pamela sat down upon the parapet and, leaning over, gazed into the torrent far below. She wished him to take his time. She had a thought that even if he had not in his mind that utterance which she hoped to hear, the recollection of those other days, richly renewed, might suggest it. And in a moment or two he spoke.

"It is true, mademoiselle, that I was of service to you last night."

"Yes," replied Pamela, gravely: "that is quite true."

"I am glad," he continued. "I shall have that to remember. I do not suppose that I shall see you often any more. Very likely you will not come back to Roquebrune—very likely I shall never see you again. And if I do not, I should like you to know that last night will make a difference to me."

He was now speaking with a simple directness. Pamela raised her face towards his. He could see that his words greatly rejoiced her; a very tender smile was upon her lips.

She rose from the Parapet, and went forward to meet him.

All over the civilized world
THE IMPROVED
BOSTON
GARTER
 IS KNOWN AND WORN
 Every Pair Warranted
 The Best is stamped on every loop—
 The Velvet Grip
 CUSHION BUTTON
CLASP
 Lies flat to the leg—never Slips, Tears nor Unfastens
 ALWAYS EASY
 GEO. FROST CO., Makers,
 Boston, Mass., U. S. A.
 REFUSE ALL SUBSTITUTES

the GAME
Sherlock Holmes
 MYSTERY NOVELS
 THE LATEST
CRAZE
 LAUGHABLE, EXCITING
 ENTIRELY NEW.
 SOLD EVERYWHERE. PRICE 50c A PACK
PARKER BROTHERS INC.
 150 N. W. 15th St. N. Y. C.

THE LATEST
CRAZE
 LAUGHABLE, EXCITING
 ENTIRELY NEW.
 SOLD EVERYWHERE. PRICE 50c A PACK
PARKER BROTHERS INC.
 150 N. W. 15th St. N. Y. C.

Williams'
Shaving Stick signifies—Perfection.
 Williams' Shaving Stick, Shaving
 Tablets, Toilet Water, Toilet Powder, Jersey Cream, Toilet
 Soap, etc., sold everywhere
 Write for booklet "How to Shave"
 THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO.
 CHANDLER, CONN.

A feminine delight—
Whitman's
 Chocolates
 and Confections
 Sold everywhere.
 Institutions
 Chocolates.
 Write for booklet with recipe with 1000 Chocolates, N. Y. C.
 Philadelphia 1911.

gotten that lesson learned on the North Sea.
 I had a fear this morning (that he had).
 "And yet?" said Warriden, putting his question at last.
 Pamela moved away from the door until they were out of ear-shot. Then she said:
 "I will take my risks too." Her eyes dwelt quietly upon her companion, and she added: "And I think the risks are very small."

To be Continued.

Training Horses for War Service

(Continued from page 1576.)

reeding test holding out to him a tempting loaf of corn.

But although judicious force is used, it need not be supposed that the horses are terrified or frightened, unless this is absolutely necessary. On the contrary, they are taught to overcome their natural dread of deep water by quite close degrees. Some of them are so terrified at the prospect that they will not even wet their fetlocks at first, but plant their trembling legs resolutely a few feet away from the water.

They are then ridden gently up and down the edge, and constantly kept within sight of the big sheet of water. Gradually they are ridden a little way into it, and soon are quite comfortable when wading along up as far as their knees. A few days later the "pupil" finds that it is not so terrible, after all, as he was at first, and he looks with just his head above the water, and his asked teacher swimming at his side with one arm about his neck.

From this stage to that in which the animal is taken beyond his depth and swims a little way automatically is but short. The horse is never swum until tired, however, but taken away and rested to be brought back next day. One raw "pupil" is as much as one man can look after at a time, but when the animals are a little advanced in their training, several of them are put under the instruction of one man. As they find themselves able to swim longer and longer distances, the collapsible canvas boats are again brought into requisition.

And this time the teachers themselves get into the boats and tether therein the swimming horses, of which there may be quite a dozen, swimming strongly for quite a long distance. The result of this training is that during military maneuvers on a large scale, the cavalry, on arriving at a broad and deep river, plunges in with confidence, caring little about the depth of the stream, and wading or swimming to the opposite bank without the least suspicion of panic or disorder.

If a stream is very broad the rider usually dismounts and swims at the side of his horse, with one arm resting on his neck.
 Arriving at the opposite bank, the animal usually displays great intelligence in selecting a landing-place, where he clambers up and out, there to shake himself and wait until his dripping rider is ready to mount.

Quite as important as the swimming instruction of the cavalry-horse "pupil" is that of the commissariat animals and those of the hospital department. For it would be a serious thing if these animals, during the passage of a flooded stream lost their heads and drowned, or were thrown into such a panic as seriously to interfere with the movements of the other animals and men.

It need hardly be said that the men at Aldershot entrusted with the education of these horses belong exclusively to the veterinary department, and are thoroughly well accustomed to handling every kind of horse, no matter what his temper or from what country he has come. They are also expert swimmers, and the whole operation is conducted under the immediate supervision of the captain or major of the veterinary department.

Of course it very frequently happens that a "pupil" more capriciously than a human turns out a discolored disease and a total failure, being absolutely unable to conquer his aversion to the water. When this is demonstrated to the "professor," the animal is given up as hopeless, and relegated to other Aldershot duties, such as the hauling of captive limbade, or the wagons containing tubs of gas whereby they are filled on the field of nimble battle.

George Frisbie Hoar

GEORGE FRISBIE HOAR, senior U. S. Senator from Massachusetts, died at his home in Worcester on September 20. Senator Hoar served in the Senate for twenty-seven years.
 He was born at Uxbridge, Massachusetts, on August 23, 1826. He received his education at the local academy, and at Harvard University, from which he was graduated in 1846. After a course in the Harvard Law School he took up the practice of his profession in Worcester. He was elected to the Massachusetts House of Representatives in 1851, and six years later was elected a member of the State Senate. He became at

George Frisbie Hoar.

lawyer for the city of Worcester in 1849, and in 1860 was chosen to represent his district in the national House of Representatives. He was elected a United States Senator in 1870, and took his seat in March of the following year. Senator Hoar had been president of the Harvard Alumni Association from 1900 until the time of his death. He was also an overseer of the university and a member of the Southwestern Institution, his ideas being a number of numerous historical and scientific associations.
 He held the degree of Doctor of Laws from Yale, Harvard, Amherst, and William and Mary universities.

Do the N-Rays Exist?

At a recent meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science a discussion of the so-called N-rays took place which was remarkable in that their existence was practically denied by the German and British physicists present. The N-rays, it will be remembered, are a form of radiation first noticed and described by Blondlot in 1903, and produced in many and various ways, such as by the nerves of the human body, by plants, by inanimate bodies, and are detected by an increase in the luminescence of a fluorescent screen on which they fall. The experiments of Blondlot were repeated and extended by a number of French scientists, and have been officially noticed by the French Academy. On the other hand, British and German investigators have uniformly failed in their attempts to detect the new radiation, and believe that the phenomenon are for the greater part subjective and depend entirely on the observer. This brings about a most curious state of affairs, as we find the scientists of one nation denying a certain group of investigations which are disputed by those of other nations. Nevertheless, the French physicists are persisting in their work, and with further experiments they may be able to convince even the foreign doubters.

THE ORIGINAL STORIES OF Sherlock Holmes

By A. CONAN DOYLE

The Immortal Detective's First Exploits

These are the original Sherlock Holmes stories which made Sir Conan Doyle famous and gave to literature the unique character of Sherlock Holmes, now a household name the world over. You have probably read some of these stories—everybody, at one time or another, has read some of them; but now for the first time they are gathered—twenty-five in all—and published in

A Uniform Set—Three Volumes

They are printed in large type, beautifully bound in cloth, with gilt tops, untrimmed edges, and cover decorations in gold—suited to the finest library, yet sold on small monthly payments at a price within the reach of all.

Twenty-Four Full-Page Illustrations

including the latest portrait of the author, reproduced upon ivory-tinted paper, are an attractive feature of the books, and picture the most interesting and crucial moments of the great detective's thrilling career. An introduction by James MacArthur tells how Sherlock Holmes came into being.

Contents of the Three Volumes

INTRODUCTION BY JAMES MACARTHUR		SILVER BLAZE
THE SIGN OF THE FOUR		THE STOCK-BROKER'S CLEN
A STUDY IN SCARLET		THE MURDERER'S RIVAL
A SCANDAL IN BOHEMIA		THE CHOCOLATE MAN
THE RED-HEADED LEAGUE		THE GREEN INTERPRETER
A CASE OF IDENTITY		THE YELLOW FACE
THE BOSCOMBE VALLEY MYSTERY		THE "GLORIA SCOTT"
THE MAN WITH THE TWISTED LIP		THE REIGATE PUZZLE
THE ADVENTURE OF THE BLUE CARREUNCLE		THE RESIDENT PATIENT
THE ADVENTURE OF THE SPECKLED BAND		THE NAVAL TREATY
THE ADVENTURE OF THE ENGINEER'S TRIUMPH		THE FINAL PROBLEM
THE ADVENTURE OF THE NOBLE BACHELOR
THE ADVENTURE OF THE BEERY CORONET
THE ADVENTURE OF THE COPPER BECHES

OUR OFFER

On receipt of $1.00 we will send you THE SHERLOCK HOLMES STORIES in three handsome volumes, all charges prepaid, and we will enter your name for one year's subscription for either HARPER'S WEEKLY, HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S BAZAR, or THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $1.00 every month for five months. The total cost to you for the complete set and the periodical for one year is Six Dollars. In writing state which periodical you wish.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Schlitz

We Guard Its Purity

We who own Schlitz beer are men who brew it.

One of us buys the materials—to get the best that are grown.

Two of us superintend the brewing. The owners of the business maintain the absolute cleanliness. We cool the beer in filtered air. We age it for months, so it cannot cause biliousness. We sterilize every bottle after it is sealed.

We who fixed this high standard are the ones who watch and maintain it.

The result is pure beer—the costliest and best beer that's brewed. Yet it costs you nothing extra, save remembering to say "Schlitz." Ask for the brewery bottling.

The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARPER

HARPER BROTHERS

NEW YORK

THEODORE ROOSEVELT—PRESIDENT

At One with the People

"OUR President has taken the whole people into his confidence. Inexplicable of direction, he has put, cool, candidly, frankly and without reserve, he has told them what their government was doing, and the reasons. It is no campaign of appearances upon which he enters, for the people know the good and the bad, the success and failure, to be credited and charged to our account. It is no campaign of sounding words and specious promises. Our President has told the people with frankness what he believed and what he intended. He has said every word he said, and the people have believed every word he said, and with him this conversation agrees because every word has been sound Republican doctrine. No people can maintain free government who do not in their hearts value the qualities which have made the present President of the United States competent among the men of his time as a type of noble manhood. None what may have cause that once in November, find good that those qualities of brave, true manhood shall have been throughout America, shall be held for an example in every hour, and that the youth of our nation to come may grow up to feel that it is better than wealth, or office, or power, to have the honesty, the purity, and the courage of Theodore Roosevelt."—Elton Root.

President Roosevelt and the Canal

"THE work of Canal construction will be speedily inaugurated and pushed with the energy and resources of the Government to the earliest practicable completion, no construction long dreamed of by statesmen and long prayed for by citizens. It is not to be expected that the harsh voice of criticism will be heard until next November. That need not and will not disturb the President. He may take to himself with exultant pride the role assurance that this triumph is an executive achievement which he has wrought for his country, for the South American Republics, and for the enduring foundation of his name; and it will not be forgotten by history in praise of him that out of his prompt and wise action there has also come, without breach of national tradition, violation of national or international law, a new Republic, adding to a long suffering people on the Isthmus opportunities of life, liberty, and prosperity. For it all he deserves and will receive and only the plaudits of thoughtful men of our own day, but the grateful remembrance of posterity."—John C. Spooner.

In the Philippines

"IN dealing with the Philippine people we must show both patience and strength, forbearance and steadfast resolution. Their aim is high. We do not desire to do for the islanders merely what has elsewhere been done for foreign peoples by the old foreign governments. We hope to do for them what is more before than for any people of the Tropics—to make them fit for self-government. To fulfill the really free nations."—Theodore Roosevelt.

Guarding the Gold Standard

"IT is idle to say that the monetary Standard of the Nation is irreversibly fixed so long as the party which in the last election had approximately forty-six per cent. of the total vote refuses to put in its platform any statement that the question is settled. A determination to remain silent cannot be accepted as equivalent to a renunciation. Until our opponents as a party explicitly admit the views which we hold and upon which we have acted and are acting, in the matter of a sound money, the only way to keep the question from becoming unsettled is to keep the Republican party in power."—Theodore Roosevelt.

In the Financial World

"EX-Secretary ROOT in his address as temporary chairman in no wise overdraw the great qualities of President Roosevelt: if anything, he rather undervalued the services rendered to this country by the Roosevelt administration. When, at the instance of President Roosevelt, the litigation against the Northern Securities Company was begun, I thought an error of judgment had been committed, but the course of events has borne out his wisdom and gives justification to the President's course in this important instance. I feel very certain that there is a strong feeling in conservative financial circles that in any case of emergency President Roosevelt will be found on the safe side."—From an interview with Jacob H. Schiff, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

A Welcome Issue

"WE could desire no better fortune, in the campaign upon which we are entering, than that the other side should persist in their announced intention to make the issue upon President Roosevelt. What a godsend to our nation! It takes some study, some research, to talk about the tariff, or the currency, or foreign policy. But to talk about Roosevelt! It is as easy as to sing 'the glory of the Gracians.' Of gentle him and loving, yet a champion of the people in the best sense; with the training of a scholar and the breezy accessibility of a ranchman; a man of the library and a man of the world; an athlete and a scholar; a soldier and a statesman; a reader, a writer, and a maker of history; with the sensibility of a poet and the steel nerve of a rough rider; one who never did, and never could, turn his back on a friend or an enemy. A man whose merits are so great that he could win on his merits alone, whose personality is so engaging that you lose sight of his merits. Make their fight on a man like that! What irrelevant rantism was it that called them the Stupid party!"—John Jay.

As Europe Sees Him

"A MAN in many ways after Carlyle's own heart, who has 'swallowed formulas,' is transparently incapable of anything mean, underhand, or equivocal, pretence and pretence the gospel of work, and finishes before nothing."—Woolf & Co., London.

"HERE is a man whose whole career has been a protest against trimming and compromise. Ever a man for to evil, ever ready to make for the right, he has yet, despite all, reached the highest level of action can give."—Daily News, London.

"HE possesses the elements that make a great man, and he will leave a strong impress for good or for ill on the history of his country. His advantages are his transparent honesty and justness. His merits are his frankness, his keen insight into the heart of things, his inquisitiveness of irrelevant and insignificant details, and his generosity in acknowledging mistakes. . . . Since he became President not a rash nor provocative word has fallen from his lips."—London Times.

"THE American President is by far the most interesting personage in all the world of the present day."—The Boston Times Herald, Boston.

"HIS intelligence is as true as a mathematical theorem, and as straight as a moral truth. To this may be added—something which is never useless or superfluous in political life—the resolution in himself the courage, and the wisdom of his country. He is American in every impulse of his blood, in every fibre of his brain. He is American by nature, and not by legend. Everything is also pure, like the heart of the earth, which no one has ever touched. Vigor, honesty, and common sense are the leaders of his principles."—The Tribune, New York.

"AS President, he has remained true to his first beliefs and convictions. In everything he has done, and as straight as a moral truth, to this may be added—something which is never useless or superfluous in political life—the resolution in himself the courage, and the wisdom of his country. He is American in every impulse of his blood, in every fibre of his brain. He is American by nature, and not by legend. Everything is also pure, like the heart of the earth, which no one has ever touched. Vigor, honesty, and common sense are the leaders of his principles."—The Tribune, New York.

THE PRESIDENT.

Taxation Reduced

"THIS deficit is imaginary, and is obtained by including in the ordinary current expenses the sum of fifty millions, which was paid for the right of way of the Panama Canal out of the accumulated surplus in the Treasury. Comparing the current or ordinary expenditures for the two years, there was a surplus of nearly eighty millions for the year 1901, and only a little more than eight millions for the year that has just closed. But this diminution of the annual surplus was brought about designedly by the abolition of the war taxes in the interval between the two dates. The acts of March 2, 1901, and April 12, 1902, cut down the internal revenue taxes to an amount estimated at about hundred and five millions a year. In other words the reduction of taxation has been considerably greater than the reduction in the annual surplus. Since the close of the war with Spain there has been no substantial change in the rate of annual expenditures. As compared with the fiscal year ending in June, 1901, for example, the fiscal year that has just closed showed a relatively small increase in expenditures (excluding the canal payment already referred to), while the year previous showed a relatively small decrease."—From Theodore Roosevelt's letter accepting the Republican nomination for President.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, October 22, 1904

NO. 966

Copyright, 1904, by Harper & Row. All rights reserved

UNCLE SAM. "ENOUGH HEAD-LINES—PRODUCE THE EVIDENCE!"

Illustrated by L. A. Rogers

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2496

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES
AND SUPPLEMENT

NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER 22, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance
Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tientsin, China

Entered at the New York Post office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO HUBBARD

Commenting upon the political outlook in the issue of this journal dated December 26, 1903, we expressed a belief that "already, nearly a year before election day, New York must be placed in the Democratic column." The responsibility for that unprecedented condition we fixed upon Governor OGDEN, who had "humiliated Senator PLATT, for thirty years the undisputed leader of his party," who had brought upon himself "a bitter personal quarrel with the Sen. the ablest, most persistent, most unforgiving, and most deadly of newspaper antagonists," and who, as "a commercialized boss," had, "by brutal methods," brought "obliquely upon the splendid life bestowed upon him by the people." In view of this condition of affairs, directly following President ROOSEVELT's futile attempt to harmonize differences, we ventured the opinion that "in this case there seems to be no cure except in the extermination of one or the other of the parties to the controversy." We can see no reason now for reversal or modification of that judgment.

The OGDEN blight is upon the party and the candidate. Some experienced observers profess to think that Mr. ROOSEVELT's personal popularity will win New York, even though Mr. HUBBARD be defeated. Frankly, we doubt it. The blight is so big and so black that it spreads over the whole ticket. And it accentuates itself daily. The supposition at first was that Mr. HUBBARD was a reputable, though commonplace and intellectually inept individual, for whom one might vote without compunctions of conscience, though with a very face. But events have failed to justify the hope. His halting and apologetic assertion—obviously for political effect—that he was not wholly under OGDEN's thumb was far from convincing in itself, and what little force it did possess was dissipated like a flash by Attorney-General CUNNEEN. Mr. EDWARD H. HUBBARD is the distinguished financier whose coat Governor OGDEN carries when the two gentlemen visit a county fair, and it was Mr. HUBBARD's Furnessville Iron Company which received $18,018 for cutting rock, in excavating for the canal, when there was no rock to cut. The Attorney-General, a member of the Canal Board, was aware of this fact, and, when the claim was presented, produced abundant evidence to that effect. Nevertheless, the minutes contain this damning entry:

"On calling the ayes and noes, the resolution was adopted by the following vote:

"On contrast No. 9.—AYES, Mr. HUBBARD, Mr. MILLER, Mr. BROWN, Mr. BRYD—4. NOES, Mr. CUNNEEN—4.

Four votes were required to allow the claim. If, therefore, Mr. HUBBARD had voted with Mr. CUNNEEN it would have been rejected.

This was the Attorney-General's explicit accusation, comprising both favoritism and fraud, and directly involving Mr. HUBBARD. Governor OGDEN sneeringly observed:

Mr. CUNNEEN objected to the award, but was the only one of the board who did so; the others, as I understand, voting for its payment, perhaps not entirely under the belief that his contentions were entirely erroneous, but that certain money was due for losses which occurred by reason of the failure of the State to permit the contractor to continue his work. This is often due to business matters; it certainly was not improper for the Canal Board to view it from this standpoint, if they deemed it wise so to do.

This was so far from conclusive as a denial that it was regarded by some as a virtual admission. The fact, in particular, that Mr. CUNNEEN "was the only one of the board" who objected did not seem to militate against his character or reputation. In a word, the suspicion that Mr. OGDEN had only made matters worse became so strong that Mr. MILLER, then a member of the board and now a justice, was drafted into service, and submitted an excessively long and somewhat confusing explanation. We have scrutinized it with care, but in vain, for satisfactory rebuttal. He declares with emphasis that Mr. CUNNEEN erred in saying that the board had rejected the claim in 1902; it had only refused to pass upon it. This, of course, is a mere quibble. He also asserts that the claim was not wholly for rock-cutting, but partly for "prospective profits lost," which seems a pity. He does not maintain that there really was rock, but there was "hard pan," which subsequently was "classified as rock." The difficulty, he says, "was that the preliminary survey had not been accurate, resulting in an estimate of $9,000,000, when three times that sum was required. Contracts were let for excavation without knowing definitely the class of material to be excavated." Consequently, so far as we can make out, the contracting company had to be reimbursed for "prospective profits lost." Incidentally, and at great length, Justice MILLER endeavors to entangle this specific claim with others that were allowed and for which Mr. CUNNEEN voted. He succeeds only in bewildering the reader; he certainly does not convince him of the futility of the Attorney-General's accusation.

Now, curiously enough, despite the unsatisfactory nature of these responses, we attach little importance to the incident itself. That the contracting company was treated kindly is plain. Most companies owned by intimate friends of a boss in power are. But we can find no reason for believing that this particular contractor got materially more than he was entitled to. What happened, we suppose, was that it cost more to remove the dirt than had been anticipated and fixed in the contract, and the State made up the difference. This is not unusual; oftentimes it is entirely proper. The real point lies elsewhere. For example, Mr. EDWARD H. HUBBARD is not an $18,000 man. He is the head of the Union Pacific and many other great railways, a contractor and financier in the very first flight, doing the biggest things constantly. Now what is he doing with a tuppenny contracting company up in the Mohawk Valley? Is he giving so much of his time to this relatively unimportant business for himself or for somebody else? We can understand his willingness to help a friend to make some money if risk be guarded against by the beneficiary, but it is not usual to find a man accustomed to deal in hundreds of millions digging a ditch at one dollar per cubic yard. Who are the real stockholders of the Furnessville Iron Company? And how much of the $10,000,000 voted for the canal does it expect to handle in the event of Mr. OGDEN's continuance in power? If a considerable proportion, will the stock of the Furnessville Company be increased? And will the present shareholders get it, or will helpful associates, not then, at any rate, holding official positions, be taken in? What is the programme, anyway? Depend upon it, no little $18,000 job need be considered for long when there is $101,000,000 in sight and twice as much more in prospect. As we have had occasion to remark before, OGDENism is not synonymous with mere pickings from the grocery or any other business.

Vastly more important than the trifling charges so persistently harped upon by the opposition is such a transaction as the ship-building securities underwriting of Governor OGDEN. When that ill-fated enterprise was launched under the legal direction of ALEXANDER & GREEN, whose office is next door to Mr. HARRISON's. Governor ORRILL protested and subsequently with great reluctance and many protests paid $169,200 for $189,000 of bonds and one thousand shares of stock. When the company collapsed, the Governor tried to persuade the persons from whom he had purchased his securities through a member of the firm of ALEXANDER & GREEN, counsel of the Mercantile Trust Company, that it was their duty and privilege to make good his loss. They did not see it in that light, and Mr. ORRILL brought suit, which is still pending in some court up the State that he considers best adapted for such adjudication. In March, moreover, Governor ORRILL's tried and true friend, Senator BUCKLEY of Saratoga, moved deeply by the iniquitous practices of promoters, prepared a resolution for introduction in the State Senate calling for an investigation of the ship-building bond syndicate. When, however, the Governor heard that another Senator proposed to offer an amendment requiring the investigating committee "to inquire if any officer of the State government by his conduct had impugned the honor of the State," the resolution was postponed.

But there were other ways of bringing the recalcitrants to terms. Colonel JOHN J. MCCOOK is the member of the firm of ALEXANDER & GREEN who had most to do with the legal direction of the ship-building syndicate; he is also a director of the Mercantile Trust Company, which was trustee of the ship-building company's mortgage. Now everybody knows that the Mercantile Trust Company is one of the biggest and most prosperous financial institutions in America, but few are aware that it does business under a charter originally granted to the "Fire Proof Warehousing Company," on March 31, the following bill appeared simultaneously in the Senate and Assembly of the New York State Legislature:

Section 1.—Chapter 308 of the Laws of 1903 entitled: "An act to incorporate the Fire Proof Warehousing Company," as amended by Chapter 183 of the Laws of 1903 and by Chapter 124 of the Laws of 1904 and by Chapter 843 of the Laws of 1905 and by Chapter 425 of the Laws of 1906, is hereby repealed.

Section 2.—This act shall take effect immediately.

It was introduced in the Senate by Senator AMBLER and in the Assembly by Robert J. FISH, both intimate personal friends of the Governor of the State. In the Senate it was referred to the Judiciary Committee of which the tried and true BUCKLEY was chairman, and in the Assembly to Mr. FISH's own committee. No reason was or could have been advanced to justify closing up the Mercantile Trust Company. Its resources exceeded $40,000,000, its stock was selling at ten times its face value, its business was being conducted to the entire satisfaction of the Banking Department. The bill was not passed, of course, but a weaker institution would have been ruined by its introduction.

The many minor faults found with Governor ORRILL need not be considered. We have set down the salient features of his recent record dispassionately, and, to the best of our knowledge and belief, with exact truth. Deductions from themselves, however, "business Governor" in the most solid and most dangerous element in public life. For DAVID B. HILL is a political factor we have exceedingly small respect, for THOMAS C. PLATT hardly more; but either is an angel of light as compared with HENRY J. ORRILL, if baleful influence constitute the criterion of judgment. Neither, at any rate, has utilized the vantage of a high honor conferred upon him by the people for personal gain or the wreaking of personal vengeance upon individuals or corporations not willing to submit to virtual blackmail. We speak of Governor ORRILL as a brute in politics. He is worse. Consider that only a few years ago he was an insignificant political heart-beat in a small city, that he was taken up by the leader of his party, and by sheer force of authority on the part of the latter was carried to the highest position within the gift of a reluctant people, that, having reached this point of security and power, he turned, like a dog, and bit the half-puberted hand of his benefactor. As an ingrate he is beyond the pale of competition. Recall the contemptuous attitude he assumed when appealed to by his party's President to waive personal considerations at a critical moment, how he boasted of being summoned to Washington, how he sneered that he might or might not recognize the call, but if at all at his own convenience, how he gloated over his triumph over the helpless old man who had lifted him above the heads of decent and deserving partisans. Note his cynical disregard of the most ordinary conventions in constituting himself an avowed political boss while still holding the second highest executive position in the Union. Reflect upon the "business" transactions of a "business" Governor, the participation in syndicates giving away shares not paid for, the shaming when "prospective profits" were "lost," the undignified efforts to get even by implied threats, by suits at law in courts of the State whose Governor appoints judges, by the introduction of strange bills in a Legislature controlled by the Executive—all openly and brazenly done in flagrant defiance of public opinion and personal self-respect. Contemplate a man of no intellectuality, of no sense of decency as a public official, of moral sense not blunted but non-existent, as vulgar politically as JOHN W. GATES personally, a hateful excrement upon the body politic, with all his bravado so cowardly that an aged father must hold up his hands, while successful a constant, lying degradation of the ideals of American youth—and there you have your business Governor, your business chairman, your business speculator.

To write such words is not a pleasing task; it is a most painful duty. We should be only too glad to record a belief that the man whom Mr. ORRILL nominated would, if elected, be himself Governor. But, as we have said, the hope could not be justified. A single-minded man of no indicated independence, he apparently lacks even the daring to attempt success by emulating his mentor in the manifestation of a thankless spirit. The established facts leave no escape from the conclusion that ORRILL, if not ORRILL, is the real candidate for Governor of New York.

The alternative is not as good as it should have been, but it is better than that seemed. Judge HENRICK certainly has ability and independence. That his political activity accompanied him to the bench we have ample evidence. In other respects nothing has developed to his discredit. His record, his words, and his endorsements are sufficient to indicate almost beyond a doubt that he would be his own Governor—and, in any case, his character and ambition, his sense of fitness, his good breeding, would prevent him from becoming a "business" Governor. However prohibitions may be as to the national candidates, it is plain that an imperative duty confronts the patriotic citizens of the State of New York.

In nominating SUMNER J. WYMAN as Postmaster-General in honor of HENRY C. PAYNE the President has paid a merited compliment to real and efficiency in the public service.—The Tribune.

Yes, indeed; stepping loud, Mr. WYMAN!

The Paterson Call requests its readers to turn back the files of this journal to 1895 and see the pictures of CAYLEY's army and other groups of unemployed persons in various parts of the country, and triumphantly asks, "Have our workmen forgotten those 'good old Democratic times'?" Probably not; and if they will watch their measures a little further back they will recall that it was the impious doing of the preceding Republican administration that brought on those bad times. What do it profit a newspaper to insult the intelligence of its readers?

The latest member of the administration to give the antiquated Constitution a whack is dear old Secretary PAINE. Having convinced the patient Western folk of the inestimable boon of high cost of living, he proceeded in Indianapolis to inform Congress that it would do well not to meddle with the looseness of an absolutely perfect executive administration. If somebody happened to read what he said to Senator HILL, it is little wonder that that venerable statesman died the next day with resignation. "Congress," declared the Secretary, "can amend the laws under which the administrative departments operate, but the administrative departments have sole authority to operate. If one coordinate branch can investigate another, independent of impeachment proceedings, it would seem at first blush that each coordinate branch might investigate both the others." It might seem so, of course, but only "at first blush," for the simple reason that Section 8 of Article I. of the poor old Constitution gives Congress absolute right to make all laws for the execution of powers vested in "the government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof," which means, of course, that it can investigate, as it has investigated over and over again, as much as it likes and make or unmake departments as will. Even the Sun papers in its vigorous support of the Republican (national) ticket long enough to gag at this truly fresh exposition of benevolently despotic power and to implore "the proper authorities" to tell Mr. POSEY to go back and sit down. And yet some thought that the suggestion we timidly offered early in the campaign, that his spellbinding be confined to Manhattan, was an idle jest.

PHASE. HARPER'S WEEKLY has misled us. His name is HARPER, not THOMAS—Brooklyn Eagle.

It might as well have been. An odd by any name, etc.

The cartoon reproduced herewith, entitled "When HOBBS was on the Bench," was drawn by HENRY DANNENBERG, and published by HENRY L. STUBBARD in the Evening Mail of this city.

Copyright, 1894, by The Mail and Express Co.

Has either Mr. DANNENBERG or Mr. STUBBARD trustworthy information that could by the farthest reach of the imagination justify the circulating of such a picture as this?

We should hate to have to be as fair as the Brooklyn Eagle.

The National Civil Service Reform League, of which, if our memory serves us, one THOMAS ROOSEVELT was once an active and determined official member, sent a letter the other day to Chairman CORTLANDT, asking his aid in an effort to prevent the levying of political assessments upon public servants. Whereupon GEORGE BURCE nibbled his quill a minute and replied:

Prefacing my response to your letter with the statement that the Republican National Committee has not countenanced nor will it countenance, directly or indirectly, any violation of existing laws on the subject of the assessment of Federal officeholders for political purposes, I beg to say that I do not think I am called upon to make any public declaration of this fact.

This is quite snappy. We are not sure that everybody would consider it wholly courteous in view of the fact that those seeking aid which they could not get elsewhere are earnest advocates of a good cause and have no axes to grind. However, let us add the help they are going to get. Mr. CORTLANDT continues:

The friends of the candidates of the Republican party in this campaign show a consistent adherence to the letter and spirit of genuine civil service reform; and as the head of the count, by having to do with the management of the campaign for their election, I see no reason to assume, either from their record or my own, that the public would be justified in any other conclusion than that the influence of this committee would be thrown in favor of rather than against a strict compliance with the law.

For goodness' sake, have we reached the point where a civil answer cannot be expected to a wholly proper request? Must we continue to digest those impervious records forever and ever and take all else for granted? GEORGE BURCE needs a net so luffy. Time was—before, of course, the present ideal conditions relative to campaign contributions maintained—when the Republican National Committee countenanced such assessments with no little severity. Even Republican Presidents seeking reelection have been known to be concerned with other pressing duties while the officeholders were paying in their percentages. Can it be that this year patriotic post-umsters are so apprehensive of the righteous wrath of their future chief that they are contributing their nites surreptitiously and with fear and trembling lest the great and good father himself get after them with his big stick? We knew the millennium was bound to come some day, but had no idea it was already here. Meanwhile, the National Civil Service Reform League will doubtless profit greatly from this aid so freely, frankly, and graciously proffered by Mr. CORTLANDT.

I accept the nomination tendered me—THOMAS E. WATSON.

That is more than the Judge said, anyhow.

Senator DANNENBERG has met the question of pledging independence to the Filipinos. He met it on the platform at Indianapolis, and landed on its solar plexus with vigorous declamation, to wit:

Young men want a President whose confidence in the American stock is strong enough to leave the future to those future Americans who must deal with it when it arrives. They want no man for the nation's chief who thinks that the nation's young men will not have the honor or ability to meet events as they develop.

Young men do not want a President whose doubts of their places then under tend to carry out his views long after he is gone.

Young Americans want to have some say in the nation's future, which belongs to them, and decline to permit that future to be determined now.

As conscientious observers we are bound to say that the young men for whom Senator DANNENBERG speaks will get the short end of the wishbone if they vote for the Colonel. If there ever was a President who was bent on settling everything before the six-o'clock whistle blows it is President ROOSEVELT. Was his confidence in the American stock strong enough to make him leave the Panama Canal matter to future Americans to handle when it arrived? Can he compel the admission that when it threatened not to arrive in time enough for him to deal with it, he dashed out between two dogs and dragged it in, snawling, by the ears. Posterity will carry on just as many virtues of President ROOSEVELT as he can band it to accomplish. It will have no decisions to post that he can foretell. He has a thousand virtues, but the virtue—if it be a virtue—of leaving the future to the future Americans is not among them.

EDWARD has made the RIKON issue, and he should be compelled to accept its consequences—New York Evening Mail. He seems to be willing.

"But," says the World, "the WEEKLY maintains that until the World finds 'some one who will tell' that he has been deceived in this manner the charge and the inference respecting Mr. CORTLANDT 'deserve no further consideration.'" It then propounds a few queries. (1) "Is not denial much easier than proof?" In view of the fact that not a shred of proof has been produced as yet, we should judge that it is. (2) "If they (the trusts) have given nothing, would not a denial be easy and natural?" Easy perhaps, not necessarily natural; rather the reverse. Neither the President nor anybody else is under obligation to answer questions which contain reflections upon his honor and are therefore impertinent. Moreover, there is a special reason why Mr. ROOSEVELT should ignore any request from the World. He did deny with great emphasis and particularly one story to like effect published in the World and vouched for on its editorial page, and the World has given no indication as yet that it attached any importance or gave any credence to his declaration. (3) "If they have contributed, are not the people entitled to know the fact?" Yes, and it is for you who make the charge to furnish the evidence. Even a President is supposed to be innocent until proven to be guilty. (4) "In either case, why should not Mr. ROOSEVELT send to Mr. CLEVELAND such a letter as has been suggested in the World? Perhaps he has, but whether he has or not, there is no reason why he should do it at the behest of an antagonistic newspaper which has failed to make amends for a wrong it has done him. Moreover, the World has no business to invent and print a letter and put "THOMAS ROOSEVELT" at the bottom of it. The Evening Post did that awhile ago, and the letter was promptly republished in the West as a genuine letter from the President. It is a reprehensible practice, which leads to mistakes and lends itself to dishonest uses. It is also an impertinence.

By some hook or crook the Herald got a wax impression of President ROOSEVELT's left hand and sent it around to some publishers, who "read" it without knowing whose fist it was. The results were interesting. Here is the palm:

Professor Palmist FLETCHER's reading comes first, and it is pretty good. "Here is a hand," he says, "that suggests a great deal of strength of character. There are determination, force, and marked vitality, but the interest is more in the beginning of an undertaking than in its conclusion. . . . The man's nature is extremely kindly and generous to a fault. It is obsolete beyond words, if opposed, and yet easily led if appealed to. There is no great amount of extravagance indicated here, except on occasion, and then a tendency to overdo things. . . . A continuous failure is unknown to this hand. Knocked down it may be, but only to be up and doing and starting out on some fresh endeavor. . . . The line of success verifies the indication so strongly marked in the fate line. This hand averts the consequences of danger. It runs in close relationship with it frequently, but it just escapes fatal results. This will always be the case, both so far as personal danger is concerned and in business affairs. . . . Earlier more optimism and self-conceit would have been added to this hand, which could have led to signal and marked results. The year 1904 is a signal one for this person, but its conclusion will not be as satisfactory as could be desired." No doubt 1904 is a "signal year," but we wish the Professor had presented more specifically the reasons why its conclusion will be unsatisfactory. Maybe Hay is going to resign, after all. The Professor winds up with the assertion that "the greatest successes have thus far been where he acted upon his own independent judgment," and, therefore, "great care should be taken in regard to the advice of friends which he cannot afford to follow." Judging from the past, we anticipate little danger from attaching undue importance to advice of others, but it is a gentle and timely warning and we cheerfully pass it along.

Lady Professor NIMZ, whose forefathers used to manage a garden on Broadway, is less happy, unless, of course, general opinion is at fault. For example, we are surprised to learn that "he is of a cool, calm nature," yet "an inquisitive, prying, curious person, who likes to know about and have a hand in everything." Professor CARLOS doesn't hit it off at all. He says it is the hand of a man "who goes into anything that will keep the owner before the public. . . . One of his greatest drawbacks is a tendency to fall from one thing to another, to take up new things before he has carried out the old. If he only possessed the ability to carry out the resolutions he forms there is a chance that he might rise far above the mediocre." The ideal! But another word of advice: "He should guard against all speculation or business changes in his forty-sixth year, if he has not reached that period, for failure stares him in the face." This sounds somewhat ominous, but good luck waits on fate. He gets out of that ticklish forty-sixth year in the nick of time—on the twenty-seventh day of this present month—and we have the highest authority for asserting that he has no intention whatever of making any changes. Being a member of a private, servant, he likes his job and is willing to stay awhile longer. So don't worry; it's all right.

If a Democrat were President of the United States and were running for election for another term, he would be criticized if he took his Secretary for Commerce from that office, which means to him power over all corporations, with secret knowledge of their resources, their interests, their fears, and their combinations, and made that Secretary his collector of campaign contributions!—Readings Excerpt.

Indeed, he would. But isn't the ideal head of an absolutely perfect Republican administration getting an occasional side dig, likewise?

Replying to the Tribune's demand for more definite information respecting the vague charges of virtual blackmail of corporations by Chairman CLEVELAND with the connivance of President ROOSEVELT, the Times says:

The information upon which the Times based its article came to it from gentlemen of very high place and standing in the business and financial world, gentlemen whose confidence it enjoys, has never betrayed, and will not now, and who would be incapable of misreading it. The Times's opinion of the matter is not in the least changed by the Tribune's assertion, "advisedly and with authority," that "the story is not true."

All we have to say to that is that if these "gentlemen of very high place and standing in the business and financial world" have not sufficient manhood and faith in American sense of justice to denounce openly practices that they whine about privately, they are richly entitled to the exclusive privilege of self-commiseration.

Unless something happens, the Honorable ROBERT CORCORAN will make no more speeches for the candidate of Messrs. REAN and BELMONT. But despair not; maybe something will happen.

THOMAS E. WATSON having written a life of JEFFERSON, and copyrighted it, seems disposed to go farther and take out a patent on JEFFERSON himself. In his latest letter of acceptance he excuses himself for devoting more of his antagonistic attentions to PARKER than to ROOSEVELT on the ground that ROOSEVELT is a definite and defiant advocate of existing conditions who calls for Republican support, whereas PARKER, though not a Jeffersonian Democrat, asks the support of Jeffersonians. Mr. WATSON's ideal Jeffersonian is named THOMAS; not THOMAS JEFFERSON, however, but THOMAS E. WATSON. Mr. WATSON appears to believe in bad money and plenty of it. How a man of his apparent intelligence can want the kind of money he professes to want is hard to understand, but he is an urgent friend of silver, he denies that the gold standard is "irrevocably fixed," and he is running with enthusiasm on a platform that calls for an irredeemable paper currency. He also wants the government to assume ownership of all the railroads and telegraph and telephone lines, adding the necessary millions to the number of office-holders and government employees. Mr. WATSON's obvious function in this campaign is to rather in the votes of Democrats whose hearts are harder than their heads. He is fighting some real evils, but the remedies he proposes would do far more mischief than the diseases he combats. One can stop any disease by killing the patient, and the diseases naturally incident to national prosperity can be effectively alleviated by knocking prosperity on the head. Money is good. Health is good. Bad money is the same kind of a good as bad health. It ruins everybody but its doctors, and too much of it even ruins them. If the honored THOMAS JEFFERSON could be recalled to earth long enough to discuss a few matters with THOMAS WARREN in the presence of witnesses, the result would be of benefit to political and economical truth, and might save the Republican Campaign Committee some money.

It was like Uncle DAVIS to refer to Mr. ROOSEVELT as "the Acting President of the United States." He is a most convincing orator.

GEORGE WILLIAMS FAIR has broken a silence that was becoming tragic and declared for the $3,500 candidate for Governor of the old Bay State. Not that Mr. DOUGLAS is truly worthy—far from it. In GEORGE FAIR's mind of minds there is but one such. But, "although with increasing fortune he has become conservative," there was a time, fellow countrymen, when as "a radical" he gave utterance to "many bright things, indicating an interest in humanity and warm heart for his fellow men." Not for what he is, but for what he was, and because he has "democratic blood," whatever that may be, that GEORGE FAIR hurls his pulsant intellectuality into the teetering scales. Well, that means one more vote and maybe the sale of another pair of shoes bearing upon their soles the benign features of the thoughtful candidate. In passing, we may observe that the "brightest" and most remunerative "thing" Mr. DOUGLAS ever said was "three-fifty."

"I am willing," says the grandiloquent BRYAN, "to be the AVERN of the party if our MOSES, who has been so slow of speech, will but lead the people out of the wilderness." No doubt; but you wouldn't make a good AVERN. Judging from your recent speeches and the slot contained even in this observation, you are best fitted for the part of a well-known character in the other testament, who also dabbled in silver.

The Springfield Republican directs attention to the fact that the market prices of bonding railway and industrial shares have advanced simultaneously with the odds on ROOSEVELT's election, and adds:

Here we have the actual trust estimate of the anti-trust effects of Mr. ROOSEVELT's election. It will be seen to differ radically from the significance which Mr. KNOX and other supporters of the President are striving to place upon his candidacy and its opposing forces. What is the explanation? At the head of its editorial column HARPER'S WEEKLY insists this sentiment: "Platform: No Hoarding!"

If it be that answer is expected from us, we say that apparently the business world is less apprehensive of a disturbance of fairly satisfactory conditions under Republican than under Democratic government.

THOMAS TUGWART is going to Indiana, to remain, perhaps, in that State during the remainder of the campaign. With the help of Mr. BRYAN, who is to make Democratic speeches, Mr. TUGWART hopes to deposit the Hoosier State in the Democratic column. Mr. TUGWART is popular among the Hoosiers, and for many good reasons. The Indiana negroes are particularly fond of him, and he is said to have earned their affection by innumerable acts of kindness. There are 25,000 negro voters in Indiana. The State is expected to poll 700,000 votes this year. In 1900 BRYAN got 300,084 votes, as against 339,083 for Mr. KINLEY. It is evident that it makes an important difference which ticket the Indiana negroes support. It is related that on the evening of the day on which TUGWART was welcomed Mayor of Indianapolis by his largest majority, two hundred negroes were released from a barn in the suburbs of the city, where they had been locked up since very early morning. It was asserted that TUGWART's men looked them up, and that each negro received two dollars when released, and there was a disposition to proceed against Mr. TUGWART in the courts for improper behavior. It turned out that there was no prospect of establishing that the behavior attributed to him was improper. The negroes gathered in the barn of their own choice, and were protected all day from the temptation to sell their votes. Whether it was wrong to shield a yielding brother from temptation is a very pretty question.

What he [President ROOSEVELT] does he does in the open. There is no concealment or attempt at concealment of purpose or method.—HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Cartoonist, for example.—The World.

Well, could anything be more open?

The well and favorably known litterateur, Mr. JOHN KENNEDY RANDOLPH, used to read pulpit with notable shrewdness, but since popularity overtook his original declaration that "the head that rocks the cradle rules the world," the subject has become as distasteful to him as "Marching through Georgia" was to General SHERMAN. So Mr. BRYAN has become a physiognomist and, with the artistic assistance of Mr. ELMER HASKELL, presents in Puck his analyses of the characters of the candidates as indicated by their countenances. We present them herewith. It will be observed that no two studies were made on the same day nor in the same place. For example, the Colonel is obviously watching the finish of an Olympic game at a Schützenfest; the Judge has been hit on the head by a brick; Mr. ICEBERG is about to lend in prayer, and Grimsby is indicating his satisfaction with the appearance of the latest arrival of the fourth generation. The studies are interesting, not only physiognomically, but as examples of the art of one lost to the sense of humor. And they do offer a noble variety, don't they? We only wish SWALLOW and THURSTON had been there.

A word more as to the WEEKLY. It is, or, rather, it affects to be, much interested in the campaign. Space is no object. Under which flag? Frankly, the interrogation point is somewhat confusing.—Bristolian Eye.

Our platform, good Doctor, is our flag.

To the readers of this journal who may attempt importance to our judgment of a story we wish to say that The Manservant, by KATHERINE COEN THURSTON, a young Englishwoman, is worth reading. We question somewhat the ability of the hero and heroine, capable and daring as they are, to keep the other women quiet and thus maintain the unprecedented situation in which they leave themselves at the end of the book—and yet there may be some authority written between the lines which we have not detected. If so, the scheme is perfect. In any case, it is a novel that is novel, and that is saying much in these days of sex problems and washbarking. Sir ALGERNON HAUNSWORTH, a very busy man of acute intellect, told us that he became so interested in a few chapters printed serially that he would not wait for the book, but sent to BLACKWOOD, who publishes it in Scotland, and got the proof-sheets. In this country it is published by HARPER & BROTHERS, but we refuse to permit that fact to deter us from advising those of our readers who like a real story to get hold of it.

The Significance of the Populist Diversion

It is a mistake to see in the collateral campaign which is being pushed by Mr. THOMAS E. WATSON with all the energy compatible with ill health an insidious attempt to detach voters from the PARKER column, and thus help the Republican nominee. There may be Republican politicians who would deem it good policy to put and keep in the field a Populist candidate for the Presidency, but that Mr. WATSON is a party to a bargain is not believed by those who know him personally, or, for that matter, by those who have read carefully his lackluster and controversial writings. We have never known of his failing to make the impression of an able, honest, and brave man. Such men do not deliberately undertake work for money to manipulate political side-shows.

If Mr. WATSON has essayed this year to resurrect Populism, which, seemingly, died in 1900, when its nominee got only about 50,000 votes, it is evidently because he believes that the time has come for its resurrection. His motives, principles, and plans are clearly outlined in his published letter of October 3 accepting the Populist nomination for the Presidency, and in an extended interview with a representative of the Record, which was printed on the same day. The former document is instinct with a vigor, a freshness, and a frankness that recall Mr. THOMAS E. WATSON'S own, and there are touches of pathos in the short, plain story of the writer's life. Even had he not been twice or thrice the antislavery Populist, as they call him; first, for Vice-President, and then for President, readers of his books about FRANKLIN, about NAPOLEON, about THOMAS JEFFERSON, and about the civil war, will be glad to hear something of their author. There is no doubt that he is an American of the Americans. His forefathers, he told the Record representative, were Quakers, and emigrated in 1784 from North Carolina, where they had originally settled. Their descendants are now scattered through Virginia, the Carolinas, Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi. That the branch of the family to which THOMAS WATSON belongs need be no progress is evident from the fact that the head of it purchased 40,000 acres of land in Columbus County, Georgia, and founded the town of Wrightsboro. His father, who was crippled financially by the emancipation of the sixty or more negroes that he owned, and the ruin of his estate was lost in the panic of 1873. By this final reverse, THOMAS WATSON, then a lad of sixteen, was obliged to leave college and to seek work. After an haphazard search for employment in Augusta, Georgia, he went into the backwoods of Surinam County, and organized a small school, with which he earned just enough to live on. When nineteen years of age, he got an old farmer to buy on credit for him a copy of BLACKSTONE'S Commentaries, and took up the study of law. Admitted to the bar within a year, he proceeded to Thomson, Georgia, with land, a few sheep, and a few chickens, and began to practise his profession. An old school-teacher, who had become clerk of the court, agreed to board him for one year on credit. This was his opportunity. He turned it to account, and, as soon as he was earning a good income, bought a home for his father and mother, gave his sisters an education, and started his brothers in business. In 1890 he was elected to the Federal House of Representatives by the Farmers' Alliance. Two years later he contested the district, but was defeated by his Democratic opponent under circumstances that must be described as peculiar, inasmuch as the majority against him was based on a vote of 23,000 in the city of Augusta, when, apparently, the largest vote possible under the census was 12,000. Although defeated, Mr. WATSON retained a large following in some of the Southern States, and in 1896 was nominated for the Vice-Presidency by a convention of the People's party, which nominated Mr. BURTON for President. The fact is generally overlooked that Mr. WATSON received twenty-seven electoral votes for Vice-Presidency, as more electoral votes for that office than Mr. JAMES H. WATSON had received for the Presidency four years before.

How came Mr. WATSON to try to revive the People's party? He tells the Record's representative that, so long as the Democratic party had possession of the Populist principles, he could do nothing. A third party, in his opinion, has a right to exist, if either of the two old parties is right. It was, he says, the abandonment of Populist principles by the Democratic party at St. Louis this year which gave him an opportunity laid upon him, as he thinks, a duty. From Mr. WATSON'S point of view, the Democratic leaders at St. Louis surrendered to the money power, and the moment the currency took place, it was to him that the hour was ripe for arousing the common people to the formation of a party of protest. In his opinion, ex-Judge PARKER does not represent Democracy at all except in name. As he puts it, the true inwardness of PARKER'S campaign is to persuade not only the Democratic corporations and privileged classes, but also those Republican corporations that especially condemn Mr. WATSON and HANNA, that he will be a safer man for them than ROOSEVELT is. Mr. WATSON believes that, if he had three months more, and could get a semblance of health, he could make the people see the situation as it is. He could convince them, he thinks, that such a campaign as Judge PARKER has prosecuted is the very thing to perpetuate Republican principles, necessities, and class legislation. As long as he and his friends control the Democratic party no right—no Mr. WATSON declaration—will be made against Republican necessities, only a fight against Republican office-holders. The Populist nominee wants, he says, to make a fight against Republican office-holders, and, at the same time, against Republican principles and policies, so that, with the change of men, there will be a change of principles, and the people will get the remedial legislation which they desire.

But why, it is asked by those who impute Mr. WATSON'S sincerity, does he strive to resurrect Populism at this time, instead of postponing the effort until 1908? He answers that, in his judgment, the work ought to be done now, because, to the extent that he gets it now, the leaders of the Democratic party will have been strengthened. In next four years might have deepened the apathy and the despair of the people that it would have been doubly difficult to arouse them in 1908. In other words, there is never a harvest in the summer unless there is seed sown in the spring. It is absolutely, he says, a matter of indifference to him how many votes he gets this year, and whence they come, so long as they are earned, honest, Jeffersonian Democratic votes. Believing himself to be in the right, nothing, he avers, can discourage him, and he predicts that, four years hence, all those who really have faith in the principles of Jeffersonian Democracy will appreciate the imperative necessity of just such a movement as is being made by Mr. WATSON. At the present time, he says, the people, as Mr. WATSON contends, have no real control of their government. They are simply asked to obey or to ratify. Their ballot has become merely a piece of waste paper. Mr. WATSON'S purpose is, he tells us, to give back to the ballot the power it was meant to have; will give back to the people the power over the government that they have lost, and which in their hands they do have, but not in fact. He commends as one of the strongest planks in the Populist platform that which demands for the American people a right already possessed by the people of Switzerland, the right, namely, to initiate by petition just such legislation as they desire, and to vote on such laws as they do not want. He would also give the people the recalled power of recalling from office any representative who, in their judgment, has betrayed his trust and ceased to be a faithful representative. Mr. WATSON denounces as one of the gravest evils of the existing system the fact that the people are not consulted when laws are to be made; they only hear of legislative acts after they are published. He adds that even best-footed lawyers find it difficult to keep pace with the changes continually introduced in the statutes. Mr. WATSON submits that the Swiss initiative and Swiss referendum would correct this evil to a large extent, while the issuance of imperative mandates to representatives and the power to recall them would insure that no such toward keeping public officers faithful to their duties.

In his letter of acceptance, which, as we have intimated, contains plunger enough to revive a dozen ordinary campaign documents, Mr. WATSON describes in a vivid, unadorned way the condition of the common people in the Old World. Then he asks, "How is it in our own land?" For natural advantages, the earth, he says, no region superior to ours. The whole of this favored region once belonged to the people. With his gun the common man won it, mile by mile, from the Indian, the Frenchman, the Navajo, and the Spaniard. What the common man did not win with his gun he bought with his hard-earned money. From sea to sea the land which is ours became more and more the common man was ready to pay for it with his tax-money or his blood. What, inquires Mr. WATSON, has become of it? He answers that, with bewildering rapidity, it has been taken from the common people and given to the corporations. It belonged to all the people, who served the government, and it was their duty to supply homes to individual citizens, and there was enough of it to do so for many generations. To the extent of about two hundred million acres it has been given to railroad corporations; and now, when a common man wants a home in all that vast domain he must go to the railroad corporations to get it. Mr. WATSON submits that a blacker chapter than this which reads before him both the old political parties united to despoil the common people of their land is not to be found in the annals of class legislation.

Elsewhere Mr. WATSON touches Democracy in a new place when he tells them that the way to win an enemy is to fight him. He reminds them that the Democratic party have known what it was to be led by their captain who put the hands of his men to work, so that all could understand what the difference between the parties was on vital issues. Such a leader was JEFFERSON. Such a leader was JACKSON. He goes on to invite the Democrats to say whether they think that in the present campaign they have such a leader, and whether, as a matter of fact, they do not recognize that their captain will not lead them. For his part, Mr. WATSON is pronounced that, if he had three months before him, he could convince the American people that he and ROOSEVELT are the only fighters in the field; whereupon he, as the only representative of Jeffersonian principles in this campaign, would gather up the vote of the Real Democracy, add it to the strength of Populism, and thus acquire a united army agreed in purpose and wedded in sentiment, with which he would go up against Mr. ROOSEVELT and the Republican party and give them such a contest as would make them wonder what they had been up against.

Mr. WAYNES concludes his letter of acceptance with the declaration that the present attitude of the national Democracy is an impossible one. He predicts that they will be driven from it, and that in 1908 the real Democrats will return to their Chicago and Kansas City platforms. Meanwhile, he has determined to prevent an organization of resistance to the plutocracy, to make them feel that there is life in the people yet, and to form a nucleus around which the party whom their leaders have betrayed, can rally. Here we strike the real significance of the WAYNES movement. It has no other purpose but to keep alive in the popular mind the principles, the aims, the policies, of the Bryanite wing of the Democrats, and to insure to it preponderance in the next Democratic national convention. From this point of view it would not be easy to exaggerate the importance of the diversion which Mr. WAYNES has organized. His purpose cannot be frustrated unless the Democratic nominee shall at last manage to carry his own State of New York. If he loses the Empire commonwealth, the conservative element in the Democratic party will have been irretrievably beaten, and might as well evacuate the camp over which Mr. BURKE will hoist his colors. This is a serious matter, which some Republicans, as well as all conservative Democrats, may do well to consider. Should they be heretofore only one conservative party, its defeat at the ballot-box might have tremendous consequences.

Another Defence of Mr. Roosevelt's Reference to the Common Law

It will be remembered that Judge PARKER, in his speech of acceptance, expressed the opinion that a remedy for monopolistic rights might be found at common law, to which Mr. ROOSEVELT, in his speech of acceptance, replied that there is no common law in the Federal courts. Thereupon Judge PARKER, in his letter of acceptance, with the air of a father admonishing a promising boy, directed the President's attention to a decision of the United States Supreme Court in which an apparently opposite assertion was made. Its Attorney-General KNOX, in his recent speech, undoubtedly carefully to demonstrate that Mr. ROOSEVELT was making the use of a lawyer himself, and that his statement, if considered with the context, as every statement should be considered, was not refuted by the decision to which Judge PARKER had referred. A more elaborate and effective defence of Mr. ROOSEVELT's somewhat misunderstood and too ungraciously remark has been made by Mr. HENRY W. TART, Assistant Secretary of War. Mr. TART contends that Judge PARKER's presentation of the one of the Western Union Telegraph Company against The Call Publishing Company in support of his argument that "the common law, as developed, affords a complete legal remedy against monopolies," and that officials, if so disposed, could apply that remedy, was misleading. The case, Mr. TART says, was irrelevant to the matter which Judge PARKER was discussing in his speech of acceptance. There is no doubt that the telegraph company was engaged in interstate commerce, or that the Call Company recovered from it damages for a discrimination in rates. The question whether there was any restriction or common law of the Federal courts, which would enable the government to prevent a monopoly, or control or regulate a combination in restraint of interstate commerce, was not before the court. Moreover, if it had been, the tribunal must have held that, when Congress passed the SHERMAN Act, and the several antitrust and interstate commerce acts of 1902, any unwritten law upon the subject was superseded. The theory of the court in the case of the Western Union Telegraph Company vs. The Call Publishing Company seems to have been that, as under the Federal Constitution, Congress was vested with exclusive power to regulate and control interstate commerce, there was implied in the omission of Congress to legislate an intention that the Federal courts should adopt the general rule of common law governing the conduct of common carriers.

Mr. TART reminds us that the rules of the common law were framed long before the evolution of modern corporate combinations, and when very different conditions of industry and trade existed. He further invites us to observe that thirty-six States of the Union have severally attempted to cope with corporate aggressions, but they have always found it necessary to pass laws specifically directed at corporate abuses. He, too, under the SHERMAN Antitrust Act passed by Congress, Republican administrations have obtained from the Federal courts decisions in the Joint Traffic, the Allyn Pipe, the Northern Securities, the Bell Trust, and the Salt Trust cases, yet it has been found needful, in order to prevent or punish evasions, to pass four or five supplementary statutes in order to expedite trial, procure information otherwise inaccessible, establish efficient rules of evidence, create penalties for particular offences, and otherwise protect the law and strengthen the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Mr. TART adds, what Judge PARKER seems to have overlooked, that there can be no adequate remedy against trusts or combinations in restraint of trade without criminal penalties; yet it is settled in the Federal courts that there exist no crimes which Federal jurisdiction which are not expressly defined as such in the statutes of the United States. Moreover, agreements in restraint of trade have never, under the common law, been illegal in the sense that the parties to them could be punished from carrying them out. The common law refused, at the suit of one party to such an agreement, to compel the other party to perform it. Under all the circumstances, Mr. TART admits that no lawyer of experience would think of asserting that monopolistic trusts could be adequately dealt with under the rules of common law; and that, consequently, Mr. ROOSEVELT summed up the whole matter correctly when he said: "If action against trusts and monopolies is to be limited to cases where the common law is applicable, the national government could take no action whatever to regulate them."

Mr. TART makes a pungent point when he says that any attempt to proceed against trusts and monopolies, under the assumption that a Federal common-law system exists, would have been denounced by THOMAS JEFFERSON himself as "audacious, baseless, and unwarrantable preposterous." In his language, he uses in a letter to FRANKLIN RAYMOND, dated August 18, 1790, wherein he maintains that "the common law did not become, ipso facto, law in the new association of States in the Union under the Constitution; it could only become so by a positive adoption, and so far only as they [the States in the Union] acting through their Federal organs, saw no expediency to adopt it. But, great Heaven!" cries JEFFERSON, "who could have conceived in 1789 that within ten years we should have to combat such windmills!"

Has the Cost of Living Increased?

An interesting feature of the Democratic campaign book is the relation of the deduction drawn from certain official statistics published by the Department of Commerce and Labor, the deduction, namely, that the cost of living has not increased during the last decade. The personal experience of every man who keeps an account of his expenditures, non-voluntarily or voluntarily, is a matter of fact, it now costs him a good deal more to live than it did ten or a dozen years ago. It is true that the prices of some articles of consumption are lower than they then were, but such articles play a comparatively insignificant part in one's expense account. Obviously, the prices which most concern us are those of food products, of which we are habitually large consumers. It is immaterial, for instance, that in 1901 the price of oatmeal was nearly fifty per cent. lower than the average price which they had commanded during the decade ending in 1898. Many a man does not consume a nutmeg in a year. It is, on the other hand, a matter of much moment that the price of eggs in 1901 should have been nearly seven per cent. above the average maintained during the two years mentioned. Plainly, it would be misleading to assume that the increase in the cost of eggs was more than offset by the decrease in the cost of nutmegs, yet just such an assumption runs through the statistics compiled by Commissioner CANNON, D. WATSON, and published by the Republican Campaign Committee. The items in Mr. WATSON's table of the prices of food which are averaged without any regard to the actual cost of such article annually consumed by the ordinary wage-earner. To cite another instance, the price of pepper (of which the normal American does not consume more than four cents' worth in a year, is permitted to affect the commissioner's statement of general averages as much as does the price of coffee, of which the normal American consumes forty times as much. To compare Mr. WATSON gives the same weight as to milk, to discriminate of soda the same weight as to fresh beef; to dried apples the same weight as to potatoes. What is even more absurd, the price of alum affects the commissioner's formulation of general averages as much as does the price of corn. Once more, in Mr. WATSON's tables, the cost of such a prime necessity as wheat is offset by the cost of peaty. It is plain that statistics compiled upon such a plan are valueless for the purpose of ascertaining changes in the cost of living.

Attention is also directed by the Democratic campaign book to the fact that Commissioner WATSON's conclusions as to the cost of living are based, not on wholesale prices, but on retail prices. Wholesale prices are comparative averages of prices, and are, practically, the same in different cities, and they certainly are the same in different stores in the same city on the same day. Mistakes or misstatements, therefore, made in tables of wholesale prices are detectable with relative ease. Mr. WATSON's tables of retail prices, on the other hand, defy correction, because of the fact that retail prices differ widely in the same city on the same day.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, THE RICHEST MAN IN THE WORLD

Mr. Higgins's Home at Olmsted, New York

Mrs. Frank W. Higgins

Photographs by Scott Miss Josephine Higgins, the Candidate's Daughter

The formal Notification of Mr. Higgins at his Home in Olmsted

CEREMONIES AT THE NOTIFICATION OF FRANK W. HIGGINS, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK, WITH PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN AT HIS HOME

Lieutenant-Governor Frank W. Higgins, the Republican Candidate for Governor of New York State, was formally notified of his nomination at his home in Olmsted, N. Y., on October 1. The notification speech was delivered by Senator George R. Bulfinch. A reception at the woman's home, and a parade and ratification meeting followed the notification ceremonies.

Putting an ailing Cossack in Irkutsk—the Prisoner was caught in an attempt to run away

Preparing for the "Knot," a Method of Flogging which runs along with the Four after the Birth of his Son

Reviving a Cossack who has Fainted during his Punishment

Hanging a Cossack in Prison for Murder committed during his Escape

HOW RUSSIA TREATS HER PRISONERS—SCENES IN THE RUSSIAN PRISON AT ALEXANDROVSKII, ON THE ISLAND OF SAKHALIN

The photographs show scenes in the Russian prison at Alexandrovskii, on the island of Sakhalin, off the coast of Siberia. Two men are sent to Sakhalin twice a year, when they are compelled to do hard labor for the terms of their sentences. Good behavior entitles them to return to the mainland after the expiration of their terms of sentence, so they may remain on the island and become farmers. The photographs show some of the punishments of prisoners during exile.

Richard Bartholdt, President of the Interparliamentary Union

Count Albert Apponyi, of Hungary

I. R. von Klenowicz, of Austria

H. A. Krabbe, of Denmark

The World's Peace Conference

By Richard Bartholdt

President of the American Group for Arbitration in Congress, and President-elect of the Interparliamentary Union

IT was a historic scene in the East Room of the White House when, on the afternoon of September 24, President Roosevelt, in the presence of representatives of fifteen different parliaments of the world, made the solemn announcement that at an early date he would call a second conference of the nations to promote the cause of the world's peace. Those who witnessed the solemn ceremony were thrilled by the reflection that history was being made for the benefit of all mankind. The Americans present shared this feeling, of course, but they were doubly affected because the promised action of the President justly excited their patriotic pride. They realized that the United States had at that moment taken the initiative in the great movement for the substitution of law and justice for brute force as a means of the settlement of international controversies, and that President Roosevelt had assumed the role of leadership in this holy cause.

The steps leading up to the event just referred to, and the preparations for the conference of the Interparliamentary Union which in a formal resolution requested such action as the part of our Chief Executive, are matters of public record, though it may be new and interesting reading to many Americans. Up to this year little was known in our country of the Interparliamentary Union. It is an organization composed of about 2000 members of national legislative bodies who believe that arbitration should take the place of war, and who have agreed to use their influence in this direction in their respective home countries. Each European Parliament has a group of such members, which is called the arbitration group, and forms a branch of the Interparliamentary Union. Parliaments which have no such groups can be represented by individual members, and this liberal provision enabled me, as a member of the American Congress, to join the union. Mr. Barrows, from Massachusetts, had, a year previous, become a member on the same terms. The American group was not organized until January of this year. But I am getting ahead of my story.

Last year's conference was held early in September at Vienna, and since this distinguished body of lawmakers, with but few exceptions, had never visited the United States, I could not resist the temptation to invite them for this year, particularly on account of the World's Fair. There were many serious objections of course. There was no invitation from Congress, and even from the American group, and there was no guarantee whatever of an appropriation to defray the necessary expenses of the meeting. I promised everything, implicitly relying on those splendid American characteristics which are favorably known the world over—generosity and hospitality. After a well-natured struggle they voted to come and do so unanimously. But while the delegates were still cheering, I suddenly realized that I had a good-sized elephant on my hands. As the only American present, I had, perhaps, undertaken too much. The events of the following six months, however, removed every doubt. The President mentioned the impending conference in his message, the organization of an American group proved a success, and both Houses of Congress passed my joint resolution extending an official invitation to the European lawmakers, and making an appropriation of $50,000 for their entertainment. During the first week in September they arrived in New York, 200 strong, of whom about 220 were actual members of the Parliaments of fourteen different countries of Europe. It was a most distinguished body of men, comprising princes, counts, barons, and other noblemen, Senators, Speakers of Houses, former cabinet ministers who are still holding seats in the Parliaments of their countries, etc. Aside from the mission which brought them here, their visit to this country alone, it seems to me, was a notable event, and it is certainly strange that the metropolitan press never woke up to its real importance. Accompanied by a committee of Congress they made what proved to be a triumphal tour through the country as far as the Rocky Mountains, being entertained with lavish hospitality at all the principal cities along the route, and it is putting it mildly when I say that their notions of the United States underwent a complete change. Genuine enthusiasm bordering on ecstasy are by no means extravagant terms to describe the state of their feelings. What they have seen and heard will, of course, be spread broadcast in Europe, so that the expenditure of the people's money in entertaining them as the guests of the nation will, in any event, prove an excellent investment. Indeed, a little reflection will satisfy us that these parliamentary visits are the best possible means to promote the cause of international unity and peace.

On March 3 of this year I had the honor to draft and introduce in the House of Representatives a concurrent resolution requesting the President to convene a second international conference, similar to the one at Hague, at a time and place to be agreed upon by the signatory powers. At the St. Louis conference the Interparliamentary Union, I am happy to say, assumed sponsorship of this resolution, and made it its own by a unanimous vote. The union has accomplished great things in the past, many of the arbitration treaties already concluded, and the first Hague conference itself being credited to its initiative. But the adoption of that resolution, in view of the success which has attended it—thanks to the sagacity of a far-seeing President—is regarded as its most glorious achievement. Since all the cabinets of Europe, or rather, of the world, are now considering the contents of the resolution, it may be well to give it a place here. It reads as follows:

—Whereas, enlightened public opinion and the spirit of modern civilization alike demand that differences between nations should be adjudicated and settled in the same manner as disputes between individuals are adjudicated—namely, by the arbitrament of courts in accordance with recognized principles of law;

H. De Lathau, of Belgium

Dr. Hauptmann, of Germany

Dr. Tydeman, of the Netherlands

John Lund, of Norway

Prominent Members of the Delegations to the Interparliamentary Peace Congress in America

Mr. Albert Gobert, of Switzerland

Marquis Di Sere Gialini, of Italy

W. R. Curran,
Sec. of the British Delegation

Mr. Jaime De Paiva, of Portugal

"The conference requests the several governments of the world to send representatives to an international conference, to be held at a time and place to be agreed upon by them for the purpose of considering:

"First, the questions for the consideration of which the conference at the Hague expressed a wish that a future conference be called;

"Second, the negotiation of arbitration treaties between the nations represented at the conference to be convened;

"Third, the advisability of establishing an international congress to convene periodically for the discussion of international questions.

"And this conference respectfully and cordially requests the President of the United States to invite all the nations to send representatives to such a conference."

There is little doubt but what all the governments will respond to the President's invitation. Negotiations will now be carried on as to the real subjects to be discussed at the next conference, which the President prefers to have again convene at the Hague, and the call will be issued according to the agreements of the powers. In this connection it is well to remember that diplomacy, as a rule, is considerably behind public sentiment. The most advanced ground on this question is, perhaps, occupied by the pure societies which convene in annual congresses (1884, in Boston). They prepare the raw material, if I may use this simile. This is then sifted by the lawmakers of the Interparliamentary Union, who, being clothed with responsibility by the people, carefully sift out what is practically, wise, and timely, and from what is then left diplomacy picks what is suitable to its purposes.

The men now enlisted in the great movement for international justice and peace do not underrate its obstacles. They are as well aware of human prejudice and human passion as is the wise man and the skeptic. Being engaged in an intellectual struggle for peace, they can appreciate even more than others the effect of an education which holds up only fighters and military heroes as models and examples worthy of emulation, and they are not unmindful of the existence of the great military powers, with their millions of subjects, whose intellects are lulled by the warrior's pomp and glory. But they—the advocates of the world's peace—lack, nevertheless, that their cause is just, and justice and reason must finally prevail. The necessity of social order requires a citizen, when he has any difficulty with his neighbors, to submit the same to arbitration—i. e., to the arbitrament of a court. Instead of being permitted to fight it out with his adversary, civilized society compels him to lose to the suzerainty of the law. All that the friends of peace demand is that nations should be held to do precisely the same thing. What is law for an individual should be law for a nation. Is not this as plain and simple as it is logical, and is it not reasonable? Enlightened public opinion is wont to ridicule duels between individuals, and yet in these affairs what is called personal honor is usually involved. Is it not true that duels between civilized nations should be regarded in the same light? Personal honor is as dear to the person as national honor is to the nation. The individual and the nation are both units in their respective spheres, and the same considerations which compel the one to seek redress in court apply with equal force to the other.

The human family is willing and anxious that this idea be put into execution. All that is required for it is the necessary machinery: an international court (which is already in existence) and an international congress to be followed by an international police, and an agreement between the nations of the world to lose to the supremacy of these institutions. If the plater's ink which has been and is being wasted in efforts to show that wars, though admitted to be relics of barbarism, are unavoidable, had been utilized for the purpose of picturing the horrors, the atrocities, and the untold misery of war, greater advancement would already have been made in the direction indicated, and the cause of humanity correspondingly benefited. All the wiseacres now point to the Far East to prove their assertion. So do we. The horrible butchery now going on there, as senseless as it is appalling, will pave the way for the second peace conference of nations.

Europe looks for deliverance, by the diplomatic action of the United States, from well-nigh unbearable war horrors. Let us rejoice as Americans that American diplomacy, under the leadership of a great President and a great Secretary of War, is proving equal to the emergency.

The President and the Interparliamentary Union

By Hayne Davis

Special Press Representative, with the Interparliamentary Union during its visit to America.

SEVENTEEN years ago the originator of the Interparliamentary Union appeared at Washington and requested the United States to take the lead in the arbitration movement (that was coming) by opening up negotiations with Great Britain for a general treaty of arbitration. The request was cordially received by the government, however warmly the President may have responded personally to the sentiments of the pioneers of arbitration. William Russell Crozer, who came with the request for an arbitration treaty seventeen years ago, was a member of the parliamentary body when the organization which he originated, and which the Honorable Richard Bartholdt has done the most in this country, presented to the President at 2.30 p.m. September 24 the resolution of St. Louis requesting the United States to invite all nations to assemble, and to give the Hague

Georges Buisson, of France

Sir Philip Stanhope,
Sec. of the British Delegation

General Constantin Phila, of Roumania

Ernst Beetsman, of Sweden

Prominent Members of the Delegations to the Interparliamentary Peace Congress in America

Examining a Crevasse—the Summit of the Mountain in the Distance

Imagined Walls of Ice on the Elbow Glacier

The last Pull to the Summit

A great Crevasse on the Elbow Glacier

MOUNTAIN-CLIMBING IN AMERICA—SOME REMARKABLE PHOTOGRAPHS OF A RECENT ASCENT OF MOUNT HOOD, IN OREGON, ONE OF THE HIGHEST PEAKS IN AMERICA

The photographs are snapshots taken during a recent ascension of Mount Hood, in Oregon, by a party of six Americans, led by Mr. Clarence White, of Burlington, Vermont. They are the first photographs of the kind that have been published, showing the summit of Mount Hood, one of the highest peaks in America. It is one of the Cascade Range, and is between eleven and twelve thousand feet in height.

From photographs copyright, 1914, by B. C. White Co., New York

A Panoramic View taken at the Grand Stand near Weather, the Starting-point and Finish of the Race

George Bruth, the Winner of the Race, in his 30 Horse-power Packard
SNAP-SHOTS OF THE INTERNATIONAL
BILT, JR., CUP ON LONG ISLAND, OCTOBER 8

The reader is referred to the opposite page of this issue of the "Weekly" for other photographs and a description of the race

Photographs by Press & Tug

Albert Howard, who made the second best Time in the Race, in his 30 Horse-power Packard AUTOMOBILE RACE FOR THE W. K. VANDER-
BILT, JR., CUP ON LONG ISLAND, OCTOBER 8

The reader is referred to the opposite page of this issue of the "Weekly" for other photographs and a description of the race

Photographs by Press & Tug

George Toste, the French autocrat, who made the fastest Tour for Our Lap in the Race

Photograph by Fred G. Coe

George Toste, Jr., of New York, at the Start. Mr. Toste was badly injured in the Race and his Chauffeur was killed

Photograph by Fred G. Coe

Frank Under, one of the six Racers who Finished, in his 55 Horse-power Simplex

Photograph by Fred G. Coe

SNAP-SHOTS OF THE INTERNATIONAL AUTOMOBILE RACE FOR THE W. K. VANDERBILT, JR., CUP ON LONG ISLAND, OCTOBER 8

The photographs are snap-shots of the first international automobile race ever held in America, which was run on Saturday, October 8, ten times around a thirty-mile triangular course through Nassau and Queens counties, Long Island. The race was run for a cup offered by Mr. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., and was under the auspices of the Automobile Club of America. Of the six eastern contestants who started, the best time for the whole of the course was made by the American, George Toste, representing France, in a 50 horse-power Panhard, driven by himself; the winning time was 3 hours 26 minutes 57 seconds.

same time to be a great Independent, above party and indifferent to it, is in such a country as England or America impossible.

It is often said of Chamberlain's preferential tariff scheme that it is really a "restoration of the old" policy of protection, of reciprocity. So, too, Lord Rosebery's way of looking at parties and his desire to stand above them without losing influence are singularly reminiscent of what England was under George III. If Lord Rosebery has come from the elder statesman, it is not the younger Pitt. I feel pretty sure he would have found nothing in all the volumes of the Chatham correspondence that would have appealed to him more intimately than a letter written to New South Wales in October 1784, in which Pitt wrote in this letter, "I purpose to continue acting through life upon the best conditions I am able to form, and under the obligation of principles, not by the force of any particular largess. . . . I shall go to the end of the world, and I shall not give up consideration. . . . Whatever I think it my duty to oppose or promote, I shall do it independent of the sentiments of others. . . . I have little thoughts of beginning the world again upon a new order of union. . . . I have no disposition to quit the free condition of a man standing single, and daring to appeal to his country-at-large upon the soundness of his principles and the rectitude of his conduct." That was all very well one hundred and forty years ago, but it does not work today. And yet Lord Rosebery's position, so far as his public speech has declared it, is not essentially different from Pitt's in 1784. When at the end of 1891 he came forth from his long retirement to formulate at Cowesfield a new policy he ended his speech with this declaration:—"I am quite aware that my policy does not run on party lines; but it is not to party that I appeal. Party in this matter can avail little or nothing. I appeal unto Caesar from Parliament with its half-hearted but overwhelming government supporters, and a dispirited and daunted Opposition. I appeal to the silent but so powerful tribune of the people, which shapes and controls the destinies of our people—I mean the tribunal of public opinion, that of common sense." That was eloquent enough, but obviously it put all the rest of the speech, which was a rattling party speech, completely out of joint. Whether since then he has been convinced himself that he can effect nothing except through and with the party system, I do not know. But I observe that in the Liberator's speech of yesterday the usual reminder that he is speaking solely for his country is conspicuously absent. It is as if in a more direct leaning towards party than he has displayed for nearly ten years. I may be correct or be wholly wrong. Lord Rosebery may still continue to stultify himself by a policy of abstinence, but I hope, at least, I think I may say all England hopes, that he will not. He is a great national asset but to be realizable he must also become a great Liberal asset. A beneficent and patriotic work that will tax all his endeavors lies before him if he will only consent so far to squiggle himself and his political creed as to look from inside the Liberal ranks. Continuity in foreign policy, efficiency in administration, and temperate reform in domestic affairs are the chief planks in Lord Rosebery's platform; and the country will have need of him and them when the Liberals are again in power. There is a very real danger that unless his experience in foreign and his restraining influence in domestic affairs can be utilized to the full, the Liberals may glide once more into a policy of reaction and "nationalism" abroad and into a brazening Radicalism, barely to be distinguished from Socialism, at home.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

RECOGNITION has been tardier in this country for the work of Mr. A. R. W. Mason than in England, where he is known as the author of several novels of fiction, and has been counted among the foremost novelists of the English school for some years past. On this side, Miranda of the Helweg, was the first book of his to attract attention, which was enhanced by Mrs. Fick's vivid and picturesque presentation of the play made from the story. Two years ago, Mr. Mason made his deep impression on the public, not only here but in England with that remarkable novel, The Four Feathers, which gave him a larger popularity than he had hitherto enjoyed. It bore the fruits of a vigorous observation, a sensitive and keen insight, and a depth of feeling and imagination which entitled him to the high regard and esteem this powerful novel won from the critics and the wide appreciation it met with at the hands of the public. He had carried an arduous and exacting task to its conclusion, that he wrote constantly with a high standard in view; he has always been a man of ideals, an earnest student of life, and a faithful servant of his art. The question was: Would he maintain the high level he had reached with The Four Feathers? It may be said at once that his new novel The Trautman, which has been appearing in these pages and has just been published in book form, answers this question with complete affirmation and satisfaction, and sets at rest any doubts that may have existed regarding the stability of his reputation. One feels that Mr. Mason is at last on free ground and has gained a mastery of his art.

Mr. Mason has always been a good story-teller. He has never disregarded the element of plot in his fiction, though one can perceive that the story grows out of the development of his characters. I can understand the processes of his mind when he says that he has never had the time to study, though he can never tell where his characters may lead him or what they may do before the end is reached. For his imaginative quality is creative and not mechanical; his characters are living, breathing men and women, with their passions, their struggles, their joys and sorrows, with deep feeling, with the sense of world drama, and not a mere abstraction of ideas, labeled and set forth with theatrical precision. There is, too, a deep purpose in his work, an earnest view of the world, a consciousness of the seriousness of life. No one can read The Four Feathers or The Trautman without being moved by their keen insight and observation, and the impact of mind upon mind. An eminent critic has been deploring the lack of religious feeling in the fiction of today, and he is right in his criticism. But this can scarcely be charged against Mr. Mason. His work is imbued with a spiritual significance and conscience which enables the trend of his thought and dignifies his treatment of life. Like Miranda in The Trautman, he has a sense of things which one remembers to have learned before, in the still of conscience, in the exercise of sympathies which become suppressed, one finds new delight: the consciousness of life as a thing enjoyable begins to tingle afresh in one's dormant sensibilities. Pamela had experienced great disillusionment, and she had become cynical and bitter. It did not seem possible for her ever to take up her life again as she had once lived it; even where she loved she could not trust that life herself go. Since then she has found the joy of being free by these new words, and again that "one must take one's risks." It took her a long time to permit this in her own experience, and indeed, it had to be forced upon her by the experience of others whose need was as great as hers. And thereby hangs the tale: for the story of Pamela, Miranda and Warriden, her lover, is interwoven with the story of Tony and Millie and Strutton—the "trautman."

The story of The Trautman grew out of an actual experience. Though still a young man, Mr. Mason has been a great traveler, and he has had many curious adventures and seen many strange things, but perhaps the most strange that he has seen is this: "It's a strange place, London." One can imagine him saying as Warriden does in The Trautman: "No doubt it seems strange to me, and once full of interesting people and interesting things, just because I have come back from very silent and very empty places. But that house always puzzled me." Pamela and Warriden have just observed a man and a woman engaged in evening dress from a dark house opposite, and stood away round the corner with the air of trying to remember a name. "I don't know who they are, and I don't care, over there," and Warriden pointed to the eastern side of the square towards Berkeley Street: "and what we have seen to-night would take place every night, and at the same hour. The light went up in the room on the second floor and the trams crept along, but there they go too! The Navy. They go and sit there among the lights and the music for half an hour, then they come back to the dark house. They live in the most curious isolation with the most serious regularity. There are three of them altogether: an old man—it is his light, I suppose, which went up on the second floor—and three men. I know who they are. The old man is Sir John Strutton. And the two people we saw are his son and his son's wife. I have never met them. In fact, no one meets them. I don't know any one who knows them." But Pamela knew them—she had been Millie Strutton's bridesmaid—and Warriden was ultimately to know them also; in fact, events were even then shaping themselves to draw him and Pamela into the tangled web that was to involve all four in its meshes, before the mystery surrounding the lives of the traumas, as well as Warriden's perplexing problem concerning Pamela, was solved. Tony had to learn over again as old London has the time to learn it just in time, that he was not a Millie's from utter work. "I have learned something which I might have known before, but never did," he said to her, when he led her back to the little house in Denney Street—the outward expression of a couple's rebellious revolt against the conventionalities of a class may be content to know that love exists, that is not the case with women. They want the love expressed, continually expressed, not necessarily in words, but in a hundred little ways. I did not think of that. There was the mistake I made, I felt you alone to think just what you chose." The other point of view! How few of us are aware that it exists, that it is deserving of interest, of consideration; yet it is only that way understanding can be had of things of the heart. Mr. Mason has said to Pamela: (Mirage) by the way, is one of Mr. Mason's cleverest creations, an original conception, quaintly, whimsically humorous; how Barrie must envy him! "Why now?" asked Pamela. "Because, recently, imagination has come to you, I have seen it, I felt it. Imagination, that is the power of understanding, the power of understanding perhaps the greatest gift which love has in all his big box of gifts." Ian Macnair once wrote a story to illustrate this, that we do not sit against our loved one through lack of love but because we do not imagine enough. Mr. Mason's story is an illuminating commentary on the same text; it has not been written for idle amusement, but for ends of beauty and strength. The Trautman is a book to make you love life better; to help you to find joy and interest in the minutiae of existence; to make you understand and breathe you in your own struggle. It is to be hoped that Mr. Mason's novel will have the wide reading and great success it deserves. Of all his books I like it best. And some day I hope Mr. Mason will tell us more of Mr. Mudge. What a rare character for a Barrie play!

A. E. W. MASON, AUTHOR OF "THE TRUANTS," WHO IS NOW VISITING AMERICA

Mr. A. E. W. Mason, the English novelist, is the author of "The Truants," which has been appearing serially in the "Weekly," and which has just been published in book form. The literary work of Mr. Mason, who is now visiting America, is the subject of an interesting appreciation by Mr. James MacVickar, on the opposite page of this number of the "Weekly."

The Adventures of an Explorer in Africa

How the Batwa Pygmies were brought to the St. Louis Fair

By Samuel P. Verner

Special Commissioner to Central Africa from the Louisiana Purchase Exposition

IT was while Livingston's son was dying at Fictsburg that Paul Du Chaillu first saw the African Pygmies, and became the first modern scientific traveller to visit them in their forest haunts. This was on the third of July, 1865, at the headwaters of the Oboke River, West Central Africa. The accounts given by different travellers concerning the character and habits of these little folk are practically the same, and have been received by the world at large with varying degrees of doubt or credulity. The African Pygmies are both unique and interesting, and never before has any group of them left its native abode for civilized lands. They are the wildest of the human race.

It is interesting to note that when Darwin was propounding his theory of the origin of species in 1859, the primitive aboriginals of Africa were unknown, save from the ancient Grecian traditions, and even when he wrote The Descent of Man in 1871, so little of them was known that he made no mention of the Pygmies, although he stated that the first human race was probably in Central Africa, and that the two most anthropomorphic apes, the gorilla and the chimpanzee, were denizens of the African forests. How gladly would Darwin have enjoyed the opportunity any schoolboy may have now at St. Louis! For the next of kin among men to the paleoanthropine of the troilanthropus is now at the Fair.

I was asked to invite him here, and I had found a place of the Batwa Pygmies in 1897, and had lived near them nearly two years. The necessary diplomatic requirements were met at the granting of a letter from the Secretary of State in Washington to the Government of the King of the Belgians, at the instance of President Francis. With other desirable introductions, we left New York the latter part of November, arriving at Liverpool December 7, and spending a month in London and Brussels, arranging official affairs with the Congo Government, selecting and purchasing supplies, and preparing for our departure from Antwerp for the Congo River on January 7. We were fellow passengers with the eminent officials of the Congo State, the new Governor-General, Major Paul Cuvelier, the "Inspector d'Etat," M. Mahieu, and the chief-conductor of the new railways in the interior, M. Augustus Adam.

While our five-hundred-ton ship was sailing up the Congo, we ran aground on one of the treacherous shifting sandbanks, and was obliged to transfer cargo to a lighter vessel, being delayed three days, and causing us finally and unavoidably to miss a connection with a steamer for the upper river, resulting in a month's loss of time.

M. Felix Fuchs, the Governor-General at Boma, the Congo's capital, — Stanley's resting place after his arduous descent of the great river in 1877, — issued the necessary introductions to the officials in the interior, and we proceeded to the post of the Congo, Haut Congo, the upper river, until February 17, when we were able to embark on the Tide of Eternity, a boat of thirty-five ton capacity, eighty feet long by twenty wide, with a lower and upper deck. On this we spent twelve days plunging the waters of the Congo, the greatest southern tributary, the Kasai, stirring up occasional herds of hippopotami, shooting some crocodiles, and once, when on shore while the river was cutting wood, having a lively encounter with elephants, as well as another with buffalo, until we reached the confluence of the Sankuru River with the Kasai, opposite a post of the state called Bousong. From this place the Tide of Eternity returned down the river, and we were obliged to wait more than two weeks in another boat to take us up the Sankuru, to the capital of the Kasai District, Lomam.

This waiting time was well spent, for we found one of the Pygmies in the interior behind Bousong, a captive in the hands of the fierce Baschile, and released him. He was delighted to come with us, for he was many miles from his people, and the Baschile were not any masters.

At Lomam, the Commissaire of the District, Captain Christ, received us cordially, and our steamer, the Tide of Eternity, Captain Johnson, first descended the Sankuru, then turned up the Kasai and made for its head at Wissmann Falls. As some state boats had been recently attacked in this part of the river, and the wild Baschile had set upon and burned a rubber trading post on the west bank, the four white men aboard took turns as sentinels at night when insured along the shore. It is not a pleasant feeling to tramp the deck at midnight, not knowing when a poisoned arrow may fly from the forest, and the wild yell of the black savages burst on the ear. I hailed the morning with profound pleasure, and when we descended up the Kasai, the forested mountains to Wissmann Falls on the last day of March, I beheld my old companion, ground with decided relief.

The steamer captain said that the lot of raging water below Wissmann Falls, across which we went in a canoe seeking a landing below the great forest, was the worst he had ever tried in all his Congo steamboating. The river was higher than it had ever been seen before, the natives told me afterwards. It was regarded as a portent. I had in rough ashore on the bank of a tree. Leaving the captain to pilot the boat across, I began the twenty-mile walk along the narrow trail in the forest of my old friend Ndombé, King of the Bilenge, and feudal lord of the Batwa Pygmies in their little settlement on the edge of the forest extending down the Lobi water to the Kasai. About midday I came in sight of the waving plainland leaves and slender palm groves which adorn this African capital. In a few moments some of the natives saw me, and what a hailstorm of arrows was set up as the news spread! My old friends came tramping up. Ndombé's eldest son, Mingo, now grown into a tall handsome young man, rushed up with a Pwéle, Mingo, the palm wine was brought out, the latter gent was killed, and Ndombé himself left the war palaver he was holding and came and gave me a warm welcome.

Next day the whole town marched, or rather ran, down to the river, and Ndombé's warriors insisted on bringing me in a few monkeys. Captain Johnson had followed me up, and returned to the boat remarking that Ndombé was the finest specimen of the race he had seen in the Congo, and that a Pygmy woman with a child whom he saw as he passed by was the smallest mother he had ever seen. The Bilenge snarled over the steamer, and great was their wonder, for never before had a white man seen Ndombé's land.

Our cargo having been discharged in the forest, most of it was seized upon by Ndombé's men, and carried by them to the town that day, and the rest of it was similarly borne through the woods and across the plains in the next few days. The next day we arrived at Ndombé's capital, a colored man, went on to Ndombé's capital town, named after the king, Ndombé, my companion, was left at the river to notify us of the coming of a steamer which it was expected would follow us up the Kasai. The next morning we walked back to Ndombé, arriving there at sunset, and enjoyed a meal which Ndombé had prepared with characteristic skill. At ten o'clock that night Ndombé arrived. He reported that the steamer had arrived about midnight, and was to follow the next morning. I wished to send mail on this boat down the river, so we started back after Ndombé had eaten and rested. That midnight tramp through those vast, sombre forests, full of legends, hymns, elephants, and pitfalls, was surely full enough of excitement. I was the most adventurous being. Perhaps the mosquitoes were the most dangerous of all the foes we had to evade. Arriving at the river about dawn, we crossed in a canoe, and found the captain of the last in a raging malarial fever.

One of the Pygmies with War-trumpet in the Exhibit at the World's Fair

The next day I doctored and nursed him until he could resume navigation. He said he was going to Lucho, on the Lufua River,—the seat of the local government, a subson, and a trading-station,—a hundred and fifty miles distant by the river. As the local officer at Lucho had jurisdiction over Ndoube's territory, I thought it wise to visit him, and exhibit my authority for our operations. On the occasion of this visit, I was courteously entertained by Lieutenant Bubbis, and also met Captain de Coker, of the Force Publique. I also paid for my familiarity with the mosquito tulle by leaving my first fever. I returned to Ndoube by boat, reaching there April 20, and then began the final offensive campaign on the minds of the aboriginal recipients of President Francis' invitation to visit the Fair.

Only those who have experienced or read of the tortuous mazes of African diplomacy can appreciate the extreme delicacy and difficulty of this work. To overcome the natural shyness of the little Batwa, so that the matter could be discussed at all; to give them any adequate idea of the great gathering to which they were invited; to overcome their fears of the journey; to convince them of the good faith of the dreaded white man; to placate their kin-people and friends; to combat the ignorance and prejudice of thousands of years—this was surely a task not to be despised. Then, too, above all things, the African boys deliberated. The great haste needed in this expedition vastly increased its intrinsic difficulties. This was a matter, in the minds of the natives, for many months' consultation and consideration. Yet I had to ask them to leave in three weeks' time! The very proposition seemed absurd. Even Ndoube remonstrated that he did not have time to finish greeting me before proposing to go. The old men shook their heads sagely. The medicine men were violently opposed to it. The women howled all night long over the matter. Some of them sent their boys off to the bushes, when the matter finally became heated about.

Then the situation was complicated by the state of war existing between Ndoube and his cousin Belling. Belling was in rebellion. A warrior from his town had stolen into Ndoube's town at night, and eloped with one of the wives of one of the principal members of the Bikingu aristocracy. If she had been a slave, a good round payment would have sufficed. But being of the nobility, Ndoube's demand on Belling was "The woman back, or fight!" So they fought. When I first arrived, there had been a number of men killed on each side, and both towns were in a state of "shed on sight."

The Pygmies were valuable allies in Ndoube in this war. Naturally the men would not like to leave a fight behind them in which members of their families might be killed in their absence. So I had first to address myself in the task of securing a truce between the combatants. Ndoube consented to call off his men, provided Belling would also restrain his warriors, and consent to my acting as arbitrator. I sent word to Belling by a man from a neutral town, and Belling consented to an armistice until he could visit me in state and lay his side of the case before me.

Then I asked Joka's advice about methods of procedure. Joka was Ndoube's prime minister. He said that if peace was fully restored, he would go to America himself. I replied at this. We called in Ndoube and Mianye. Mianye was enthusiastic about going too. Ndoube could not think of it; he said he might find no kingdom on his return, that he said he would gladly consent to securing the consent of some of his people and of some of the Batwa to go. It was decided that Mianye was the best intermediary between the Pygmies and myself, and the night after he brought one of the Batwa, his own special friend, to talk over the matter. This was Malengu, who subsequently came with us. Malengu made numerous objections, but promised to consider the matter, and if he decided favorably, to try to induce others. Mianye remained behind after Malengu left, and suggested that next day I visit the Pygmy village with him, and take plenty of salt with me. Sodium chloride is more desired by the inhabitants of Central Africa than gold. Knowing this, I had gone well provided with salt.

I found the Pygmy village largely peopled with children. I gave each piece of a pinch of salt. Soon they snarled, screaming, dancing, whooping with delight. Their mothers emerged from their clay leaf-coated huts. They, too, were salted. Then came the old men. I became so popular that I hurriedly had healing rooms. I left word for any Pygmy that wanted salt to visit me next morning. Next day the yard before my grass hut was black with them. Word about that Salt had gone to the woods. The men were there. They were liberally treated. Then another idea struck me. These men were great hunters. I had a number of cheap guns for purposes of protection. I selected some of the brightest-looking of the men, showed them how to use the guns, and lent them the weapons. They beamed. That night the famer mentioned—they were certainly no mean sportsmen. These two devices broke the ice. Thereafter the Pygmies came freely, and I held nightly conferences. But still I obtained the consent of individuals to come only one by one. This meant that the patients time was flying. After Malengu, the next was Lomui, then Mianye, then Bous-shaba. Three more also promised, but subsequently gave away to their fears. The old men and the women continued their incoherent opposition, and many a stormy scene came up the morning after an interview with some promising man or youth the night before.

Here is a conversation, one of many:

Rhousha (one of the principal old Batwa men): "Fuels (my appellation), why do you not stop working your magic on me boys?"

Fuels: "I am not working magic, I am only inviting them to come to my country, as I have visited yours."

Rhousha: "But the white men are wizards. They will surely bewitch our boys."

Fuels: "When did Fuels bewitch you? I tell you we mean to be good friends to you and your people."

Rhousha: "But our doctors say that the white men eat black people in their country. Is the old lady many went away from here to be eaten?" (Referring to the ancient slave-trade.)

Fuels: "That is all wind talk. The white men do not eat men."

Rhousha: "But they say that you have men men in those iron pots you bring with you." (Meaning roasted meats.)

Fuels: "That is all foolishness. Those meats are cow and hog meats."

Rhousha: "But then, white men live under water." (The tradition in the interior, since on the coast the ships seem to come up out of the sea.) "Black men cannot live under water."

Fuels: "But here is Kofidola who went down with me before."

Rhousha: "How do I know that you have not bewitched him?"

Fuels: "If I were a wizard, why did the white men let me live?"

Rhousha: "They are wizards. But give us some salt. I do

Batwa Pygmies at the World's Fair (the Boy at the Left of the Group is a Father-youngster, and one of the Batwa Pygmies)

Correspondence

THE PRESIDENT AND THE TARIFF

New York, October 10, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—One of the most extraordinary statements in Mr. Roosevelt's letter of acceptance is that a Democratic tariff law would aim "at preventing the prosperity of some of our people." What the Wilson Tariff was intended to make a law which would give fair play to all our people. So far from preventing the prosperity of any one, it provided, as far as a statute could, an opportunity for prosperity to all. To the manufacturer it gave free raw material, or rather the materials of his industry. To the farmer it gave a better market, by encouraging trade with foreign countries, and thereby providing a better market for the products of the farm. To the great body of consumers it insured lower prices. No one could suffer from it. It is not suffering, or a reduction of prosperity, to take from the great capitalist a bonus to which he is in no respect entitled, and which simply enhances his profits, in the detriment of the community at large.

Again, this extraordinary letter repeats the old statement that the Republican tariff is designed "to sweep in the American wage-worker the benefit of the high standard of living which we desire to see kept up in this country." The fact is that when the Dingley bill was before the Senate, in order to test the sincerity of this false and hypocritical pretence, I drew and sent to Senator Gray two amendments to the bill. One of them provided that the rate of duty should not in any case exceed "the entire cost of the article which were paid or payable on the manufacture of such article." Premium was voted by this amendment for ascertaining such wage cost. This amendment was voted down, as has expected, by the Republican majority.

Another amendment provided that no duty "at any rate exceeding seventy-five per cent, ad valorem shall be levied upon any article except spirits, wines, and other beverages." No one can pretend that the wage cost, much less the entire cost, be the wage cost of American manufactured articles, is over as much as seventy-five per cent. That rate was inserted designedly, in order to give the Republican majority an opportunity to show that at least there was some honesty in the pretences in regard to the tariff. This also they promptly voted down.

The fact is that in the present Dingley bill, by an ingenious combination of ad valorem and specific duties, the tax that is actually levied on our articles that are in point of fact accessories of life for the American workman exceeds just per cent. To claim that increasing the cost of everything that a working man has to buy, enables him to keep up a high standard of living, is one of the absurdities of which the tariff should make an honest man blush. It really does not seem possible that the same Theodore Roosevelt, who thirty years ago was the folly and absurdity of a high protective tariff, can now be putting upon the public those who are the victims of it.

It is no part of the Democratic policy to pull down the edifice of American manufacturing prosperity. The Wilson bill, so far from doing this, gave the most reasonable consideration to the interest of invested capital. If it were really today it could afford a ample revenue for the needs of the government. True, it did not do this in a time of great business depression, but that was simply because the Supreme Court reversed its previous decision, held that an income tax was unconstitutional, and struck out of the bill provisions as to the income tax, which were necessary at that time to provide revenue sufficient to make the annual appropriation of presents. A Republican majority in the following Congress refused to add provision for the deficiency in revenue caused by this decision. But the tariff itself was certainly not arbitrary and far more reasonable and just than the present Dingley tariff.

I AM, SIR, FAITHFULLY Y. WHEELER.

AN ANTIEMPERICALIST VIEW

Boston, September 26, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—In your review this week, entitled "Senator Lodge on the Unpopularity of the Wilson Tariff," you make a number of incisive objections to the indefinite assurances of good intentions contained in the St. Louis platform, but that these trifles—no tariff is so much as a declaration which Judge Parker might make "that as we found you morals and in only religious purpose toward the Filipinos, precisely the same manner which we have followed toward the Cubans, and in the former war, as in the latter, should make a definite promise to grant the Islanders perfect independence at a fixed date, say, for example, ten years from the present time."

May I ask how such a declaration could be more definite, and therefore more intransigent to Senator Lodge's criticism, than that of the St. Louis platform? It is our duty to make that promise now, and upon suitable guarantees of protection to citizens of our own and other countries resident there at the time of our withdrawal, set the Filipino people upon their feet, free and independent to seek out their own destiny.

Anti-imperialists are, however, in "education" for independence by a foreign sovereign, however enlightened and well-intentioned. This, as John Fiske testifies, is an ideal never attained and impossible of attainment. Anti-imperialists believe in national evolution, protected by a "neutralization," such as the United States could at once obtain for the Philippines. When Dr. Leon Guerrero, an intelligent member of the Philippine Exposition Board, was asked whether he thought the Filipinos were capable of self-government, he said: "If the government of the United States expects to make an Anglo-Saxon of the Filipino it will be a long time, if taken as they are, as Filipinos, I mean, they are capable of governing themselves now." Mr. Guerrero's meaning, of course, that the "long time" should be never. Not in ten years, but at once, the present policy of the United States should be abandoned. It is only dishonesty and hypocrisy to speak of future independence. It is probably more or never. I am, sir, EARNEST WILSON.

INCIDENTS OF POLITICAL HISTORY

St. Louis, Mo., September 10, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Where you inquire about the number dated October 1 was prepared? I see that you report that Root was nominated for Governor of New York instead of Higgins. Another item in regard to the Tilden-Hayes election refers to the part taken by Senator Bill Chandler, a late Senator Zachariah Chandler, of Michigan, was the leading spirit conducting the investigation that led to Hayes being declared elected.

But I cannot say that the editor is one of the young men who have grown up since the war of the rebellion and knows very little of ancient history. But if he ever comes to know as much as he thinks he knows now, the world will stand in awe of one so great and wonderful. I am, sir, A. R. CULVER.

If Mr. Culver will kindly drop into the nearest Carnegie library and examine the New York Times of June 15, 1867, or John Higginson's Life of General J. F. Taylor, Vol. II, page 11, he will find that the Chandler whom John T. Reid met in the Fifth Avenue Hotel on the morning after the election in 1876, and who promptly initiated the investigation in the conspiracy and sent the first telegram to Southern Republicans, was Senator Bill of New Hampshire. We reluctantly admit, as the result of a thorough investigation induced by Mr. Culver's reflections upon the accuracy of our statements, that Mr. Root was not nominated for Governor. Some people residing at present on the left bank of the Potomac wish about now that he had been.—EDITOR.

ANDREW JACKSON'S BAD MANNERS

St. Louis, Mo., September 10, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—In your current issue you say, speaking of the manners of some of our Presidents, "We suggest that the President Henry Lee Nelson used the word 'immoderate' to avoid comparison with such Presidents as Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln, who in some respects are supposed to have done pretty well."

Where did you get the idea that Andrew Jackson had bad manners? Is this man to be continually labelled by people who should know better, and is his career, one of the most studied processes by any of our public men, to be assailed simply because he has never had a really sympathetic historian? I challenge you to point to any single act in General Jackson's public career, stretching over fifty years, which indicates that he had bad manners, or was not a man of the most delicate sensibilities and most chivalrous nature. On the other hand, I can point you to numerous statements of foreign travellers to the effect that in mien, appearance, and dignity, General Jackson was a man who would attract attention, and compare favorably with any of the practical conquerors of Europe.

Did you ever hear of General Jackson telling a vulgar story? Do you not know that the inspiration of his mature years was the memory of his wife, who died as he was preparing to leave his home for the White House, whose picture hung in his study, and could be seen near his bed, where he could see it the first thing in the morning and the last at night, and whose inscription, written by himself, upon her tomb is as chaste in expression and nobility of sentiment as it is in its reverence and beauty?

General Jackson owned race-horses and ran them; he fought duels, when provoked into them, and they were not of his own choosing, but not one of our Presidents, from George Washington down, had a more sinless life, possessing a higher conception of the dignity and responsibility of his office, or was more free from partisan bias.

I have already taken up too much of your space, but desire to add a few words to the last statement. It was General Jackson, who urged President Monroe, a Democrat, to appoint John Quincy Adams, a Federalist, to the first place in his cabinet. John Monroe did, and Adams stayed there eight years. General Jackson's letter to President Monroe, urging this step, showed his devotion to the public service and his abhorrence of mere party service, and this carried with it his administration. Of seventeen foreign ministers, he only retained one during his first year of office, and of over eight thousandable removable officers, only six hundred and ninety were turned out of office, and these not for partisan purposes, but because of their incompetence or corrupt practices employed in securing the appointment.

If you really want the truth about Andrew Jackson, I beg to call your attention to a history of him, just from the press, by my venerable fellow-townman, Colonel A. S. Colyer.

I AM, SIR, THOMAS J. BROWN.

Quintana, R. & S. J. Lieber kind. You have done this to please me, but—" And her voice wavered a little.

"Well!" said Tony.
 "Just," she went on, with difficulty, "I am not sure that I can endure it, unless things are different from what they have been lately. I shall be reminded every minute of other times, and the comparison between those times and the present will be very painful. I think that I shall be very unhappy, much more unhappy than I have ever been, even lately."

Her voice sank to a whisper at the end. The little house in Beaufort Street, even in her dreams, had been no more than a symbol. She had longed for it as the outward and visible sign of the complete reconciliation on which her heart was set. But to have the sign and to know that it signified nothing—she dreaded that possibility now. Only for a very few moments she dreaded it.

"I don't think I can endure it, Tony," she said, sadly. And the next moment his arms were about her, and her head was resting against his breast.

"Mille!" he cried, in a low voice; and again "Mille!"

Her face was white, her eyelids closed over her eyes. Tony thought that she had fainted. But when he moved her hands held him close to her, held him tightly, as though she dreaded to lose him.

"Mille," he said, "do you remember the lights in Oahu Bay? And the gulls sailing at night above the islands?"
 "I am forgiven, then?" she whispered; and he answered only:
 "Hush."

But the one word was enough.

CHAPTER XXXVI

THE END

TONY wished for no mention of the word. He had not brought her to that house that he might forgive her, but because he wanted her there. If forgiveness was in question there was much to be said upon her side, too. He was to blame, as Pamela had written. He had, during the last few months, begun to realize the justice of that sentence more clearly than he had done even when the bitter was fresh within his thoughts.

"I have learned something," he said to Mille, "which I might have known before, but never did. It is this. Although a man may be content to know that love exists, that is not the case with women. They want the love expressed, continually expressed, and necessarily in words, but in a hundred little ways. I did not think of that. There was the mistake I made: I let you alone to think just what you chose."

"Well, that's all over now. I bought this house not merely to please you, but as much to please myself; for as soon as I understood that, after all the compromise which I dreaded need not be our lot—that, after all, the life together of which I used to dream was possible, was within arm's reach if only one would just cast an arm and grasp it, I wanted you here. As soon as I was sure, quite sure that I had reclaimed you, I wanted you here."

He spoke with passion, holding her in his arms. Mille remained quite still for a while, and then she asked:

"Do you miss the Legion? As much as you thought you would—as much as you did that night at Eve?"

He answered: "No"; and spoke the truth. On that night at Eve he had not foreseen the outcome of his swift return, of his intrusion into the joyfully-lighted room murmurous with the sea breeze. On that night he had revealed himself to Mille, and the revelation had been the beginning of her in her rather than its resumption.

This he had come to understand, and, understanding, could reply with truth that he did not miss the Legion as he had thought he would. The sea murmurs, so distant, when the sound of a lute on a still evening would stir him to a cease of love, and he would fall to dreaming of Taverney and Barbier, and his old compatriots, and the murmuring silence of the Sahara. At times, too, the yapping of dogs

1854-1904

WALTHAM WATCHES

ALWAYS FAITHFUL

After fifty years of good works the word "WALTHAM" has become the most famous trademark in the world, and signifies everywhere the best American watch.

We make a great many grades of movements, each one designed for the use it is to receive, and all good timekeepers.

For sale by all Jewelers

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY,
 WALTHAM, MASS.

Read Blake's HOW TO GET STRONG and How to Stay So

How and (page 100)

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

In Calm or In Storm LIFE

INSURANCE

is the One Resource Always Certain and Secure

THE PRUDENTIAL HAS THE STRENGTH OF GIBRALTAR

Policies for Both Sexes
 Ages 1 to 70
 Amounts up to $100,000

THE PRUDENTIAL
 INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA

JOHN DRYDEN,
 President.

Please forwarding request for more copies, I shall be glad to furnish this.
 Name _____
 Address _____
 City _____
 State _____
 Mailed 1000-1000, No. 7

Home Office:
 NEWARK, N. J.

Visit The Prudential's Exhibit, Palace of Education, World's Fair, St. Louis.

In the street would call up vividly before his mind the picture of some tent village in Moscow where he had camped, the wind rustling among trees on a night of storm would set his mind wondering whether the latch Procurement was heading to the white-riveted rollers, clattered between the Digger and the Feder bands; and for a little while he would feel the seat of the horse sharp upon his lips, and longing would be busy at his heart—for the latch cannot easily become a stay-at-home. There, however, were but the passing needs.

Of one other character who took an important part in shaping the fortunes of the Truants a final word may be said. A glimpse of that man, of the real man in him, was vouchsafed to Warriden two summers later. It happened that Warriden attended a public dinner which was held in a restaurant in Oxford Street. He left the company before the dinner was over, since he intended to fetch his wife Pamela, who was on that date enacting a performance of "Ripetto" at the Opera House in Covent Garden. Warriden rose from the table and slipped out, as he thought, in eleven o'clock, but on descending into the hall he found that he had miscalculated the time. It was as yet only a quarter to the hour, and having fifteen minutes to spare, he determined to wait.

The summer night was hot; he threw his overcoat across his arm, and turning round out of Oxford Street, passed down a narrow road in the neighborhood of Drury Lane. In those days, which were not, after all, so very distant from our own, the great blocks of model buildings had not as yet been erected; squatted courts and rookeries opened on to ill-lighted passages; the houses had a ruinous and a miserable look. There were few people abroad as Warriden passed through the quarter, and his breast-plate of white shirt-front made him a conspicuous figure. He had come about half the way from Oxford Street when he saw two men suddenly emerge from the mouth of a narrow court a few yards in front of him. The two men were speaking, or, rather, shouting, then from the abject nature of their postures, no less than from the abject nature of the language which they held, it struck Warriden that they were quarrelling. Words and gestures led to the ground.

In the instant a little group of people was gathered about the combatants, people intensely silent and interested—the sight conceivable rapidly, as though they had been waiting in the shadowy place. Warriden, indeed, was wondering curiously at the absence of it. He stopped and peered over the shoulders of the men and women in front of him that he might see the better. The two disputants had relapsed apparently into mere slumber. Warriden pressed forward, and those in front parted and made way for him. He did not, however, take advantage of the defence shown to his attire; for at that moment a voice whispered in his ear:

"You had better slip out. This one is got up for you."

Warriden turned upon his heel. He saw a stout, stout, meanly-dressed man of an elderly appearance moving away from his side. No doubt it was he who had warned him. Warriden took the advice, all the more readily because he perceived that the group was, as it were, beginning to reform itself, with him as the new center. He was, however, still upon the outskirts. He pushed quickly out into the open street, crossed the road, and continued on his way. In front of him he saw the stout elderly man, and, quickening his pace, he caught him up.

"I have to thank you," he said, "for saving me from an awkward moment."

"Yes," replied the stout man, as he heard his voice, glanced at him with a sudden curiosity. But his hat was low upon his brows, and the street was dark.

It was an old trick, but the old tricks are the tricks which succeed. There was no real quarrel at all. Those two men were merely pretending to quarrel in order to attract your attention. You were seen a-spying—(that white shirt-front naturally inspired hope. In another minute you would have been hustled down the court and into one of the houses at the end. You would have been lucky if, half an hour later, you were turned out into the street stripped of everything of value you possess, half naked and half dead into the bargain. Good night!)

The little man crossed the road abruptly. It was plain that he needed not any thanks nor any further conversation. It occurred to Warriden, indeed, that he was deliberately avoiding conversation. Warriden accordingly walked on to the Opera House, where met, meeting his wife in the vestibule, told her this story while they waited for their trunks.

As they drove together homewards he added: "That is not all, Pamela. I don't know but that the little stout man reminded me very much of some one we both knew."

Pamela turned suddenly towards her husband. "Yes," replied Warriden, with some astonishment at the accuracy of her guess. "He reminded me of a man of whom I was very much attached."

"It was Mr. Mulger," she said, gently. "In all of us."

"He was Mr. Mulger," she said, gently. "In all of us."

"He was Mr. Mulger," she said, gently. "In all of us."

"Mulger!" he cried, in a low voice and, meeting his wife in the vestibule, told her this story while they waited for their trunks.

As they drove together homewards he added: "That is not all, Pamela. I don't know but that the little stout man reminded me very much of some one we both knew."

Pamela turned suddenly towards her husband. "Yes," replied Warriden, with some astonishment at the accuracy of her guess. "He reminded me of a man of whom I was very much attached."

"It was Mr. Mulger," she said, gently. "In all of us."

THE END

Progress of Science

A Proposed Rhine-Danube Ship-Canal

That the canal is a means of inland communication is by no means obsolete is well demonstrated by the fact that there is at present under discussion a project for a ship canal from the Rhine to the Danube, which, if constructed, will prove the most important waterway in Europe. The proposition involves the dredging of the Neckar from Mannheim, where it flows into the Rhine, to Heilbronn, and thence to Cannstatt or Keislingen and Neckarwe, so that it would be navigable for steamers and barges of considerable draught. The distance would be 110 miles, and the expense is estimated at about $10,000,000. From Neckarwe to the Danube, a distance of 71½ miles, the beds of the Rhine, Moselle, and Rhen, all small streams, would be followed, and there would be required a considerable amount of excavation and engineering work, such as lock construction, which is expected to cost about $25,000,000. There would be a certain amount of water-power available from the various locks and feeders of the canal. The commercial advantages following the construction of such a canal are readily apparent—it would link the various states of Germany and other parts of Europe into much closer relation. For example, Bavaria would be connected not only with the Upper Rhine district, but also with the French and Alsace-Lorraine canal system while to the east it would gain access to Russia, Austria-Hungary, and the Balkan Peninsula. Such a waterway would be brought closer to East Prussia, Poland and Italy, while Württemberg, which at present occupies rather an unfavorable position as regards commerce, would lie in the middle of an important system of waterways. Of a somewhat similar nature is a project under discussion for connecting the Rhine and the Danube by the Main, a proposition which is complementary rather than antagonistic to the one just described. These schemes are fairly comparable to the improvement of the Erie Canal in New York.

Injurious Effects of Smoke

An interesting discussion has been going on in Utah to determine the effect of the smoke from factories upon crops, as many of the farmers near Salt Lake City claim that they have suffered damage by the injurious fumes given off from such establishments. So much as the annual value of agricultural products in Utah amounts to $17,000,000, while the metallic output is practically twice as much, it is of importance that conditions should be regulated so that neither industry is injured, either by direct effects or by restrictive legislation. It was found that farms lying in the direction of the prevailing wind, and in the most damaged, but that in no case was it sufficient to cause a total loss of the crop. The greatest damage was done in the spring when the leaves were tender, and in the case of fruit trees the year was the most injured, and the plum the least. Potatoes were also affected, but even possessed considerable power of resistance. The chief cause of damage was the presence of sulphur dioxide in the smoke, which exerts its greatest effect when the atmosphere is damp, but as this is rarely the case in Utah the injury was less than might be expected. The presence of arsenic and copper in the smoke was also shown, and it was believed that such substances, when carried during the winter to distant snowfields, would become dissolved in the water and carried through the district by the water of irrigation systems. It is even possible that concentration produced by evaporation might cause the water in pools to be sufficiently strong in these toxic substances to cause the poisoning of animals. The effects of the smoke, while unquestionably present, were not as serious as feared and were not as widespread as claimed by the farmers. Further interest attaches to the investigation that the country is arid and is famed with the abundance of artificial irrigation, and it was thought that by not turning on the water when the wind blew from the factories an improved condition of affairs could be secured.

MEDICAL OPINIONS OF

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Strong Testimony From the University of Virginia.

"IT SHOULD BE RECOGNIZED AS AN ARTICLE OF MATERIA MEDICA."

James L. Cabell, M.D., A.M., LL.D., former Prof. Physiology and Surgery in the Medical Department of the University of Virginia, and Pres. of the National Association of Buffalo Lithia Water, in Uric Acid Diathesis is Board of Health.

"NOTHING TO COMPARE WITH IT IN PREVENTING URIC ACID DEPOSITS IN THE BODY."

Dr. P. B. Barringer, Chairman of Faculty and Professor of Physiology, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va.: "After twenty years' practice I have no hesitancy in stating that for prevention of uric acid deposits in the body, BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is known to me to be the best."

"I KNOW OF NO REMEDY COMPARABLE TO IT."

Wm. B. Towles, M.D., late Prof. of Anatomy and Materia Medica, University of Va. "In Uric Acid Diathesis, Gout, Rheumatism, Rheumatic Gout, Renal Calculi and Stone in the Bladder, known to me to be the best remedy is BUFFALO LITHIA WATER No. 2." Voluminous medical testimony sent on request. For sale by the general drug and mineral water trade.

PROPRIETOR: BUFFALO LITHIA SPRINGS, VA.

6 Fine Souvenir Teaspoons $1.50

One of the most pleasing souvenirs of the World's Fair, St. Louis, is the set of six teaspoons, made especially to order for the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway by the Ontario Community. Each bowl contains an engraving of a different World's Fair building, and the handles are handsomely engraved. The spoons are made of best material, finely finished and fully guaranteed, and are thoroughly serviceable for everyday use.

Do not fail to order a set. You will be pleased with the spoons.

How to order. Before art will be sent, post paid, in air mail box for $1.50 per Canadian post paid $2.15. Please by express or postpaid orders direct to:

Ontario Community, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

For really shipping, convenient locations between the Fair and St. Louis, see the Lake Shore. It affords the most complete service of any line. Send lowest fares for World's Fair holder and souvenir spoons to: A. J. SMITH, G. P. & T. A., Cleveland, Ohio.

MOTOR BOATS

LAUNCHES, STEAM AND SAIL YACHTS, ROW BOATS, CANOES

SPEED—PLEASURE—BUSINESS

Beautiful Hatteries, Economical, Simple, Safe

Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

Exposition. Motor boats are made in St. Louis. Write for a catalogue and see the boats on display at the Fair and Chicago

RED TOP RYE

AMERICA'S FINEST WHISKEY

It's up to YOU

FORWARD: WESTPHALIA & SONS, 111 N. MARKET ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

See our World's Fair Exhibit, Agricultural Bldg., Booth No.

AN ENGLISHMAN'S IDEA OF AMERICA.

Mr. Lance Thackeray depicts his idea of the ways of the American travelling public in a Pullman sleeper.—From "The Yaller."

I. W. Harper Rye.

"On Every Tongue."

For gentlemen who appreciate quality; for the weak who need to be strengthened; for the careful physician who requires purity; for everybody who knows a good thing.

Sold by leading dealers everywhere.
BERNHEIM DISTILLING CO., Louisville, Ky.

ABBOTT'S ANGSTURA BITTERS

Take the last cocktail. A delightful remedy for all wine, spirit and soda drinkers. A balsamic tonic to be used after meals, it cleanses the system and aids digestion. Important to see that it is Abbott's.

The Elements of International Law

By GEO. B. DAVIS

Regulator-General and Judge Advocate-General, U. S. A.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION

A work sufficiently elementary in character to be within the reach of students, yet comprehensive and of wide scope. It gives essential information in regard to the law governing the relations of nations, duties of diplomatic representatives, rights of citizens, alliances, etc.

$2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y.

First-Class Hotels and Clubs, on Wheels — The Thorough Trials of .

A PERFECT COCKTAIL

is a drink in which all the ingredients are so carefully blended that whilst no particular one is so evidence yet the delicate flavor of each is apparent. This result is difficult to arrive at, as a few drops more or less will destroy the balance. The only safe way is to buy which are the original and best, scientifically blended from the choicest old liquors and properly aged before being bottled.

Club Cocktails

The most popular varieties of the Club Cocktails are the Martini and Manhattan, the French Brandy and the latter a whisky here.

All grocers and leading wine merchants sell them.
G. F. HILL, 101, 103 & 105, New York, London, Harrogate, New York, London.

DR. LAVENDAR'S PEOPLE

Mrs. Margaret Deland's new book of stories concerning Dr. Lavendar and the other dwellers of Old Chester seems to have awakened the interest in these characters created by the publication of "Old Chester Tales." Speaking of the leading character, the Chicago Interior says that "Dr. Lavendar takes precedence over all country parsons with the possible (only possible) exceptions of the Vicar of Wakefield and Balzac's Village Priest. Let no one who loves the fine things of the soul pass this book by." $1.50

Booth Tarkington's CHERRY

Says the Interior, speaking of Booth Tarkington's dainty new comedy: "Anything more utterly delicious than the comedy of this narrative can scarcely be conceived. It is simply beyond praise or praise. The humor of it all is so exquisite it moves one far beyond laughter, to the point of tears." The book is attractively made and is illustrated in color. $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

The New York Central.

Comment upon "Comment"

IN THE ARENA OF POLITICS

The current issue of HARPER'S WEEKLY has a front-page cartoon entitled "Defiance." It pictures Roosevelt in the centre of the arena raising a sword aloft on the ground and Judge Parker just within the entrance, in fighting array, with his judicial robe thrown over his shoulders.

The purport of the cartoon is shown in an editorial paragraph wherein the WEEKLY writes that it devotes much space to Mr. Roosevelt's letter, and says, regarding his talk of his administration:

There is not so much as a hint of the possibility of the present administration ever having been or ever going to be in the wrong. Mr. Roosevelt is undoubtedly wholly sincere in regarding it as ideal. But, he mistakenly urges upon his rival, if you will persist in finding faults, in devising excuses, in inventing danger in present policies, what recent changes do you propose? Speak up, in detail, and we will join issue, otherwise, by holding your peace, condemn your impotence. It is a direct, personal challenge. In the judge to come into the open and fight it out on every point he cares to raise. We shall know in a day or two how he is met."

Judge Parker has advanced to the centre of the arena since the attack was published in the WEEKLY, and has crossed swords with the would-be gladiator, and the battle is now on. That cartoon can now be retised, for so vigorous, so daring and so brave are the attitudes of Judge Parker that the White House fighter must put forth his best efforts, and let them be on a far different line than he has been pursuing, if he wishes to maintain his self.

Defiance?—One subject alone in Judge Parker's letter shows more defiance, more bravery, more sterling integrity, more respect for the Constitution than all the flower-strewn orality of Mr. Roosevelt. When he had the courage to say that if elected to the Presidency he would revoke the celebrated reserve pension order, made by the Executive, he exhibited a degree of honesty of purpose not generally attributed to men of the political world, ever imbued with a desire to succeed in their undertakings for office.

The WEEKLY asked Judge Parker to speak up. He has done so, and probably in a more "discreet" manner than was expected when that paper in its entirety, laid down the gauntlet and raised the sword on high for its candidate.

This is only one subject on which that defiance has been met, and every paragraph of Judge Parker's letter teems with them. The WEEKLY wants to revise that cartoon.—London (Trib.) Statesman

DAVID H. HILL, BACHELOR

In an effort to account for David H. Hill's mental and moral fluctuations and his curious lack of conviction, George Harvey advances an ingenious theory about the loss of HARPER'S WEEKLY. Mr. Hill's experience, he thinks, has been defective. Too restricted a contact with general society and too much concentration on political details have stunted his growth. He has none of the political world's company, social engagements, but neither has he any of the attending vices and graces. Mr. Harvey says:

Mr. Hill is not only a bachelor, but one with very slight inclination for mixed society. He has habitually devoted himself not only the common pleasures and solaces of domestic life, but the insipidities that come from the society and discourse of intelligent women. Now, womanhood constitutes the greatest help and one of the most important sources of inspiration that have been vouchsafed to man.

That a man who has gone through life unswayed is to a certain extent out of touch with the social system and more or less abnormal is a logical conclusion. He has not only missed the help and inspiration which Mr. Harvey justly attributes to women, but his whole life has been out of tune with the natural and wholesome order of things. Cultures alone, however, does not account for Mr. Hill's inability to find a normal point of view and establish himself on firm ground of conviction. His relation to the majority and to life in general has been one of isolation. George Cleveland was a lonely man, but his dis-connection had been a good misadventure. On the other hand, there are many thoroughly disinterested men whose personal lives are as narrow and circumscribed as Mr. Hill's and who are just as incapable of seeing things in their proper perspective.

Netting made the question of motive homely, the trouble with Hill and with many other public men is an inability to take the point of view of the normal, average man and keep in touch with him. If Hill, who has confined himself to playing politics all his life, had had some interests to broaden his outlook, and show him that principle and conviction, not selfish intrigue, are the things that really count in the struggle, he might have been just that a clever politician. To this extent at least, Mr. Harvey's theory may be right.—Chicago News.

THE MERCENARIES

This attitude of a great mass of venal citizens who are not grown tough enough to stay bought for more than one campaign, and are ever clamoring to be repurchased, is regarded by our contemporaries, HARPER'S WEEKLY, as the worst menace to Republican success. Yesterday's despatches sharply confirm the reasonableness of this view. The news comes from Indiana, Evansville's State, that the Merediths are already going out to the Republican National Committee, the custodian of the campaign fund that has been imposed by Secretary Cortelyou, sometime Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the late Postmaster General, in the next election. If Mr. Meredith is right, as he claims it, they want money and they want it badly; money out of all proportion, seemingly, to what the National Committee expected to be called on to contribute to the campaign in a State that has the honor of naming for a citizen the Vice Presidential candidate. In other words, the mercenaries are beginning to make themselves heard. They are saying, in so many words, that if the committee expects sentiment to rule within their bosoms, that the State of Indiana, England that expects every man to do his duty, is laboring under a delusion. In New York, too, they are calling, gently calling for the sinners of war, and we have no doubt in other States the mercenaries are being heard from in clear and emphatic language. As our own temporary suggests, the Republican campaign fund will hardly be equal to their demands, the question of what to do with them becomes perplexing. It would hardly pay to incur their active or even their quiet opposition in States where the Democrats are in power. On the whole, we should recommend to the National Committee the plan pursued by Carthage to get rid of the mercenaries, as told in Plautus' "Salammbo": They were inveigled into a lonely valley that with the exception of the opening, by near-mountains, the entrance was closed, and there they were slowly starved to death.—New Orleans Times Democrat.

A REPUBLICAN VIEW

Our Karapetian has had the center of the stage for some time as a master in retreating tactics, and we did not expect to see his equal in that respect for many years; but the retreat which George Harvey is making in HARPER'S WEEKLY from the Parker standard indicates the administration of politicians and dilettantes, and all others versed in the art of quietly, gracefully and not too offensively letting it be known that a losing cause excites no enthusiasm.

At first he was all aglow for the Parker ticket. His words had the sincerity and brilliancy of the rising sun. Suddenly he saw a great light—that Parker speech of exasperation! It was an awful blow to the reformer's enthusiasm. Then came the biggest revelation the Murphy defection, and the McKinley scandal. The misadventure of the editorial backing back to the days when Underwood wanted to repay W. C. Whitney for a favor done years before, and paid it by helping to elect Cleveland. That Whitney's conduct, as told by Colonel Underwood, will live as a political story telling us on incident that made a President.

There have been no such drives down town in this campaign, no early fates repaid, no nothing. The reformer has been hard put to it in keeping his word. Nothing was going right in the reformer's camp; everything seemed to be going right with the Republicans. Much as he desired Democratic success, facts were facts in the reformer's eye, and so he gave the job up for this campaign and began to reconsider. Luckily Mr. Harvey has great fund of anecdote to draw upon, and as we said some time ago, his budget of gossip makes HARPER'S WEEKLY with many times the price just to enjoy what he says and the good time he gives. The anecdotal evidence indicates clearly Judge Parker's defeat in Mr. Harvey does without really saying so.

It is what the editor fails to say, rather than what he says—the handling between the brilliant, aggressive forces of early July and the calm, reminiscent tone of to-day—that convinces us that the Editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY will not ask an election fight. "Are we backed?" but "How much are we liked?"—New York Evening Mail.

CHAIRMAN CORTLEYOU'S METHODS

HARPER'S WEEKLY expresses the opinion that the chief danger to the Republican ticket lies in the lack of a big campaign fund to hire party workers to bring the vote out. It says that the Republican party will have nothing like the fund available in 1896 and in 1900, and remarks: "There are two causes why we consider that in this condition lies the chief weakness of Republican prospects, thus it is that there exists an ominous peril making the raising of so great a fund, and the securing of it, the first and most important duty of the party." It is not clear what he means by it if he had it.

It certainly appears that Chairman Cortleyou's plan is upon the appeal to public reason and not upon manufactured noise and emotion, but the Cortleyou plan is not a new thing, it is a new one with an effect which astounds the old school of campaigners. Such was the quiet of the Vermont campaign that it was mistaken for apathy, but while there was no noise and excitement, strong speakers were being introduced and the campaign was being carried on. The speech of Secretary Telt at Montpelier as the Philippine policy of the administration was an admirable specimen of logical reasoning, free from any trace of sophistry or day-dram. The people listened to speeches of that character or read them in the papers and reached conclusions by sober thought. Then on election-day they turned out and rolled up a plurality which exceeded calculations by from six to seven thousand. No brass-band campaign with hired shysters could have been anything like so successful.

Instead of endangering Republican success, as HARPER'S WEEKLY suggests, the present circumstances of party organization are so favorable that the Democratic managers feel the necessity of putting the situation by a corresponding change in their own methods.

Mr. Cortleyou may not know how to hire a corps of mercenaries, but he has been able to put a campaign upon a plane where he can do without them, and where, in six months, people will have to meet him in order to put up a real fight.—Pittsburgh Gazette.

THE UNEXPECTED GHOST STORY

Four or three weeks ago the New York World printed under the title "The Ghost of the President" a story which was so effective that J. Pierpont Morgan visited the President at Oyster Bay, and that the two held a long conference, the result of which was a lot of subservient concessions in the President's letter of acceptance.

The publication was as sensational as it was calculated to injure the President. Several details were given to make the recital seem probable. The writer of it claimed to have spent two weeks verifying the facts.

The story was called to the attention of the President, and he promptly authorized the publication of an unqualified denial, with the statement that the story was a "plain lie" without a single circumstance to belabor the existing details of the World's liar. The President declared that Morgan had not visited him at the time alleged or any other time, and that he (the President) had not held any kind of conference with J. P. Morgan, and had never had any agreement or understanding with him on any subject.

The President's denial and denunciation was sweeping and complete. The World printed the disclaimer on its first page, but made no apology, and so far as known Joseph Pulitzer has not repented or promised to inform confidants who wrote the story with such a pretense of circumstantiality and corroboration.

HARPER'S WEEKLY, which has not been supporting Roosevelt, directly charged the World with not only libeling the President, but refusing to make proper use of the vicious slander. Meanwhile the Democratic organs throughout the country are taking no pains to correct the Pulitzer lie. On the contrary, many of them are repeating it in the face of its refutation. A party that would willingly become the beneficiary of a station slander is unfit for any service.—Dallas Press.

STRICTLY IN LINE

JUDGE PARKER'S letter to the editor of the Democratic campaign text-book begging him to "see in it that there is no word in it that reflects upon the personal honor and integrity of President Roosevelt" excites the scornful wonder of Colonel George Hurley. "The Times of this morning says that the party text-book is about prepared," says the Judge, and "an Evening Post editorial indicates that but little care was taken," etc. This is Colonel George Hurley's comment on the Democratic text-book.

"Was ever such nonsense?" Do they really mean to tell us that all the Judge knows of the contents of the two text-books he got from the Times and the Evening Post? And, pray, what has Theodore Roosevelt ever done to justify an expectation that an assault was about to be made upon his "personal honor and integrity"? And if the Judge really did entertain such a suspicion, why did he get quietly and privately warn the prominent slanders in the text of putting forth a sensational direction to be photographed and exploited in a campaign document? Will politicians ever learn that men are not mice?

That is good, breezy stuff. It will bear thinking over "considerable." It is strictly in line with the platform adopted by Colonel Hurley early in the campaign: "No hangover."—Spokane Standard.

THE FOURTEEN SENATORS

HARPER'S WEEKLY asks: "By the way, what are our sick old fourteen Senators doing nowadays? We don't seem to hear much from the Aldrichs, the Morrises, the Brewsters, the Chases, the Fishes, the Frys, the Burrows, the Algers, the Wetmores, the Spooners or the Quarles. And Elkins, what of him? Spooner and Quarles probably have all that they can tend to in their own State of Wisconsin, but how about the others? However, there is plenty of time yet. The grave and wily Senators will no doubt do their duty. Even Mr. Elkins, of West Virginia, son-in-law of the Democratic candidate for the Vice-Presidency, will, we feel sure, rise above all family considerations and give a good account of himself. It is to be noted further that there has been no rush to the support of Parker from the Democratic side of the Senate. Pettus, Morgan, Clay, Bacon, Bishsham, Housley, Cockrell, Hale, Cullerton, and Culberson have at least not been conspicuous in the campaign up to the present time. We should remember that the Senate is a deliberative body, that it moves slowly, that it has an awful lot of dignity, and that impetuosity is in its eyes the crime of crimes."—Indianapolis News.

SECRETARY TAFT'S REPLY TO MR. OLNEY

HARPER'S WEEKLY regards Secretary Taft's Vermont speech in defence of the administration's Philippine policy as a complete answer to Mr. Olney's attack upon it.

The Secretary's main argument relates to the constitutional question of the expansion of the United States. His contention, that the Constitution gives no countenance to the altruistic purposes of the administration, is met by Judge Taft in a manner that Mr. Olney's position lacks the elements of strength.

There is a belief, more or less widespread, that this country has no right under the organic law to use the public funds to elevate ignorant and barbarous peoples. Judge Taft takes a different view, and proves from history and individual precedent that the United States has the express policy in thorough agreement with the Constitution. There is no eloquent testimonial to the soundness of his argument and the forcefulness of its presentation in the fact that our contemporary, the sometimes irascible but never the "loach of progress," is persuaded that he is right.—Columbus Journal.

WHEN HARPER'S WEEKLY, which has heretofore looked with sympathy upon candidates put forward by the Republican party, recently showed Candidate Fairbanks in cartoon depicted as a human caterpillar, thoughtful persons believed it a bit rough on the man who wishes to be Vice-President. Senator Fairbanks was shown as chilling those around him and the impression was not exactly pleasant. Those who came in contact with some Fairbanks during his stay in Elmira this week, however, feel less apologetic to HARPER'S WEEKLY for doubting, for it is certain that no mere icy blast ever came out of the north than the Republican candidate proved to be. Leaves on trees prematurely shriveled up and dropped off and many a garden was ruined absolutely. The chilly stay, and ice wigwags went around town with none seeking the wares they offered. Enterprising hardware merchants dusted off sleds and skates, and citizens generally shook the mush balls from their hats. Several carriages of frost-bitten cars were reported, and some of the horns of the welcoming bands froze up absolutely and refused to do duty. The members of the entertainment committee, who felt in duty bound to stay by Senator Fairbanks as long as he remained in town, brought ice and mittens and drank hot ginger tea at frequent intervals. Altogether it was the chilliest time since the thermometer dropped to thirty degrees below zero one day last winter.—Elmira Gazette.

AN incident of the past week is the narrow escape of HARPER'S WEEKLY from being an out-and-out Roosevelt paper. First there is the conclusion that General Chase is still in command of the Democratic forces, illustrated by Rogers's cartoon showing Editors McKelway and Pulitzer in personal combat trying to determine "who is running this campaign, anyway." Then there is a merciless exposure of the World's great take about a visit of Mr. Morgan to Ghyser Bay to revive the President's pledge of the future of the Republican party, "body and bones." A little further along Professor Henry Nelson is utilized for the rationalization of the public in connection with some of his Imperialistic fancies—his great fear that the President conspire with the other 99,999 members of our army and take possession of all outsiders on some dark night. Then Mr. McKelway comes in for another little bit of attention wherein the WEEKLY is guilty of gross irreverence for the ponderous duty of omniscience which stalks each evening through the editorial columns of the flowery Examiner and settles the country's doubts. Mr. McKelway is charged with the audacity anywhere with an honest conviction at any time in his life is referred to as a previously established fact, and Chairman Taggart's classification as not in the whitest campaign column is a serious matter. There is nothing doing at Keokuk.—Minneapolis Journal.

HAVING for its motto "A Journal of Civilization," the WEEKLY should have been a supporter of McKinley's Philippine policy from the beginning. But what says Irving Winslow to the assertion that neither Judge nor Editor can impose any conditions on that policy? Mr. Winslow will, of course, dispute it, but the burden of proof is on him. The anti-imperialists have merely cried: "No conditions!" They have never suggested anything better. And now they are crying: "No conditions!" But Mr. B. H. Hill has made a promise to the effect that when they are capable of performing the functions of self-government they shall be free to go their own sweet way, but in the mean time as we continue to educate and train them. While waiting for the day when independence becomes a reality, what becomes of the Constitution and the precious principles of the anti-imperialists? If it is wrong to govern them in the same way, but under a promise that sometime the people will have complete and absolute independence? If the anti-imperialist idea amounts to anything at all it should not be so closely linked to the policy now being pursued. It is a recognition of the fact that the present course is more than half right.—Springfield Patriot.

It is a strange contingency that Judge Parker should ever find himself in a position to need a Secretary of State, but the "sensitive" discussion of his proper personality in this week's HARPER'S WEEKLY possesses more interest. It suggests that the Judge could not advance his campaign by announcing that he would, if elected, name some statesman like Judge Oliver or Richard Olney to hold the portfolio. The avowed purpose is to dislodge the secretar who the possible selection of David B. Hill to that important post has enabled shrewd campaigners to erect. The Judge might find ample ground for disparaging the ability of his convention competitors for the nomination to be his premier, and thus furnish a cogent excuse for ignoring the claims of his chief sponsor. The WEEKLY displays great sagacity in its suggestion, that the effect upon the election of the Judge might be that New York may not be harmonious. Mr. Hill has shown that he has friends and is a power, and this premature eclipse of his possible ambitions might further discomfit them.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

A WEEKLY published in New York has just come out with a picture which represents the President as consulting with the trust magnates, in running his campaign. The allusion, of course, is to the stories put out by the Democratic campaigners, that J. P. Morgan and H. H. Rogers had instructed the President as to the best of his letter of acceptance. It is a gross and malicious charge that the captains of industry never had such conferences with the President; but the silly story is still used as Democratic campaign material. HARPER'S WEEKLY has just come out strongly against such sorts of stories, printed after every reasonable man knows that they are untrue. George Harvey plainly thinks that such tactics are a disgrace to the Parker campaign, and as a friend to the Democratic candidate, he objects to all such. He is right, having all questions of decency and fairness out of the question. These stories are repeated, the pictures printed, to make voters for Parker. They do just the opposite, of course.—Boston Advertiser.

HARPER'S WEEKLY reasons that the Democrats who voted the Republican ticket in the last two campaigns have seen, many of whom have reached the voting age in the last eight years, and who have all this time heard their fathers' arguments about the faults in the Democratic party which caused their change of heart. Now that the fathers have returned to their Democratic allegiance, HARPER'S says that the young ones will not turn away from the Republicans, just because their fathers do. They have seen the working of the Republican party and know what it has done, whereas they know next to nothing of a Democratic regime. Moreover, young blood likes a party that "does things," and one with a successful record. Manifestly there is something in this reasoning and it will help to keep the doubtful States in line for Roosevelt.—Omaha Bee.

HARPER'S WEEKLY may not favor the Republican national ticket, but Editor Harvey has a wholesome regard for the veracity of news items, especially when the inaccuracy is not acknowledged, as in the case of the New York World's charge of a visit by J. P. Morgan to Sagamore and the consequent deal between the President and the financier as to the conduct of the Republican campaign. In the current number of HARPER'S WEEKLY Mr. Pulitzer is brought severely to task for the reportorial inaccuracy which cannot even be blamed on the Associated Press, and Mr. Harvey goes so far as to predict that the World's prestige as a first-class newspaper is injured to such an extent that it will not recover for a score of years.—Townsend News.

THE editorial pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY sparkle in these days with entertaining political comment. George Harvey, while of course intending to be fair, is having a good deal of fun and making interesting reading for both parties. He writes frankly, telling some things that are in the nature of interesting revelations of political history, and altogether he is having a jolly time. With its cartoons and illustrations of current events and its articles on various subjects of public interest HARPER'S WEEKLY is a most entertaining periodical.—Waterloo Times.

HERE is a real gem from HARPER'S WEEKLY: Platform: No Humbug! The natural defenders of the Constitution at any given time are the members of the party that is opposed to party which is at that time in a position to subject the Constitution to pressure. If that is anything else than a roundabout way of endorsing the Irishman's declaration that he was "agin' the government," the editor of the WEEKLY should hasten to print it out.—Half Lake City Tribune.

HARPER'S WEEKLY gets up a jolly editorial on the governor's situation in New York, by making believe that the candidates are Elihu Root and the Lanesy Small. And it winds up: "For this boon all praise and gratitude to Governor Benjamin B. Odell, Jr., and former Senator David Bennett Hill. They not only, in the language of the classics, 'seen their duty and done it,' but in the no less graphic words of a well known statesman, 'they done their damndest, angels could do no more.'"—Wolke Transcript.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has been called to account for finding fault with Davenport's cartoons. It devolved there as good rules, declaring that "there is really no reason for believing that the occasional utilization of an idea would detract from the excellence of his work." Well, it is a fact that Davenport is at once offhand and imprudent. To his adherents—his power of portrayal—the WEEKLY pays well deserved tribute, but imprudence is not absolute.—Brooklyn Eagle.

FOR that very reason Mr. Root's nomination is doubly satisfying and more distinctly a cause of general congratulation than it could possibly have been in any other circumstances.—HARPER'S WEEKLY.

For what the brilliant, profound and late lamented Artemus Ward called "sarkism" the foreword is a flawless gem, shining like the "sparkler" on a Tammany leader's shirt-tail.—Troy Press.

SARCASTICALLY, HARPER'S WEEKLY congratulates the Republicans on the nomination of Elihu Root for Governor. To the Democrats it pays a tribute in kind for having selected DeLaney Kioell for its State standard bearer. Not for anything in the world would the Eagle dispel a dream so beautiful.—Brooklyn Eagle.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is right about the wet blanket, and it is also right when it adds that though Judge Parker may rise more fully to the occasion hereafter, it is difficult to anticipate the conclusion that first impressions, especially of an unknown candidate, are apt to be lasting.—Bridgeport Standard.

HARPER'S WEEKLY wants to know why nobody has yet notified Mr. Tibbles that he has been nominated for Vice-President. This interrogation is as impertinence. Tibbles has not only been notified, but he has served notice upon himself and upon all others whom it may concern.—Franklin Bee.

THEREFORE, holds HARPER'S WEEKLY, "there is no issue in the gold standard," and the Republican attempt to keep it alive as an issue is futile. It is absurd to try to fight a political battle over dead issues. Yet that is what many Republican journals are trying to do.—Rochester Union.

GEORGE HARVEY, throwing bouquets in HARPER'S WEEKLY at the Springfield Republican, says he knows of but one other newspaper in the United States which has as good an editorial page, and that one is not published in New York. Thanks.—Boston Transcript.

HARPER'S WEEKLY advises President Roosevelt to stop drinking milk, avoid water, and substitute light claret. It also recommends an occasional mild cigar. Of course, HARPER'S WEEKLY has similar designs on the President.—Thomas Ledger.

HARPER'S WEEKLY keeps straight in the middle in politics this year, and at the same time it is not superior to Tom Watson. Mr. Harvey's political views are most interesting if he does not know "what he is at."—Augusta Herald.

HARPER'S WEEKLY crushingly refers to Senator Fairbanks as Mr. Icebanks. Well, would you prefer a hot water bag for Vice-President? Have we come to making the temperature of occupants of the chair?—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

GEORGE HARVEY, editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY and one of the most incisive writers connected with the American press, is having fun. A newspaper is always interesting when it ceases to be an organ.—Boston Times-Herald.

THE editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY intimates that David B. Hill's political undoing may be traced to his state of single blessedness. Well, isn't ex-Rose Tom Platt a brightroom?—Atlanta Constitution.

"Does Mr. Bryan mean to be mischievous," inquires HARPER'S WEEKLY. He does not, but Willie does not know from playing with the matches, even when the party's stable is filled with hay.—Times Herald.

HARPER'S WEEKLY may be said to have Republican leanings, but it is far from being partisan. It is at least fair, and often commends Democratic and Democratic measures.—Grand Rapids Press.

EVEN HARPER'S WEEKLY admits that Dr. Cortislow has a long lead over Chairman Tom Taggart. A double-barrelled handshake is good, but it spreads them over the whole country.—Boston Record.

THE Republican Vice-Presidential candidate has not as yet warmed up sufficiently to mount the opposition. Icebanks' given him by HARPER'S WEEKLY.—San Antonio Express.

FOR fair, absolute impartial discussion of the political situation HARPER'S WEEKLY sends any paper which has come to our editorial table.—Pittsburgh (Pa.) Courier.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is evidently inclined to support Justice Tucker. Even a "journal of civilization" must some day become more or less civilized.—Jacksonville Times.

THE GIVERS

BY

MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

RESULTS are what tell—

HARPER'S HISTORY CLUB
NEW YORK

September 22d, 1904.

ASSOCIATED SUNDAY MAGAZINES

New York, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN:—The advertisement we had in your issue of Sept. 19th has brought in so many orders that we have decided to run the next four issues. Each week you will find copy for more, please let us not fail.

Of course it is too early to tell the exact extent of business but Sunday's advertisement will do, we know more than it is very large as compared with expenditures made for advertising. Later on if you wish to know the exact results we will be very glad to give them to you.

Yours very truly,

HARPER'S HISTORY CLUB
& J. P. FARR, Treasurer.

THE ASSOCIATED SUNDAY MAGAZINES

A Part of EACH SUNDAY'S ISSUE of

THE AMERICAN HISTORY HERALD

100 N. E. COR. HERRIN

THE PHILADELPHIA PRESS

THE PITTSBURGH POST

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE

THE BOSTON POST

For advertising rates address

HENRY DRISLER, Advertising Manager

31 Union Square New York
Marquette Building, Chicago

In Search of the Unknown

By

ROBERT W. CHAMBERS

Author of "The Maids of Paradise," "Cardigan," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

THE FUNNIEST OF BIOGRAPHIES

The Memoirs of a Baby

By JOSEPHINE DASKAM

NEVER before has the dignified title of "Memoirs" graced so funny a book as this latest tale of Josephine Daskam's—a writer widely known for her clever child studies. The sorry side of life—the tribulations of the little tots—have no place in this irresistibly amusing record of the home-life of a typical American couple. The baby refuses to develop psychologically or scientifically according to the theories set down in his Aunt Emma's books, but he grows to rebel joyfully after a fashion of his own. All the various incidents of a lively youngster's boyhood here find laughable portents. The unceasing arguments between the common-sense young father and the theoretical "Aunt Emma's" not only afford such amusement as Josephine Daskam alone can give us, but go to make a clever satire on "modern" methods of rearing children.

F. Y. Cox, whose pictures of baby life have never been equalled for cleverness and humor, has illustrated the book especially with pen-and-ink drawings. The pictures are every bit as funny as the narrative, and the book will provoke the laughter of any one who turns the pages.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

There is no better known name and trade-mark identified with Havana Cigars than HENRY CLAY. This name has for several generations stood for fine quality only, and has without doubt had as much influence in building up the reputation of Havana Cigars as any one brand known to the public.

La Flor de Henry Clay

Here are six new shapes and sizes—original and distinguished! They have the refined "Regalla" style, but modified from the extreme pointed shape. The skill, the experience and the traditions of a century are combined in this new production from the famous HENRY CLAY factory. A selection of tobacco has been made for these six new "NAVY" sizes from our own plantations that is unapproachable, for they are mild and yet have that rare aromatic quality so prized in the finer Havana Cigars. They are made in the original HENRY CLAY factory and by the same workmen who have made HENRY CLAY cigars for a generation.

In addition to possessing these characteristic traits of quality and style, these new shapes and these new names are given them to aid the smoker to identify the different sizes and fix in his mind their grading prices. They are now for sale by the leading Importers and Retailers of fine cigars in all the large cities in the United States.

JULIAN ALVAREZ, CALZADA DE LUYANÓ 100

Habana, Cuba

HAVANA TOBACCO COMPANY, 111 Fifth Ave., New York

General Selling Agents for the United States

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER & BROTHERS

NEW YORK

$1385.00

Thirteen Hundred and Eighty-five Dollars
and
Eleven Hundred and Eighty-seven Inquiries was the net result of three insertions of an advertisement in

THE SUNDAY MAGAZINE

which were published about a month apart and

Pulled for Over One Hundred and Fifty Days

THIS test was not a cheap mail-order catch or medical advertising, but high-class advertising from a reputable concern.

ANOTHER MERCHANT REPORTS

$6,000 in cash and 221 inquiries from his one insertion of 112 lines.

Is it surprising that THE SUNDAY MAGAZINE grows in popularity from week to week?

ANALYZE IT

Almost 800,000 every Sunday in the homes of our well-to-do citizens. Figure their purchasing power and what it costs you to reach them.

THE SUNDAY MAGAZINE

has the lowest rate in the United States for circulation of character.

LESS THAN TWENTY-FIVE CENTS PER LINE PER 100,000

For advertising rates address:

HENRY DRISLER, Advertising Manager

31 Union Square New York
Marquette Building, Chicago

"The Boy Man's Train."

Appropriate in Its Name.

Appropriate in Its Route.

Appropriate in Its Character—

"THE 20th CENTURY LIMITED."

This is The century of all the ages.

The New York Central—Lake Shore 20-hour train between New York and Chicago (the two great commercial centers of America) is The train of the century and is appropriately named

"THE 20th CENTURY LIMITED."

A beautiful etching of this train, printed on plate paper 24 x 32 inches, ready for framing, will be sent free to any address on receipt of 50 cents by George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

Rulers of Kings

by

GERTRUDE ATHERTON

Author of "The Contender," "The Aristocrats"

IN this novel is pictured the conflict between the two greatest forces in the world—American wealth and European royalty—in which the former triumphs. Gertrude Atherton, from whom the reading public has learned to expect surprises, has evolved a story both daring and original. Fessenden Abbott, the son of America's most colossal millionaire, in the midst of great financial undertakings that are watched by all the world, falls in love with the daughter of the Austrian Emperor. In her heart duty to the weakening monarchy of her fathers battles with an overmastering love for the young American. How Fessenden Abbott bends the will of emperors and alters the diplomatic relations of kingdoms to win the girl he loves is an original and most romantic piece of fiction writing.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

THE FUNNIEST OF BIOGRAPHIES

The Memoirs of a Baby

By JOSEPHINE DASKAM

NEVER before has the dignified title of "Memoirs" graced so funny a book as this latest tale of Josephine Daskam's—a writer widely known for her clever child studies. The sorry side of life—the tribulations of the little lols—have no place in this irresistibly amusing record of the home-life of a typical American couple. The baby refuses to develop psychologically or scientifically according to the theories set down in his Aunt Emma's books, but he grows to robust boyhood after a fashion of his own. All the various incidents of a lively youngster's boyhood here find laughable portrayal. The unceasing arguments between the common-sense young father and the theoretical "Aunt Emma" not only afford such amusement as Josephine Daskam alone can give us, but go to make a clever satire on "modern" methods of rearing children.

F. Y. Coy, whose pictures of baby-life have never been equaled for cleverness and humor, has illustrated the book copiously with pen-and-ink drawings. The pictures are every bit as funny as the narrative, and the book will provoke the laughter of any one who turns the pages.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved. Entered at the New York Post office as second class matter

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO HUMOR!

Judge PARKER expects to be elected. He thinks he is going to receive a large silent vote that nobody knows anything about. His optimism is based upon some thousands of letters he has received from all sorts of people living in all parts of the country. Some of those associated with him in the conduct of his canvass are impressed by his confidence, but, so far as we can learn, none shares it. They will keep on doing the best they can, however—and so they should. A better lieutenant to be President could not be found. The difficulty about the election lies in the fact that the Judge has been running for Chief Justice, while his opponent has been running for President. There is a certain nervous energy loathed up in the American people that requires intellectual activity as well as moral courage in a candidate for the highest position they have at their disposal. Now, everybody knows the Judge is a good man, but he certainly has made of himself a most depressing candidate. He is what long-suffering publishers call a "one-story author." With his gold telegram he shot his bolt. Not that what he has said since has not been unquestionable; it has. But he has uttered nothing appealing. In all that he has said or written not a phrase lives in the memory as a rallying note. His latest and most aggressive declaration did contain an expression of profound conviction that the Filipinos are becoming "positive." We dare say they are; they have been no less sure for several hundred years; so the fact, extraordinary as it may seem to the Judge, is that nobody cares. We are spending a lot of money on them and trying to inspire them with proper desires for education, clothes, missionaries, women's temperance unions, and all of the other good things of life. They are having the best time they ever had. And if they will behave themselves the great and good father has promised to treat them kindly. If not,—well, we have one of our very best hospital doctors down there in the guise of a major-general prepared to sew up their wounds. We are painfully aware that the subject is a serious one and one that ought not to be treated with levity, but the problem itself is not in consideration. All we are endeavoring to point out is the utter futility, in a practical political sense, at the last stage of a campaign, of trying to win an election by arousing sympathy for a lot of equidistant and half-savage people, for whose development we are expending goodness knows how many millions per annum. Of course, the Judge may be right in expecting that more than half of the sixteen millions of the ballots to be cast on November 8 will bear his name, but if so the silence maintained by those proposing to do it has certainly been that of a cemetery up to the present time. Out West they are still talking of "ALLEN R. PARKER" and printing pictures of WILLIAM L. DOUGLAS as the Democratic nominee. No, brethren, we fear the candidate for Chief Justice will not be elected President of the United States.

When this number of the WEEKLY meets the eye of our readers only about two weeks will intervene before election day. As we have repeatedly said, there is in that fortnight verge enough for a decisive change in the drift of public opinion, such as occurred in 1860, 1864, and 1892. We must say frankly, however, that, at this time, we can see no prospects of any such change. While, so far as politics is concerned, there is no truth in HUME'S dictum that a miracle is contrary to experience, it seems to us that, in the present campaign, as it has shaped itself, not merely one, but half a dozen miracles will be needed to give a majority of the electoral votes to Judge PARKER. He is absolutely sure of only 151. To get the necessary 239 he must carry New York (39), New Jersey (12), Connecticut (7), Indiana (13), West Virginia (7), and Maryland (8). Should he lose Maryland or West Virginia, the loss could be made good by Colorado (5) and Rhode Island (3); or by Colorado and Montana (3) or Nevada (3). Is it likely that so many miracles will be performed simultaneously on Judge PARKER's behalf? A landslide would be needed for the purpose, and of this there is as yet no sign. It is unquestionably true that some of the leaders of union labor in Pennsylvania are trying to swing all of the votes which they can influence in the doubtful States, and which, they claim, number some hundreds of thousands, in favor of the Democratic nominee. We doubt their ability to effect a considerable diversion. Mr. ROOSEVELT himself has warm friends among the union-labor leaders—Mr. JOHN MITCHELL, for example—who are unlikely to remain quiescent when they learn that such a move as we have mentioned is contemplated.

The "CONFIDENT" scandal still bears heavily upon the minds of the journalists in real charge of the Democratic canvass. What annoys them most at present is Mr. ROOSEVELT's apparent indifference to their asseverations and intonations. They cannot understand why neither he nor Mr. CLEVELAND will consent to be coaxed into explanations or denials of vague charges that would serve only to add fuel to the blazing fire. They even refuse in the most obstinate manner to manifest signs of alarm. This really does not seem quite fair; but when one comes to think of it, may not the inattention be due to disagreement among the doctors themselves? It may be that the President, who is of an obliging disposition, would like to accommodate them, but cannot find out how to do it. The World squarishly has abandoned the happy idea that he permit it to write his letters for him and sign his name to them, and now proposes "a very simple means" of disposing of the whole matter. "Let them," it says, "open the books of the Bureau of Corporations and give the public a chance to share the secrets they have unconcealed. Let them open the books of the Republican National Committee and show how much the trusts they have investigated have contributed to keep the investigators in office."

Now what could be easier or "simpler" than that? And yet, curiously enough, it does not suit the Brooklyn Eagle at all. "It is or should be hardly necessary," says Doctor McKELWAT, "to remind the World that the books of the Republican National Committee are not open for general inspection. Nor can they very well be opened. That would involve a betrayal of confidence, which is not to be thought of for a moment." Then what shall be done? Ah! the Doctor has it. "A few words from the President will carry conviction. What is to prevent a resumption of the crusade? What is to prevent the President from saying that there is to be no change of administration policy? Such a statement would clear the atmosphere at once." Has the Doctor forgotten already that the most conspicuous sentence in Mr. ROOSEVELT's letter of acceptance was, "We intend to let the future to carry on the movement in the same way that we have carried it on in the past"? It is well, of course, to clear the atmosphere, but how often must the clarifying process be repeated? Every fifteen minutes? Or whenever an antagonistic newspaper makes the demand? If the Eagle really wants only what it says it wants, namely, a "few words from the President" that "will carry conviction," its desire seems to have been gratified clearly and explicitly before the request was filed.

The Times has no suggestion to offer. It simply "marvels" at the "public indifference to the Carrollan scandal." It cannot understand why the "exposure" has been "received by the mass of the voters with stolid unconcern," why "the religious press resents the charge, denies, defends, and contentedly drifts with the party current," why "the public conscience is asleep." Now may it not be possible that this stolid unconcern is due to the fact that the public do not believe a word of it? There seems to be no other adequate explanation. And since, on the Times's own testimony, the people have thus indicated with emphasis their faith in the integrity of the President, why should he consider it necessary to bother his head about charges which have not been substantiated by one iota of evidence? To ourselves, as we have said before, the appointment of Mr. CARROLLAN to be chairman of the National Committee seemed ill-advised; that it was anything more than an error of judgment we have never believed—nor has the public, as the Times pathetically concedes.

But suppose the President should accept the World's challenge and virtually say: "It is true. I am not honest. Carrollan is a scoundrel. Money is incompetent. The only faithful guardians of the public are the newspapers who are supporting the Democratic ticket. I, therefore, abdicate. Here are the books. I confess to a sense of relief in turning over to you the responsibility of inaugurating a new departure in the conduct of our internal affairs without inflicting injury unjustly upon any body of our citizens, rich or poor, without crippling in any way our splendid and rightful industrial progress, and yet safeguarding the interests of the whole people." What would happen? Would the confidence now manifested by the people in the integrity, fairness, and carefulness of the present administration be transferred—with the books, accompanied by the knowledge that at last somebody in authority really would "run amuck"? Somehow we cannot convince ourselves that this would be the case. Or suppose, instead of turning the government over to the World, the Times, and the Eagle, the President should transfer his authority to Judge PARKER. What would he do? Fortunately, we know. He would not "run amuck"; that is certain. He would apply the common law. And what "secrets" does any sane person believe either the newspapers or Judge PARKER would unearth? A trust is a corporation authorized by a State to transact business in conformity with provisions of law. It possesses rights as inalienable as those of an individual. Is it likely that these corporations have been so neglectful or so badly advised as to place their very existence in constant jeopardy, subject to the caprice or venial spirit of any one in a position to obtain possession of their "secrets"? One would be led by these newspapers to believe that President ROOSEVELT, aided and abetted by men like JOHN HAY, EDWIN DREW, WILLIAM H. TAYLOR, and THOMAS B. CORTWELL—all men of some little repute and with the future staring them in the face—was holding down the lid of a box containing the most gruesome skeletons ever imagined by the wit of man. And he absolutely refuses to say that he is not doing so. He will not "open the books" to the World, and he will not "clear the atmosphere" for the Eagle. Was such lack of consideration ever known?

But there is another phase of this situation which may as well be noted while we are engaged in the elimination of this particular humbug. We should like to know from Doctor McKELWY whether Judge PARKER has announced his intention, in the event of his election, to inaugurate or resume a "crusade" against the trusts. And if so, when and to whom? Has he not rather intimated very plainly that he considers special legislation such as resulted in the dissolution of the Northern Securities Company unwise and ineffective, and that only application of common law need be apprehended from his administration? And since the World triumphantly declares that, although "the President has been challenged to make public the corporation contributions to his campaign fund, he has not done so," we should like to learn from Mr. PELTZER why he does not issue the same insulting "challenge" to Judge PARKER and see if he will "do so." And since Mr. CARROLLAN has been challenged to sue the newspapers for libel and "has not done so," why not put Mr. TAGART and Mr. BELMONT and Mr. RYAN in the same position? Incidentally, it may interest Mr. PELTZER to know that Mr. GEORGE FORSTER PEARMAN, when elected treasurer of the Democratic National Committee, proposed to announce that all contributions would be made public at the end of the campaign—and Mr. PEARMAN was promptly set upon. In humble but faithful emulation of our favorite journalist, we hereby formally challenge Mr. GEORGE FORSTER PEARMAN to sue us for libel or defamation of character or anything else he happens to think of. By failing to do so in time for the afternoon papers he will confess his guilt. As for us, in conformity with recently established journalistic practice, we shall call him guilty anyhow. Again we say, let no innocent man escape!

A despatch from Butte gives the interesting information that the Republicans are likely to lose Montana "because Senator W. F. MEYERS stole a kiss from a girl on the streets of Red Lodge." It seems that the girl's friends, "powerful friends they happen to be," resented the theft and demanded MEYERS's withdrawal from the ticket. The two leading Republican newspapers have joined in the crusade and the party is disrupted, State Chairman LEX MANTLE having tried in vain to induce MEYERS to withdraw his name. Unfortunately the data at hand are not sufficient to enable us to pass upon the merits of the case. There may have been mitigating circumstances. Possibly the young lady piously looked the other way or even held up; such things have happened. Senator MEYERS seems to be wholly within his rights in refusing to withdraw from the ticket, but he might at least offer to return the stolen property. Maybe the girl would graciously forgive if assured that she was irresistible. There are various ways of adjusting such differences. What Chairman LEX MANTLE seems to lack is experience.

So the people seem to like
This inflammatory reborg that comes blaring down the phat!
So sings the Baltimore American from the top of a wave of enthusiasm. Senator FARMAN was the one on fire.

Better than any other Republican journal published in these parts, our neighbor the Globe succeeds in feeling that the cause and candidates it supports stand for all that is right, desirable, and profitable in politics. It is not merely wroth, but indignant and scandalized, at every effort to beat the Republican ticket, and surprised when it finds them made by papers that it has been used to think respectable. It is "amazed" to find "two PARKER newspapers of high moral pretensions" (the Times and the Post) "aiding with Mr. MURPHY in denouncing Governor ORRILL's efforts to prevent fraudulent registration." To be so wholesome and under such deep conviction in support of one's own side is to be in an enviable case. The average observer, less fortunate, is likely to feel that in the election that is impending Governor ORRILL's efforts to protect the purity of the ballot in Manhattan are well entitled to the compliment of close scrutiny.

In an editorial article, under the title of "No Change Wanted," the Globe records Mr. ANDREW CARNEGIE's opinion that the industrial interests need a Republican President who inspires commercial confidence, and declares at some length that that is the feeling of the country. The Republicans, it says, have declared that they "stood pat" on their record, and that if continued in power they would continue unchanged the policy they had pursued since 1896. "Every voter," says the Globe, "be he millionaire or farmer or laborer, knows that the day after ROOSEVELT's election things will continue without change, that no job or check will be felt in any branch of commerce or trade or industry. If, on the other hand, the Democrats were to come into power, the most beneficial influences that can enter into commercial and industrial life, uncertainty, would be felt at once through every channel of trade and business in the land. That is no alarmist cry, but a simple statement of an elementary truth."

But is the whole truth? No doubt the Republican policy of "stand pat" has its value for immediate use in the stock market, and possibly, if the Democrats should win, the bull movement in that sensitive region would sustain something of a jolt after election. But "stand pat" as a continuing and permanent policy is as far as possible from being a harbinger of commercial power. Too many people know too much about the tariff for it to endure, unmitigated, for many years.

Mr. CLEVELAND's conviction that "American interests have prospered so greatly and competition is so severe" that we need another Republican President will excite, outside of the White office, a good many smiles. A great many people are feeling that the distribution of prosperity is not so equitable as it ought to be, and that too many commodities cost too much, and that too many of the industrial interests are enabled by the tariff, and by other artificial aids, to collect for themselves an undue share of prosperity from the consumer. "Stand pat" is riding to a fall. It is riding the Republican party too hard. If the party cannot unscrew it, it is sure, presently, to go down under it. The tariff has got to be amended, or its effects modified by reciprocity treaties. Opposition in the Republican party to any step in its execution will be extremely strong, and may be strong enough to prevent reform. But unless the Republicans are soon frightened out of "stand pat" by Democratic strength, the consumers will flock to the other standard in sufficient numbers to carry their point.

Secretary of War TART pointed out in his masterly speech on Thursday night the Democratic habit of planning improvements and then neglecting to appropriate the money for them.—The Press.

The contrast is inevitable, isn't it?

HERBERT WELSH, of Philadelphia, is opposed to ROOSEVELT, chiefly because of his "complete subservience to Senator Quay in the distribution of Federal patronage in Pennsylvania." In a long letter he set forth sundry bad appointments which the Colonel made at Senator Quay's behest, and expresses his sorrow that President ROOSEVELT never found a convenient season to carry out his expectation "to have a break with Quay later on." Mr. WELSH thinks that "President ROOSEVELT found Quay and men like him too strong to be withstood if he would attain his end." No doubt he did. Power has its price, and the most scrupulous aspirant cannot always avoid paying it. VOLTAIRE, in his Life of Charles XII., says of GUSTAVUS VASA: "Brave with circumspection, and mild and gentle in a fierce and cruel age, he was as virtuous as it is possible for the leader of a party to be." We must not demand impossibilities. Was it possible for the leader of the Republican party to be virtuous enough to break with Quay?

If CORTLANDT is the one man in all the place of Postmaster-General and clean out the pot-smoke in the department, then the American people are entitled to his services at once.—The Evening Post.

You seem to forget that Mr. CORTLANDT had to work very hard in organizing the Department of Commerce and Labor. He is now indulging in the bit of recreation to which his toil fairly entitled him. When he gets well rested, maybe he will see what he can do in the Post-Office Department. Meanwhile, why interrupt what seems to be a more post-time?

Former Senator ELMOR made a queer speech in the peace-meeting in Philadelphia. He began by denouncing England for invading Tibet and the United States for "disemboweling a sister republic—Panama—for the sake of a canal," and for depriving the Filipinos of the liberty they were vainly "trying to win" from Spain. These cases of interference, to Mr. ELMOR's mind, were distinctly unwarranted, immoral, and un-Christian. He then upbraided England and America for not taking a hand in the Far East. "It is our duty as private citizens," he declared, "to stop our neighbors from quarrelling, and it is our duty as a nation to do the same thing. Of course, Russia and Japan might be angry should we interfere, but this should not make us fail to do our Christian duty." As surely the venerable and highly respected Senator is the most belligerent peace-maker we have yet heard from. He reminds the fighting Methodist preacher of certain riding days. While denouncing the reserve of the Filipinos from boudoir and the establishment, not the dissabonement, of the Republic of Panama, he outperforms imperialism itself in urging armed intervention between Japan and Russia. Contrasted with peace-makers of this illiberal and militant type, our present benevolent despotism is as safe and sane and conservative as an eight-day clock.

Who can truthfully urge that the close of this campaign is lacking in humor when DAVID B. HILL begins to worry about THOMAS ROOSEVELT's "singular obtuseness in moral perception?"

Doctor McKIMMAY is not nearly as "fair" as he was awhile ago. He used to "assess" merely; now he "refutes"—which is ominously serious. The unknown who shops out his cartoons, however, is not so easily diverted from basic principle, and here to the original line with the picture reproduced herewith, entitled "Eagle Government Weather Bureau—Consulted by the Presidential Candidates for Election-Day Forecasts." The Colonel is at the left, the Judge at the right, as a most casual observer might have noted, but to avoid the possibility of misunderstanding, their names will be found upon the telephone books. The gentleman in the black coat in the centre facing the reader is the Doctor himself, apparently trying to talk with both candidates at one and the same time. There seems to be so little doing in the counting-room that we judge that the picture was made on a Saturday afternoon when the clerks were away to Dreamland. Since it was drawn the ROOSEVELT wire has been cut, and information is canalised only to the Judge. Let us hope it is satisfactory.

Or shall it be that flag stained by the use to which President ROOSEVELT put it in the commission of a public crime upon the isthmus of Panama, the flag soiled and dishonored by the employment to center the national sanction upon an ignoble, cowardly, despicable deed of spoliation? It would be a highly appropriate symbol, gentlemen, for the undertaking in which you are engaged.—The Times.

There, there! Go to bed early and get a good sleep. It will soon be over.

The announcement that President ELMOR would vote for ROOSEVELT was followed within a week by the disclosure that the endowment figures for Harvard University had decreased 240 from last year. Dr. ELMOR probably knew it before he announced how he would vote. The decrease is attributed to various causes, and among others to "business conditions." That President ELMOR "stands pat" may be plausibly, if not truthfully, attributed to the facts that every new student costs Harvard about a third more than he pays, that Harvard received her income by $100,000 last year, and that, for her, less business may be good business, and conditions that cut down her enrollment, favorable. Dr. ELMOR, however, gives no reason for his vote, and intimates that he is not likely to give any in public. He proposes to vote also for the Hon. SAMUEL W. McCALL, Republican nominee for Congress in his district. It was Mr. McCALL who told the Harvard Phi Beta Kaput last June about newspapers and their powers and their divergence from a complete state of grove.

President TRUMAN of Dartmouth is also out for ROOSEVELT, and he has printed the reasons for his preference. There are plenty of them. He likes the Republican candidate, thinks him highly competent, and can recall the career of no other man in American public life "who has lived in the thick of the fray who has done so few things that one feels called upon to justify." It is odd how differently it strikes another New England educator, Professor HENRY LOMAX NELSON, of Williams. He could easily keep President TRUMAN busy justifying him, ROOSEVELT from now to election. He even points out (in the World) to President KLAAR that while we have a republican form of government we have not a republican government, and "that all who believe in a republic should vote against Mr. ROOSEVELT, no matter what organization comes into power." The reason, as Mr. NELSON sees it, why we have not now a republican government is that State bosses, promoted to Senators, compel appointments, control treaties, dictate nominations, and thus govern the government. Most of the independents who will vote for Judge PARKER will do so, he thinks, because they want "to stop the movement that is changing the very nature of our government."

What an interesting turn of affairs there would be if President ROOSEVELT, having realized his aspiration to be elected President, should take to heart this theory which Mr. NELSON expounds, and set himself earnestly to relieve sundry Senators of powers inconsistent with real republican government!

We wish the Springfield Republican would use better ink.

The Tribune gives a Sunday page in the house and personal characteristics of the candidate for Governor—Mr. HUGHES of Olean, an inland city which "was once a place on the map." A reporter possessing delective instincts hunted up the place, and the very first man he met at the station, when asked what he thought of his distinguished townsman, replied, "Damn him; any one who says he is not a gentleman is a liar!" That fact being established, the reporter walked up the street and immediately discovered that "he is courteous in his bearing toward every one." It is even "said of him in Olean that if a person whom he does not know happens to catch his eye he will bow." Moreover, "he is especially courteous to women, regardless of their station in life. If he knows one, he will wave his hand." In this graceful manner he conveys "the impression of being a person incapable of doing anything contemptible." In front of the house is a fresh green lawn. There is also a vegetable-arch, in which we assume vegetables are grown. His precocity is established authoritatively, thus:

As a boy Lieutenant GOFFERT HUGHES is said to have enjoyed "trading." He has often told one story of himself as a boy. A circus was coming to town, according to the story told by an acquaintance. He wished some money. He made a contract with his grandfather to do a certain piece of work on the farm. For this he was to receive $2. Somehow he succeeded in persuading his grandfather to pay him the money in advance. Then he went to the circus.

Even at this early age he was developing a "sound business instinct which has been of great service to the people of this commonwealth." Whether subsequently he really owed his grandfather's wood is not stated positively; he probably did.

The importance of an intimate acquaintance with baking-powders and things was evidenced in a somewhat thrilling episode after he had become great and gone to Albany. A photographer was taking a flash-light picture of Mr. HUGHES and some other statesmen at his house after supper and burned his wrist. "The man squirmed with pain, and yet all of the assembled Senators looked at him in mute astonishment, with the exception of the Congressman member." Why the others should have been so amazed that a man whose wrist was being eaten into by magnesium should suffer pain can only be inferred; in any case, Mr. HUGHES rose promptly to the occasion. Quickly springing to his feet—apparently he had been sitting or lying down—he said, "I'll fix you all right; just wait till I jump into the kitchen!" The squirming photographer manifested no disposition to leave, so the Senator jumped into the kitchen and "at last dug up a package of soda, but not until he had covered his black cheviot frock coat with a mixture of flour, cornmeal, and dust. He then carefully powdered the bars with soda, and, taking out a silk handkerchief from his pocket, he bound up the injured hand with the care and attention of a nurse." Being of silk, the handkerchief was necessarily "an expensive one," but when the photographer said he would return it, the Senator, despite the fact that he had a quite severe cold in the head, said quickly, "No, no; keep it to offset the other souvenir of your visit." Another instance of his thoughtfulness was afforded when "one day he was observed running out of the City Club of Olean, of which he is a member. He was walking briskly. He caught sight of something on the sidewalk, stopped to look at it, and then returned and kicked a human pel into the gutter. 'Some one might slip on that and be hurt,' he observed to a bystander as he hastened away."

The interesting account concludes with this narration of an incident which now becomes historic:

Governor ROOSEVELT was to speak at a comedy fair near Olean. He had accepted the invitation of Senator HUGHES to spend the previous night at his house. The visit of Governor ROOSEVELT was to be the occasion of a demonstration in Olean. When Senator HUGHES and Governor ROOSEVELT descended from the train, the former looked about for the carriage which he had ordered from a local livery-stable to meet his guest and himself. A hack-driver quickly drew his vehicle up into the crowd beside the platform and called out: "Here you are, Governor! Tied tight in here."

The carriage was so thickly surrounded by the crowd that its character could not be distinguished, and, thinking it was the vehicle ordered by him, Senator HUGHES ordered the Chief Executive of the Empire State into it, and followed himself. Instantly the hackman shipped up his horses and dashed up the street, without waiting for the reception committee. Then it was discovered that the carriage was a ransacker's affair. The rattling of the spokes could be distinctly heard as the carriage rolled up the street. The driver paid no further attention to his passengers until he reached the front of the town, where he turned up to one of the hotels.

"This is not my horse," exclaimed Senator HUGHES to the hall-attended driver. Baiting the driver to the opposite corner, the carriage was stopped in front of a much inferior hotel. "I wish you to go to my house," said Governor ROOSEVELT's host in a firm tone, as the driver turned around to see if his feet were going to get out.

This time the delay on the seat seemed to grasp what was wanted, and, swinging around the park, he drew up in front of Senator HUGHES's house.

The firmness manifested by Senator HUGHES in meeting and mastering this trying situation is said in Olean to have made a deep impression upon Mr. ROOSEVELT's mind. Indeed, it is suspected that the recollection of the happy outcome of that wild ride had no little to do with the warm approbation of the recent nomination expressed by the President. Having gleaned these fascinating reminiscences, the reporter was obliged to return to New York to avoid staying in Olean overnight. Hope is freely expressed, however, that he may return, as the half has not yet been told.

And if the people choose me for their Governor (he raised both hands as if to emphasize what he was about to say), I pledge you my word, under God, to administer the trust fearlessly and honestly.—JUDGE PARKER'S Madison Square Garden speech.

Mr. HUGHES will do the same. Two conscientious men are running for Governor of New York. It is well.

In Indiana Mr. WILLIAM J. BUTANE has been making an energetic and, so far as we can judge, a sincere effort to procure for Judge PARKER all of the 310,000 votes that were cast for the Democratic nominee in 1900. Even should he succeed in doing this, the Republicans would be reasonably sure of victory, for, in the last Presidential year, the Republicans polled 330,000; and it must be remembered that THOMAS E. WATSON, as the Populist nominee for the Presidency, is likely to have many more votes in Indiana than the 1141 which were polled for WATSON PARKER four years ago. On the whole, the political forecasters who back their opinions with money are probably warranted by the outlook when they offer to bet two to one that Mr. ROOSEVELT will carry Indiana. In the adjoining State of Kentucky the Democrats admit that the Republicans will have a chance of gaining one Representative in Congress, and that the majority for PARKER is unlikely to exceed 10,000. If there is any solid foundation for the prediction that THOMAS E. WATSON will get 25,000 votes in the State, the Republican electors may be returned, as they were— all but one—in 1896.

We expected that there was something behind the appointment of Mr. WYNN to be Postmaster-General even for a week or two. It now transpires that he is the proud father of ten children, seven of whom have to vote for THOMAS RANSFORD in 1924.

On some accounts it is good news that Mr. HEFLIN of Alabama is virtually sure to spend the greater part of the next two years at Washington. He is the Democratic candidate for Representative in Congress for Alabama. He is quoted as saying lately in a campaign speech:

There they sat, ROOSEVELT and BREWER, and if some Congress or one of his kind had thrown a bomb under the table so great harm would have been done the country.

In the same speech, as reported by the Montgomery Advertiser, he said:

And if BREWER interferes in this thing, there is a way of stopping him. We have a way of influencing negroes down here when it becomes necessary.

The Advertiser rebukes him for these deliverances, which, indeed, seem to us also to be exceptionally improper. They are so improper that it almost seems as though they ought to prevent HEFLIN's election to Congress; but of course they won't; not in the fifth district of Alabama. Let us look then on the bright side. HEFLIN may be unfit for Congress, but Congress may be good for HEFLIN. His words show that he has lived too long in Alabama, just as Governor VANDAMMA's words show from time to time that he has lived too long in Mississippi. The cure for HEFLIN is to send him away from home. Two years spent in Washington may teach him decency.

Supreme-Court-Justice MILLER made a fizzle of his attempted defence of the United Board's generosity in dealing with the Furnaceville Iron Company, but even the intention was considered deserving of reward. The Governor promptly designated him to sit in Part XI, in the First Judicial District, at a salary exceeding that which he had been receiving by $10,000. If the defense had been successful, there is no telling where he would have landed.

"Why not let poor COCKRAN alone for at least one week?" asks a kindly disposed person residing on Long Island. Because, gentle one, he continually bumps up against the irrefragable principle embodied in our immutable platform.

In the current number of the Metropolitan Magazine, a twenty-five-cent periodical that can be bought for fifteen cents, the respective merits of the two chief candidates are considered by the Honorable BOLKEE COCKRAN, statesman, and Mr. ALFRED HEVAT LEWIS, philosopher. The former, who obviously was for PARKER at the time he prepared his article, practically limits his favorite's preferential claim to the courage indicated by the famous mob telegram. The writer was a delegate to the St. Louis convention and tells the story with substantial accuracy, although for the information of the future historian we are obliged respectfully to record the fact that he errs in saying that he was "a spectator of all the events," and that what he writes "came under his personal observation." The truth is that Mr. COCKRAN did not get even a glimpse of the dramatic episode which he attempts with moderate success to depict. His own "participation," as he describes it, consisted in riding back and forth between St. Louis and Indianapolis—as witnesses the following plaintive verse published at the time by the Star:

THE FUTILE FLIGHT.

A TALE OF THE COCKRAN AND THE CHAIR.

[ALL FROM AN JULY 8. W. FOR MR. COCKRAN AND A SERGEANT CRAM left St. Louis for home on their private car to keep a dinner engagement at Sherry's. At Indianapolis they were overtaken by a telegram from CHARLES F. MURPHY indicating the opportunity afforded by Judge PARKER's telegram, and urging the prompt return of Mr. COCKRAN. Thompson Mr. CRAM hired a special locomotive at a cost of $400, and they were whisked back at an average speed of seventy-five miles an hour, arriving two hours after the final adjournment of the convention.]

"We are lost!" the Cockran shouted,
As he tumbled down the Pike,
"What's the use of sashy?
When you cannot open the dyke?
Let us shake the rusty city,
Let us leave the leaky lake,
Let us hasten back to Sherry's
And get on our dinner coat!
"Tis well!" said mighty Cockran,
"Oh, hell!" said Sergeant Cram.

"We are lost!" the Cockran shouted,
And he cursed his stupid fate,
As the train approached the station
Of the Honorable Parker State.
But a telegram awaited,
And it called the Cockran back,
As the savior of the party,
To reform the jumping jack.
"Tis well!" said mighty Cockran,
"Oh, hell!" said Sergeant Cram.

For a special went four hundred
Of the Sergeant's yellow coin,
And away they sped at frightful speed
In the dawning of the morn.

"We are lost!" the Cockran shouted,
As the special crossed the mud
Of the Leaky yellow river.
To the chief of steel and blood,
"Tis well!" said mighty Cockran,
"Oh, hell!" said Sergeant Cram.

"We have lost!" the Murphy shouted
To the Cockran and the Cram,
As they stepped upon the platform
With their most prized cram.

"Twas the only chance!" he shouted,
To avert the kicking mob,
And to end in blaring toads
With the fringe of the frock.
"Ah, well!" sighed mighty Cockran,
"Ah, hell!" said Sergeant Cram.

Despite the enforced absence of Mr. COCKRAN's brain, however, the convention managed to go ahead and do the right thing. Upon that ground, and because WASHINGTON, LEWIS, GRANT, and CLEVELAND made good Presidents, Mr. COCKRAN, with characteristic logic and convincing argument, demands the suffrages of the people for Judge PARKER.

Philosopher LEWIS, who used to be in Tammany when Statesman COCKRAN, by order of RICHARD COCKER, was dividing his mental and moral energies between high society and low finance, takes the opposite view. He does not consider Judge PARKER's honesty brilliant enough, and cites, in proof thereof, the fact that he voted for BAYLY while opposed to the silver fallacy. This, the philosopher adds, ROOSEVELT could not have done; "his honesty is of too porous and stifflined a generation. He is of an honesty too intemperate to have consented to what he held to be wrong merely to be 'regular.' He lacks the selflessness, the virility, his patriotism ever militant, his probity ever self-willed, would have run away with him." Without wishing to discredit in the slightest degree Mr. LEWIS's intimate personal knowledge of what Mr. ROOSEVELT would do under imagined circumstances, it might be well to recall that his brilliant honesty did not prevent his consenting to what he held to be wrong merely to be "regular," when he voted for BLAINE. That candidacy involved elements quite as hateful to ROOSEVELT as free silver was to PARKER, but he swallowed it for the reason, stated in his letter at the time, that "a man cannot act both without and within the party; he can do either, but he cannot possibly do both." In other words, he is an uncompromising partisan who, confronted by the same situation, would unquestionably vote, as Judge PARKER voted, for the nominee of his party. Philosophers who write history should know facts and stick to truth.

President ROOSEVELT spoke a little quickly when he told the penmen that he would call another Hague Conference right away. He finds now, presumably after conferring with Mr. HAY, that it will be necessary to communicate with some of the other nations which still maintain a pretence of identity and which may want to know whether the congress will be expected to reach some sort of agreement or only talk. "Many limitations," says an apparently inspired despatch, "are expected to be proposed in this way, and it is realized that much difficulty will be experienced in securing harmony." Moreover, Russia and Japan are too busy to select or even spare peace delegates just at the moment, so, regretfully, the millennium will have to be postponed till cold weather sets in.

The acute nature of the prevailing dissatisfaction in Panama is attested by the President's determination to send Secretary TAYLOR to the rescue. It is evident that the Canal Commission has not been successful in making practicable plans to carry on the work of building the canal under the terms of the treaty. Possibly the commissioners' plans are satisfactory to themselves, but they have incensed the Panamanians to that degree that something prompt and effectual had to be done. The Panamanians complain that the United States has established absolute authority over the canal strip, that it has erected the rampart of the DURELY tariff along the edges of the canal zone, that it has seized the ports of Panama and Colon and collects port charges in them, and that it has set up United States post-offices in the canal zone. That any of these actions is contrary to the treaty does not appear; but whether the treaty warrants them or not, they are extremely prejudicial to the peace of mind of the Panamanians. They cannot endure the thought that the great DURELY barrier is to run through the streets of their town, shutting off their merchants from profitable trade with the canal-diggers. If they are up against the protected interests in this country, and have got to compete in Congress for their share of trade, we are heartily sorry for them. The President has done the best thing he could do. The War Department has supervision of the work of the Isthmian Canal Commission, and Secretary TAYLOR is an ideal man to send on such an errand as the President has committed to him. If, under the law, the Panamanians can be conciliated and appeased, he is the man to do it. He will see that they get legal justice, and so far as lies in him it will be tempered with equity.

The Episcopal convention at Boston granted the request of its committee on change of name of the Church, that it be discharged. That means that the effort to change the name has failed for the time being, and that the Church will be "Protestant Episcopal" until further notice. The movement for a change is not yet strong enough (and may never be) to overcome the vis inertia. Furthermore, the prevailing sentiment of the convention in the matter was that there was a far better chance of promoting church unity by bringing the Protestant churches together than by uniting the Episcopal and Roman Catholic churches. Therefore a change of name that might widen the distance between the Episcopal Church and the other Protestant bodies seemed inexpedient.

The majority report of the convention's committee on canons recommended a canon providing that no minister shall solemnize a marriage between persons either of whom has been, or is, the husband or the wife of any other person then living from whom he (or she) has been divorced for any cause arising after marriage. But a divorced person who is remarried contrary to this canon is not to be excluded from baptism, confirmation, or the communion, if he (or she) solemnly avers that he (or she) was the innocent party in a divorce. Nor shall a penitent in imminent danger of death be debarred from the sacraments. Except in these specified cases, any minister who has reasonable doubts whether a person desiring to be received to the ordinances of the Church has been married in accordance with the discipline of the Church shall refer the case to the Bishops.

The nub of the proposed new canon is that Episcopal ministers shall not perform the marriage service for the benefit of persons who have been divorced, whether innocent or not. The House of Deputies sitting as a committee of the whole voted 214 to 191 in favor of the new canon, but in the final vote taken by dioceses and orders (lay and clerical) the canon failed of adoption. The failure was due to the rule that when a diocese is evenly divided its whole vote is cast in the negative. In ten dioceses the clerical vote was thus divided; in six the lay vote. All these votes being counted in opposition, the measure was lost. Five days later (October 17) the House of Bishops adopted the new canon by a vote of 14 to 23. It has not transpired at this writing whether the deputies will concur in the action of the bishops, but such a final result is possible. At any rate, a majority of the Episcopalians now favor the new canon. It is argued with much force that a minister cannot with propriety read the present marriage service with its promise "until death do us part" to a person who has been widowed merely by law, and that either the words of the service should be changed or ministers forbidden to marry divorced persons.

With what relief one turns from the gloom which now pervades the editorial page of the Springfield Republican to the gladsome poetry of its Sunday columns and reads:

This no month for sadness:
Nate her sounds of gladness:
Autumn has its echoes of the spring:
For our soul was stirred
When to-day we heard
Voice of spring's own bird
Blow of wing.

Ostensible authorship is ascribed to another, but it is easy enough to see that, for the nonce, the daisies were put on the shelf and Mr. BOWLES took a stroll through Loggemoor.

During the civil war JOSEPH ELLER enlisted and went into camp. While there he got news of sickness at home, and went home informally to see about it, hiring a man meanwhile to personate him in his company and answer to his name. While ELLER was still away the regiment was ordered to the front, and the substitute, still answering to ELLER's name, went with it, served four years, and was finally mustered out as JOSEPH ELLER. Subsequently the substitute died. Later it occurred to the real ELLER that his recorded services in putting down the rebellion entitled him to a pension and he got one, and drew it for many years. But not long ago it was discovered that though ELLER's record was all right, he had not personally intruded on the hostilities of the civil war, so his pension was taken away and he was fined $1000, and in default of payment he is now in jail at Fort Scott, Kansas. He is an old man, and there is a movement afoot to have him released. It seems to us that, considering what persons get pensions, and for what services, ELLER's case commends itself to leniency. He did enlist, and he did serve; for shall vicious service go for nothing? May it not be argued that he enjoyed a constructive rest of four years from military engagements, and is the recess any the less valid because he constructed it himself? His disabilities, if he has any, were doubtless the lawful consequence of his disappointment at being left behind. He missed the honors of war, and all chance of promotion, and now even his pension is gone. At least he had a civil-war experience, and his pension claim is better in that respect than that of many an eighteen-year-old widow of a eighty-year-old veteran who spent ninety days in camp. All things considered, the government seems to have been hard on ELLER.

JOHN T. SMITH, a member of the United States Army Hospital Corps, stationed at Fort Mott, New Jersey, has married a success. The post surgeon at Fort Mott has recommended that SMITH be discharged "for the good of the service." General GAVIN endorsed the recommendation and forwarded it to Washington, where it was further endorsed by Surgeon-General O'BRIEN, and went finally to Judge-Advocate-General DAVIS for consideration and report. "A report from General DAVIS is not expected immediately," says a newspaper despatch. A delay of a couple of weeks in this case won't hurt, though there cannot be much doubt that JOHN T. SMITH's usefulness as an army-hospital steward is seriously impaired.

Word comes from Glasgow that neither FIFE nor WATSON can be induced to design a new challenger, Sir THOMAS LARSEN will not race for the America's cup in 1905. Unlike Sir THOMAS, Mr. FIFE and Mr. WATSON know when they have got enough. They are skilful men, but if neither of them has an inspiration which he wants to match against our Mr. HERRINGTON's next inspiration, they do well to hold off.

The best tariff-reform speech made in this campaign was that of WILLIAM L. DORRIS, in accepting the nomination for Governor of Massachusetts.

Taft and Root Uphold the President

The most notable of the recent speeches on the Republican side were delivered on October 13 by Secretary TAFT at the Union League Club, New York, and on October 15 by ex-Secretary Root in the Philadelphia Academy of Music. For lucidity, vigor, and effectiveness these utterances deserve the best circulation which the Republican Campaign Committee undoubtedly means to give them. Judge TAFT began by saying that the outcome of the campaign up to date was that the Republicans had defined clearly their principles and purposes, whereas the Democrats had produced a fog in which your search in vain to find out just how they stand upon most of the issues of the campaign. Many of the auditors applauded when he told a friend, who, being asked what he thought of Judge PARKER's speech of acceptance, replied that it reminded him of the recommendation given to a good old family horse that "even ladies and children can drive it." He maintained that every statement in the speech of acceptance was framed with a view of convincing the country that, if the Democrats were put in power, they could do no harm. The Secretary of War admitted that Judge PARKER's letter of acceptance was, apparently, a document of much more force than the same gentleman's speech of acceptance, but he insisted that when you come to analyze it and try to learn where the Democratic nominee stands on all but two of the issues of the campaign, you again find yourself in a puzzled condition of mind. As to the charge that, under Mr. ROOSEVELT's administration, we are drifting toward imperialism, Judge TAFT maintained that, under our system of government, there is not the slightest danger of usurpation by the Executive. All that Congress has to do, if an Executive should attempt to usurp its functions, is just to sit still. Without appropriations, no Executive is powerless. Division Order No. 78 was described as the only name-borne of the prolonged and painful partitioning of alleged unconstitutionalism. A very small name, Judge TAFT called it, because that pension order had followed one of a similar kind made by Mr. CLEVELAND fourteen years ago, and another made by Mr. McKINLEY seven years ago. This answer bore much of its force, however, when the fact is kept in view that Judge PARKER has declared an order of the kind unconstitutional, whether Mr. CLEVELAND made it or not. As to the declaration of the Democratic nominee that he will revoke Pension Order No. 78, and thus revive the Southern States when he reports to Congress the House of Representatives, in pure a servile pension bill, Judge TAFT advised Union veterans not to attach much value to that promise. Southern Democrats are not wont to show themselves particularly lavish of public money on behalf of Union soldiers.

Judge TAFT concluded that, in one particular, the Democratic position is perfectly clear. Judge PARKER has pointed out that the disbursements of the Federal government in 1904 were larger by $240,000,000 than they were in 1898, and he has said that, if the Democrats are restored to power, they will put a stop to such extravagance. Judge TAFT proceeded to analyze the modus in the matter of disbursements, and showed, in the first place, that fifty million dollars were for the Panama Canal, and, secondly, that about $34,000,000 were mere transfers of money from one account to another. These ten million dollars were allotted to the St. Louis Exposition, of which $1,500,000 will be paid back about the 1st of January.

Incidentally, moreover, as the Democrats did not vote against this amount, the appropriation for St. Louis cannot be charged exclusively to the Republican party. It is true that there has been an increase of $700,000,000 in the appropriation for pensions. But does it lie, asked Judge TAFT, in the mouth of the Democratic nominee to object to that increase, when he promises to try to impose on the country a new burden of taxes or thirty or forty millions for service pensions? Turning to the increase of some eighty million dollars in the appropriation for the navy since 1898, Judge TAFT recalled that, in the first years of Mr. CLEVELAND's administration, there were only thirty-five naval vessels in commission, and we only had eight thousand sailors. To-day we have 241 vessels and thirty-one thousand sailors. He then asked the Democrats that, he asked, that we ought to tie up all but thirty thousand of those vessels in our harbors and discharge all but eight thousand of the sailors? The naval appropriation includes a million and a half dollars for a new Naval Academy at Annapolis, but we are reminded that in this item no Democrat objected. The appropriation for the War Department was criticized by the Democratic nominee, on the ground that it shows an increase of $61,000,000 in eighteen years. Judge TAFT directed attention to the fact that the appropriation includes $20,000,000 for rivers and harbors, of which the Democrats surely cannot complain, because their platform favors large grants for the national waterways, and especially for a permanent improvement of the Mississippi River, according to the committee of engineers, would require from one hundred to two hundred million dollars. Then, again, the appropriation for the army includes eight million dollars spent on coast defenses, which are being constructed and equipped in pursuance of a plan adopted by the ENDSLEY Board under Mr. CLEVELAND's first administration. One charge Judge TAFT omitted to notice, namely, that the regular army is much larger than it needs to be, and that it now costs the government almost twice as much to feed a soldier as it did formerly. To sum up, Judge TAFT asserted that, if the appropriation for Panama, for pensions and for the army and navy were cut out, the denounced excess of disbursements would be reduced to $32,000,000, every percent of which was called for by an undertaking to show, by a legitimate increase of expenditure. He added that the ratio of government expenditures to the wealth of the country was now less than it had been in any of the preceding periods to which Judge PARKER referred. His auditors seemed to derive a good deal of comfort from these figures, and they applauded loudly when, in conclusion, he said that the McKinley doctrine, if it meant anything, meant a big alkali. It was a warning to European nations to keep their hands off of South-American republics; but such a declaration would be derogatory, unless we fitted ourselves to discharge the protective function.

The first point made by ex-Secretary Root in his speech at Philadelphia was the expression of a conviction that the silence maintained to so notable an extent by the Democratic nominee was an accident, but the outcome of forethought and calculation. The deliberate purpose of that reticence was, he believed, to induce voters to compare the men and the policies of the Republican nominee with any declared policy of the Democratic nominee, voters of its Democratic opponent, but with an ideal standard of perfection. Mr. Root asserted that the Democratic party is basing its attacks upon the men and measures of the Republican party solely or mainly on the ground that they are not perfect. Everything that has been done in the past eight years he held up to a comparison with a Democratic standard, for none is presented, but with a standard of perfection. The result is a situation, which Mr. Root, for his part, has never before encountered. No one claims, he says, that President ROOSEVELT, or Senator FAIRBANKS, or Senator LODGE, or even any member of the cabinet is perfect. No one claims that the administration even of Mr. McKinley was perfect. All that Republicans presume to say is that they have been doing the best they could, and that they believe the record shows that they have done better than the Democratic party ever did or ever will do. It is absurd, Mr. Root contends, to ask the American people to exchange an administration, mortal and imperfect as all administrations have been, for an ideally perfect administration. The American voter knows that he cannot get perfection, but what he has a right to know is, whether he is likely to gain or lose by a change. This he cannot learn, unless he knows to whom he is to entrust the administration, if it be changed, and how his rights, interests, and hopes are likely to be affected. Mr. Root pointed out that the people of the country may get little or no information as to the personality of the man whom the Democratic party asks them to put at the head of affairs.

Ex-Secretary Root made another telling point when he said that, while the American people were left in the dark concerning the personality of the Democratic nominee, they were equally pleased when they volunteered to learn what would be done with the trusts in the event of a Democratic victory. How is it possible, he asked, to re-visit the St. Louis platform with Judge PARKER's letter of acceptance? The platform demands the enlargement of the statutory powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and further Federal legislation for the more effective suppression of the trusts. Judge PARKER says, on the other hand, that the common law, as developed, affords a complete remedy for harmful trusts, and that what is needed is not so much additional and different laws as officials having the disposition and the courage to enforce existing laws. In view of this conflict of opinions and power always appears to be extravagant to the people who are out of power. The orator considers that they have proved their case when they show that more money has been spent by Republicans in recent years of prosperity and abundant income than was spent by the Democrats when they were borrowing money to pay expenses under Mr. CLEVELAND. They do not say anything about what Republicans have got for their money. In Mr. Root's judgment, an reasonable man will deem it extravagant to spend money for things that ought to be bought and that ought to be done, when you have got the money to spend. As to the belittled disposition attributed to President ROOSEVELT, the ex-Secretary of War charged Mr. OLNEY to point to any period in our national history when more perfect peace was enjoyed between the United States and all the nations of the earth than is today. Mr. Root went further and defied any Democrat to point to an American administration in which one-half as much has been done for the cause of peace throughout the world as has been accomplished by the present Chief Magistrate.

ALEXANDER E. ORR, PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF RAPID TRANSIT COMMISSION WHICH HAS DIRECTED THE BUILDING OF NEW YORK'S NEW SUBWAY

Alexander E. Orr, the distinguished president of the Board of Rapid Transit Commissioners for New York's new Subway, has been prominent in New York financial and civic affairs for almost half a century. He has several times been president of the Produce Exchange, and was president of the Chamber of Commerce from 1894 till 1899. He is a director of many important financial institutions.

A NEW AUTOMOBILE RECORD FROM CHICAGO TO NEW YORK—MESSRS. B. B. HOLCOMB AND LAURENCE DUFFIE, IN THE COLUMBIA CAR, WITH WHICH THEY REDUCED
THE NEW YORK-CHICAGO RECORD TO 58 HOURS 45 MINUTES

The photograph above, Messrs. B. B. Holcomb and Laurence Duffie in the thirty-five horse-power Columbia motorcar with which they made their record-breaking run from Chicago to New York. Mr. Holcomb left Chicago at five o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, October 1. He arrived at Cleveland, 107 miles, at 6.45 the same evening. At Cleveland, Mr. Holcomb was met by Mr. Laurence Duffie, who had gone ahead by train, again took the wheel at Poughkeepsie. The entire run was made in 58 hours, 45 minutes—an advance of 14 hours, 4 minutes over the best previous time.

Admiral Togo

Baron Roma, formerly Russian Minister to Japan

Field-Marshal Ogura

General Kuroki

CARICATURES BY JAPANESE ARTISTS OF SOME OF THE PROMINENT LEADERS IN THE FAR EAST

A Republican View of the Campaign Issues

By Senator Albert J. Beveridge

THREE issues of the campaign? There are none. This is not a campaign of issues. It is a campaign of topics. The campaign of 1892 was fought out on an issue—protective tariff versus revenue tariff. The campaign of 1896 was fought out on an issue—the gold standard versus free silver. The campaign of 1900 was fought out on an issue—retention versus abandonment of the Philippines.

These campaigns, like all campaigns where the people radically differ on clear questions of principles or even on plain propositions of expediency, were great mental and moral battles where victory determined which of important and contrary policies should be adopted by the nation.

The present campaign is without any of these issues or the like of them. Not only is there no clear conflict as to principle; there is not even an important difference as to expediency. For example:

Tariff for revenue only as against a tariff for protection might again have been made the issue. Indeed, the opposition did start to make such an issue in their platform. But the opposition's candidate destroyed it by declaring that however desirable a revenue tariff, it could not be secured for the next four years, because a Republican Senate will prevent it.

For everybody can see that if we are bound to have a protective tariff for the next four years it is better to keep in power the party that made that tariff, and hold that party responsible for whatever happens under it, than it is to put in power the party which is against that tariff, and which did not create it, and yet is held responsible for whatever happens under it.

It is as clear as this to everybody, it is clearer to the tariff reformers themselves than to anybody else; for a genuine tariff reformer does not want responsibility for what happens under a protective tariff while at the same time he is deprived of the power of enacting a revenue tariff. He does not want the blame without deserving it and without power to remedy what he was unjustly blamed for.

This is the common sense side of the tariff issue. But the sentimental side appeals even more vividly to those who look upon protection as a wrong and want a tariff for revenue as a matter of conscientious principle. This very earnest class of citizens would undoubtedly vote for a candidate regardless of consequences who represented their cause, promulgated their principle, and whose utterances were calls to battle against a wrong.

Such a leader was former Cleveland in the cause of revenue tariff. Such a leader was Mr. Bryan in the cause of free silver. But Mr. Parker sounds no call to duty on the tariff. He is not the hero of a cause. He does not represent a principle.

So it is that on the one hand, those who are against protection because they believe it is a moral wrong do not find in the opposition's candidate a leader who inspires them to fight for a conviction; and on the other hand, those who look upon the tariff as a mere expediency may see clearly the confusion that would result from a President in the White House committing the government under a fiscal system which he disapproves and yet prevented by Congress from effecting any remedy. And in everybody of every shade of belief the uncertainty that such an absurd situation would bring to the business world is apparent.

Neither is the money question an issue in the sense that it was an issue in 1896. For, although among the great majority of the rank and file of the opposition, Mr. Bryan and his views are all-powerful, yet the opposition's candidate declares, first, that the gold standard is established, and, secondly, that he believes in it.

Therefore the candidate of the opposition accepts the Republican position upon the money question. And although the opposition itself, whose candidate he is, agrees with Mr. Bryan, rather than with Mr. Parker, still Mr. Parker is the standard-bearer; and what he says is officially the declaration of the opposition itself.

But if, as Mr. Parker says, the gold standard is established, everybody will see that it is better to keep in power the party which, with the aid of the gold Democracy, established that standard, and hold that party responsible for whatever happens under it, than to put in power an opposition which fought the gold standard, and held that opposition responsible for what happens under a money system which that opposition did not create, but fought to prevent.

Senator Albert J. Beveridge

Clear as this will be to men of all shades of financial opinion, it will be clearest of all to the six million voters who twice supported Mr. Bryan on the money question and who are still his followers. For it is foolish to say that the great mass of opposition voters are not to-day as earnest as ever in their views as they were. Gentlemen sitting in the New York clubs may doubt this; but no one who gets out among the masses of the people in other portions of the country, and notably in the Mississippi Valley, can doubt it.

This anomalous situation forces another plain fact on the mind of every man, no matter what his political views may be: That with the opposition in control of the House and the opposition candidate seated in the President's chair, we shall have a constant financial agitation with doubtful results. For since Bryan's influence is paramount among the opposition's masses, free silver bills would be presented in Congress. Would Mr. Parker veto them if they came to pass? Nobody knows. He now declares that he believes in the gold standard; but he believed in the gold standard in 1896 and 1900, and yet both times voted against his belief; although it appeared to everybody—both free-silver men and gold men—that the welfare and hence of the American people were wrapped up in the issue.

To vote one way and believe the other is not an splitting of the apple at any time; but to believe that the nation is in peril of industrial and commercial ruin and even that its honor is in danger, and yet, so believing, to vote to bring this danger and peril on the nation is as not being the power of temperate language to describe the conduct of a person who would do anything like that, no matter how much one might want to make a moral hero out of him. So it is not much wonder that large numbers of silver Democrats resent Mr. Parker's action in the gold standard rather have had a man whose convictions were for gold, as Mr. Parker's are, but who openly voted for his convictions. It is not much wonder, either, that the gold Democracy have not been able to make themselves very enthusiastic about him for Mr. Parker's action in 1896 and 1900 was a direct condemnation of what these gold Democrats did.

Thus we see that either the cowardice or the over-shrewdness of the opposition has eliminated two possible issues; and as the election draws near it becomes clearer that the opposition was very unwise in its tactics of evasion and dodging. We are beginning to see, as election day approaches, that it would have been better for the opposition frankly and bravely to have met the Republicans upon some great question and fought out the campaign on some clearly defined issue.

But just as the possible issues of tariff and finance have been barred out of the issue are obscured, and the possible issue which may be embodied in the one word "trusts."

On the one hand, the Republicans have done something effective on the trust question. They have written three great laws—the Sherman, the Elkins and the Hepburn acts—upon this subject. Two of these laws are the work of the last Republican Congress, and were enacted upon the recommendation of President Roosevelt. Indeed, they were the legislative accomplishment of his Executive accomplishment of his trust policy. In the other hand, the Republican party and President Roosevelt declare that they regard these great organizations of industry, called trusts, as a danger to the community development of the country, and a situation; that, therefore, their annihilation is neither wise, possible, or right; and that the incendiary language frequently heard on this subject is to be regarded as severely as the evils of trusts themselves are to be remedied and prevented.

Against this Republican position of fair common sense and simple justice, the opposition does not whisper a single outcry. Mr. Parker will not declare that, if elected, he will recommend the repeal of the laws the Republicans have enacted to control and regulate trusts, although many times he has been invited to say what he would do in this subject.

So it is clear to everybody, regardless of political opinion, that since these Republican laws are to be kept upon the statute-books, it is only good sense to keep in power the party that placed them there and hold that party responsible for their execution and for whatever happens under them, than it is to put in power the opposition, which failed to do anything when it was in power before, and held it responsible for what occurs under the laws it did not pass.

This effectively eliminates the trust issue. But the opposition's candidate more than eliminates it by the necessary declaration that no new laws are necessary, and that the "common law" is itself sufficient. Thus he infamously condemns the new laws which the Republicans have passed, because if the "common law" is sufficient since their passage it was sufficient before their passage.

Worse than this, the suggestion of the "common law" as a remedy for trust evils is itself confusing: for any of our able lawyers do not think there is such a thing as a "common law" of the United States, and conceding that there may be other lawyers who think there is such a thing as a "common law" of the United States, nevertheless we have at the very best a proposed remedy, about the very evidence of which there is dispute among the lawyers themselves. What good, then, can the people see in a proposed remedy about whose very evidence the experts themselves differ? What says the old maxim—"Where doctors disagree, who shall decide?"

Now we come down to the Philippine issue. Here might have been an issue indeed. Here, too, as in the matter of the tariff, the opposition did start to make an issue by declaring in their platform for immediate withdrawal from these islands. But here, again, their candidate destroyed the issue in the contrary declaration that we cannot leave the Philippines until the Filipinos are prepared for self-government.

But everybody who qualified this statement on the ground, regardless of political beliefs, agrees that the Filipinos will not be prepared for self-government for generations, as witness the opinions of former Governor Taft, a Republican, and present Governor Wright, a Democrat, when Mr. Parker said that we cannot withdraw until the Filipinos are prepared for self-government, he made it clear that American administration of the Philippines must continue during the next administration and many succeeding ones.

Thus it is plain that, since we must stay in the Philippines for several years, in any event, it is better to keep in power the party who set up the new government there and who now control it, and hold that party responsible for whatever happens, than it is to put in power those who were against setting up an American administration in that archipelago and holding those responsible for what happens under a regime of which we had no work of theirs and yet which they cannot abandon.

Since Mr. Parker declares that if he is elected we must remain in the Philippines during his whole administration, what sense is there in electing that man? For everybody admits, so far as the honesty and efficiency of Republican administration of the Philippines is concerned, no fault can be found. Everybody admits that really wonderful administrative progress has been made in those islands, the work of the one hundred American commissioners who have been there for the last two years has been as largely successful; and the same thing is true of every other branch of the civil government of the republic's Oriental possessions.

This declaration of Judge Parker is that we cannot leave the Philippines till they are prepared for self-government destroys the contention that we have no right to remain there on principle. The only argument on principle urged against the retention of the Philippines is that we cannot govern another people "without their consent." Yet Mr. Parker declares that we must continue to govern the Filipinos "without their consent" until we have made them capable of self-government.

So in a single sentence he not only destroys the entire Philippine issue, but annihilates the one moral argument on which those who are opposed to retaining the Philippines have hitherto rested their contention. Parker's argument greatly injured his cause when he did this negative the argument of "the consent of the governed"—for it never was a convincing argument. The fact that during the civil war the North forced upon the South a government, and that a great segment of the Southern people who were capable of self-government were actually governing themselves, is recent and overwhelming proof that the phrase "consent of the governed" does not have the meaning the opposition claims for it.

Having thus effectively eliminated the Philippine issue, the opposition candidate appears immediately afterwards to have realized his tactical blunder, and attempts to cure it by declaring that, although we cannot leave the Philippines till some distant day, yet we must promise now what we will do then. But this offends common sense. No business man will promise to-day what he will do ten years from now when such promise is necessary; much less will a prudent and good man make an unnecessary promise which his great-grandchildren will have to carry out. It is just as foolish, too, for a nation to mortgage its future as it is for a father mortgaging his family's future.

This proposed promise to leave the Philippines at some future date is particularly offensive to the young men and women of the country. They rightly feel that, since the future of the Philippines is a problem which they must solve, they should be left with a free hand to solve it when the time comes. These coming Americans will be as wise, upright, and patriotic as Judge Parker; and they will have more information. It is, therefore, not only good sense, but it is common sense, to refuse to raise the question the question which they must answer.

For no man can say what will be best to do fifty years from now. And yet Mr. Parker and those who believe with him propose to foreclose the question by making a promise now that we will leave those islands then, although the whole world might agree then that to keep that promise would be unwise for both the Filipinos and ourselves and dangerous to the peace of the world. And it might readily be this latter for to surrender the Philippines to the Filipinos would be to surrender them to the Japanese, who are not strong enough to hold them, but to the Japanese, the Germans, or the English governments, one of which would certainly seize them. In the rivalry for those widespread war is not only possible, but probable.

But worse than such distant consequences would be the immediate bad effects of such a promise. Ambitions and incorruptibilities in the archipelago would intensify their attacks on the Filipinos, the time to leave them. (All students of the question know that no denouement is as dangerous as the Oriental demagogue, who easily sways the masses, and that every ambitious Oriental considers ambition a power which would cover the ideal of his life.)

So if the promise is made to leave those islands, and one or two agitators demand that the promise be kept to-day, and our government should find it impossible to comply with that demand, an agitation would at once break which would draw the Japanese's knife and light the incendiary's torch again from Luzon to Mindanao. Judge Parker's proposed promise would, therefore, set incitement burning once more throughout the archipelago. It would make much, if not all, that our administration thus far has so ardently and so well accomplished.

The opposition evades the canal issue in the same way. In the Senate they tried to vote the canal, and said that they never meant they have not repudiated to denounce it as dishonorable as the perpetration of a moral wrong. Yet Mr. Parker declares that he will consummate this moral wrong by digging the canal because the law says that he must.

But if the law says that the canal must be dug, everybody will see that it is better to keep in power the party that made the digging possible and has the whole undertaking in hand, and hold that party responsible for whatever happens, than it is to put in power an opposition that tried to prevent the canal, that even now holds it to be the consummation of a moral wrong, and hold that opposition responsible for whatever is done or not done.

If the people want the canal dug they know that the only way they can be sure that it will be dug is to continue Mr. Roosevelt President, and give him the canal. This is the only way to get him. For many years the canal has been prevented by many things. The very fact that Mr. Parker declares his willingness to dig it only because the law compels him to do so shows that he is not in earnest in carrying out the canal, and that the difficulties which will arise in the construction of this greatest material work which the genius of man has ever undertaken.

But one question remains. Upon this question it must be admitted that Mr. Parker has made a mistake. This is his position on which the two candidates frankly conflict. Judge Parker declares that if elected he will revoke Mr. Roosevelt's pension order. That order is that when a Union soldier proves that he is at least ten years of age he shall be considered disabled, and the fact that he is one-half disabled physically.

Mr. Parker declares that this is a violation of the Constitution, because it is the enactment of a law, where no law exists, has the power to enact laws. The answer to this is that the law grants pensions for physical disability; that it is left to the department to say what evidence shall constitute this disability; that accordingly for forty years the department has determined what shall constitute disability and even how much of a pension shall be paid for various disabilities, as, for example, the loss of a finger, etc.; that Mr. Cleveland when President made an order that twenty-five years should be considered sufficient proof of a soldier's disability; that President McKinley made an order that sixty-five years should be considered proof of disability; that President Roosevelt's order, like that of Cleveland and McKinley, is a rule evidence, and finally, that the pension law is a law of the pension law, acquiesced in by everybody during a long term of years. Even the order's legality.

Moreover, naval lawyers all over the country have declared the pension law entirely legal, and have issued their own orders approving $1,500,000 to pay the pensions that will accrue under that order. Thus the only issue which Mr. Parker has made is one about which even lawyers disagree, and one concerning which the President's orders of former Presidents and the practice of the department for forty years prove Mr. Parker to be wrong.

The country does not have very much patience with that kind of issue. Everybody regards it as a lawyer's quibble. And among the masses of the people there is a feeling much akin to disgust with such bar-splitting about the pensioning of old soldiers. For the American people are very sensitive, and although we are forty years away from the time when there will be a profound and universal feeling of tenderness for the gray-haired old veterans who are scattered in the homes of the people all over the republic.

So much for the issues of the campaign. But the feature of the campaign has not been the denouement of the issues. The great feature of this campaign is the overwhelming positive personality of President Roosevelt, on the one hand, and the negative uncertainty of Mr. Parker, on the other hand. For whether the issue of the two candidates is a moral issue or a legal issue it is the opinion which the country has formed of the two men.

The masses of the people think that Mr. Roosevelt means to do right. Whether they agree with him or not, everybody concurs in his morality. This is the only thing that can be said about a candidate. As before revealed, it is the thing which has given Mr. Bryan his strength and has twice made Mr. Cleveland President.

There is something very humane and warm-blooded about the personality of Mr. Roosevelt. To the great mass of his countrymen he is a real, living warm-hearted being—not a mere image, not an abstraction. It is very common to hear men who do not belong to the President's party declare, "Well, I am going to vote for Teddy, and I don't care who knows it." Any interested person who wishes to learn the actual situation may hear such expressions as that by listening to the talk of the men in railroad shops or of farmers at their country gatherings, etc.

Another important feature of the campaign deserves a line: the feeling among the great masses of the opposition who are the faithful followers of Mr. Bryan that the St. Louis convention was managed by manipulators and that the wishes of the opposition millions were not faithfully represented there. Of course we know that this is true. Mr. Bryan declared that Judge Parker's nomination was secured "by crossed and indelible methods"; and while it would be far from using such strong language, it cannot be denied that Mr. Parker's nomination was secured by a carefully constructed network of manipulation whose engineers are hostile to Mr. Bryan and to his friends. So that the atmosphere of the opposition campaign throughout the whole fight has been that of suspicion ill-concealed and hatred with differing degrees of intensity.

And so it has been a campaign not of issues and principles, but of candidates and topics. And the country is prostrated and content; and election day is the 8th of November.

A Democratic View of the Campaign Issues

By Edward M. Shepard

STRIKINGLY speaking, an issue is neither Democratic nor Republican. It is the subject-matter of dispute to which there are of least two sides—in an American political campaign probably a Republican side and a Democratic side. No party is necessary interest. Real issues grow; they are not made. Governmental or political facts which they are, and popular interest and popular conscience being at the same time what they are, the issues are fixed and inevitable. Parties may shift them. They may raise false or irrelevant or premature or academic questions, hoping to take the popular side of them, because, as they think, the popular side of real issues is pre-occupied by the rival party. But the campaign is a false one; nothing is decided; the energy of political leaders and voters is wasted; the election day merely marks time.

In this campaign the American voters have true issues—issues as true as the free-silver issue was in 1896, or the Philippine issue in 1900, when free silver had become a false issue. Of the issues presented to-day the Democrats have one side and the Republicans the opposite side. Doubtless false and untrue issues have been suggested, but they have been set aside. No one who takes any pains to pay attention to-day to the question of the gold standard—no intelligent and sincere person, I mean. I repeat that question is not even a false issue. If it be true, as we are told, that the campaign has seemed long and indifferent, the reason is not in the lack of real and present-day issues, but rather in the ground and efficient energy with which the great parties have taken or held their own proper attitudes. The almost pathetic devotion to peace which, since the campaign began and suddenly for campaign purposes, has animated the President and his party associates, the complete shrinking of many Democrats from the attack upon the "robberies" of protection, against which their platform gave them an effectual and really politic text—these and other inequalities or inadequacies there may have been during the campaign, ignoring these, there remain issues which are genuine and fit for the politics of the greatest of republics. Upon these issues each of the two great parties has taken its side. I begin with the issue commanding the first public interest. I shall finish with the issue which, in these last days of the campaign, commands the greatest interest.

The Democrats attack—the Republicans defend—the recent and great increase in Federal expenditure. During President Roosevelt's first three fiscal years (submitting the Panama and St. Louis Exposition payments) this was $1,350,000,000. In 1900, as against $778,349,119 for the first three years of President Cleveland's first term, and against $1,000,000,000 for the first three years of the second Cleveland term. The great increase in President Cleveland's second term over his first term chiefly represented increases to meet permanent legislation enacted under the Republican administration of President Harrison. Under the Democratic administration there was restraint upon expenditure—material increase. Under each period of Republican administration succeeding Democratic administration there has been a great increase. The increase under President Harrison is far more enormous than that under President Harrison, not only because the money increase is greater, but because, if not forbidden by the verdict at the polls, it will signify a lasting policy. Pensioners die; but nations do not reduce the peace feelings of army and navy establishments. Every self-supporting citizen is forced to practise economy, and it has been a prime virtue of all great rulers; but the virtue is not proved—it is not even mentioned—by the Republicans or the President. Yet every dollar of public expense represents the labor and denial of some one somewhere in the United States. If governments refuse to economize, all the more people must economize. Secretary Taft compares the accumulation of wealth now and formerly with Federal expense at the same time. But this is the fallacy that Federal taxation is laid ratably upon all accumulated wealth. All of it is laid rather through the tariff upon American industry or through the internal revenue upon the consumption of a few articles, chiefly the luxuries of the middle and laboring classes. Whether Federal expenditure keep even pace with the accumulation of wealth is of little moment, but that accumulation in America to-day, as never before, represents vast between which have grown in enormous proportion to the growth of the average wealth of the American land of a family.

The Democrats attack—President Roosevelt compels the Republicans to defend—the present and enormous increase in expenditure for purposes of war. The $400,000,000 which (including pensions) President Cleveland spent for the army in the last year of his second term has been increased to $115,000,000. The $12,000,000 which our navy cost in the last year of the Cleveland second term has become $102,000,000. President Roosevelt, through Secretary Hay, has just given the peace conference at Boston words of peace, and almost at the same hour launched new ships of war. He carried a "big stick," and he "spoke softly." He showed his power, however, to postpone until after the election his speech accepting from the War Lord of Germany the estimate Frederick the threat. Our military and naval President Roosevelt has made far more than the military and naval expense of Germany or France. While their wise men condemn the oppressive barbarism, while their rulers discuss disarming the burden upon the American republic. Perhaps we can, for the present, be extravagant without disaster. None the less the burden must be borne by Americans who toil and who save. And the moral result is, in the maintenance of men and the provision of tools for war beyond the necessity of defence make for war. The land of warlike things breeds war. Not only in war, even the most just and necessary war, a "hell" of savagery; it is almost invariably followed by a hell of corruption.

The Hon. Edward M. Shepard

The Democrats attack—the Republicans defend—the pecuniary integrity of recent Federal administration. Doubtless the pocket-books of which the public have learned are a material public expenditure. The Democrats at the last session pressed for Congressional investigation; the Republicans by a party vote defeated it. The Attorney-General and other representatives of the Government, without investigation, we have learned, held that the statute of limitations protected the wrong-doers. The President has thus renewed his experience as Governor of New York. There is no doubt that the Republican administration of President Harrison must go unpunished because they were outlawed. Since the administration refuses investigation except by the very officers under whom the wrong has been done, it should be displaced by an administration which will have every motive to expose, not to conceal—to punish, not to forgive—corruption and fraud in public service.

The Democrats attack, for lack of sincere efficiency, President Roosevelt's enforcement of the law against trusts and monopolies; the Republicans defend it. The Republicans and the President refuse to deprive the right of the manufacturer of steel and iron of their preferential tariff advantages which make them monopolies, and enable them to extract their own Aladdin-like profits from the American masses. So the Republicans have refused to enact any statute fit to enforce fairness in public life in the rates for interstate transportation. It is through secret discriminations by common carriers that small and moderate independent producers have been driven to the wall. When the Department of Commerce, with its Bureau of Corporations, was established, extrinsically to procure publicity, President Roosevelt signed a bill repealing the law which made secret rebates a crime. Unlabeled shippers are still practicing their craft. The only practical result of the new Federal supervision of corporations has been the intolerable scandal of the transfer by the direct vote of the President of his cabinet member in charge of that supervision to the chairmanship of the National Republican Committee. By the use of a moral pressure none the less real that he was no words of threat and the contributions no voluntary in form, he or his committee collects for the election of President Roosevelt from the millions it has enacted to his official duty to investigate, and with which, as the Postmaster-General to be appointed after the election, he is to arrange the postal contracts. The scandal is still new and far more serious indeed for the further the slightest of the statute for publicity has been in force nearly two years, not a fact has been made public by the Federal machinery.

The Democrats attack, the Republicans defend, the measure of respect paid by President Roosevelt to American law, of which he is the sworn servant, and to the laws of nations. By his personal order he ordered public moneys paid to veterans which Congress had refused to permit to be paid by law. That Congress by a later appropriation gave validity to the order is immaterial to its original lawlessness. By the system of temporary appointments without examination, a practice carried by him directly beyond the practice of any other President and one discredited with the intent of the civil service statute, he has gone far to surrender an invaluable reform to the Senatorial bosses. The expulsion at Panama, the violation of our treaty obligations to Colombia, the sudden war in effect waged upon her by the President without the consent of Congress are, therefore in defiance of the Constitution, the collusion with conspirators in which he involved our republic and the world's public conscience.

The Democrats attack, the Republicans defend, the President's policy of meddling in the affairs of other nations. The Republican platform, for instance, justifies our holding of the Philippines because it enables us to keep the peace in the Pacific and in future intervention on the Asiatic coast. The Democrats attack, the Republicans defend, the President's policy of contempt and menace of the "big stick" towards the feeble republics in the south of us.

The Democrats attack, the Republicans defend, the military conquest of foreign peoples and the holding of them as subject colonies. The Democrats would take the American flag, wherever it is the symbol of sovereignty, shall it go; it has been a gift given to the Democrats would have independent every people whom we cannot safely admit, or who are unwilling to come into the American Union of self-governing States. The Philippines, for instance, the Republican party has been a violation of that Declaration of Independence which is the true American charter of liberty. It is a violation inspired part by sentiment and part by hope of profit; but it has been a violation not vindicated by a result of glory—it has been a violation condemned by certain waste and loss, past and prospective. It is a violation stained with blood; it is today a violation the outcome of which, if pressed in, no man can foresee.

The Democrats attack, the Republicans defend, the present tariff law. The Republicans deny that it includes or promotes any abuse. They reject the idea of any present amendment; they insist that if it ever shall be amended the amendment shall be made by those responsible for the present abuses. The financial history of the United States shows that the rates of increase in wealth, product, and almost every form of material well-being was far greater under a system of extreme or relatively moderate duties than it has been under the present highly protective and even monopolistic duties. The progress made in American industry—ever manufacturing industry—from 1840, when the Walker revenue act was passed, to the present time, is enormous. In 1840, it was, notably greater than the progress since made. The infant industries, for the protection of which the protective tariff was first enacted, have grown to be gigantic organizations, often so powerful that they control the government. They support the world has ever known have been carried, and are today being carried in them. Not only consumers, but large classes of American manufacturers, have found for some modification of the protective tariff. The Republican party refuses any relief; it refuses investigation; it refuses discussion. Nor can there be a remedy or beginning of a remedy for tariff oppressions except through Democratic action.

And last, and most serious of all, the Democrats attack, the Republicans defend (by implication if not expressly), the control of the government of our free and democratic republic by a few rich, powerful, moneyed interests. They support the Republican party; it repays them with legislation, not of which they secure a hundred dollars for every dollar they pay in Republican campaign collectors. This policy of the Republican party finds its most sinister illustration in the transfer, in which I have referred, of the head of the Federal department in charge of corporations to the executive and financial control of the campaign of Roosevelt. This policy of the Republican party is meant to disorganize, if it continue it will go far to destroy—the independent small producers. The policy means corruption; it means oppression; it means, unless we desert it, that our republic will no longer be a truly free and democratic one; it is to be shorn of its true headship and glory.

It is, indeed, a necessary campaign for our country, at the head of which the Democratic party has set the high character, the laudable temper, the sound statesmanship of Alton B. Parker.

An English View of the Election

By Anglo-American

TO one looking at it from afar this Presidential election is a most amazing thing. The amazement resides in this, that it is all so flagrantly and publicly unnecessary.

Your case is just as applicable to ours in England. In England we have a household of losses, but no election. In America you have an election, but no issues. I really do not know which state is the more unpleasant, but there can be no doubt which is the more necessary. The more necessary, plunged into a debate over a specific question that you are not allowed to settle without it, is no doubt, irritating enough. But to set in motion all the monstrous mechanism of American electioneering, to have the people of a nation, the millions of men, the "deals" and combinations of campaign managers, the maddening swirl of primaries and nominating conventions, the parades and processions, and the stomp sections in "whomp here" and "let nature take its course," to keep the nation for four solid months on red thoroughly agitated and upset, and to do all this when there is not the smallest reason for doing anything—surely, the very climax of futility.

I trace all the trouble back in the perverse inconsistency of the American Constitution. I read in the American papers that the politicians are puzzled by the prevailing "apathy." Of course there is apathy. Nothing on this earth is more dispiriting than to have to fight when there is nothing to fight about. In England there is one thing that we always have in our elections—a motive for them. That motive may not always be a high one. It may amount to no more than a conviction on the part of the voter that an incumbent is rotten, or a desire to see a certain candidate of the other side. That is not very high. An English election may be nothing more than a wire-pulling manoeuvre. But as a rule during a Parliamentary campaign there is something even more definite and intelligible than a desire to see a certain candidate settled, some specific policy to be condemned or approved. Again, our general elections, having the Septennial Act, are optional and at the discretion of the government. Sometimes, of course, no, for instance, when the ministry is defeated in the House, that discretion is forced. But in such cases the clear correspondence between the election and the needs and realities of politics only becomes clearer still. In England, on the other hand, when an administration makes an election it has one, and when it does not need one it does not have one.

Now what is the use with America? In American elections are governed not by issues, not by the wishes of the majority of the people, but by the judgment of the administration, but simply and solely by the calendar; and the calendar being an essentially inhuman and arbitrary continuance, with a fixed and immutable schedule of operations, cannot always be expected to adapt itself to the shifting exigencies of events, any more than a locomotive can keep track of a butterfly. Every four years the Constitution (in its wisdom) decrees that a Presidential election must be held. So matter whether there are any issues before the country or not, an election there has to be. The thing is so unchangeable, as much beyond human control, and with as little respect for any petty whims as for the result of the season. That is far worse of living under a written Constitution. It is continually interrupting the natural and organic development of politics in favor of some rigidly mathematical device of its own, imposed from without and smothering human affairs as though they always worked out with the bloodless precision of an algebraical formula. So that in America it is just a happen so if these quadrennial campaigns correspond to and synchronize with any clear and vital question; and so that if they do not, they are a waste of time and energy. In 1860 an election and an issue that the unexpected gave an entire of being on the same spot at the same time. In 1860, though the election punctuated not in its appearance, there was only the tail-end of it. In 1860 there was just the beginning of it, and nothing else. Well, it is certainly one way of carrying on representative government, but I think it might be a little improved (Continued on page 1651.)

Is there a Common Law to Control "Trusts"?

By Gen. Benjamin F. Tracy

Ex-Secretary of the Navy

HAS the United States a body of law known as the common law which Federal officers charged with the duty of enforcing the law of the United States may invoke to curb and restrain the so-called trusts and monopolies?

Judge Parker, in his speech of acceptance, declared that it had; that no further legislation by Congress is necessary. He asserted that "the common law, as developed affords a complete legal remedy against monopolies." He further declared "the fact that they have multiplied in numbers and increased in power has been due . . . to the failure of officers charged with the duty of enforcing the law to take the necessary procedure to procure the judgments of the courts in the appropriate jurisdictions." . . .

"What is needed," he said, "is . . . officers having both the disposition and courage to enforce existing law." He not only thus asserts the existence of the law, but casts a reflection upon the present and preceding administration for their neglect to enforce a law, the existence of which he clearly and positively asserts.

This utterance was so opposed to the universally accepted view of the legal profession that lawyers generally, without distinction of party, on reading it, concluded that it must have been a mere oversight—one of those strange lapses of memory that be liable to occur to any of us. It was supposed that Judge Parker, having long been engaged in administering the laws of the State where the common law plays no inconsiderable part, assumed for the moment, and without reflection, that the common law of the States was also the common law of the United States, and furnished ample areas in the hands of honest and vigilant officers to curb trusts and monopolies. That there exists no common law of the United States was a fact so well known and so thoroughly understood by the entire legal profession that no one supposed that Judge Parker intended seriously to assert the existence of such a body of law.

As much as I desire the election of President Roosevelt, my respect and esteem for Judge Parker prevented me from calling public attention to what I regarded at the time as a mere slip or fault of memory, but the President, in his letter of acceptance, did take notice of this position, and in response said: "There is an common law of the United States. Its rule can be enforced only by the State courts' officers. No Federal court could take any action whatever under it. It was this fact, coupled with the inability of the States to control trusts and monopolies, which led to the passage of the Federal statutes known as the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Interstate Commerce Act, and it is only through the exercise of the powers conferred by these acts, and by the statutes of the last Congress supplementing them, that the national government acquired any jurisdiction over the subject. To say that actions against trusts and monopolies should be limited to the application of the common law is equivalent to say that the national government should take no action whatsoever to regulate them."

Judge Parker, in his letter of acceptance of September 26, answered this by saying: "Whether there is any common law which can be applied in the Federal courts cannot be determined by the President or the candidate for the Presidency. The determination of this question was left by the people, in framing the Constitution, to the judiciary, and not to the Executive. The Supreme Court of the United States has recently considered this question, and in the case of the Western Union Telegraph Company vs. The City Publishing Company, to be found in 181 Vol. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. at page 362, it decided that common law principles could be applied by the United States courts in cases involving interstate commerce in the absence of United States statutes specifically covering the case. Such is the law of the land."

Since Judge Parker's reply to the President an friend of his can longer assume that his original position, taken in his speech of acceptance, was not a correct statement of his views seriously entertained, and that he believed that the President and his officers possess, in all matters relating to the jurisdiction of the national government, the powers of the English common law, and that they may invoke that law, both criminally and civilly, in the repression of trusts and monopolies.

To believe otherwise now would be to regard Judge Parker an insincere and as one seeking to deceive and mislead the people.

Nothing can be truer than that times change and that we change with them. It does seem strange, indeed, to those familiar with the bitter controversy so long carried on between John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and Alexander Hamilton, on the one side, and Thomas Jefferson on the other, in the formative days of our republic, touching the powers of the national government, to now find Jefferson's successor as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, insisting that the same imperial power that is conferred upon the English crown by the English common law over his subjects was transferred to the President and the Federal courts by the Constitution of the United States.

It is enough to make Jefferson turn in his grave. He was the real author of the Kentucky resolutions of 1799, which, from the time of their adoption to the secession of the Southern States in 1861, constituted the corner stone of the Southern Democracy.

In these resolutions it was declared that the United States did not constitute a government, but a mere compact under the style and title of a Constitution for the United States between independent States formed for special purposes; that in this compact each State acceded as a State and as an integral party, its co-States forming as to itself the other party; that the United States had no common judge to determine the extent of the powers delegated to itself, but that each party had an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions, as of the mode and measure of redress.

Jefferson denied utterly the power of the Supreme Court to determine the powers delegated to the national government.

Against this construction of the Constitution, which made the nation a mere rope of sand to be broken at the will of any of the States composing it, stood Alexander Hamilton, John Adams, and

General Benjamin F. Tracy

Copyright by Victor Wright, N.Y. 1913

States. This is expressly decided in the case of Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 463-478, in which Mr. Justice Matthews, speaking for the court, says:

"There is no common law of the United States in the sense of a national common law, distinct from the common law of England as adopted by the several States each for itself, applied as a local law, and subject to such alterations as may be prescribed by its own statutes. The courts of the United States are not entitled to apply directly to any State where they are called upon to administer the law of the State in which they sit, or by which the transaction is governed, otherwise an independent, though consistent, jurisdiction, according to the principles of the law, and the law according to their own judgment. . . . And this has been applied in, not the law, but the spirit of their State."

But Judge Parker's experience as a judge should have admonished him that in running down a line of authorities, especially in modern times, he should be careful to get the last case upon the subject. This he failed to do in this instance. Had he looked a little farther into the United States courts, he would have found a case in 1891 U. S. Reports directly in point and in conflict with his original position. This is the case of Mrs. Pitt. Ry. Co. v. U. S., 140 U. S. 254. Here, the United States Attorney of the State of Kansas, acting under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, in pursuance of an article of the Interstate Commerce Law, instituted an action against the railroad company, and charged that the defendant, as a common carrier, discriminated between shippers in violation of the Interstate Commerce Act. The action, which was the ground of a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant from continuing to exact the rates which were claimed to be a discrimination.

In this complaint a demurrer was filed by the defendant. By demurring the defendant admitted the discrimination, but the point raised by the demurrer was whether the United States had any right or authority to institute the suit. The demurrer was overruled by the court below, and a decree entered granting a perpetual injunction, which, upon appeal, was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. An appeal was thereupon allowed in the Supreme Court. Upon the argument of the case in the Supreme Court, the defendant—the railroad company—took the position that no court of the United States had jurisdiction or power to hear and determine causes, except such as it derived from Congress, and the only laws enforceable in such courts were such as were enacted by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution. It denied that there was any common law by which this proceeding could be supported, and it denied that the action was authorized by the Interstate Commerce Act, and that therefore the demurrer should be sustained and the judgment of the court below reversed.

In deciding the case, Judge Wiley, among other things, said:

"Failing this question by the law which was in force at the time when the case arose and when it was decided below, we are left with the opinion that the authority in bringing the suit did not exist. But that is not the case under consideration. It is now, after the passage of the act, that the case under consideration is expressly conferred by the act of Congress, passed after this case was argued at bar, namely: "An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, approved February, 1903."

This case, therefore, decided that at the time this action was brought there was no law, either common or statutory, by which the proceeding could be maintained, but as it transpired that after the case had been argued in the Supreme Court an act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, approved February, 1903, would justify the action, and as the act provided that it should apply to the cases then pending, the court, while sustaining the demurrer and reversing the judgment of the court below, sent the case back to be proceeded with under the new law.

It will thus be seen that for nearly one hundred years the decisions of the Supreme Court have been uniform and affirming that the United States has no common law and that the courts of the United States have no jurisdiction, either civil or criminal, to punish or restrain or restrain the English common law, might be punished or restrained by the English courts at the instance of the English Crown, and that the President's oath that he will "take care that the laws be faithfully executed" extends only to the laws of Congress, and not to the English common law.

And still the mystery deepens with this clear and conclusive demonstration that the United States has no common law, and that the President, under the Constitution of the United States, has no power to enforce the English common law. In this case Judge Parker, a judge of long experience on the bench of the Court of Appeals of this State, to assert that the English common law does exist, and if implicitly executed by the President does constitute a complete remedy against ourselves!

He approves the law, and wishes it understood that if elected he would enforce it. But he could not enforce what does not exist, and as in the light of this discussion if such appear even in him that the matter of its existence is involved in great doubt, will he, if elected to the Presidency, remove that doubt by recommending to Congress the passage of an act declaring that the English common law, as it existed at the time of the conclusion of the treaty of peace following the Revolution, shall be the law of the United States?

Up to this time there has never been an administration that dared to take the responsibility of such a recommendation. Will Judge Parker, if elected, rescue all doubt by recommending the adoption of the English common law? Such an act would, so far as the common law versus power in the Chief Executive of the nation, place the President of the United States on the same plane as the King of England.

It is true that this would be imperialism and a centralization of power heretofore unknown, and it would be imperialism of the genuine kind—the real thing—imperialism with a "big stick" and a more sinister and subtle and insidious character than the discussion names themselves with by punching for the mere exercise which it affords.

The Campaign Parasite

By Edward Lissner

THE man who sat at the roll-top desk, on top of which stood a telephone that gave to the outside world the ear of the master spirit of the campaign—this gentleman, decorated in the world of politics with the title of sergeant-at-arms, hovered and remained absorbed in his paper.

For it was the tenth time in less than half an hour that very day when a gentleman called by some "a grafter," by others "a fakier," though perhaps "crank," would describe him best, of insignificant appearance, in a shabby suit, with a pale, shaven face and dressed in shabby clothes, wearing a silk hat that had seen its best days years before, had asked and in two instances persisted in having his card taken to one of the big men on the executive committee. This official was at the time in conference with a well-known United States Senator, famous as a political manager, who had come all the way to New York to straighten out some of the political tangles that had caused the master spirits of headquarters many sleepless nights, and was now deep in the work.

No wonder the sergeant-at-arms frowned at this interloper, this parasite for revenue only, who was seeking the ear of the campaign manager and not much to present an idea that would bring money through loss of the party principles, but for the money it would put in his well-worn pockets, where none had been for so long and where it was so badly needed.

In answer, the sergeant-at-arms put his paper down on the desk, and said in a tone lacking that usual:

"I said so. You can't see Mr. Sheehan now. He's engaged with Senator Gorman."

This impudent was not entirely unjustified, because his patience was being sorely tried and had been all that day—that day of days, when his orders were not to disturb the masters of the campaign.

The man who had presented his card and by his insistence aroused the temper of the sergeant-at-arms, now sank into a seat in the overcrowded room, which never was without others of his rank, who, in concert with himself, had read in the papers in the fabulous amount of money that the committee had spent in this campaign.

He kept watching the glass door near the desk of the sergeant-at-arms for the hands to turn and come great man of the party leave, in the hope that he might catch his ear long enough to explain the great scheme he had mapped out to set in motion the tide against himself and Fairbanks, and in the future raise the sergeant-at-arms to stand as a rival and ally in the room, which walked unobserved into the office of Mr. Sheehan, without stopping to observe such formalities as waiting in his card or knocking to find out first whether the executive chairman was engaged with any one. For, were this the case, would not be a welcome incident a necessary party to the conference? This was why he allowed the brogue-manner of the sergeant-at-arms to go unrebuked. His day would come—that which he had rebuffed to his hand and friends, saying his neighbors to look for him in any.

For was it not agreed from that to that in the block where the double-deckers never seemed to end, that Mr. Blank was spending much of his time at headquarters in consultation with Mr. Sheehan?

And so this visionary gentleman of such hope and great expectations, whom only the pen of Charles Dickens could do justice to, sat and waited and watched until the hands of the clock pointed to whereupon he came and that Mr. Sheehan should see him one day, better a sigh and looking dejected as he left the building.

The man dreamed that this day would bring forth so much, and he never forgot it. He had been kept waiting in the hall for a long time longer than ever since he had been out of employment, and his awakening in the same old grinding poverty was painful.

The next day he came again and sat beside others of his class. His name was high, much higher than they had heard of before, because the papers had it that the campaign managers had still failed to solve the problem of how to put grain into the cam-

The "Nebraska" leaving the Ways

The "Nebraska" afloat, after the Launching

THE LATEST ADDITION TO OUR NAVY—THE LAUNCHING OF THE BATTLE-SHIP "NEBRASKA" AT SEATTLE

The battle-ship "Nebraska," the latest addition to the United States navy, which was launched recently at Seattle, Washington, is not so large as the "Pennsylvania," whose recent launching at the Brooklyn Navy Yard was described in the "World" of October 15. The "Nebraska" displaces 12,000 tons, and is 311 feet 5 inches in length, 56 feet 2 1/2 inches in beam, and draws 24 feet 9 inches. Her speed is calculated at 18 knots, and she has an indicated horse-power of 18,000. Her battery includes four 12-inch, eight 8-inch, twelve 6-inch, and fourteen 5-inch guns; twelve 3-pounders, and sixteen small guns. Her armor belt is 8 feet wide and 11 inches thick. Her complement will include 40 officers and 772 men.

paing and were in dire straits as a result. He again saw the great men of the party going in and out of the room, and his impatience to point out the remedy that would blaze the path to success, he was about to rise and ask for a few words in private with one, a member of the executive committee, when the argument against him cried out, "This gentleman is not Mr. Sheehan." Whereupon he sat down, while the great men passed out of the room, and again waited the day that led the way to the office of the executive chairman.

The unexpected happened, when his thoughts were far away from headquarters, and upon the greater burdens and higher responsibilities that were imposed on him.

The next-day argument, which was on duty while his superior went to lunch, came over, and, tapping the man on the shoulder to attract his attention, said that Mr. Sheehan would see him in a few moments. He trembled, his face flushed, his heart throbbed violently, he lost his nerve—and why not? For his great moment had arrived, and how many of us can walk along the narrow brink of fate and remain calm and collected in the face of such uncertainty?

That the man who had opened the door and was coming toward him was not Mr. Sheehan, he knew.

"It is a private matter and I want to see Mr. Sheehan himself about it," he persisted, when the inquiry was on what business.

The secretary remained firm. How many men were forever coming to headquarters to see the executive secretary, all on private business, which concerned their personal fortunes rather than the party welfare. If half the schemes these private matters disclosed had been adopted with success, some gentlemen in doubtful circumstances, of dubious appearance, unlike our friend, would be telling of wealth, the party treasury depleted, and the Democratic National Committee would have closed up shop and in a spirit of resignation walked aloft at the polls on election day.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

WHEN The Masquerader began its auspicious career as a serial in HARPER'S WEEKLY last winter, I ventured to predict that it would turn out to be the best article of the year, and that when the novel form it was published in book form it would achieve a wide and enviable popularity. It needed no great propensity to know this result; the situation was fraught with dramatic possibilities of thrilling and absorbing interest, and Mrs. Thurston had already given evidence of ability and ingenuity as a story-teller far above the common. There is nothing the reader is so grateful for, and so ready to appreciate, as I have found myself said in these columns, as a child-like story that engages all his senses and keeps him busy guessing to the end. It is the magic carpet of modern life. There are really few great story-tellers in my age. The inventive faculty which makes the story-teller is a rare gift. Nonetheless may or may not possess it; few of them do nowadays in any great degree of spontaneity; it is a special genius. Charles Froese, himself a great story-teller, was so convinced of the fact, that in his work on copyright he maintained that the inventor in fiction was entitled to patent to protect his original ideas like any other ingenious craftsman who discovered a new invention. The remarkable thing about The Masquerader is that the situation itself is built on a theme of great familiarity in fiction and on the stage, with a double-barreled story gains by this very familiarity, for it makes greater demands on the author's resources of treatment, and it is in the treatment of a theme—sometimes the older the better—that the literary artist distinguishes himself. The theme of The Masquerader is old and original; it is the beginning of The Masquerader, it is still more bold and original, not to say startling and exhilarating in its development and dénouement.

Mrs. Thurston was born in Cork; her father—in whose memory The Masquerader is dedicated—was an eminent Irishman; and until her marriage about four years ago with Mr. Ernest C. Thurston, she lived a quiet and uneventful life in her home in the South of Ireland. Her home is now in London, although she revisits her native land at intervals; it was in the quaint and primitive village of Avonmore that the greater part of The Masquerader was written. It seems surprising that although she was always very fond of reading, the idea of writing had never occurred to her until it was suggested by her husband. The result was her novel, The Circle, which was published about two years ago, and achieved a success rarely won by a fiction. If we take the time that The Circle had the distinctive novelty of being unlike any novel I had ever read. Yet its interest was not confined to the working out of its plot; it had at least two characters of striking personality. Anna Selby, that little white-lipped daughter of an exiled houseman few living in a London slum, who eventually becomes a great actress, and Mrs. Mintered, who had a capacity for exploiting clever people, while never retaining cleanness for herself. The novel had a certain what is significant: "In youth we dream that life is a straight line; later we know it to be a circle in which the present presses on the future, the future on the past." I wish to emphasize the point of this significance, for to understand it is to understand the secret of her compelling power. Mrs. Thurston not only creates in the sense of romantic convention—and she is first and foremost a novelist—and a masterpiece of the sense of fate, of inevitable law, which at the root of it, is a sense of tragedy. It is this recognition of the law of consequences which makes the improbable with an air of experimental philosophy and gives credence and reality for her strange situations. She brings you face to face with an unheard-of scene, most daringly conceived, just to let you see, as it were, how natural and reasonable her characters can act in the circumstances, and what is more surprising, when the reader wins the reader's sympathy and belief in it, although upon reflection he may admit that it could not so have happened in the actual world. But nothing is impossible to the imagination.

It would be unfair to do more than hint at the plot. The pitch of the story lies in its unswerving; in the momentary expectation of the discovery of the game of doubles played by the two men; in the constant anxiety lest the love of the one or the wife of the other should precipitate their ruin; in the suspense which grows stronger as the situation becomes intolerable for the man who is in a false position and who awakes at last to the enormity of his deception. John Chilcote, a rich member of Parliament, with a prospective career, in the very first week through the use of morphia, when he meets John Loder, a journalist who has missed his opportunities, but who is capable of great things, you can see.

It may seem odd to say that the story offers to the reader a glimpse of his wild proposal to change places with him during his morphia periods. They met first in the thick of a London fog. Their voices sounded strangely familiar and alike. A match was struck to light a cigarette.

For a second each stared, blankly at the other's face, suddenly made visible by the light of the fire. The match in the stranger's hand burned down till it scorched his finger, and, feeling the pain, he laughed and lit it.

"I told you nothing," he said. Then he broke off. The circumstances were too odd for ordinary remark.

In case of these two circumstances—these chances that seem too odd for credence, and yet belong to no other sphere—the two men are strangely hidden and so strangely revealed were identical before for future. It seemed to each man that he looked, not at the face of another, but at his own face reflected in a feature looking glass.

The scheme which Chilcote subsequently hatched worked admirably. But on the very threshold Loder encountered difficulties and Mrs. Thurston does not dodge them. There is Chilcote's wife, for one, and an old flame of Loder's for another. Eve Chilcote is a highly dramatic figure, subtly drawn, and a woman of subtle emotions who finds at last in the man she mistakes for her husband the realization of her fondest dreams. The plot becomes tangled, and the score is laid for Loder's feet, and that of the woman who, too late, finds out that she has been deceived by her husband. The next must be left to the reader. Suffice it to say that in The Masquerader I can promise the reader one of the most absorbing and exciting novels he has read for many a year and day.

KATHERINE CECIL THURSTON, AUTHOR OF THE NEW NOVEL,
"THE MASQUERADER"

Katherine Cecil Thurston's new novel, "The Masquerader," which has just been published, is already the most-talked-of novel of the year. For a description of the story and a note on its author the reader is referred to the article by Mr. James MacArthur on the opposite page of this issue of the "Weekly."

The Men who Made New York's New Subway

By A. B. Boardman

MORE than a decade ago it was obvious, if not to the public generally, at least to those who had given special attention to the subject, that the growth of the city of New York, past and prospective, made subways absolutely necessary in the near future. Manhattan Island is in the form of a horseshoe, the more important business being concentrated near the southern end. This conformation, as the population of the city increases, makes the transit problem an extremely difficult one to solve. It is idle to talk of establishing, at least for a long time, a collection of centers north of Canal Street comparable in importance with those established in the territory south of that street, where are found the great exchanges, trust companies, banks, insurance companies, and shipping offices. A constantly increasing number of employees must be transported in the morning from their homes in the north to their offices in the south, and must be carried back over the same route in the evening. The people of New York have for a long time been disatisfied with the land equiry of the transit facilities north and south. They have that the opening of the subway now completed will greatly improve these transit facilities and make travel more rapid, as well as more comfortable. But this hope can only be realized to a very limited extent, because statistics prove that during the time that the subway has been building the travel which it was built to ease has increased almost, if not quite, to the full extent of its capacity. Mr. William Gardiner Verneer and others, who have given the subject most careful attention, are of the opinion that if the travel now and done time is to increase in the same ratio during the next decade as it has increased during the last, it will be necessary to add at least one track running north and south each year. In order simply to keep ahead of the procession. In other words, in order simply not to run behind, we must provide for two and one-half new subways or an equal number of tracks on or above the surface during the next decade. As substantially all the streets running north and south are now occupied by the surface lines, and as many cars are run during the busy hours as can be pushed through the mass of other vehicles on the surface, and as the public will probably never permit the construction of elevated railroads in any corner north and south avenue, at least below Central Park, it follows that the New York city authorities must be continually addressing themselves to the task of laying out and constructing or providing for the construction of new subways for passenger traffic. The rapid transit subway now being constructed by the Pennsylvania, New York, and Long Island Railroad Company will necessarily greatly increase the travel upon all the longitudinal lines, and as other internal subways are built and the territory beyond the shore is made more and more an integral part of the city of New York, the transit problem in the city itself will within a time short in the life of a great city require the appropriation of the subsurface in such an extent that it can truthfully be said that there will be one city above the ground and another city under the ground. The importance of this situation to the citizens and taxpayers of New York city can hardly be overestimated. We hear the complaint constantly made that taxes are high here and there will be no more land granted without adequate compensation to the city. The city authorities are now alive to the importance of this question, and we can feel reasonably certain that hereafter no important franchise in the city of New York will be granted without conditions which will, at least to some extent, protect the interests of the city and its taxpayers. Treating the city, therefore, as a mere business enterprise, we find that there will be no use of tremendous importance, which hitherto has been substantially ignored, namely, the productive capacity of the subsurface of our streets and public places.

It may be interesting to recall the history of the effort, which has lasted at least a decade, to provide facilities for the transportation of passengers between the Battery and Harlem in fifteen minutes. Senator Vane-Weir introduced a bill for the appropriation of a rapid transit commission when David B. Hill was Governor. It passed the Senate, but was defeated in the Assembly by a very small margin. Afterwards, the necessary legislation was obtained, and a commission was appointed, which laid out a route, including Broadway, and attempted to sell the franchise at public auction. Up in this time the feature of municipal ownership had not become part of the law. The attempt to sell the Broadway franchise failed, partly because of this fact and partly because the financial community had not at that time become sufficiently impressed with the earning capacity of the new transit facilities. The friends of rapid transit were naturally much discouraged. It seemed that nothing effective could be accomplished. When Mayor Hewitt made his great rapid transit address in the Chamber of Commerce, an address which will probably count for more in practical results than any address which was ever made even before that important body, he said, in substance: "We must have subways. Private capital apparently cannot be induced to embark in the enterprise of constructing the first subway, but the city can build and own its own subways, and it will be perfectly safe for the city to undertake such an enterprise, if before commencing construction it has obtained a responsible tenant who will give proper security to operate, by paying a rental sufficient to take care of the interest upon the city bonds issued for construction and furnish a sinking fund to redeem these bonds at maturity." The fact that this solution of the problem now seems to us as an natural ought not to detract in any respect from the credit of the great man who first suggested it. Mr. Hewitt's suggestion was received with enthusiasm—legislative, legal, financial and popular. These obstacles were surmounted one after the other. First, the Legislature was induced to put upon the statute-book the necessary laws; second, the Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of these laws, and its judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals; third, the opposition of the city authorities, which delayed all effective action for a long time, disappeared during the administration of Mayor Van Wyck, and from that time both political parties have vied with each other in pledging in every proper way the solution of the rapid transit problem; fourth, the financial difficulties were swept away by the splendid courage and force, first, of Mr. McDonald, and, second, of Mr. Belmont and his associates.

Will the citizens of New York ever appreciate the work of Mr. Orr and his associates on the Rapid Transit Commission? The space allotted to me permits only a single suggestion in this connection. The rapid transit act necessarily could not be an extraordinary power upon the Rapid Transit Commission. These powers are so far-reaching that it can be said with confidence that no financiers would have dared to contract with the city upon the terms imposed by law if they had not the utmost confidence in the integrity, but in the business capacity and fairness of the Rapid Transit Commission. It is these qualities in the commission and in the engineers selected by it which have made it possible to overcome the financial difficulties which threatened the city of New York the magnificent subway shortly to be opened for public travel, which has been constructed upon such terms and with such guarantees that all the city's bonds issued for its construction will be redeemed out of the interest which the Bureau of some of your readers. The greatest municipal enterprise of modern lines—great not only in itself, but in its effect upon future enterprises—has been brought to fruition antecedently to schedule time, within the engineer's estimate of cost, and without a breath of scandal or a suggestion reflecting in any way upon those upon whom the onerous duty of representing the city has rested. Mr.

A. B. Boardman

August Belmont

John B. McDonald

Gir and his associates will no doubt some day be honored by other monuments, but I have no hesitation in affirming that the subway, the great Pennsylvania tunnel, and the other tunnels which are being built as the result of their efforts will always be the most impressive monuments of their ability and civic virtues.

An English View of the Election

(Continued from page 1654.)

proved upon. The Constitution might in the more enterprising, if it incline on an election being held it ought also to provide an issue to hold it on. That would save a lot of wild and heated and useless argument. When nothing else comes handy why not a good article on "Mark Twain and Christian Science"? The parties would soon line up and everybody would be interested. In New York to-day there are, as far as I can make out, some half-dozen Democratic papers, and they are all busily pummeling not their opponents, but one another in a lifeless effort to find out what the election is all about and if such a thing as an issue really exists. How much better it would be if the Supreme Court were empowered in summer. "The sole issue in this campaign is 'International Law in its relation to Modern Diplomacy.'" Sooner or later I am persuaded that it will have to come to that or something like it. To an outsider like myself, at any rate, the fundamental question connected with the present election is, "Why should there be an election at all?" and to that question I have been unable to find any answer.

I never admire Americans more than during one of these boneless campaigns. They turn to with such hearty good will to manufacture what doesn't exist, and they work with such frantic sincerity to persuade themselves that their really is a why and wherefore for the frenzied conflict in which they are engaged. Among domestic industries in the United States there is none that equals in output the trade in campaign issues. But it is one thing to invent issues and quite another to get them accepted and believed in. And this brings me to the second feature that so amazingly distinguishes American and English politics. In England, if Liberals and Conservatives were set to fight one another at stated intervals, they would not take them long to find something worth fighting about, because in England it is not merely rival organizations that are opposed, but faiths, convictions, habits of mind and temperament, instincts and inclinations, ways of looking at things. But in America the only parties that have any vital beliefs or principles or anything that one could call a political religion are the Prohibitionists and the Populists; and they hardly count. The differences between Democrats and Republicans are, at the utmost, differences of opinion merely, and often not even that. A true description of them would go no further than to say that they are rival electorating bodies. One searches there in vain for anything in the nature of a political creed. There is no such thing as a distinctively Democratic or a distinctively Republican policy. In England every one is conscious of an atmospheric change when a Conservative government succeeds a Liberal or a Liberal a Conservative. No such change is observable in the United States. Take the administrations of the last twenty years, study the legislation passed and the policies pursued by them, and you could not, unless you knew, say offhand and with certainty which were due to the Democrats and which to the Republicans. The two parties have lost everything that we in England consider essential to a party, except office or the hope of it. Their alignment on the questions of the day is purely fortuitous and arbitrary, dictated not by conviction, but simply by a sense, often shrewd, often amazingly so, of electorating needs. It follows that if nature has failed to keep pace with the timetable and to provide an issue for the campaign, the parties are in heretofore incapable of stepping in to make good nature's defects. That does not mean that they will not line up in battle array with leaders and banners all complete, or that they will not pound one another as though something really serious were at stake, but it does mean that the fight between them is at bottom nothing but a faction fight between the lies and the omits, at the bidding, and under the compulsion, of the Constitution.

In such a fight the chances of the issue are always greater than those of the omits, and the Democrats are still further handicapped by not being a political party at all. Nothing in the present campaign has been more forcibly borne in upon me than the fact that the Democrats are an assortment of odds and ends and not a political party. I do not see how they can ever become a political party so long as they depend on the South and the South depends on them. The South, which I find so often spoken of as the seat of Democratic strength, is, in my mind, the source of Democratic weakness. Southerners are Democrats, not positively and inherently, but by the force of reflex action. They are Democrats because they are not Republicans. They are Democrats because the Republicans waged the civil war, were responsible for the horrors of the reconstruction period, and from time to time show a wrong-headed and mischievous form of sympathy with the negroes. That is to say, their allegiance to the Democratic party is determined by the race issue alone, and the race issue has no relation whatever to the politics of the day. High-tariff Southerners and low-tariff Southerners, Southerners who are for gold and Southerners who are for silver, Southerners who are Imperialists and Southerners who are anti-Imperialists, Southerners who stand on every side of every political question, all join the Democratic party because that party is supposed to be sound on the race issue. A more fanatical and unhealthy state of things it would be impossible to conceive, and so long as it obtains the Democrats can never be anything but a quarrelsome and impotent party, in office or out of it, fundamentally divided among themselves. I see no real future hope for the South, and the race issue has its focus and has learned to look at present-day politics in the light of present-day conditions.

Correspondence

THE COLLEGE MAN IN BUSINESS

CHICAGO, September 25, 1909.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—In your issue of September 12 there appeared an article by Doctor William H. Harper in which he made a plea on behalf of college education for business men, but his statements were so filled with misstatements that I think they ought not to be allowed to pass unchallenged.

This question is one to which I have devoted much time and thought, and having grave doubts as to the ability of a college education for young men who intend pursuing a commercial career, I decided a few years ago to make some inquiries, with the view of ascertaining whether college graduates were looked upon with favor by business men, and how they compared in commercial life with the non-college men.

Naturally, I applied first to the presidents of our principal colleges and universities, feeling that they ought to be able to furnish me tangible evidence on this subject; but while practically all these gentlemen maintained that a college education was beneficial to the young man in business, it transpired that this was simply their abstract opinion, not one of them having made any systematic effort to ascertain the actual facts, or possessing a particle of evidence to support his statement.

I then concluded to take up the matter myself in a thorough manner, and made an exhaustive investigation among all classes of people interested in it, the results of which proved conclusively that the broad and extravagant claims of Dr. Harper and other advocates of colleges were utterly unfounded and incorrect, the truth being that, instead of college men being in demand in business, they were actually shunned by employers when seeking help. The results of my research were published by me in a pamphlet form, for the benefit of all who might be interested in the subject, and I am sending you a copy, in order that you may see the testimony which I gathered and judge for yourself whether it is not convincing.

It is certainly very strange, to say the least, that, with this conclusive evidence before him, Dr. Harper should continue to make these absolutely unsupported statements, knowing, as he must, the disastrous influence which they may have upon many young men who are thereby induced to spend a large amount of time and money in acquiring a college education, only to discover, when too late, that, instead of being a benefit, it is an actual detriment to them.

I am, sir,

R. T. CRANE.

THE SMALL FAMILY MEANS

SALEM, MASS., October 4, 1909.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—The article "A Modern Mother," which recently appeared in your publication under the caption of "The Small Family," to a certain extent deals with a subject which should receive the thoughtful attention of every American who feels an interest in the welfare of our country.

I trust that I may be permitted, with all due deference, to say that, in my opinion, your correspondent is far from right in her conclusion.

"A Modern Mother" decries that many American women are adverse to rearing a family, and suggests that the statements showing that many families from choice limit the number of their offspring are all wrong. A little further on, however, the writer says that one reason for the small family is "the greater feeling of responsibility now felt for providing for a family and the greater requirements of such provision." This latter statement would seem to indicate that some families—those who feel a great responsibility—do limit the number of their children, notwithstanding the writer's preceding statement to the contrary, and I think most well-informed persons will concede the fact that there are parents who do limit the number of their children in much the same way as they limit the number of yards of cloth used for a garment. In many cases they do this "limiting" in order to avoid the old American way of rearing children in accordance with their means and station in life. With children to provide for, where would have to be less expensive apartments, less clothes, less clubs, less fine clothes, and less limitation of the ways of people with money—where the "greater feeling of responsibility." The writer also another reason for the "small family," viz., in other words, the same reason in another form. "Many there are," says the writer, "who from lack of means feel that a crime would be committed if they brought another life into the world." This statement may be true, but let me ask you, does this responsible writer propose to prevent the "crime of bringing another life into the world"? Is it to be understood that your correspondent is advocating a state which in fact is dressed a sufficient cause for dissolution of marriage now?

I am, sir,

ROBERTSON PETERSON.

San MARCO, TEXAS, October 10, 1909.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Perhaps an imperfect sense of humor prevents my seeing that your correspondent, in the issue of October 8, is simply scoffing in his attitude at adoption as the cure for the delinquent children. Yet I do not think he is, neither do I judge that he knows the sacred and elevating part of parenthood.

To think that those denied that blessing can satisfy the longing of their hearts in this satisfactory manner by the adoption of children is certainly fallacious. To think that by so doing they fulfil their duty towards God and man is equally so. Possibly an adopted child may in the lives of its foster-parents as to come them to fancy their duty done and their longing satisfied; but that it is rarely a securing over will be realized and should as all wise Providence send them children afterwards.

During the last and most wholesome parts of such nation's life parenthood has been a mark of honor, respect, and distinction, a badge of those strong inherent virtues that led men upward and upward. With decrease in the family and the growing extinction of the home life has come decay and loss of those sterling virtues that make for national strength.

I am, sir,

COLEMAN YOUNG.

CERTAINLY

NEW YORK CITY, October 7, 1909.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Although my subscription to your paper does not expire for several months, I had no further use for a sheet which I read us against the best and patriotic interests of this country. When I left Granite, Idaho, some weeks since, I told a neighbor of mine there that he and his friends could have my paper, which will amount to $10.00.

It writes me urging that I have the sheet "discontinued," as they desire to receive a publication filled with such sentiments at looks upon the President, under whom administration the country has been so prosperous, and when the good people of Idaho will heavily help to elect by the overwhelming majority be so rarely deserves.

I was about to ask you to put the remainder of my subscription in the waste-basket, but an old friend of mine—now my guest—says: "Tell them they have very good pictures, which will amuse me, and I will take good care not to waste my time on the reading matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY, which has degenerated into such an unfair publication, so they can send the remainder of your subscription to me."

You will therefore, please, henceforth forward no more numbers to

Mrs. Abide C. Morrison,

Granite, Idaho.

but instead to

Mrs. F. A. Malloy,

32 Riverside Drive, New York City.

I am, sir,

ABIDE C. MORRISON.

TWO LETTERS FROM EDITORS

PHILADELPHIA, October 11, 1909.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—I take this opportunity to congratulate you upon the editorial work in HARPER'S WEEKLY. I read it with very much pleasure each week.

I had the pleasure of meeting one of the representatives of your office the other day, and I told him that it seemed to me you strike the independent note more happily and cleverly than any daily newspaper in the country. I certainly derive much satisfaction in perusing your editorial columns.

I am, sir,

GEORGE W. LINTS,

Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Boston, October 8, 1909.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—I want to compliment you on the splendid work that you are doing in HARPER'S. It is strong, brilliant, and interesting.

I am, sir,

CHARLES H. TAYLOR,

Boston Globe.

AN EXTRAORDINARY PROFESSOR

NEW YORK, September 1, 1909.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—I am a student of August 1909 on an editorial paragraph as to the concern of President Roosevelt for his figure, and containing the following generalization: "No man who doesn't smoke can drink milk and get or get thin." From the context I am somewhat uncertain whether this is meant seriously. If it is, you may be interested to know that I am sixty-three years old and feel as well as high; have always been unusually tall and strong; have never smoked, and served through the civil war without drinking whiskey; yet never have I weighed over 135 pounds. I was brought up on milk, and never drink water when I can get it. I do not want to be named in this connection, but you are welcome to quote my statements as from a college professor.

I am, sir,

R. W.

PERHAPS

NORTHAMPTON, MASS., October 2, 1909.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—I am a young man, and will cast my first vote in the coming Presidential election. My father is a Democrat, as was his father and grandfather. He will vote for Parker. Notwithstanding this, he has told me that, if he was a young man, he would vote the Republican ticket. What reason he has for this I do not know, but I am brought up on milk, and never drink water when I can get it. I do not want to be named in this connection, but you are welcome to quote my statements as from a college professor.

I am, sir,

PERHAPS.

THE SPELLBINDER

By Joseph A. Altsheler

WHEN the special train, bearing the Presidential nominee, made its great leap down through Wyoming and Nebraska, into the central regions of Kansas, where the land rolls away like the waves of the sea and is covered in dense masses with fields of grain, they came into a country abounding in men, and passed little towns, which rose quickly one after another from the prairie.

"And this is Kansas, the home of cranks," said Churchill. "I think it is a good thing for a State to have cranks," said Harley. "It indicates thought and an attempt to solve important problems. Every tree that bears much fruit has some good mixed with the bad."

"Simon beautifully metaphorical and allegorical we are becoming!" exclaimed Churchill.

Harley made no rejoinder—he had grown used to Churchill's cynicism, and returned to his old task of watching the people, who were an unending source of interest to him. He had early noticed the difference between the East and the West. The West, wholly detached from the Old World, while the East was not, put its stamp upon its new inhabitants much more quickly, and the whole region seemed to him to have a flavor, lacking in the older and denser East. Moreover, there could be no doubt of its democracy, because every day brought new proof—it was as much a part of the people's lives as the pure air of the prairies that flowed through their lungs.

The train was continually thronged with big head politicians and others, anxious to see the candidate, and at a little station in a wheat field that seemed to have no end they picked up three men, one of whom attracted Harley's notice at once. He was young, only twenty-four or five, with a bright, quick, eager face, and he was not dressed in the usual careless Western fashion. His trousers were carefully pressed, his white shirt was well laundered, and his tie was neat. But he wore that strange combination—no so strange west of the Mississippi—a sack coat and a silk hat at the same time.

The youth was not at all shy, and he easily obtained an introduction to Mr. Grayson. Harley thus learned that his name was Moore, Charles Moore, or Charlie, as those with him called him. Most men in the West, unless of special prominence, when presented to Jimmy Grayson merely shook hands, exchanged a word or two in convenient laconic, and then gave way to others, but this fledgling sought to hold him in long converse on the most vital questions of the campaign.

"That was a fine speech of yours you made at Butte, Mr. Grayson," he said in the most impulsive manner, "and I admire every word of it, but are you sure that what you said about Canadian reciprocity will help our party in the great wheat States, such as Minnesota and the Dakotas?"

The candidate smiled at him at first in surprise and some displeasure, but in a moment or two his face was changed into a kindly smile. He read well the youth before him, his amusing confidence, his eagerness, and his self-importance that had not yet revealed a rude character.

"There is something in what you say, Mr. Moore," replied Jimmy Grayson, in the tone absolutely without condescension that made every man his friend, "but I have considered it, and I think it is better for me to stick in my neck. Besides, I am right, you know."

"Ah, yes, but that is not the point," exclaimed young Mr. Moore. "One may be right, but one also might keep silent on a doubtful point that is likely to influence many votes. And there are several things in your speeches, Mr. Grayson, with which some of us do not agree. I shall have occasion to address the public concerning them, so you know a number of us are to speak with you while you are passing through Kansas."

There was a flash in Jimmy Grayson's eye, but Harley could not tell whether it expressed anger or amused contempt. It was gone in a moment, however, and the candidate was again looking at the fledgling with a kindly, smiling, and tolerant gaze. But Churchill had thrust his elbow against Harley.

"Ah, the child of the fine and beautiful West!" he murmured. "What innocence and what a sense of modesty and power!"

Harley did not deign a reply, but he made the acquaintance by and by of the men who had joined the train with Moore, two of them was a country judge named Hensley, sensible and middle-aged, and he talked freely about the fledgling, whom he seemed to have, in a measure, on his mind. He laughed at first when he spoke of the subject, but he soon became serious.

"Charlie is a good hog," he said, "but what do you think he is, or, rather, what do you think he thinks he is?"

"I don't know," replied Harley.

"Charlie thinks he is a spellbinder, the greatest ever. He's dreaming by night, and by day too, that he's the West's most wonderful orator, and that he's to swing the thousands with his words. He's coming Henry Clay and Daniel Webster rolled into one. He's read that story about Demosthenes holding the pebble in his mouth, to make himself talk good, and they do say that he signs away out on the prairie, where there's nobody about, and, with a stone in his mouth, tries to beat the old Greek at his own game. I don't touch for the truth of the story, but I believe it."

Harley could not keep from smiling at this.

"Well, it's at least an honest ambition," he said.

"I don't know about that," replied the judge, doubtfully, "not in Charlie's case, because as a spellbinder he isn't worth shaking. He can't speak, and he'll never learn to do it. Besides, he's leaving a thing he was just made for to chase a raincoat, and it's breaking his old daddy's heart."

"What is it that he was made for?"

"He's a born telegraph operator. He's one of the best ever known in the West. They say that at eighteen he was the swiftest in Kansas. Then he went down to Kansas City, and he got along great; now he's given up a job that was paying him a hundred and fifty a month to start his own business. He says he's going to be a great inventor, too, and now he's trying to speak or politics, when he doesn't know anything about public questions—and he doesn't know how to talk, either. I don't know whether to be mad about it, or just to feel sorry—because Charlie's father is an old fellow of mine."

Harley shared his feelings. He had seen the mound peg in the square hole so many times, with head counts to both the peg and the hole, that every fresh instance grieved him. He was also confirmed in the soundness of Judge Russell's opinion by his observation of young Moore, as the journey proceeded. The new spellbinder was anxious to speak, whenever there was an occasion, and often when there was none at all. The disconcertment and sea and then the open rebukes of his elders could not suppress him. The correspondents, comparing notes, decided that they had never before seen so strong a rage for speaking. He took the whole field of public affairs for his range. He was willing at any time to discuss the tariff, internal revenue, finance, and foreign relations, and attested himself master of all. Yet Harley saw that he was in these affairs a perfect child, shallow and superficial, and depending wholly upon a few catchwords that he had learned from others. Even the future Populists turned from him. Yet their more faces when he spoke brought him nothing. He was still, to himself, the great spellbinder, and he looked inward to the day when he would be a means for the President, and would change the attitudes with his eloquence and logic. He had no hesitation in confiding his hopes to Harley, and the correspondent longed to tell him how he misjudged himself, yet he refrained, knowing that it was not his duty; and that even if it were, his words would make an impression.

But in other matters than those of public life and oratory Jimmy Grayson's people found young Moore likely enough. He was helpful on the grain, new machinery, and the Canadian operators (and even material) than they could handle he gave them valuable aid; he was a fine comrade, taking good luck and bad luck with equal philosophy and never complaining. "It only he wouldn't try to speak to me," (Robert) for whom he sent a telegraphic message with skill and dispatch.

But that very afternoon Moore talked to them on the subject of national finance until they fell into a cage and left the car. The result was that Harley was the candidate's operator when an old man, bent of figure and gloomy of face, came to him.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Grayson," he said, "for intruding on you, but I've come to ask a favor. I'm Henry Moore, of Council Grove, the father of Charlie Moore, who was the best telegraph

(Continued on page 1662.)

Progress of Science

An Ocean Race for Motor-Boats

With the increased interest taken recently in high-speed motor-boats comes the question of the greater range of usefulness for these craft, and especially their availability for crossing the Atlantic Ocean. For a prize of $20,000 offered in Paris for the first motor-boat to cross the Atlantic there have been seven entries, and races will soon be formulated for the contest, which, it is hoped, will take place in the coming year. By some authorities it is claimed that motor-boats have already reached a state of development sufficient to warrant the undertaking of an ocean trip, while, in the opinion of others, some further improvements are needed before it can be essayed in safety. In the ocean race it is intended to have supplies of petroleum along the route, as each boat will require between four and seven gallons of this fuel on the trip. Since it would hardly be possible to carry more than 200 to 300 gallons on each boat, they will be supplied from steamers or yachts specially chartered, which will meet them at certain appointed places. The vessels intended for the race are to generate high speed, and it is the hope of some of the enthusiasts that a rate of fifty miles an hour can be secured eventually, if the rate of progress is as great as with automobile vehicles. It must be understood that the project is confined to high-speed boats. A practical testing of this department of naval architecture is thought to be in the construction of high-power automobile life-boats, which would be especially valuable in case of accident, as they could travel into the most perilous routes of the ocean, or to a neighboring coast, at a speed of from twelve to twenty-five miles an hour to secure aid.

A New Multiplex Telegraph

The invention of new methods for sending a number of messages simultaneously over the same wire continues, and one of the most recent of these is due to Professor Mercadier, of the French High School for Post and Telegraph. In this method an alternating current is employed, whose frequency depends upon a tuning-fork having a certain definite number of vibrations. The current of such an interrupted circuit can be broken by an ordinary key, and signals transmitted over the line wire by an induction transmitter. On the line at the distant station are a number of coiled wire-telephones which respond to current of one frequency, and are tuned in the forks in the circuit at the sending station. Thus each particular circuit has its own telephone, which is connected by lines with the ears of the receiving operator, and responds to the signals made at the sending station. In all, twelve transmission circuits are provided, so that twenty-four messages may be sent over the line simultaneously. A double line, or metallic circuit, is required, but otherwise the apparatus is comparatively simple, and involves merely the adjustment of the tuning forks and suitable transformers and induction coils. It has been tested on the line between Paris and Dijon, and also between Toulouse and Bordeaux, and has worked with marked success.

Testing Cables by Roentgen Rays

A novel application of the Roentgen rays to the testing of submarine cables has recently been made in Europe, and has been found useful in determining defects and imperfections which might cause a breakdown of the cable and involve considerable expense for repairs. The apparatus consists of a Roentgen-ray tube, above which is a fluorescent screen, while the cable to be tested is passed through guides just below, so that a shadow is cast on the screen. The cable is allowed to run through the testing apparatus, and the observer looks for any indication of a fault in the shadow. Foreign substances, air bubbles or bad joints in the rubber or gutta-percha insulation are readily detected, and may be rectified at the works. Imperfections of this kind can remain unnoticed by other tests, and a cable with such imperfections may be laid on the sea bottom at great expense, and be abandoned for a number of years before it will fail.

1854-1904

WALTHAM WATCHES

ALWAYS FAITHFUL

In 1876 a WALTHAM watch movement was pronounced by the Swiss Commissioner at our Centennial Exhibition to be so superior that not one of 50,000 Swiss watches could compare with it. Today WALTHAM watches are better than ever.

For sale by all Jewelers

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY,
WALTHAM, MASS.

A KEYSTONE OF EMPIRE

By the Author of "The Martyrdom of an Empress," "A Dotted Coronet," etc.
Illustrated from Private Drawings and Photographs. Crown 8vo, Ornamented Cloth, Docket Edges.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

THE EQUITABLE

HENRY RANTO
PRESIDENT

J.W. ALEXANDER
VICE PRESIDENT

J.H. HYDE
VICE PRESIDENT

HARNESS THE POWER!

Why not utilize that part of your income now going to waste? By taking an Endowment policy in the Equitable you will protect your family and provide for your own mature years.

Spendthrift accumulates the sum of character to act as representative
Write to C.A.G. TARRILL, Vice-President

For full information fill out this coupon, or write

THE EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES
120 Broadway, New York Dep. No. 21

Please send me information regarding an Endowment for $. . . If I have it . . . years of age.

Name, Address,

(Continued from page 605.)

operator in Kansas City, and who is now the poorest public speaker in Kansas.

The old man smiled, but it was a sad smile. Jimmy Grayson was full of sympathy, and he shook Mr. Moore's hand warmly.

"I know your son," he said—"a bright boy."

"Yes, he's nothing but a boy," said his father, as if seeking an excuse. "I suppose all boys must have their foolish spells, but he appears to have his tricky hand and long."

The old man sighed, and the look of sympathy on Jimmy Grayson's face deepened.

"Charlie is a good boy," continued Mr. Moore, "and if he could have this foolish spell knocked out of his head—there's no other way to get it out—he would be all right, and that's why I've come to you. You know you are to speak at Topeka tomorrow night, in a big hall, and one of the biggest crowds in the West will be there to hear you. Two or three speakers are to follow you, and what do you think that sign of mine has done? Somehow or other he has got the committee to put him on the programme right after you, and he says he is going to demolish what he calls your fallacies."

Harley saw the Candidate's lips curve a little as if he were about to smile, but the movement was quickly checked. Jimmy Grayson would not willingly hurt the feelings of any man.

"Your boy has that right!" he said to Mr. Moore.

"No, he hasn't!" burst out the old man. "A boy hasn't any right to be so light-headed, and I want you, Mr. Grayson, when he has finished his speech, to come right back at him and wipe him off the face of the earth. It will be an easy thing for me to hit a man as you do. Charlie doesn't know a thing about public affairs. He'll make a lot of statements, and every one of 'em will be wrong. Just show him up! Make all the people laugh at him! Just sting him with your words until he turns red in the face! Roll him in the dust and tread on him till he can't breathe! Then hold him up before all that audience as the biggest and the wildest fool that ever came on a stage. Nothing else will cure him; it will be a favor to him and to me, and I, who love him more than anybody else, ask you to do it!"

Harley was tempted to smile, and at the same moment tears came into his eyes. No one could fail to be moved by the old man's intense earnestness, his fervid and mixed language, and his appealing look. Certainly Jimmy Grayson was an exception. He glanced at Harley, and saw his expression of sympathy, but the correspondent made no suggestion.

"I appreciate your feelings and your position, Mr. Moore," he said, "but this is a hard thing that you ask me to do. I cannot tempt upon a boy, even metaphorically, in the presence of five thousand people. What would they think of me?"

"They'll understand. They'll know why it's done, and they'll like you for it. It's the only way, Mr. Grayson! Either you do it or my boy's life is ruined!"

Jimmy Grayson walked up and down the room and his face was troubled. He looked again and again at Harley, but the correspondent made no suggestion. At last he stopped.

"I think I can save you son, and promise to make the trial, but I will not say a word more at present. Now don't ask me anything about it, and never mind the thanks—I understand; maybe I shall have to bring you myself some day to be turned from the wrong path. Good night. I'll see you again at Topeka, Harley. I wish you would stay a while longer. I want to have further talk with you."

The Candidate and Harley were in deep converse for some time, and when they finished much of the trouble had disappeared from Jimmy Grayson's eyes.

"I think it can be done," he said.

"So do I," repeated Harley, with confidence.

The next day, which was occupied with the run down to Topeka and occasional stops for speeches at stage stations, was uneventful save for the growing obscenity of Charlie Moore. He was overbearing with pride and impatience. That night in the presence of five thousand people he was going to reply to the great Jimmy Grayson, and to show to them and to him his errors. Mr. Grayson was seated in most things, but there were several in which he should be set right, and he, Charlie Moore, was the man to do it for him. He was suppressed, however, for a few moments only, and then said them over again to the others.

The declining proudly produced several printed programmes with his name next to that of the Candidate, and talked to the correspondents of the main points that he would make, until they fled into the next car. But he followed them there, and asked them if they would not like to take in advance a synopsis of his speech in order that they might be sure to telegraph it to their offices in time.

All evaded the hour except Harley, who gravely jotted down the synopsis, and, with equal gravity, returned his thanks for Mr. Moore's consideration.

"I knew you wouldn't want to miss it," said the youth: "I come on late, you know, and besides, I remembered that the difference in time between here and New York is against us."

Mr. Moore, the father, was on the train throughout the day, but he did not speak to his son. He spent his time in the car in which Jimmy Grayson sat, always silent, but always looking with approval and pathos at the great leader. His eyes shined. "Mr. Grayson, you will not fail me, will you? You will save my son! You will beat him and tread on him until he hasn't left a single thought of being a famous orator and public leader! Then he will return to the work for which God made him."

Harley would look at the old man a while, and then return to the next car, where the youth was chattering away to those who could not escape him.

The speech in Topeka was to be of the intended longer than the one at the next car, where the youth was chattering away to those who could not escape him.

The speech in Topeka was to be of the intended longer than the one at the next car, where the youth was chattering away to those who could not escape him.

The audience gathered early, and it was a splendid Western crowd, big-hearted and tanned with the Western winds.

He launched upon a speech for which the whole Union was waiting

"They have cranks out here, but it's a land of strong men, don't you forget that!" said Hazley to Churchill, and Churchill did not attempt a sarcastic reply.

They were both sitting at the edge of the stage, and in front of them, near the footlights, was young Moore, proud and eager, his fingers moving nervously. His father, too, had found a seat on the stage, but he was in the background, next to the scenery, and being behind the others he was not visible from the floor of the house. There he sat, staring gloomily at his son, and now and then, with a sort of despairing hope, at Jimmy Grayson.

There were some short preliminary speeches and introductions, and then came the turn of the Candidate. The usual flutter of expectation ran over the audience, followed by the usual deep hush, but just at that moment there was an interruption. A boy, in the uniform of a telegraph company, hurried upon the stage.

"You must come at once, sir," he said. "Mr. Wyand's horse's turned up! We don't know what's become of him! And Mr. Burr has lost sick, madder and bad. The Tukepa manager says he'll get some one here as quick as he can, but he can't do it under half an hour, anyway!"

The other correspondents stared at each other in dismay, and then at the hired stage-driver who was to take them to the speech in full. But Hazley, always thoughtful and resourceful, rose at once to the crisis. He had noticed Moore lift his head with an expression of lively interest at the news of the disaster, and stepping forward at once he put his hand on the boy's shoulder.

"Mr. Moore," he exclaimed, in stirring appeal, "this is a crisis and you must save me! You have eaten with us and you have lived with us, and you can't desert us now! We have all heard that you are a great operator, the greatest in the West! You must take Mr. Grayson's speech! What a triumph it will be for you to send what he says and then set upon the stage and demolish it afterwards!"

The feeling in Hazley's voice was real, and the boy was thrilled by it, and the admiration every natural impulse in him responded. It was the chivalrous thing for him to do, and on every one. He could send a speech as fast as the fastest man living could deliver it. He rose without a word, his heart thrilling with thoughts of the coming battle, in which he felt proudly that he would be a victor, and made his way to the telegrapher's box.

Moore was a Tukepa boy, and nearly everybody in the audience knew him. When they saw him take his seat at one of the instruments their quick Western minds divined what he was going to do, and the roar of applause that they had just given to the Candidate, who was now on his feet, was succeeded by another, but the second was for Charlie the telegraph operator.

The footlighting had no time to think. He had scarcely settled himself in his chair when the deep, full voice of Jimmy Grayson filled the great hall, and he was launched upon a speech for which the whole nation was waiting. The shorthand man was already deep in his work and the copy began to come. But the boy felt no alarm; he was not even flustered; the feel of the key was good, and the atmosphere of that box which enfolded the telegraph apparatus came sweet to his nostrils. He called up Kansas City, from which the speech would be repeated in the greater cities, and with a sigh of deep satisfaction settled in his task.

They felt yet in Western cities of Charlie Moore's great reputation. The Candidate was in splendid form that night and his speech came rushing forth in a torrent. The mellow Wyand was still missing and the luckless Hazley was still ill, but the shouting out alone in the box, his face bent over the key, oblivious to the world around him, and sent it all. Through him ran the fire of battle and great endeavor. He heard the call and replied. He never missed a word. He sent them hot across the prairie, over the slopes and ridges, and across the muddy Kaw into Kansas City. And there in the general office the manager muttered more than once: "That fellow is doing great work! How he saves time!"

The audience liked Jimmy Grayson's

WINCHESTER

REPEATING RIFLES FOR HUNTING.

Shoot a Winchester once and you will shoot a Winchester always: That's because Winchester rifles after a test of over thirty years represent today in accuracy, reliability and quality, the highest development in gunmaking. Whatever your preferences may be, some one of the nine different Winchester models will surely suit you; for they are made in all calibers, styles and weights. Use Winchester guns for all kinds of shooting and Winchester cartridges for all kinds of guns.

See our Exhibits at St. Louis in Remingtons and Fish and Game Buildings.

WINCHESTER REPEATING ARMS CO.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Read Blaikie's HOW TO GET STRONG and How to Stay So

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

November, 1904

- The "Yellow Peril" Japan's Golden Opportunity, Baron KENTARO KANEKO,
By the House of Peers of Japan.
- Where is Russia to Get Her Next Loan? YVES GUYOT
- International Arbitration Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Attorney-General of Great Britain.
- What Must be Done to Secure Safety on Railroads? JOHN J. ESCH, M.C.
- The Irish Muse.—I. FIONA MACLEOD
- Suicide and Life Insurance W. H. LAWTON
- Sir William Harcourt GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL
- The Self-Supporting Student in American Colleges . Professor O. F. LEWIS
- Alien Colonies and the Children's Court ERNEST K. COULTER
- The Australian Telegraph System HUGH H. LUSK
- Is the Democratic Party Insincere? JOSEPH S. AUERBACH

WORLD POLITICS

London; Berlin; Rome; Washington

50 cents a copy

$5.00 a Year

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

Mme. Schumann-Heink in "Love's Lottery"

Mrs. Schumann-Heink is appearing at the Broadway Theatre in a comic opera entitled "Love's Lottery," by Julius Edwards and Minnie Steiner. The eminent contralto plays the part of "Lea," a German landlady, who becomes involved in comic complications over the winning of a lottery.

A Scene from "Letty," at the Hudson

"Letty," a new play by J. W. Pueris, is on view at the Hudson Theatre, with Miss Carlotta Akeley and William Faversham in the principal roles. The play deals with the struggles against temptation of "Letty," a working girl, and her victory over herself and the man who bears her unworthily.

John Drew in "The Duke of Killcrankie," at the Empire

At the Empire Theatre John Drew is appearing in a comedy by Robert Marshall, "The Duke of Killcrankie," which had a successful run last season in London. Mr. Drew plays the part of the rich peer, who has not prospered in his love for "Lady Henrietta Adham." After she has refused him repeatedly, he conceives the idea of luring her, by a ruse, to his castle in Scotland, and keeping her there until she consents to marry him. aided by an obsequious friend, he puts the scheme into execution; and in the end, after many humorous complications, succeeds in convincing "Lady Henrietta" that she loves him.

PLAYS AND PLAYERS IN NEW YORK

Who Will be the Next President?

A summary of the results in Presidential elections in all States in the Union since 1872, with tables, showing the political situation in detail in States now classed as doubtful by Republicans or Democrats

FOURTEEN States—Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, Texas, Missouri, and Nevada—are certain, according to the records of the past twenty-eight years, to give Democratic pluralities in November next at the Presidential election. The States having a flawless record of Democratic pluralities, 1872-1900, are Georgia, Tennessee, Texas, and Missouri. The only State in the group showing a steady and regular increase in total vote, 1872-1900, is Missouri. During the period 1880-1900, the only breaking away from Democratic pluralities occurred in Kentucky, 1880, and in Nevada, 1884 and 1888. The only split electoral vote is that of Kentucky, 1896.

The "certain" States in the Democratic list above represent 154 electoral votes at the November election of this year. The whole electoral vote of 1904 being 476, and one more than half of that number, 239, being necessary for a choice, it is evident that 82 electoral votes in addition to those of the States mentioned will be necessary for a Democratic victory. If the Democrats carry every State in the above list, which is highly probable, and can carry New York (36 electoral votes), New Jersey (12), Connecticut (7), Indiana (15), Montana (3), Idaho (3), and Maryland (8), they will win and have 206 electoral votes to spare. If, on the other hand, they lose the eastern and middle group of "doubtful" States, as shown in the following tables, saving only Maryland and Delaware (3), they will need the electoral votes of West Virginia (7), Indiana (15), Illinois (27), Wisconsin (13), North Dakota (4), Montana (3), Colorado (3), and Idaho (3), to win.

On the other hand, sixteen States—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, Wyoming, Washington, and Oregon—are certain, according to the record of twenty-eight years (1872-1900), to give Republican pluralities in November. There is absolutely no flaw in the record of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Iowa, and Minnesota. Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Ohio, and Iowa show a steady increase in total vote for the whole period, 1872-1900. The pluralities fluctuate throughout. A noticeable feature of the total vote is the heavy McKinley pluralities of 1896 and 1900 as compared with the pluralities of previous years. Kansas broke away twice from the Republican column. Nebraska, South Dakota, Wyoming, Washington, and Oregon have each dropped out of line once in the record of twenty-eight years. The only splits in the electoral vote were in Ohio, Michigan, and Oregon in 1902.

The "certain" States in the Republican list above represent 163 electoral votes at the November election of this year. The whole electoral vote of 1904 being 476, and one more than half of that number, 239, being necessary for a choice, it is evident that 76 electoral votes in addition to those of the States above mentioned will be necessary in order to secure a Republican victory. If the Republicans carry every State in the above list, which is highly probable, and can carry New York (36 electoral votes), New Jersey (12), and Illinois (27), they will win with two votes to spare. If, on the other hand, New York and New Jersey swing in the opposite direction, it will be necessary to supplement the electoral vote of Illinois with those of Connecticut (7), West Virginia (7), California (10), Wisconsin (13), North Dakota (4), Colorado (3), Delaware (3), and Utah (3). As Connecticut usually goes in the same direction as New York and New Jersey, and no Indiana is likely to vote as New York votes, according to the record, the odds of lacking up the necessary number would fall on Maryland, which is inclined, at this writing, toward the Democratic column.

With this record of "certain" States, and with the complete record and analysis given in the following pages of the Presidential, Congressional, State and county votes in the so-called "doubtful" States during the past twenty-eight years, many interesting combinations of possible victories in November can be readily worked out.

EASTERN STATE CONNECTICUT

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900	1904
Total vote (thousands)*	107	142	132	237	154	165	174	180
Plurality (thousands)	4 R	3 D	2 R	1 D	200 R	5 D	104 R	104 R
Electoral vote	4 R	3 D	2 R	1 D	10 R	3 D	10 R	10 R
U. S. Congress	1890-92	1902-04	1904-06	State Legislatures						1908-10	1910-12	1912-14	1914-16
Term, two years	R	D	4	4	5	Term, two years	R	D	20	1892	1896	2000	2004	2008
Total	4	4	4	5	Total	24	24	24	24	24	24	24	24	24
For Governor	1898	1900	1902
Term, two years	Thousands														Other elections, 1880-1904.—None.
Total vote	158	181	100
Plur.	32 R	14 R	10 R

Electoral Vote, 1904

7

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

Although the record of Connecticut, in the matter of Presidential vote, 1872-1900, shows a number of deviations, a careful study of the State situation reveals a Republican tendency.

The Republican pluralities in 1896 and 1900 greatly exceeded any plurality recorded at the eight Presidential contests immediately preceding. It is also a notable fact that the Congressional representation, both in Senate and House, has been wholly Republican since 1894. Several contests are probable for the House representation in the Fifty-ninth Congress. Each of the last three Republican members for the thirteenth, as may be seen in the accompanying table, received pluralities exceeding 14,000. The record of the State Legislature, 1890-1904, shows, in the Senate, a Republican majority never less than twelve, and in the House a Republican majority averaging over one hundred.

Record of and Variations in County Vote.

The county vote at Presidential Elections, 1872-1900, shows three counties out of eight as giving R pluralities during the whole period. Two counties have a similar record, except for 1872 and 1894. Three counties, voting D in 1872, voted R in 1896 and 1900. Every county in the State gave an R plurality in 1896 and 1900.

* Where a total vote or plurality includes any number of hundreds over five, another thousand is added. To illustrate: The total vote of New York State for President, 1872, was 825,072. In the proper column in these tables, under Total Vote, 1872, the number is given as 825 (thousands).
† Where a plurality is less than 1000, the exact number is given.

MIDDLE STATES
NEW YORK

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900
Total vote (thousands)	520	501	511	524	532	536	549	556
Plurality (thousands)	102	27	14	24	0	1	15	10
Electoral vote	55	55	55	55	55	55	55	55
U. S. Congress	1899-1900	1901-2	1902-3	1903-4	1904-5	1905-6	1906-7	1907-8
Term, two years	R 16 D 18	R 21 D 13	R 20 D 17	R 20 D 17	R 20 D 17	R 20 D 17	R 20 D 17	R 20 D 17
For Governor	1898	1900	1902	1904	1906	1908	1910	1912
Term, two years	Total 1714 18 R	Total 1714 18 R	Total 1714 18 R	Total 1714 18 R	Total 1714 18 R	Total 1714 18 R	Total 1714 18 R	Total 1714 18 R

Electoral Vote, 1904

39

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

The fluctuations in the annual pluralities of New York State are proverbial. It is interesting to note, 1872-1900, that the Republican pluralities became smaller after the Democratic victories of 1876 and 1884. Again, in 1900, the Republican plurality was reduced nearly one-half, although the total vote that year showed an increase over the total vote, in 1896, of more than 100,000.

The Congressional representation this year, as in 1895-96, is fairly even. There are several "doubtful" districts to compete for supremacy. In November, they may affect four Democratic and two Republican constituencies so materially as to alter the political complexion of the majority.

The greatly reduced Republican plurality for Governor in 1902, and the falling away of the total vote, as compared with 1896, to the extent of over 150,000, is partly explained by the fact that 1900 was a Presidential year.

A general survey of the record seems to fully justify the use of the term "doubtful" in each of the phases of current political interest.

Record of and Variations in County Vote.

The county vote at Presidential elections, 1872-1900, shows 34 counties out of 61 as giving R pluralities regularly during the whole period. Only one county has a similar D record.

Five counties giving D pluralities in 1888 and 1892 gave R pluralities in 1896 and 1900.

Six counties giving D in 1892 gave R pluralities at the last two elections.

Three counties favoring McKinley in 1896 gave Bryan a plurality in 1900.

In size of Republican pluralities, 1872-1900, 5 counties—then Dutchess, Westchester, Albany, and Orange—gave R pluralities exceeding 2500 at every election. Twelve other counties gave R pluralities exceeding 1000 regularly at every election, 1872-1900.

NEW JERSEY

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900
Total vote (thousands)	180	220	236	262	266	278	301	400
Plurality (thousands)	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Electoral vote	9	9	9	9	9	9	9	9
U. S. Congress	1901-2	1903-4	1905-6	1907-8	1909-10	1911-12	1913-14	1915-16
Term, two years	R 6 D 2	R 6 D 2	R 6 D 2	R 6 D 2	R 6 D 2	R 6 D 2	R 6 D 2	R 6 D 2
For Governor	1895	1897	1901	1905	1909	1913	1917	1921
Term, three years	Total 207 21 R	Total 207 21 R	Total 207 21 R	Total 207 21 R	Total 207 21 R	Total 207 21 R	Total 207 21 R	Total 207 21 R

Electoral Vote, 1904

12

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

Notwithstanding the array of Democratic pluralities at Presidential elections in New Jersey, 1872-1900, there is but scant indication, especially during the past five or six years, of any leaning in the direction of Democratic supremacy.

The pluralities in favor of McKinley, 1900 and 1904, are many times greater than the pluralities recorded in the State at any preceding Presidential election between 1876 and 1896.

Both United States Senators from New Jersey are Republicans. At each of the last three elections for Congress, twice as many Republicans as Democrats were elected. There will be some doubt as to whether in three Democratic districts this year, but the outcome is not at all certain to bring about a change in the complexion of the majority.

The last two Republican candidates for Governor were accorded pluralities, that given in 1891 being substantial and a marked increase over the one preceding.

Both Senate and Assembly in the State Legislature, 1902-4, have had considerable Republican majorities.

Record of and Variations in County Vote.

The county vote at Presidential elections, 1872-1900, shows 7 counties out of 21 as giving R pluralities regularly during the whole period. Two counties have a similar D record.

Four counties, giving D pluralities in 1880 and 1892, gave R pluralities in 1896 and 1900. Three counties, giving Cleveland a plurality in 1892, voted for McKinley in 1896 and 1900. Two counties changed from R to D in 1900.

MARYLAND

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900
Total vote (thousands)	144	163	175	186	211	213	254	265
Plurality (thousands)	40	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Electoral vote	8	8	8	8	8	8	8	8
U. S. Congress	1901-2	1903-4	1905-6	1907-8	1909-10	1911-12	1913-14	1915-16
Term, two years	R 4 D 2	R 4 D 2	R 4 D 2	R 4 D 2	R 4 D 2	R 4 D 2	R 4 D 2	R 4 D 2
For Governor	1903	1905	1907	1909	1911	1913	1915	1917
Term, four years	Total 10 R	Total 10 R	Total 10 R	Total 10 R	Total 10 R	Total 10 R	Total 10 R	Total 10 R

Electoral Vote, 1904

8

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

The recent political record of Maryland shows a decided Democratic trend.

The Republican plurality, Presidential election, 1900, was considerably less than one-half of the Republican plurality, 1896, although there was an increase of 14,000 in the total vote for the latter year.

Two seats in the National House of Representatives were gained for 1903-4, and the present campaign will include a lively contest, having in view the gaining of at least two more for the Democrats. The Democratic nominees for Governor, 1899 and 1903, secured substantial pluralities, a gain of 10,000 being recorded in 1903, although the total vote was over 33,000 less than was cast for Governor in 1899.

The State Legislature, 1903-4, shows a marked increase in Democratic membership over that of 1901-2, the gain being 2 in the Senate and 20 in the House.

DELAWARE

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1902	1906	1910
Total vote (thousands)	22	24	29	30	30	27	31	32
Plurality (thousands)	1221	0	3	0	0	2	1	1
Electoral vote	3	3	3	3	3	3	3	3
U. S. Congress	1899-1900	1901-2	1903-4	State Legislature
Term, two years	R	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Term, four years	D	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Total	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
For Governor	1898	1900	1902	Other Elections
Term, two years	R	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Term, four years	D	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Total	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
For Governor	1898	1900	1902	Other Elections
Term, two years	R	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Term, four years	D	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Total	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	1

Electoral Vote, 1904

3

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

The Presidential voting record of Delaware, 1872-1902, indicated a Democratic tendency. Conditions, in some respects abnormal, have existed since that time, the dispute of factions rendering results at all elections uncertain. It may be noted, on reference to the table, that the Democratic plurality decreased in 1888 and again in 1902, although the total vote in this latter year showed an increase of 1000.

The present representation in the United States Senate is Republican. The Congressional representative is a Democrat elected by a plurality of over 5000, but it should be borne in mind that when this election took place (1902) the Republicans had a "split" ticket in the field.

It will be observed that the present Governor's plurality, Republican, was equal to that of his predecessor, a Democrat.

The Republican nominee for State Treasurer, 1902, secured a plurality of over 4000.

The State Legislature, 1903-1904, records Republican majorities in Senate and House, the majority in 1903-4 being an increase over the preceding term.

Record of and Variations in County Vote.

The county vote at Presidential elections, 1872-1902, shows that Kent and Newcastle counties, voting D in 1880 and 1892, voted in favor of McKinley in 1900 and 1904. Essex County, which gave a D plurality in 1884, changed to R in 1888, again went D in 1892, and in 1900 and 1904 favored McKinley.

SOUTHERN STATE WEST VIRGINIA

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1902	1906	1910
Total vote (thousands)	52	52	112	112	119	111	106	221
Plurality (thousands)	2	12	1	1	1	1	1	1
Electoral vote	3	3	3	3	3	3	3	3
U. S. Congress	1899-1900	1901-2	1903-4	State Legislature
Term, two years	R	3	4	5	5	5	5	5
Term, four years	D	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Total	4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4
For Governor	1892	1900	1904	Other Elections
Term, two years	R	3	4	5	5	5	5	5
Term, four years	D	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Total	4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4
For Governor	1892	1900	1904	Other Elections
Term, two years	R	3	4	5	5	5	5	5
Term, four years	D	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Total	4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4

Electoral Vote, 1904

7

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

West Virginia, at the Presidential elections, 1872-1902, presented a solid Democratic front. Swinging into the Republican column in 1900 and 1904, the record shows a much larger Republican plurality at the last election than had been cast for any Democratic candidate during the preceding twenty-eight years.

The Congressional representation, including United States Senate and House, is Republican, and has been so during the past four years. This year, at an outcome of the election of a Democratic nominee from this State for Vice-President the Democrats are hopeful of a gain to them in three, if not four, districts.

The vote for Governor, 1892-1904, shows two substantial Republican pluralities.

Two years ago there was a Democratic majority of 7 in the lower branch of the State Legislature. This year there is a Republican majority of 26.

Record of and Variations in County Vote.

The county vote at Presidential elections, 1872-1900, shows 16 counties out of 35 as giving a D plurality regularly during the whole period. Nine counties have a similar R record. Seven counties, voting D in 1880 and 1892, gave R pluralities in 1900 and 1904. Six counties, voting R in 1880, 1892, and 1904, voted R in 1900. 23 counties gave Bryan a plurality. Of these, 6 went to McKinley in 1904.

WESTERN STATES INDIANA

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1902	1906	1910
Total vote (thousands)	351	431	471	495	577	554	617	694
Plurality (thousands)	21	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Electoral vote	3	3	3	3	3	3	3	3
U. S. Congress	1899-1900	1901-2	1903-4	State Legislature
Term, two years	R	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Term, four years	D	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Total	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
For Governor	1892	1900	1904	Other Elections
Term, two years	R	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Term, four years	D	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Total	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
For Governor	1892	1900	1904	Other Elections
Term, two years	R	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Term, four years	D	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Total	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0

Electoral Vote, 1904

15

'SERPENT'S TOOTH!'

-Annals of a Business Governor

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

Alteration of Republican and Democratic pluralities, 1872-1906, is the conspicuous feature of Indiana Presidential campaigns. The Republican plurality of 1900 was larger than any Presidential plurality given to either party in the State during the preceding fifty years.

The battle for supremacy in Congress, under Taggart's leadership, will be keen. Four, if not five, of the districts are shakable territory and very uncertain. The members of the United States Senate are both Republicans. The Republican candidates for Governor, 1896 and 1900, received substantial pluralities. The same is true of the Republican candidate for Secretary of State, 1902.

There has been a practical working Republican majority, 1890-1904, in both branches of the State Legislature.

Record of and Variations in County Vote.

Thirty-one counties out of 92 in Indiana, 1872-1900, gave R Presidential pluralities regularly during the whole period. Twenty-three counties have a similar R record. Eight counties gave D pluralities, 1872-1900. Five counties, giving D pluralities in 1884 and 1892, changed to R in 1900 and 1904. Twelve counties changed sides in 1896. Eight of these variations were from D to R; the remainder from R to D. In 1896, 43 counties gave Bryan a plurality. Seven of these counties changed to McKinley in 1900.

ILLINOIS

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900
Total vote (thousands)	459	554	622	674	748	874	1001	1132
Plurality (thousands)	54	10	20	11	25	11	142	155
Electoral vote	21	11	11	21	22	11	24	24
U. S. Congress	1890-94	1900-02	1902-04	State Legislature	1900-04	1904-02	1904-04
Term, two years	R	14	11	17	Term, Senate, R	34	81	32
					four years, D	10	71	19
					House, two years, Rep	1	1	1
Total	22	22	24	Total	31	152	51	153
For Governor	1892	1896	1900	Other Elections, 1900-1904	1902
Term, four years	Total vote, 874	1001	1132	State, Term, 1900	1902
	21 D	113 R	69 R	Term, 1900	1902
				Term, 1900	1902

Electoral Vote, 1904

27

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

The record of Republican Presidential pluralities, 1872-1900, is unbroken, save in 1902. The Republican plurality of 1900, it will be noted, was 47,000 less than in 1896, although the total vote for 1900 was 40,000 greater than in the preceding year.

The Republicans, with two Republicans in United States Senate, gained substantially in the Congressional election of 1902. At least four Republican and two Democratic districts are likely to be the scene of lively battles for supremacy in November.

The last two Congressional contests show large Republican pluralities.

At the election of a State Treasurer, 1902, the Republican candidate had a plurality of 50,000 recorded in his favor, being over 20,000 in excess of the Republican plurality for Governor in 1900.

In the State Legislature, 1902-4, the Republican majority was considerably increased.

Record of and Variations in County Vote.

Forty counties out of 102 in Illinois gave regular R Presidential pluralities, 1872-1900. Thirty-two counties have a similar R record. Nine counties changed sides in 1900. Of these 4 went from R to D; 5 counties gave Bryan a plurality. Of these 4 favored McKinley in 1900. In nearly every instance of a Bryan plurality in 1900, the county giving it had a D record extending back twenty years or over.

WISCONSIN

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900
Total vote (thousands)	192	254	292	329	355	372	447	413
Plurality (thousands)	18	6	16	12	12	7	11	107
Electoral vote	10	10	10	11	11	10	12	12
U. S. Congress	1890-94	1900-02	1902-04	State Legislature	1900-04	1904-02	1904-04
Term, two years	R	10	10	10	Term, Senate, R	31	81	31
					four years, D	11	2	10
Total	10	10	10	Total	31	100	31	100
For Governor	1896	1900	1902	Other Elections, 1900-1904	1902
Term, two years	Total vote, 328	447	413	Term, 1900	1902
	30 R	101 R	105 R	Term, 1900	1902

Electoral Vote, 1904

13

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

As in Illinois, the record of Republican Presidential pluralities is unbroken, save in 1902. These Republican pluralities, from 1884 to 1900, increased at each election.

With two Republicans in the United States Senate, the Congressional representation, 1890-1904, was solidly Republican until 1904, when one Democrat was returned from Wisconsin. Four of five Congressional districts will be feverishly contested in this campaign, two of the fights being directed by the La Follette faction, now endorsing Democratic candidates.

The last three Republican nominees for Governor received large pluralities. The State Legislature has a strong Republican majority in both branches.

Record of and Variations in County Vote.

Twenty-four out of 29 counties in Wisconsin gave regular R Presidential pluralities, 1872-1900. Two counties have a similar D record. Eight counties gave R pluralities, 1872-1900, and 8 counties recorded D pluralities, 1872-1902. Only 3 counties changed sides in 1900. In 1896 only 3 counties gave Bryan pluralities; one of these voted in favor of McKinley in 1900. Eighteen counties giving D pluralities in 1902 supported the McKinley ticket in 1896 and 1900.

NORTH DAKOTA

Presidential Elections	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900
Total vote (thousands)	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Plurality (thousands)	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Electoral vote	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
U. S. Congress	1890-94	1900-02	1902-04	State Legislature	1900-04	1904-02	1904-04
Term, two years	R	1	1	2	Term, Senate, R	31	82	31
					four years, D	11	2	10
Total	1	1	2	Total	31	100	31	100
For Governor	1896	1900	1902	Other Elections, 1900-1904	1902
Term, two years	Total vote, 41	54	54	Term, 1900	1902
	41 R	24 R	14 R	Term, 1900	1902

Electoral Vote, 1904

4

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

It will be seen from the accompanying table that the Republican Presidential plurality, 1900, showed an increase proportionate to the increase of total vote cast of that year.

The Congressional representation, including United States Senators, 1899-1904, has been entirely Republican.

Record of and Variation in County Vote.

Twenty-three out of 30 counties are credited with regular R Presidential pluralities from 1892, when the first Presidential vote of the State was cast, to 1900. In 1892 every county except one gave a D plurality. In 1900, 8 counties voted for Bryan. In 1900 each of these counties changed side and gave R pluralities.

MONTANA

Presidential Elections:	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900
Total vote (thousands):						44	53	84
Plurality (thousands):						1	11	12
Electoral vote:						3	7	11
U. S. Congress, 1899-1900	1899-1900	1901-2	1903-4	State Legislature, 1900-1901	1901-2	1903-4	1905-6	1907-8
Term, two years:	R			1	Term, Sen. Rep.:	R
Term, four years:		1			Sen. Rep.:	11	40	14
					House, Rep.:	3	21	6
					House, Sen. Lab.:			14
Total:					Total:	24	61	28
For Governor, 1892	1892	1896	1900	Other Elections, 1900-1901	1902	1906	1910
Term, four years:	44	52	64	Appellate Judge:
	1872 R	22 R	30 R	Supreme Court:
				Judge:

Electoral Vote, 1904

3

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

The trend of Montana, as shown in the table, indicates a Democratic loss of ground all along the line. In the Presidential contests, it will be noted that the Democratic plurality of 1900 was 29,000 less than in 1896, although the total vote for 1900 was 13,000 greater. The United States Senators are both Democratic. The member of Congress, 1900-01, was also Democratic. A Populist held the office in 1901-2. For 1903-4 a Republican represents the State, receiving a plurality of over 3,000. It is deemed possible that, through the Clark interests, Senator Clark's son being a likely candidate, the Congressional delegation may become entirely Democratic after the election.

The last two elections for Governor have given Democratic pluralities, but with an increased total vote in 1904, a Presidential year, as against the vote of 1900, there was a falling off of 13,000 in the State plurality. In the State Legislature, Democratic representation in the House fell from 40 in 1899-1900 to 6 during the present term. For Appellate Justice, 1902, the Republican nominee received 10,000 plurality.

Record of and Variation in County Vote.

Four counties out of 23 gave regular D Presidential pluralities, from 1892, when the first Presidential vote of the State was cast, to 1900. Two counties gave similar R records. Eight counties changed sides in 1900, all swinging from Bryan to McKinley. Twenty counties gave Bryan a plurality in 1892. At the next succeeding Presidential election every one of these counties gave an R plurality.

COLORADO

Presidential Elections:	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900
Total vote (thousands):			51	61	92	104	180	227
Plurality (thousands):			7	10	11	15	103	14
Electoral vote:		3	4	4	4	4	10	16
U. S. Congress, 1900-1901	1900-1901	1901-2	1903-4	State Legislature, 1900-1901					1903-4
	R			R					R
Term, two years:				2					2
Term, four years:		1	1						1
Total:		2	2						3
For Governor, 1900	1900	1904	1908	Other Elections, 1900-1901					1903
Term, two years:	140	210	185	Supreme Court:
	45 R	22 R	7 R	Judge:

Electoral Vote, 1904

5

Summary and Analysis—State Vote.

The record of Colorado in Presidential pluralities, 1892-1900, was Republican, with gradually increasing pluralities. The period, 1892-1900, shows Populist and Democratic domination. The decrease in Democratic plurality, 1900, as compared with 1896, was over 60,000, yet the total vote of 1900 was 20,000 greater than in 1896. Since 1901 Colorado has been represented in the United States Senate by two Democrats. Congress, in the House, has two Republicans and one Democrat. The attitude of the present Governor toward labor and other labor difficulties make, in the present campaign, every district "doublet," both parties being in disfavor with some of the labor leaders. The vote for Governor, 1902, gave a Republican plurality. The State Legislature, 1903-4, has a Republican majority of 7 in the House, as against a Democratic majority of 23 in 1901-2.

Record of and Variation in County Vote.

Fifteen counties out of 38 gave R pluralities, 1892-1900, but D Presidential pluralities 1902-1900. Thirty-one counties gave an R plurality in 1892, voted a D and R from 1900 to 1902, and gave D pluralities in 1900 and 1902. In 1900 every county in Colorado except two gave Bryan a plurality. In 1900 13 of the Bryan counties voted in favor of McKinley.

PACIFIC STATES

UTAH

Presidential Elections:	1872	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1900
Total vote (thousands):							76	103
Plurality (thousands):							33	42
Electoral vote:							3	14
U. S. Congress, 1900-1901	1900-1901	1901-2	1903-4	State Legislature, 1900-1901	1901-2	1903-4	1905-6	1907-8
Term, two years:	R	—	1	1	Term, Sen. Rep.:	R	—	—
	—	—	—	—	House, Rep.:	14	10	10
	—	—	—	—	House, Rep.:	4	—	—
Total:	—	—	—	—	Total:	18	10	10
For Governor, 1900	1900	1904	1908	Other Elections, 1900-1901	1902	1906	1910
Term, four years:	140	210	185	Supreme Court:	—	—	—
	45 R	22 R	7 R	Judge:	—	—	—

Electoral Vote, 1904

3

Summary and Analysis—Main Idea

The present political trend in Utah, according to the record, is Republican. The Republican plurality in 1900 was very insignificant, as compared with the Democratic plurality of 1906, but, in 1904, the United States Senators and the member of Congress are Republican; the Governor, as was his predecessor, is of the same political faith; the State Legislature is strongly Republican in both branches, although the House was strongly Democratic in 1898-99; and the Republican candidate for Supreme Court Judge, 1902, received a plurality of 4781.

Record of past iterations in County Vote

Nine counties out of 27 gave D Presidential pluralities in 1896 and 1900. Twenty-five counties gave Bryan a plurality in 1896. Fifteen of these counties changed sides in 1900, swinging to the McKinley column.

IDAHO

[illegible]

Electoral Vote, 1994

3

Namowitz and Ambrose—State Lotc

The Presidential plurality of Idaho, 1900, shows a remarkable falling off in Democratic plurality. The total vote rose from 29,000 in 1896 to 38,000 in 1900, but the plurality was 15,000 less in the latter year. The United States Senators, 1894, include one of each party, the Republican having yet five years to serve.

Reversal of and Variations in County Vote

Seven counties out of 21 changed sides at the Presidential election of 1900, swinging from D to R. Eleven counties gave D pluralities, 1892-1900. Every county in the State gave Bryan a plurality in 1896. Seven of them changed sides in 1900, favoring McKinley.

CALIFORNIA

Pre-independent Elections	1952	1956	1960	1964	1968	1972	1980	1984
Total vote (thousands)	361	1,526	161	194	251	270	297	304
Plurality (thousands)	63	61	128	14	12	7	114	12
Electoral vote	6	6	6	11	1	1	1	1
T. S. Congress	1903-1907	1907-2	1903-4	State Legislature	1905-1907	1901-2	1905-6
Term, years	4	4	4	5	Term, Senate, 6 years; House, 2 years	4	4	4
Total	1	1	1	1	Total	1	1	1
Year, first	1904	1906	1902		Year, first	1904	1904	1904
Year, last	1907	1910	1906		Year, last	1907	1907	1907

Electoral Vote: 100

10

Research and Analysis—State Vote

Twice in twenty-eight years California has given Democratic pluralities. The Republican plurality, 40,000, in 1900, was the largest plurality recorded for California at Presidential elections since the formation of the Republican party. Lincoln, 1864, received 18,000. That was the next largest. From the several sections of the table it will readily be observed that the tendency is Republican. The United States Senators are both Republicans, one with six years to serve, the other one year. Congressional representation in the national house of Representatives is 5 to 2.

In favor of Republicans. The Governors, 1898 and 1902, received Republican pluralities, the latter year's plurality, however, being greatly reduced. The State Legislature has a substantial Republican majority in both branches.

Record of and Variations in County Vote

Fourteen counties out of 57 gave R Presidential pluralities regularly, 1875-1900. Seven counties gave a similar B record. Fifteen counties changed sides in 1900, 14 being from D to E. In 1920, 20 counties gave B as a plurality.

SOME POSSIBLE COMBINATIONS

In the above table are fifteen States recorded as doubtful, with an electoral vote as follows: New Jersey, 30; New Jersey, 3; Connecticut, 3; Delaware, 3; Maryland, 8; West Virginia, 4; Indiana, 11; Illinois, 27; Wisconsin, 13; North Dakota, 3; Colorado, 3; California, 10; Utah, 3; Montana, 3; Idaho, 3. Admitting that the Republicans are sure of 103 electoral votes, and the Democrats 154, the following possible combinations may be made:

If the Republicans should lose New York, they might also lose New Jersey, Connecticut, Maryland, West Virginia, Colorado, and Montana, and yet win if they carried the remaining eight "doubtful" States. If the Republicans should carry New Jersey, Colorado, Illinois, Wisconsin, California, Delaware, Utah, and Idaho, they could lose New York, Indiana, Connecticut, Maryland, West Virginia, Montana, and North Dakota and still win.

Again, the Republicans might lose New York, New Jersey, Maryland, and West Virginia, and either Indiana or Wisconsin and yet have a safe majority if they carried the ten other doubtful States.

linas, they would still win if they should carry Illinois, New Jersey, California, Connecticut, West Virginia, North Dakota, Delaware, Utah, and Idaho.

If the Yank and, if the Democrats carry New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Maryland, and West Virginia, they would need only the votes of either Indiana or Wisconsin or the combination of Colorado, Montana, and Idaho to make up the required quota. If the Democrats carried New York, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Maryland, and West Virginia, they could win by receiving the votes of Illinois alone, or Indiana and Wisconsin together, or Colorado, Montana, and Idaho. If the Democrats were to lose New York, but carry Illinois, they could win by carrying New Jersey, Indiana, Connecticut, West Virginia, Maryland, Colorado, Montana, and Idaho. If the Democrats carried New York, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Maryland, West Virginia, Illinois, and Indiana, it would be necessary for them to carry Indiana, Wisconsin, New Jersey, Connecticut, Maryland, West Virginia, Colorado, California, Montana, Idaho, and Utah in order to elect

THE MASQUERADER

by

KATHERINE CECIL
THURSTON

ILLUSTRATED BY
CLARENCE F. UNDERWOOD

Two men, not related, but looking absolutely alike—one married, the other a bachelor—secretly change places. The novel develops along lines new to fiction, and is a forceful, compelling story; not a story of style and words, but a story of doing, a history of life in action. The moral problem involved is a strange one.

A CURIOUS LETTER

August 3, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Bazar:

"You may, and I hope you have, some little remembrance of my name. But this will be the very oddest letter you have ever received. I am reading that most clever and wonderfully well-written novel 'The Masquerader.' I have very serious heart trouble, and may live years—and may die any minute. I should deeply regret going without knowing the general end of that story. May I know it? Will be as close as the grave itself if I may. I really feel that I may not live to know the unravelling of that net. If I may not know it for reasons good and sufficient to yourself and by no means necessary to explain, may I please have the numbers as they come to you, and in advance of the general delivery? I congratulate you on the story—it is to my mind the very best and most intensely interesting story I have read for many and many a year; indeed, I cannot think of any book I ever read which held my attention so utterly. I have my own theory of the end. I think Loder is in some way the real Chilcote. . . . I just felt that (I have had so many troubles) it would be just my luck to die, and not to know the end."

The Editor of HARPER'S BAZAR was so much interested in the letter that the advance proofs of The Masquerader were sent to the lady.

The book is now for sale at all booksellers

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Straight to the Gate

(The Golden Gate)

SAN FRANCISCO

OGDEN

CHEYENNE

OMAHA

THE CHICAGO
MILWAUKEE
AND ST. PAUL RAILWAY

CHICAGO

If you have spent a winter in

California

it is not improbable that you are planning to go there again. If you have never enjoyed the beautiful scenery, the delightful climate and the hundred other charms of the golden state, you owe it to yourself to postpone this ideal sojourn no longer.

California is not impossible even to those of moderate means. The idea that a trip there is a luxury for only the rich has been abandoned by the knowing ones. With California.

Less than

3

Days

distant from Chicago, with comparatively low rates in effect via this line, and with excellent living in California at moderate cost, the trip there and back is within the reach of almost every-

The Overland Limited

is one of the two fast daily trains Chicago to San Francisco via The St. Paul and Union Pacific line.

Electric lighted throughout. The Overland Limited is a blaze of glory along the old overland trail. No other train compares with it in speed, service or equipment.

The California Express is another excellent train. It carries tourist and standard sleepers Chicago to San Francisco. On both trains dining car service at moderate rates is offered for each meal. The tourist sleeper is first class in everything but name and expense.

The Overland Limited leaves Union Passenger Station, Chicago 6:05 p. m., and The California Express, 10:35 p. m., daily.

Descriptive books sent free on request.

F. A. MILLER,
General Passenger Agent,
CHICAGO.

W. S. HOWELL,
General Ticket Agent,
100 Broadway, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER BROTHERS

NEW YORK

THE MASQUERADER

by

KATHERINE CECIL
THURSTON

ILLUSTRATED BY
CLARENCE F. UNDERWOOD

Two men, not related, but looking absolutely alike—one married, the other a bachelor—secretly change places. The novel develops along lines new to fiction, and is a forceful, compelling story; not a story of style and words, but a story of doing, a history of life in action. The moral problem involved is a strange one.

A CURIOUS LETTER

To the Editor of Harper's Bazar:

August 3, 1904.

"You may, and I hope you have, some little remembrance of my name. But this will be the very oddest letter you have ever received. I am reading that most clever and wonderfully well-written novel 'The Masquerader.' I have very serious heart trouble, and may live years—and may die any minute. I should deeply regret going without knowing the general end of that story. May I know it? Will be as close as the grave itself if I may. I really feel that I may not live to know the unraveling of that net. If I may not know it for reasons good and sufficient to yourself and by no means necessary to explain, may I please have the numbers as they come to you, and in advance of the general delivery? I congratulate you on the story—it is to my mind the very best and most intensely interesting story I have read for many and many a year; indeed, I cannot think of any book I ever read which held my attention so utterly. I have my own theory of the end. I think Loder is in some way the real Chilcote. . . . I just felt that (I have had so many troubles) it would be just my luck to die, and not to know the end."

The Editor of HARPER'S BAZAR was so much interested in the letter that the advance proofs of The Masquerader were sent to the lady.

The book is now for sale at all booksellers

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

ILLUSTRATION

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, November 5, 1904

NO. 2495

Copyright, 1904, by Harper & Brothers. All rights reserved

EITHER IS "GOOD ENOUGH FOR ME"

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2491

EDITED BY GEORGE HARPER

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 5, 1904

TERMS: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post Office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 43 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO HUMBOLDT!

When this campaign began we expressed our inability to perceive any good reason why a Republican should refuse to vote for ROOSEVELT or a Democrat for PARKER. Nothing has happened to call for a change or modification of that judgment.

Among the inalienable rights conferred upon Yankees by what there is left of their Constitution is that of guessing. When the next number of this journal reaches the reader somebody will have been elected President of the United States. Consequently, if we are going to get in a guess at all, this is our last chance. We propose to exercise the privilege here and now. In 1880 McKINLEY received 271 electoral votes, and HAYES 170; majority, 95. In 1888, Mc KINLEY 292, HAYES 155; majority, 137. We guess ROOSEVELT will receive 314 electoral votes and PARKER 162; majority, 152; divided as follows:

FOR ROOSEVELT.		FOR PARKER.
California	10	Alabama	11
Colorado	5	Arkansas	9
Connecticut	1	Florida	5
Delaware	3	Georgia	13
Idaho	3	Kentucky	13
Illinois	27	Louisiana	9
Indiana	15	Maryland	8
Iowa	10	Mississippi	10
Kansas	10	Missouri	16
Maine	6	Nebraska	3
Massachusetts	16	Nevada	3
Michigan	14	North Carolina	12
Minnesota	11	South Carolina	9
Montana	3	Tennessee	12
Nebraska	4	Texas	18
New Hampshire	4	Virginia	12
New Jersey	11
New York	39	Total	162
North Dakota	25
Ohio	25	Majority
Oregon	4	for
Pennsylvania	34	Roosevelt,
Rhode Island	4
South Dakota	4
Tak	3
Vermont	4
Washington	6
West Virginia	7
Wisconsin	13
Wyoming	3
Total	314

Since the war, majorities in the electoral college have been counted as follows: 1868, GRANT, 154; 1872, GRANT, 221; 1876, HAYES, 17; 1880, GRANT, 20; 1884, CLEVELAND, 37; 1888, HAYES, 65; 1892, CLEVELAND, plurality, 152; 1896, McKINLEY, 95; 1900, McKINLEY, 137. If, therefore, by chance we have guessed right or about right the very first time, Mr. ROOSEVELT will sweep the country by a larger vote than any successful candidate has polled since the days of the high white hat. We modestly admit a remote possibility of having guessed wrong—but we guess not.

The results in New York and New Jersey as to the State tickets will depend upon the size of ROOSEVELT's majorities. If there were no national election this year, we think the two Democratic candidates for Governor, HERRICK and BLACK, would be elected. Their opponents, HUGGINS and STOKES, must rely for success upon the drawing power of the great and good father—the difficulty of voting split tickets and the certainty of feigning to the polls the full party strength. The defection from HUGGINS is somewhere between five and ten per election district. This is not sufficient to defeat him if ROOSEVELT carries the State by, say, seventy thousand. Should that number be cut in half, however, HERRICK will almost surely win. Our guess is that ROOSEVELT will get about fifty thousand and that the State election will be very close. Like conditions prevail in New Jersey, except that STOKES's chances are materially better proportionately than HUGGINS's and we anticipate his election by a fair majority. The President has invited Mr. JOHN MORLEY to dine with him on November 9. Mr. MORLEY, who likes to have a good time when Mr. CANNIBAL isn't around, is to be congratulated upon having hit upon an occasion that promises to be joyous.

As a rule, the number of votes cast in Greater New York in Presidential elections is less by about five per cent. than the number registered. If the proportion is maintained this year, 654,000 votes should be returned in the metropolis, since the registration is 688,803. In the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx there is less evidence of increase in Democratic than in Republican districts, and the difference is even more marked in Brooklyn. Viewed collectively, this year's registration exhibits almost precisely the excess over that of 1900—to wit, 48,000 votes—which would be expected from the supposed increase in population. There have been some notable increases of registration in up-State cities. For example, in Rochester, 2438 more votes were registered than in 1900; in Syracuse, 2157; in Buffalo, 1524; and in Albany, 1275. It is the increased registration in up-State Republican towns and in the Republican districts of Brooklyn, and in the Borough of Manhattan north of Fourteenth Street, which has caused the betting on the Governorship to vary, the odds now slightly favoring HUGGINS. The expert calculators for the Stock Exchange seem to take for granted that Mr. ROOSEVELT will carry his native State, though not by a large plurality; but, as the Herald, with a characteristic affection of wisdom puts it, the people will have to decide. As for the challenges by which Governor-CHARLES OUELLE is said to have expected to eliminate 50,000 Democratic votes in New York city, they are not likely to affect one per cent. of the registration.

The latest claim put forward by spokesmen of the Democratic National Committee is the following: in addition to the 151 electoral votes of the Southern States that voted for BAYNE in 1900, they assert that they are now assured of New York (39); New Jersey (12); Indiana (15); West Virginia (7); Maryland (8); Washington (5); Colorado (5); Montana (3); and Nevada (3). Thus they arrive at a total of 248 electoral votes, or 9 more than are required. The truth seems to be that, while the Democrats are not unlikely to elect their highly popular candidate for Governor in the State of Washington, they have no chance of beating Mr. ROOSEVELT there, who is expected to receive more than the 12,933 plurality given to McKINLEY four years ago. Colorado, Montana, and Nevada may be carried for Judge PARKER, but no well-informed observer believes that the Republicans will lose New Jersey, and those who know West Virginia best question the possibility of wiping out the plurality of 21,000 which the Republicans obtained in 1900. When TOM TAGGART claims Indiana, his fellow Hoosiers of Republican prepossessions smile. Even for New York, the odds in the betting, as we have already pointed out, favor ROOSEVELT.

The friends of Judge PARKER are likely to regret that he did not make at an earlier stage of the campaign the speech in favor of a reduction of the tariff which he delivered on October 22, at Esopus. The Democratic Campaign Committee have made up their minds that a mistake was made in pushing to the front the issues of "constitutionalism" and "anti-imperialism." The masses of the people decline to believe that their liberties are in danger at the hands of Mr. ROOSEVELT, and they also seem disposed to think that our government is doing its duty in the Philippines, and is giving the inhabitants of those islands as much self-government as they are at present fitted for. Nor can they be made to believe that citizens of the United States will be any the less true to their own rights, because they know that only an installment of those rights is conceded to the Filipinos. We have kept New Mexico in the condition of a Territory for fifty-six years, but not on that account has any of our States evinced a willingness to accept the status of a Territory in lieu of Statehood.

The issue of the trusts, as it has been handled, has also failed to gain votes for the Democratic machine. The sincere trust-buster seems to prefer Mr. ROOSEVELT, who upon the Northern Securities merger, and who has had supplementary anti-trust legislation enacted, to Judge PARKER, who proposes, in dealing with the trusts, to lean, exclusively or mainly, on the common law, which, according to most legal experts, has been proved to be a broken reed. There is, on the other hand, no Democrat and no independent who doubts that the Dingley tariff is much too high in many of its schedules, and that it ought to be lowered forthwith. There is, moreover, and there has been for upwards of thirty years, a great deal of dissatisfaction with high tariffs in the ranks of the Republican party itself. As was pointed out at Esopus, Senator SHERMAN, as far back as 1872, declared that if the duties, which then prevailed, and which were much lower than are those of the Dingley act, had been high enough during the civil war—when home industry was burdened with heavy internal taxes, stamp duties, income taxes and high rates on raw materials—then surely the duties were too high when all these taxes had been removed. The views of Senator SHERMAN were shared by so many Republican statesmen that a revision of the tariff was made a distinctive feature of ARTHUR's administration. A commission was appointed for the purpose by a protectionist Congress in 1882. After taking testimony for some months, the commission reported that a substantial reduction of the tariff was demanded by the best conservative opinion of the country, and proposed to lower the rates by twenty to twenty-five per cent. Thereupon the protected interests, which had ostensibly agreed to a moderate reduction, changed front, killed the commission's bill, and caused Congress to pass another, which, instead of reducing, actually increased the average rates on dutiable goods from 41.25 per cent. to 45.96 per cent.

In 1890 the McKinley tariff raised the average rates on dutiable goods to 48.71 per cent., and the Dingley tariff to 53 per cent., although not a few of our industries are so far from being "infants" that they can undersell their European competitors in Europe. Why, asks Judge PARKER, should American railways have to pay for steel rails nine dollars more per ton than is paid to the same American manufacturers by Canadian customers? Why should American citizens have to pay a duty of five cents a pound on baux when the California producers of that commodity sell it in England for a much smaller price than they demand in the United States? If Judge PARKER and the Democratic campaign speakers had confined themselves to putting questions like these—had, in other words, concentrated their whole artillery on the tariff—they would have made the campaign disconcerting and uncomfortable for their opponents, and might, by this time, have had them on the run. As it is, they have wasted their time on issues that the people, rightly or wrongly, care nothing about.

As for the Panama issue, there is no doubt that Mr. CLEVELAND would have made something out of it. He would have dealt with it precisely as he dealt with Hawaii. He held, it will be remembered, that the HARRISON administration had aided and abetted the revolution by which Queen LALAEKALANI had been deposed, and a government substituted which desired to bring about annexation to the United States. Mr. CLEVELAND offered, it will be recalled, to restore the Queen if she would issue a proclamation of amnesty, and nothing but her vindictiveness prevented the execution of the magnanimous design. Mr. CLEVELAND would unquestionably hold that, when our naval authorities forbade Colombian troops to proceed from Colon to Panama for the purpose of restoring order in the last named place, it aided and abetted the revolutionary government, from which it quickly procured the canal grant. On the ground that the receiver is as bad as the thief, Mr. CLEVELAND, had he succeeded Mr. ROOSEVELT, would have maintained that the United States could not afford to retain the canal belt under existing conditions, and that they should forthwith enter upon negotiations to ascertain upon what terms Colombia would sanction the grant. Judge PARKER, on the other hand, while condemning the method by which the canal belt was acquired, treats our title to it as now valid, and does not acknowledge that in equity we are under any obligation to compensate Colombia for a wrong by which we have profited.

Under the circumstances, the American people are simply invited to choose between an avowed thief and a self-confessed receiver of stolen goods. No Presidential campaign could be made to turn on such an issue. As the latter from Mr. ROOSEVELT to Mr. STAN, out of which Senator CLEVELAND seemed to think that a good deal could be made, the President, in his capacity of individual citizen, had a right to feel, and confidentially to express, the hope that the inhabitants of Panama might assert their independence as they had done several times before. The hope would naturally be felt by every patriotic American, because a canal grant would be likely to be obtained more easily from a Republic of Panama than from Colombia. There is all the difference in the world between the confidential expression of such a hope and practical cooperation in a revolution. Of such cooperation no proof has ever been furnished, while both Mr. ROOSEVELT and Mr. HAY, both of whom are men of veracity and honor, have solemnly asserted that no encouragement was given to the organizers of the Panama revolt. Where these statements erred, if they erred at all, was in their construction of the treaty of 1846. They held that our treaty obligation to maintain order on the Isthmus authorized us to prohibit Colombian troops from going to Panama for the same purpose. It is well known that Mr. CLEVELAND took an opposite view of our duty under the treaty when, during his administration, a rebellion against Colombian authority took place.

Mr. CLEVELAND wants to give the Filipinos full independence; Mr. ROOSEVELT doesn't. Mr. CLEVELAND is in favor of tariff revision; Mr. ROOSEVELT isn't. Mr. CLEVELAND opposes militarism; Mr. ROOSEVELT doesn't. Mr. CLEVELAND is an advocate of non-interference in the affairs of other nations; Mr. ROOSEVELT isn't. Therefore, Mr. CLEVELAND is for Mr. ROOSEVELT.

It is computed that Secretary TAPPAN's cable to Governor WALKER inquiring whether Judge PARKER had been correctly advised as to prevailing conditions in the Philippines, and Governor WALKER's reply saying that he had, must have cost the taxpayers as much as $74. We think the information was worth the money. Secretary TAPPAN quoted Judge PARKER as saying that the only Americans likely to be benefited by our control of the Philippines were seekers after special privileges and professional office-seekers. As to the latter, Judge PARKER quoted a student of conditions as saying recently that many of them were either inefficient or despotic and corrupt, and that the islands seemed to have got the dregs of our people. Furthermore, the Judge's "student of conditions" said that the situation in the Philippines to-day is so terrible that it passes the comprehension of our people at home, that agriculture for the time being is ruined, land is going out of cultivation, the population is ill fed, and in some places unable to get work; that the country is overburdened with taxation, that disease is prevalent, that farm animals have died, towns in many places are in ruins, whole districts are in the hands of bandits, and the price of products is low and unremunerative; that public opinion has not free expression; that newspapers are bled, that influential critics of the commission are ostracized, and plays in theatres censored; that private persons are subjected to espionage, especially by detectives in the guise of servants, and the oath of a single eye is enough to destroy a man's reputation, property, and even life. Transmitting these statements by cable, on October 20, to Governor

WRIGHT, Secretary TART said, "your comment as Civil Governor upon this statement of conditions is requested."

Governor WRIGHT took due time to reply. His response, received October 23, says that the officials in the islands compare favorably with those at home. Total defaults by subordinates in three years have been $78,000, but the government has lost nothing. A comprehensive civil-service law rigidly enforced protects the service. Complaints of oppression are few, and are promptly investigated. Towns are not in ruins, agriculture is not ruined, people are not ill fed. In 1901 and 1902 surra and rinderpest destroyed seventy per cent. of the cattle used in agriculture, but the disease has been checked by inoculation, and at present almost as much land as ever is under cultivation. Lack of rain and locusts hurt crops and sugar crops last year, but this year crops are excellent, prices good, and there will be no lack of food. As to taxation, customs are eighteen per cent. as compared with twenty-five per cent. under Spain, and other taxes are also less and honestly applied. As to laborers, there is no longer a single hand left in Lagon or the Vinayan Islands, though there are a few stragglers who still dole the constabulary. Peace and order obtain in all the islands inhabited by civilized Filipinos, except Samar, which has a semi-savage mountain population of religious fanatics who are still troublesome. Newspapers are not monopolized. The right of free expression of opinion is recognized and practised. Critics are not ostracized, politics are freely discussed, and the theatres are not censored, though a play was suppressed in which the American flag was torn down and stamped upon. That detectives dog private citizens is nonsense. "Judge PARKER," says Governor WRIGHT, "has evidently been grossly deceived."

The Springfield Republican thinks Governor WRIGHT somewhat eulphemic in his report as to embezzlements, and quotes against him the official report of Governor TART for the period ending December 23, 1903, in which Mr. TART speaks of "a most humiliating experience during the past year in the numerous defalcations of Americans charged with the official duty of collecting and disbursing money." In this report Governor TART specified twenty cases of embezzlement in sixteen months, and the Republican finds the total amount of the embezzlements as officially reported to be $144,000 in the currency of the Philippine Islands. The discrepancy between that sum and Governor WRIGHT's statement of $78,000 may, possibly, be accounted for by the difference between Mexican and American dollars. The New York Evening Post secking a congenial fray attacks Governor WRIGHT's denial that the Filipinos are overtaken, and quotes Mr. ALLENBY IRELAND, "a student of colonization and an avowed Imperialist," as showing in the November Atlantic Monthly that the Philippines have to pay forty-six per cent. of the value of their exports for the privilege of being governed. Mr. IRELAND thinks this is obviously absurd, and makes five British dependencies, including the Federated Malay states, in which the average is twenty-seven per cent. as against this forty-six per cent. in the Philippines.

It looks as though the Judge's "student of conditions" had given him some state news, and that matters in the Philippines had mended very much since the student was there. We believe that there has been far behind every statement that Judge PARKER's student of conditions made, but the time at which his inspection occurred is not given, and Governor WRIGHT's testimony as to present conditions is doubtless more accurate and trustworthy than any information that was at Judge PARKER's command. There are several buzz-saws in American politics this year, and the Philippines is one of them. If existing conditions there are to be an issue here, it is highly desirable that they should be accurately described. Secretary TART's now-known easily beats any that Judge PARKER can hope to organize before election.

Judge PARKER's estimate of the cost of the Philippines to the United States was $420,000,000. It is unnecessary to have been based on computations by Mr. EDWARD ATKINSON, set forth in the Democratic campaign book. Secretary TART, figuring with his own slate and pencil, says the islands have only cost us $204,000,000. Mr. TART's figures commend themselves more to acceptance than Mr. ATKINSON'S. Mr. TART says Mr. ATKIN-SON included in his total $132,000,000 spent for rivers and harbors, and $68,000,000 for fortifications, all in this country. He does not think that fair. He is not even willing to charge against the Philippines the cost of increasing our army from 27,000 men to 61,000. We think part of this last expenditure might fairly be charged against our new acquisition, but still there is a disparity of four hundred millions between Mr. TART'S estimate and the most rosate view of Mr. ATKINSON'S. Such a sum is not much among friends, of course, but rival campaigners have made great ado over less.

Colonel C. R. EGDON, chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, solemnly declares that Governor WRIGHT'S glowing catalog account of the heavenly conditions in the Philippines was in no sense "political"; it was "in defence of the honor of the civil government." To which we say, Fudge!

Last week's whirlwind campaign of refutation by members of the cabinet included a refutation by Attorney-General MONTAGUE of remarks by Mr. RICHARD OLNEY. Referring to these remarks Mr. MONTAGUE said:

It is not claimed that rebates and other discriminations between customers have entirely ceased, but it is claimed that they have greatly diminished, and that, in the words of the non-partisan Interstate Commerce Commission, "never before in the railroad history of this country have tariff rates been so well or so generally observed as they are at the present time."

What the Interstate Commerce Commission said is probably true. Railroad tariff rates are better observed than they were. The little fellows cannot get rebates any more, but the big fellows can, and do. Any concern that is big enough to take a railroad by the throat gets its rebate. The law can be enforced against the small shippers who need its protection. It cannot be enforced against the big shippers, whom it is intended to restrain. This condition of things, which, though secret and difficult to prove, is notorious, is one thing that makes some conservative citizens tolerant of Trust WATSON'S socialistic plan of having the government own and operate the railroads. At the post-office all corners fare alike. There is neither rebate nor reduction to large customers. If so way can be found to compel railroads to act with manifest impartiality the idea of government ownership will presently be taken up by men who appreciate all the objections to it. The use of railroad favors to crush competition is too well understood nowadays to last. A sagacious New England manufacturer, who is voting heavily for ROOSEVELT this year, says in a letter: "If I were not getting money I would be with WATSON. Most of his platform I can stand, and sometime the country will be with him in most things, or at least in many."

HARPER'S WEEKLY is not victims in any of these attacks. It is good-humored and sagging and mildly critical; but we must submit that the leaders are too numerous to admit of perdition—Stamford Press.

What are they?

A correspondent writes: "I did not read much of CLAYTON'S speech. I am tired of speeches, especially of those admonishing us to get back to the anchorage of our forefathers." This correspondent is a temperamental expansionist, and perhaps cooler about forefathers than the average. But we are all with him about speeches. We are all tired of them. The trouble about speeches is that all the good ones are reported in all the papers. Scarcely anybody has heard too many speeches in this campaign, but thousands of faithful voters who have conscientiously tried to keep abreast of the discussion have read speeches to extinction.

The Boston Hatchman, speaking of the appointment of Governor CHANE to be the successor of Senator HOAR, says: "The day for great orators in Congress has passed. . . . Congress has become a business body, and the men who are most influential seldom make speeches." It is true enough that other arguments besides oratorical ones are potent in the Senate nowadays, but the gift of discourse is still a distinction there. There seems to be no doubt that Governor CHANE is to be elected to serve out the unexpired term of Senator HOAR. He is an excellent man, but he is a new type of Senator from Massachusetts. It was said that Mr. Hoar's choice was MORTON.

who is probably the ablest man in politics in the State. Moon would have made a Senator of the old Massachusetts lawyer type. The Senate ought to have him. To be sure, he comes from the same end of the State as Mr. Lenz, whereas Mr. CAIXE comes from the Berkshires. But that is not a vital matter. Moon is the right type and the right individual for the post. Mr. CAIXE made a good Governor, and would make an excellent cabinet officer or a safe President. Of course he will make a useful Senator, but he hasn't the timber in him to shine as the successor of WENDELL, SUMNER, and FLOYD.

Mr. THOMAS indignantly denies the base assertion that the present Republican Governor is his friend.

It is the plain duty of every true patriot to be cross now. Only a week is left in which to repudiate foul aspersions and speak plainly of the unworthy tactics of the demoralized and desperate opposition. Editorial-writing in particular must be trenchant, vigorous, determined. The World valiantly leads the way. "Corruption and Corruption" is its slogan, and a truly good one, too. There is nothing like forceful alliteration for effectiveness. If the chairman's name had been HANES, it would have been "Bribery and Bribery," or if DUNE, "Duns and Debauchery." Either would have an equally powerful effect upon the stunted voter. For the other side we would suggest "Tom and Trusts," "Balm and Boodle," "Ryan and Road," "De Lamy and De Liver us," "Mendacity, brethren, this is no time for tempered phrases. Spades must be called spades, whether they are or not. And we guess they will be. Already the good work is under way. We read, for example, this morning, that Mr. ROOSEVELT is "a corrupt and unworthy creature, shriekingly [that is a good one]—shriekingly unfit for the Presidential office," and that Duke HANSEN is "a foul-mouthed slanderer as well as a notorious political corruptor." This is from the Press, which has become a real joy. The big guns also are limbering up, and we may cheerfully anticipate very heavy firing to the South, and then on the cold, gray dawn of the morning after election mutual felicitations will be forthcoming, as usual.

The Times will recall that, after all, Mr. ROOSEVELT once had a character, and with hearty good-fellowship and congratulations upon his unprecedented success, will wish his administration well. It will, of course, direct his attention to the fact that the confidence so signally manifested by the American people only doubles his personal responsibility, and, if he undertakes his great task with that full knowledge, the Times, along towards the end of its leading article, will become quite hopeful of the result and will definitely pledge its cordial cooperation in all that he may do that is good.

The World will go into double leads with something short and crisp. That will be an hour for open letters a mile long. What the public will be crying for and what they will get is about three sticks of ringing sentences designed to attract widespread attention and carry conviction of the World's absolute independence, utter fearlessness, and penetrating sincerity to every doubting heart. It will be headed "An Opportunity," or maybe "A Great Opportunity," although probably the former, because simplicity of expression must characterize the utterance. "No adjectives" will be the order. It will go like this: "To THEODORE ROOSEVELT, President of the United States." That will have to go in to indicate a subtle appreciation of the true change in his official position—also because it is impressive. Briefly will be noted the splendor of the compliment paid to him by the American people, congratulations will be extended upon the success of his political audacity, which will have enabled him to triumph over all opposing elements. And then will be expressed a hope, a sincere longing, that he will rise to this great occasion. Probably it will be well to reprint the World's eulogy of him published at the time he began to swing the big stick over the Northern Securities Company, just to show that the World knew all the time and actually said fifteen minutes before anybody else that he had courage. It will also recognize his ability.

But it will require him to prose by his arts that the CORRECTOR scandal was baseless; that will be his great personal opportunity. (We use italics because full-faced type wastes ink—the World is rich and doesn't mind—besides using cheaper ink.) But this will not be the least. The poor man will be confronted chiefly and most severely by a Public Opportunity. The sad condition of present affairs, the various menaces to republican institutions, the downfall of the Roman Empire, will be graphically portrayed. Then will come his chance to enroll his name on the same parchment with the greatest, wisest, and purest of our various fathers. If he does this firmly and conscientiously, he will have the encouragement and support of the World, which incidentally will continue to be for principles, not persons. But if he doesn't, if he starts in and robs banks, or slaughters widows and orphans with machine-guns, or slaps an Emperor's face, or steals a republic, or steals to J. PIERPONT MORGAN, or gets caught with the goods on him in young ROCKEFELLER'S Sunday-school, he will merit and receive the stern rebuke which will continue to be the duty and privilege of a highly trained, sensitive, independent press to administer. But in the name and on behalf of the Republic, the World will hope for the best. It will wind up with the words: "The occasion—the opportunity—arrives! Is the man on deck?"

The Herald will content itself with the proud declaration that the people have decided, just as it said they would all along.

We do not know what the Star will say. And if HOSAGE wins we never shall. We are not inviting apology.

Senator MORGAN of Alabama is much troubled by the knowledge that the HAY-VARELLA treaty with Panama provides that Panama "may renounce with Colombia, or may merge its sovereignty into that of any foreign country in the whole world without the consent of the United States, and without notice to the government." "Any night," says the Senator, through Colonel HENRY WATKINS'S newspaper, "Panama may lawfully become a state or province of France, Great Britain, or any other power, by simply signing a treaty to that effect. When she will conclude to do this will be when she finds sufficient inducements from a power strong enough to protect her." But that will not be right away; not till after election, certainly.

"Economy and statesmanship," says Secretary PAINE, "are not synonymous terms." And yet we never heard the good Secretary described as a spendthrift.

Candidate DOLGAS in Massachusetts talks in a very practical way about the cost of the DINGLEY tariff to consumers. By DOLGAS'S figures he makes out that prices are about thirty-six per cent. higher than just before the DINGLEY tariff became a law, whereas wages, he says, have increased only eight per cent. The working-man, he says, should not lose sight of the fact that he does not eat or wear money, and that his actual wages are food, clothing, and shelter. Where the working-man got $1 in 1897 he got $1.48 in 1903. But what cost $1 in 1897 cost $1.35 in 1903. So Mr. DOLGAS computes that the working-man only gets about four-fifths of what he got in 1897. And of the tax that the Dingley tariff makes him pay only about one-sixth goes to the government. The other five-sixths goes to make the country "pro-sperous" for the protected interests.

The World took it back. We thought it would.

Although addressed to independent voters, Mr. CROATT'S earnest appeal could hardly be described as another Declaration of Independence—at any rate, on his own behalf. If we were Mr. WHITFIELD RICE, we should denounce this bid for continuance in a pleasant place as offensive political activity on the part of a public servant who ought to give a weary waiter a chance.

We know JAMES A. RUS is a good man, because the great and good father has said so. He is also a good deal of an ass, as witness this childish communication to a Nebraska newspaper:

Will you kindly give my regards to the Democrats on your library board, who, I learn from the newspapers, threw out my book on ROOSEVELT for fear it would help elect ROOSEVELT. Tell them that I wish heartily for "more power to their elbows." I presume it must be with their elbows they pick out books for their library, unless they do it with their hands.

If not to Mr. RUS, to anybody else who has had the patience to wade through the mass of puerile sophistry contained between the covers of his book, the action of the Nebraska board is wholly explicable. "Elbows" and "hands"—what delirium of irony!

Different impressions were made in different quarters by the view of the industrial and financial situation expressed by Mr. FRANK A. VANDERLIP, vice-president of the National City Bank of New York city, at a meeting of the Illinois Bankers' Association of St. Louis. On the one hand, he said that the remarkable advance in prices recently witnessed in Wall Street was not warranted by the actual conditions, and that the period of assured recovery might be set back a month, six months, or a year by a wild speculative boom at this time, when improvement is justified rather by hopes and possibilities than by realities. He did not hesitate, however, to indicate a conviction that the depression which began two years ago is over, and that the conditions are favorable to a return of prosperity, provided past mistakes are remembered. Whether, however, the upward movement has already started, or is to start next month or next year, Mr. VANDERLIP did not profess to say. He computed the total bank deposits in the United States ten years hence as upwards of fifteen billion dollars, as against $4,000,000,000 ten years ago. He also computed the annual gross earnings of American railroads ten years hence at nearly three billions of dollars. He gave other figures to show the proportions which, in his opinion, the expansion of business is likely to obtain in the course of a decade. He added that we are today in a sound financial position. The reserves of the national banks are ample, while bank loans and discounts are not, as a rule, open to criticism. Mr. VANDERLIP believes, what is not generally known, that we have fully paid off the indebtedness to foreigners which two or three years ago had reached a large aggregate, and are now in a position to command international credits. Whatever may be the outcome of the Presidential election, there is, in his judgment, no reason to apprehend any interference with business development. We note, finally, that the value of the corn crop, cotton crop, and wheat crop this year will amount to upwards of two billion dollars, whereas the value of these three crops was only a little more than a billion dollars ten years ago. On the whole, Wall Street seems to have regarded Mr. VANDERLIP's views as encouraging, for, although there was a brief pause, there was no prolonged slackening of the advance in prices on the Stock Exchange during the week ending October 22. Curiously enough, in summarizing the causes which had produced American prosperity in the past, and could be counted on to produce it in the future, he omitted to mention a high tariff.

The peace-makers who went to Brooklyn forgot to take their dose with them, and received this cheerful greeting from many young voters:

Boom-chick! Boom!
Boom-chick! Boom!
thom-jig! A-rig-a-jig!
A-rig-a-jig! Boom!
Boom! Get a rattap!
Bigger than a rattap!
Boom! Boom! Boom!
Cannibal! Cannibal!
Nab! Boom! Ah!
Brooklyn High School!
Hah! Hah! Nab!

They sighfully returned to Washington and renewed their application for a conference at the less strenuous Illinois.

A Lexington, Kentucky, despatch says that SIGNOR MORETTI has finished his model of the statue of WILLIAM GORREL, and that ARTHUR GORREL says it is very like. After election, when the monument committee has time to meet, the statue will be cast in bronze, and in due time set up at Birmingham. Meanwhile the papers hereabout report that ex-Governor BLACK of this State has volunteered to go to Frankfurt, Kentucky, after election and try to free young CALIA POWERS, who is under sentence to be hanged for the GORREL murder. It is a good errand for Mr. BLACK. He is an able lawyer, and capable of enthusiasm. In so far as appears POWERS has never had anything like a fair trial. Nobody who isn't a Kentucky Democrat believes that he is guilty, and a good many Kentucky Democrats are now doubtful about it. The case comes up for its final appeal next month. If Mr. BLACK can secure POWERS's release he will do a much more valuable service to the State of Kentucky than SIGNOR MORETTI can hope to effect by ever so fine an effigy of GORREL.

Where are the official "refutations" of Judge PARKER to step?—New York Evening Post.

Possibly when the Judge stops making statements that are refutable.

Professor ALEXANDER AGASSIZ has started off on the government steamer Albatross on a winter cruise to take deep-sea soundings in the Pacific, and to gather in such scientific loot as the deep-sea trawls bring up. The government furnishes the ship and the ordinary expenses of maintaining her in commission. The extra expenses, amounting to $75,000, are defrayed by Dr. AGASSIZ himself. The story that Mr. CANNON offered to pay them on the condition suggested by his advertising bureau, that the cruise should be known as the CANNON-AGASSIZ expedition, sounds likely enough. Dr. AGASSIZ, with Calumet and Hecla at his back, finds nothing embarrassing in a disbursement of $75,000, and preferred to pay for his own scientific pleasure. Mr. CANNON's bureau must be gradually accumulating very interesting material for a magazine article on Things Money Cannot Buy.

The prodigious exploit of the Baltic fleet in attacking the Hull fishing fleet in the North Sea suggests a possible revocation of the Can's license to operate war-ships. Automobils that run amuck get into trouble. What of a fleet that runs amuck? Will Europe tolerate the operation in European waters of a fleet that is subject to nightmare, and that fires off its guns by the hundred while under the control of hallucinations? No doubt it will, but not without some fervent protests.

The bishops and the deputies at the Episcopal Convention in Boston finally agreed upon a new divorce canon which provides that Episcopal clergymen may, if they choose, renounce innocent parties in divorce cases, but not until one year has elapsed since the divorce was granted. But the innocent party who wishes to be remarried in the Church must provide the bishop concerned with satisfactory evidence about the facts in the case, including the record of the court, if practicable, and other data. The bishop, having taken legal advice, shall then declare in writing, if satisfied, that the case conforms with the requirements of the statute. Then a clergyman may renounce the innocent party if he sees fit, but whether he does or not is left to his discretion. It is left to the bishops to decide whether their clergy shall administer the sacraments to persons suspected of having been married "otherwise than the Word of God and the discipline of this Church allow." Altogether a good deal has been done to discourage divorced Episcopalians from marrying again.

It was a public-spirited act of the late Dr. GEORGE S. CONANT, of New York, to bequeath his brain to Cornell University. Dr. BERT WILDER, of Cornell, is a recognized leader in investigations relating to the brain, and a good many brains of deceased persons come into his hands by direction of their former owners. It seems that Dr. CONANT, a physician of reputation, died of diabetes. The disease is held to be incurable, but is usually slow in its progress. Dr. CONANT watched his own case very carefully, and sought to add to medical knowledge by his observations. Because diabetes is suspected of originating in the brain, he wished that his brain should be examined and give up to science any secrets that it held.

The first thing Mr. HENRY JAMES did, upon his return to America after an absence of twenty years, was to go to a post-office and ask for a three-cent stamp.—Harper's Weekly.

As Mr. JAMES has corresponded with relatives and friends in the United States during his protracted sojourn in England and France, we are inclined to believe that the editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY is in a sportive mood.—Albany Knickerbocker.

A simpler conclusion might be that the Knickerbocker has the pleasure of its first foreign trip still in contemplation.

Ex-Secretary Root Replies to Mr. Cleveland

THERE is no doubt that a telegraphed report of the speech delivered by ex-President CLEVELAND on October 21 in Carnegie Hall, New York, had been read carefully by Mr. ELIOT ROOT when he now to address an audience of five thousand persons in Buffalo on the following night. We have before expressed the opinion that the ex-Secretary of War is the ablest man who, during the present campaign, has been active in the service of the Republican party. We do not hesitate to say that never has he more thoroughly vindicated the wisdom of that opinion than he did on this occasion. He evidently recognized that he had in Mr. CLEVELAND a man worthy of his steel, and that it behooved him to muster all his resources for the encounter. Of course the greater part of his speech had been composed and perfected before he learned of Mr. CLEVELAND's great deliverance in Carnegie Hall. It would not be fair to him, therefore, to note solely what he has to say by way of rejoinder to the ex-President, but we ought to listen at least a glance upon the array of data by which, in the earlier part of his address, he undertakes to prove the Democratic party incapable of governing. What evidence, he asks, has the Democratic party given of its fitness to govern? He concludes that there has been plenty of evidence. He admits that, before the great upheaval and political readjustment of the civil war, there was a Democratic party which had political principles—a party that believed in a strict construction of the Constitution, and in the confinement of the Federal power within the narrowest possible limits. In a few pregnant sentences Mr. Root confirms the record of that party. It opposed and destroyed, he reminds us, the National Bank of the United States; it denied the right of Congress to appropriate money for internal improvements, or to enact protective tariffs, or to interfere with the extension of slavery, because it believed that the Constitution granted no power to do those things. Mr. Root willingly acknowledges that, dominated by the master minds of the South, the Democratic party in the ante-bellum epoch was vigorous, able, and competent to govern. He would not belittle its achievements. It more than doubled the size of the United States. It annexed Louisiana; it seized upon Florida; it annexed Texas; it made war upon Mexico, and acquired New Mexico and California. Mr. Root adds, what is true enough and said enough, that the same party enforced the fugitive-slave law; with fire and sword it carried slavery across Nebraska to the virgin soil of Kansas and Nebraska; and when the awakened conscience of the North had decreed that its rule should end, nine hundred audacity it welcomed the ruin of the Union which it had so long controlled.

Mr. Root goes on to assert that since the civil war there has been no such Democratic party. There has been, he says, on opposition, organized under the name of Democracy. He insists, however, that the opposition has been composed of incoherent and warring factions, agreeing upon no principle, faithful to no principle, leaving in its principle, and held together only by a desire to turn the Republican party out of power and to secure the offices for itself. Mr. Root denies that there is anything in common between the old-fashioned, gold-standard, business men of the East, who call themselves Democrats, and the Populist followers of Mr. BREYER in the West, who also describe themselves as Democrats. As for the representatives of the South, elected on they are without reference to any national issue, but with sole reference to the galling questions arising from the presence of the black race in their section, the ex-Secretary of War maintains that some of them accept Republican doctrines, and some the ancient Democratic doctrines, and some the new Populist doctrines. In view of these facts, which he challenged opponents to dispute, Mr. Root reiterated the assertion that for forty years the controlling motive which has ruled Democratic platforms has been the wish to curb the public force of the moment; and the Democracy's only consistent rule of action has been to affirm what Republicans deny and deny what Republicans affirm.

No such for the indictment. Now for the specifications. What, asks ex-Secretary Root, do Democrats really believe as to the existence of strict limitations of the Constitution upon the powers of the Federal government? He begins with quoting the broad declaration repeated in platform after platform: "Resolved, that the Constitution does not authorize the Federal government the power to coin money and carry on a general system of national improvements." With this proclamation of party faith, Mr. Root invited his hearers to compare the Democratic platform of 1892, which declared that "the Federal government should cure for and improve the Mississippi River and other great waterways of the republic, so as to secure for the interior States easy and cheap transportation to tidewater." Or with the Democratic platform of 1900, which advocated "an intelligent system of improving the arid lands of the West, storing the waters for purposes of irrigation." He finally, with the Democratic platform of 1904, which said: "We favor liberal appropriations for the care and improvement of the waterways of the country. When any waterway like the Mississippi is of sufficient importance to demand special aid of the government, such aid should be extended." Again, we read in the same document: "We congratulate our Western citizens upon the passing of the measure known as the New East Irrigation Act for the irrigation and reclamation of the arid lands of the West." Is it not plain, asks Mr. Root, that to get votes in the Mississippi Valley, and to get votes in the States embracing the arid lands of the West, the strict construction of the Constitution, which the Democratic party still professes in high-sounding phrases, has been thrown to the winds?

What, Mr. Root proceeds to inquire, does the Democratic party really believe as to the tariff? He recalls the old declaration of 1860: "The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of progressive free trade throughout the world." How can this profession of faith be reconciled with the platform of 1872, which included the following clause: "Recognizing that there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade, we commit the discussion of the subject to the people in their Congressional districts, and to the decision of the Congress thereon, wholly free from Executive interference or dictation." In 1880 the Democrats reverted to the position taken by them in 1856, and in their platform demanded "a tariff for revenue only." Four years later they announced their conversion to sound protectionist doctrine, for, in their platform of 1884, they said: "The Democratic party is pledged to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests. In making the reduction in taxes, it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but rather to promote their healthy growth. . . . The necessary protection can and must be afforded without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing heavier rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may arise in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country." Even in 1888, although Mr. CLEVELAND had then become a convert in the project of a tariff for revenue only, the Democratic platform demanded simply "a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor." In 1892, however, when Mr. CLEVELAND had his way, the Democratic national convention planted itself firmly on the ground, which had been occupied by CALHOUN and the other inspirers of the Democratic party in the ante-bellum epoch, but it proclaimed in its platform: "We denounce Republican protection as a fraud, a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the Federal government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purposes of revenue only." In this emphatic affirmation the platform of 1904 recurs: "We denounce protection as a robbery of the many to enrich the few." Is a platform sentence the ex-Secretary of War sums up the multitudes, conflicting, and irreconcilable positions taken by the Democratic party on this question during the last half-century. Here we have, he says, the record of the American people asked for by the Democratic party upon the ground that it is in favor of free trade, upon the ground that the party assumes no position whatever on the subject, upon the ground that the party will give adequate protection by levying duties always equal to the difference between the wages at home and abroad, and upon the ground that protection is unconstitutional, and upon the ground that protection is robbery.

We turn to the concluding and impressive paragraph of Mr. Root's address, in which he said a suitable tribute to ex-President CLEVELAND, at the expense, however, of the latter's fellow Democrats. He pointed out that only once since the civil war has the Democratic party had an opportunity of showing by a practical test what it believes and really wishes to accomplish. In the second administration of GROVER CLEVELAND, the Presidency and both Houses of Congress were Democratic. Mr. Root submits that, during that administration, the Democratic party demonstrated decisively two things—one, that it had not the coherence and unity of sentiment needed to make intelligent governmental action possible; the other, that the worst element of the party is the element that is sure to control. There came the tribute to the character and abilities of the ex-President. Mr. Root said that, widely on some of his auditors might differ from Mr. CLEVELAND politically, they must all recognize the admirable qualities that have made his career so illustrious.

Mr. Root does not pretend to know whether Mr. CLEVELAND would have accepted another nomination for the Presidency, but he reminds us of what is common knowledge, namely, that in the St. Louis convention the bitter opposition of the two Democratic leaders named made a nomination of the ex-President impossible. Mr. Root adds that to-day Mr. GORMAN controls the Democratic campaign from the party headquarters in New York, while Mr. BURMAN, by inspiring the sole hope of the Democratic party in the State of Indiana. To these two men, more than to any others, Judge PARKER will owe his election, should he be elected. Is it probable that he will be guided by them, or by the men whom they detest? What hope, then,—such as Mr. Root's final query—is there of better things if power be placed in Democratic hands?

Photo-graph by H. H. Brown

MR. DUMONT CLARKE, PRESIDENT-ELECT OF THE NEW YORK CLEARING-HOUSE

Mr. Dumont Clarke, who was recently elected president of the New York Clearing-house, is one of the best-known bank presidents in New York. Mr. Clarke has been connected with the American Exchange National Bank for more than forty years, having entered its service in 1864. He succeeded Mr. George B. Cuy as its president, and is also a trustee of the Mutual Life Insurance Company.

Miss Bishop, Winner of the Women's National Golf Championship

Miss Lottie Rod, the visiting British Champion

Miss Vanderhoff, Winner of the Low Score Prize

Miss F. Ayres, Winner of the Approaching and Putting Contest

PROMINENT CONTESTANTS IN THE WOMEN'S GOLF CHAMPIONSHIP ON THE MERION LINKS AT HAVERFORD

The final of the women's national golf championship, which was played on the links of the Merion Cricket Club at Haverford, October 10 to 15, was won by Miss Georgiana Bishop, of the Brooklawn Golf Club, of Bridgeport, Connecticut. Miss Bishop defeated Mrs. E. P. Sanford, of the Essex County Club, of Orange, New Jersey, by 5 up and 3 to play. Miss Lottie Rod, the present women golf champion of Great Britain, took part in the championship meeting. She was beaten in the first match-play round by Miss Pauline Mackay, of the Oakley Country Club.

Photographs by T. G. Turner

THE LAST DAYS OF THE CAMPAIGN—THE FIREWORKS DISPLAY IN MADISON SQUARE AT THE REPUBLICAN
MASS MEETING, OCTOBER 19

One of the largest and most enthusiastic meetings of the campaign in New York was the Republican mass-meeting held in Madison Square Garden on October 19, at which ex-Secretary of War Elihu Root, Senator Fairbanks, and Frank W. Higgins delivered addresses. In Madison Square during the evening there was an elaborate display of fireworks, with torchlight processions and other demonstrations by various Republican clubs and campaign organizations.

Photograph by Hamilton

A View of the Labor Question

By Ralph M. Easley

Chairman Executive Council of the National Civic Federation

ASERIES of articles upon the labor question by Mr. John Keith, recently published in Harvard's Quarterly, has been of special interest because they are typical of a mental attitude toward this subject that has become unfortunately frequent among magazine and newspaper writers.

The prevalence of this mental attitude is not hard to explain. Up to the time of the strike the public had paid little more than passing notice to the labor question. The difficult possibilities when zero weather loomed up before the nation with empty coal-bins at that time set everybody thinking, talking, or writing on the great labor problem. About the same time some of the more conspicuously offensive incidents in the labor movement cropped out, such as Sam Parkison in New York; picketing funerals in Chicago; expelling union men for belonging to the State militia in Newberry, etc., etc. These occurrences naturally gave the average student of humanism a very unfavorable impression, as their frequent pens have since given innumerable evidences. Mr. Keith, in his very interesting articles, whether one of the old students or of the new, evidently was not wavering for trade-union virtues; and if there were any excesses he overlooked I do not now recall them. If the view were restricted to the array of hostile witnesses he summons, the reader would be quite ready to believe his conclusion:

"It may be set down as a general truth that the labor-union men in so far as is a rule, but in a thousand ways as an obstacle to the development of the country along the most scientific lines of economic advancement."

But suppose this method of criticizing labor-unions were applied to other social institutions; what would be the conclusion? Only the other day there was a hearty call for the police to remove the restaurant to prevent students of Columbia University from pounding one another into bloody insensibility during a class fight. The week before the daughter of a president of a college in Illinois was dragged out of bed by a gang of hawking students. Only a short time before that another incident of breaking a young man was taken out of night, hampered until several bones were broken, and thrown into a pond. Is it fair to single out such instances and to say that, therefore, higher education "acts as an obstacle to the development of the country?"

Again, many writers lay undue stress upon the fact that in isolated cases labor-unions have broken "sodium" agreements with employers. Every trade agreement has in truth all the solemnity of a contract. It is no defense of the gravity of such a condition to point out that an employer's agreement, which is called a "sodium" agreement, is "sodium" as the officials can reach the telephone, or that when goods are sold for future delivery and the price falls a large number of buyers—about seventy-five per cent, as stated—break by a prominent wholesale merchant break their "sodium" contracts through some pretext or other. The point is that while the breaking of contracts by labor-unions is a most serious matter, its occurrence is much less common than the public is led to believe. Where one labor union breaks a contract there are five hundred broken contracts with which organized labor has nothing to do.

Much stress is also placed upon the assumption that organized labor is opposed to the militia. This assumption is based upon the expulsion from a local union, controlled by radicals, of a member of the New York militia; a similar isolated act of folly in Michigan; and the unsupported testimony of a local witness in Boston. If true, this would be a serious charge. A special point is made of the New York case forbidding discrimination against members of the National Guard, causing the inference that it was passed to meet an impatience phase of unionism. The fact is not stated, however, that this law was equally directed at employers who had discharged or denied their employees for joining the militia and refusing themselves from business to attend to their own duties to the State.

Further investigation would show that many labor organizations have repudiated all spirit of antagonism to military service. For instance, the International Typographical Union voted down as antimilitarist resolutions by an overwhelming majority.

The recent demonstration of patriotic enthusiasm that followed the speech of the chairman of the executive committee, a printer from Georgia, in closing the argument against the resolution, would have excited no man sure, the approval of the most severe critic of organized labor.

Still higher authority was the reply made by Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, to a member who asked if a union man could be a conscientious member of the State militia.

"Yes, a member of the State militia can be seated in a trade-union. In fact, the matter is so obvious that it ought not to be open for discussion at all."

"A man who is a war-citizen and honestly working at his trade or calling to support himself and those dependent upon him has not only the right to become a citizen soldier, but that right must not be questioned."

"The militia—i. e., the citizen soldiery of the several States in our country—includes what otherwise might take its place—a large standing army."

"The difference between the citizen soldiery of the United States and the large standing armies of many European countries is the difference between a republic and a monarchy—it is the difference between the conceptions of liberty and tyranny."

The critics of labor-unions rarely omit the regulation statement that organized labor includes only a small minority of the wage-workers of the country. This estimate generally quotes the figure given by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which is based upon the claim that it is "monstrous tyranny for the small minority to dictate to the great majority of workers the wages, hours, and conditions of their toil" is that labor organizations contain only from eight to twelve per cent. of all wage-earners. But if a usual estimate is twenty-five per cent. of the skilled workers is its craft demands better conditions it is no answer to say that the farm-lands or the unskilled men are not organized.

The statistics most frequently made credits organized labor with a membership of about 2,400,000, which is only eight per cent. of the more than 29,000,000 persons engaged in gainful occupations in the United States in 1900. But an analysis of the gainful occupations shows the fallacy of the comparison. These 29,000,000 include: In agriculture, 10,000,000; domestic and personal service, 6,000,000; the professions, 1,200,000. Practically all of these are unorganizable and should be excluded from the comparison. Included also in the 29,000,000 are the 4,700,000 engaged in trade and transportation. But among these are bankers, carriers, mechanics, officials of banks and corporations, bookkeepers, commercial travellers, agents, accountants, brokers and owners, hucksters and peddlers, livery-stable keepers, undertakers, and miscellaneous workers, who are also unorganizable, and should be excluded from the comparison.

It is repeatedly asserted that there is no community of purpose between the union and the non-union man. The fact is that shorter hours, higher wages, and improved conditions are just as much desired by the non-union workers as by the unionists. Occasional brutal combats do not justify this broad conclusion.

When the 6000 union strikers went out at Fall River a few weeks ago they took with them 24,000 non-unionists, and the two are standing shoulder to shoulder, the families of the non-union workers being supported from the treasury of the union to the best of its ability. When John Mitchell called out his 8000 members at the time of the anthracite-coal strike in 1900, the 140,000 non-union miners went with them. When the railway brotherhoods contemned a strike they submit the matter to a vote of all the employees, non-union as well as union, the vote of every man counting equally.

Such experiences are common, and yet many writers would have us believe that unionists and non-unionists are natural antagonists.

Organized labor is charged with "defiance of the mandates of President Roosevelt's Executive Order No. 11806, which forbids the injunction issued by Judge Friedman of New York, 'against interference with non-union signers.'" was quoted as saying, "I am here especially to violate the injunction."

What is there in this charge? It may be said that Mr. Gompers was misquoted. But what is the substance of the charge? Mr. Gompers would have been clearly within his rights if he had uttered the words imputed to him. As a matter of record, the injunction in question was not "against interference with non-union signers." It merely forbade the signing of a petition to the National Treasury or to pay money out of their union treasury to assist signers who were in distress. The injunction was overruled as soon as it was brought before a higher court, thus sustaining Mr. Gompers.

Whether or not the injunction was sound, if it is plain that a disproof of its soundness, Mr. Gompers was exercising only a right that is brought daily into use in the courts. Was it a "defiance of the law" for President Hies of the Reading Railroad to refuse to obey a judicial order to testify before the Interstate Commerce Commission, until the Supreme Court had decided that he must? Did the promoters of the Northern Securities Company "defy" the law when the government of the United States was obliged to appeal to the Supreme Court to establish the constitutionality of the act and passing into law? And finally, and probably the most important, were within their legal rights. Any citizen may test the constitutionality of a law, whether in the form of a judicial mandate or of a statute, by appeal even to the highest court in the land. To assume otherwise would be to assume the infallibility of single court or of a legislative body. To assume otherwise would be to blot out as an instant all the system of appeals for which judicial machinery is devised.

In considering here the familiar charges against the unions of bad contracts, tyranny of management, exclusion to the militia, and defiance of courts, it is not intended to minimize by omission the array of crimes growing out of violence during strikes, ranging from petty assault to women-beating and murder, or the cases of corruption that have been exposed. But the deplorable offenses are as opposed to the principles of unionism as were the ante de jure and the sale of indulgence to the spirit of Christianity.

Granting all the charges brought against labor-unions in the true and multiple, the question is, "What is the result?" They would prove that some labor-unions and some labor leaders have committed grave offenses against society and against themselves. That proposition is admitted.

But it remains also the less true that the trade-unions of this country, no matter what percentage of all the wage-earners they include, or what incidental crimes they have committed, have a fundamental purpose which all will admit to be for the benefit of society as a whole. They are striving to improve the condition of the working masses. Organized labor is the only force of this kind, not only alone and unaided, but against the general opposition of employers, individual and organized, and against the misrep-

PRINCE SVIATOPOLK-MIRSKI, RUSSIA'S NEW MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR

Prince Sviatopolk-Mirski, who succeeds the late W. de Pléhv as Russian Minister of the Interior, is of Polish origin. He has served as adjunct of the Minister of the Interior and assistant to the Chief of the Gendarmes, where he won the predilection of General von Wühl. He has also been Governor-General of Vilna. Prince Sviatopolk-Mirski has attracted much attention by his recent declaration that he will be guided in his official conduct by a liberal administrative policy. In an interview given out at Vilna, the new minister declared his belief in the Russian "zemstvos," or local government boards, and advocated a more humanitarian attitude toward the Jews.

sentations of prejudiced critics, when, in fact, it covered the friendliness of their ally. Labor has consistently had to evolve its own leadership. It has made all the mistakes of unskilled generalship and undisciplined following. It makes them still. But the time has come when those who have some understanding of the hardships and misdirections that hamper the advance of labor are extending the sympathetic and of their superior intelligence.

There are associations of employers who would lead down the advance of labor with a bludgeon. There are other associated employers who would come to terms of mutual understanding.

The Business Outlook in London

By Sydney Brooks

London, October 27, 1904.

BY all reports and tokens we are in for a winter of exceptional distress. Trade is slack and the labor-market overstocked; a very general feeling exists that England has entered the zone of severe commercial depression. Taking London as a whole, the present lack of employment, even before the opening of November, is as great as, if not greater than, it commonly the case in the middle of winter. On this the officials who administer the poor law, the secretaries and agents of the innumerable charity societies, and the officers of the Salvation Army, who know the poor of London as no other Englishman knows them, were in full agreement. "During the twenty-one years that I have been working here," writes the vicar of Plaius, "I have never found so much distress at this time of year. I have already had to start the soupkitchen, which is not usually opened till Christmas time. I have done so because our lady visitors found the state of things so bad in the poorest districts that they begged for something to be done to provide food, at all events, for the children." What Plaius reports, Whitechapel, Stepney, Poplar, Canning Town, Ilford, near Kennington, and indeed every borough and parish in London outside the fashionable residential districts confirm. It was shown the other day a bundle of correspondence that has recently passed between one of the organizing secretaries of a Salvation Army bureau and some of the greatest contractors in the metropolis. He had sent out letters asking whether they could find or promise work for unemployed laboringmen. Of the two hundred replies received only one was in any degree satisfactory or held out the faintest hope. I have no desire to exaggerate conditions, but I see at present no reason to believe that want and idleness are to hold London in their ghastly grip this winter.

It was, I believe, Taine who remarked that the mildest inscription in the English language was the "Supported by Voluntary Contributions," which is found over numerous institutions of charity throughout the length and breadth of England. This can, indeed, be no question of the overwhelming response that is always made in this country to the call of distress. Whether it always chooses the right instruments and works along the best lines is another question. I have seen both success and failure in philanthropy at work in more than one country, and there can be little doubt that in London it displays the least intelligence and does the smallest amount of practical good. Last year I studied its methods at close range in the Canning Town district. Canning Town twelve months ago came into philanthropic notoriety. A correspondent of the most popular paper in the kingdom visited its public schools and found, of course, great destitution. "In class after class," he reported, "I saw rows of ragged, shivering boys whose faces told of real hunger. In some classes none kept the places near the fire for the boys with best clothes and no boots. At a neighboring school the normal number of practically or altogether shivering children—thirty—had mounted up fivefold, owing to the exceptional distress." The paper in which this appeared at once published a subscription list, and donors poured in. Another paper followed suit, and the charitable raised contributions. The local borough Council set aside $30,000 for relief works. Then came what the local vicar described as "that terrible institution, the relief committee," with its central and branch committees, managers and secretaries, all in correct style. I give the vicar's own account of its methods. "I am confident," he said, "of this—that it has not permanently benefited any but the very smallest fraction of the deserving. It would be strange, indeed, if in some cases kindly efforts had not shamed upon some deserving people. Let us put this to the credit side, modifying it always with the reflection that a half-hearted and a two-willing respecter of fact do not tend towards increasing a man's self-respect. . . . And then, again, I am only too willing to allow that temporary benefit has been conferred upon a certain section of the community: people who have grown too old or too feeble to work, who have no dreadly record against their names, and are maintaining a precarious existence in ways which it is rarely given to mortals to know how to have, in any instance, been temporarily assisted. And in a very short time the assistance ceases, and what permanent good has been achieved? Has one really assisted a 'case' when one has tied it over twenty-four hours and leaves it in as precarious a condition as one found it?"

Against this the vicar found—and I continue to quote him, because my own observations confirmed his conclusions—that among the body of applicants who received relief were a large number of the hopelessly improvident, the drunkards, and the vicious. He had received over two hundred such applications for assistance, and not one of them came from a bona-fide member of his church, and not one a single instance did inquiry show that

This second method, I am glad to say, receives more and more the approval of leaders of public opinion and of business and intelligent employers. In the multiplication of concrete examples of relations between employer and employed that are becoming the cause they are just, can be discerned a brightening outlook in the entire industrial situation. In this view national prosperity will be coincident with the uplifting of organized labor. The admitted errors may become fewer and its sincere cooperation with capital in increasing productivity more frequent. Some hopeful phases of the mutual progress of organized capital and labor in this direction I shall illustrate in a subsequent article.

The applicant was a subscriber to any of the sick and benefit societies in the locality or had ever made an effort to buy by money. On the debit side of the charitable invasion of Canning Town was to be placed, first of all, the fact that a large percentage of the utterly thriftless and undeserving received assistance; and, secondly, that at the end of a week or a month the vast majority of the assisted ones were no better off than when they were before. The vicar summed up the work of the relief committee as "a direct incentive to improvidence, a direct snare to the careful. It has left behind it little or no permanent benefit. It has assisted the undeserving and assisted them badly. . . . It knows no measure of the debt it owes to the community. It is in a year or a time some relief funds come to hand, it will find its old list of the same familiar names will recur with surprising regularity. And if it has not permanently relieved distress, it has augmented it. This is the history of it. It leaves a miserable legacy for others who are not less interested in the welfare of the poor than itself. It is heart-breaking. Men who live and labor among the poorest section of the community try to inculcate morality, sobriety, self-dependence, thrift, try to discourage drunkenness, idleness, and improvidence. See the work of many years shattered by a relief committee in the hands of well-meaning but utterly inefficient persons."

That, it will be agreed, is not the way to relieve distress. Still less is it to the public interest that the unemployed should be allowed to organize parades and processions and collect money from all and sundry. Last winter these parades and processions were an unspeakable feature of London life. Wherever you went you encountered them—long lines of the unemployed marching six abreast, north, south, east, and west, with a mounted policeman behind them and another behind another behind another. And with the processions went a small army of scouts and cadgers, each with his collecting-box. They would thrust them under the noses of passers-by; they would jump on the step of your hearse, they climbed the omnibuses, they would run for a quarter of a mile to get to the very carriage that they were to collect from and ladies inside. I remember standing in Regent Street watching one of these processions for a full half-hour. Needless to say, it utterly disorganized traffic and blocked the thoroughfare completely. What was the use of speculating on men who were completely sane? Some may have been genuine unemployed (others must assuredly were nothing of the kind. You saw men stamped with the ineffaceable mark of hereditary disease, of improvidence, of drink, of viciousness, the social failures, the unemployable, the irredeemably hopeless and unfit. It was not a pleasant sight, but even less pleasing was it to watch the money poured into the collecting boxes and to know that those who gave it had not the remotest conception of where it was going to or who was likely to get it. That was sentimentalism run mad.

This year there are signs that the problem will be tackled more scientifically and less spasmodically, in a spirit of reasoning power. Mr. Long, the president of the local government board, recently delivered a conference of the local government board, and has to consider the matter. From that conference there has issued a really workmanlike proposal. Briefly, it is this, that joint committees of the local boards of guardians and borough councils should be formed in each metropolitan district to operate with the parishes and charitable associations in the neighborhood. All the agencies of relief in any one district are thus brought into working touch and harmony. The next step is to apply the same principle of unification and cooperation to all the districts, and this also it is proposed to do. Practically, the administrative body is to be the local board, charged with the work of looking after the unemployed, insuring unity of aim and method throughout all London, and in receipt of constant information from the rural district councils in regard to places where there is lack of work on the land. Mr. Long's declaration of intent agrees, that the question of the unemployed is not a government and national, but a local question. That is the first principle that will be observed. I think we may also take it for granted that in any relief works that are started preference will be given to the unemployed over the unemployed, and to the men who have settled homes in London over the men who have not; that the employment provided will not be partial, but constant enough to secure the health and upkeep of the home till the back of the winter is broken; that there is a reasonable period of rest time; and that the work exacted will be such as to be a far closer supervision than has hitherto been exercised, such supervision, in fact, as a private employer of labor would insist upon, not solely for his own benefit, but for the well-being of the men themselves. I think it would sound and healthy to have the principle of increasing acceptance is a sign of the new English longing for efficiency.

The Field taking the Water Jump

"Good and Plenty," the Winner, clearing an Obstacle

Copyright, 1924, by H. W. Bradford, New York

The Winner, "Good and Plenty," and his Jockey, returning to Scale

Copyright, 1924, by H. W. Bradford, New York

THE LAST IMPORTANT STEEPLECHASE EVENT OF THE YEAR

The $11,500 Champion Steeplechase, the most important steeplechase of the year, was run at Morris Park on Saturday, October 12, the last day of the fall meeting. The race, which was for four-year-olds and upward, was won by Mr. Thomas Hitchcock, Jr.'s "Good and Plenty," over the three-and-a-half-mile course, in 7 minutes 15 seconds. The Queen City Stable's horse "Woodgatherer" was second place.

Japanese On and on the Body of Colonel Sugi

A Russian Artillery Trench after the Battle of Liao-Yang

Scene on Top of Shantung after the Battle

Japanese Bombarding the Liao-Yang Railroad Station with Guns captured from the Russians

PHOTOGRAPHS OF SCENES DURING AND AFTER THE BATTLE OF LIAO-YANG—THE MOST IMPORTANT ENGAGEMENT OF THE WAR

The reader is referred to the opposite page for other photographs he saw special correspondent sent a detailed description of this engagement

Photographs by A. C. Smith

Japanese Troops moving forward at the Battle of Liao-Yang

A Japanese Battery in action during the Battle of Liao-Yang

Japanese bringing Artillery into Liao-Yang on Flat-cars

PHOTOGRAPHS OF SCENES DURING AND AFTER THE BATTLE OF LIAO-YANG—THE MOST IMPORTANT ENGAGEMENT OF THE WAR

The photographs are snapshots of scenes and incidents during and after the battle of Liao-Yang, the most important engagement of the war thus far. In this battle, which extended over a period of several days, it is estimated that 300,000 men were engaged—more than twice the number that fought at Gravelotte. Field-Marshal Kuroki, in his report to the Japanese government, estimated the number of Japanese casualties during the fighting in the vicinity of Liao-Yang as 17,529. The Russian losses are estimated at 25,000. More than 1,000 Russian dead are said to have been buried by the Japanese in and around Liao-Yang.

Photographs by William Dieckhoff

A Street Decorated in Honor of the Japanese Victory at Liao-Yang

A Street Theatrical Performance representing the Struggle in the Far East

A Planchard Model of a Japanese War-ship displayed in a Procession

THE CELEBRATION IN YOKOHAMA OF THE JAPANESE VICTORY AT LIAO-YANG

The photographs are snapshots taken in Yokohama on September 5 during the celebration there of the Japanese victory at the battle of Liao-Yang. The occasion was marked by numerous ceremonies and displays. There were processions in the streets, illuminations at night, and other patriotic demonstrations in commemoration of the most notable triumph thus far of the Japanese arms.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

MR. WILL N. HARBEN is wise in sticking to Georgia. He knows it, root and branch, as Mr. Allen knows his Kentucky and Miss Wilkins her New England. I think it is his Mr. Howells who makes one of his characters say in his new novel, The son of Royal Leighton, that so great a way from the influence of his mother. Nor does he ever get far from the influence of the soil that bore and nurtured him. Mr. Harben is comfortably at home with his Georgia folks; he is as much at his ease telling a yarn of the countryside which nurtured him as is his own unimpeachable Georgian, Abner Daniel, when he lifts a chair back against a tree and leisurely draws out some humorous homiletic or racy reminiscence to an audience with eyes intent on the checker-board, but with ears so full of the rich, homely word of the old man's quaint speech and Mr. Harben's yarns are worth listening to; he knows how to tell a story; in his latest novel, The Georgians, he has mastered the art to perfection. Abner Daniel may be garrulous with his native drawl and deliberate manner, as is the wont of village philosophers—a garrulosity that is as pleasant and agreeable as the music of a purring brook with the sunlight playing and sparkling in its eddies; but in telling his story Mr. Harben has himself avoided that prolixity which hampered the narrative style of that former excellent novel of his, called after Abner Daniel. An author is not always successful in reviving a character in a previous book, and introducing him in a new title is another work of fiction, notwithstanding the approval and admiration that character may have elicited. Mr. Harben, however, has succeeded admirably in making Abner Daniel the hero of his new novel, and, indeed, we feel that we know him better and have stronger cause to admire and love him. "Abner was a farmer, tall, lank, thin-faced, with a tuft of gray beard on his chin and a constant twinkle of merriment in his eyes. He wore a dingy black alpaca coat, a pair of jean trousers, supported by bone-knitted suspenders, and stout brown shoes, never firmly tied."

That is a portrait sketch of Abner Daniel as we see him when he steps into the opening scene of the story. But it is only a sketch; it is only as we follow him through the successive scenes in which he plays a more human and philanthropic part than that of philosopher that we divine the nobility and grandeur of his nature beneath the quaint and uncouth exterior, the rough and unfettered tongue, the native homeliness and simplicity of demeanor. The story itself is a plain tale, wholly ingenuous and unaffected. It is in the treatment that its entertaining and refreshing qualities reside. There is a love-story—parted lovers, misunderstandings, wrongs to be righted, a crime to be atoned, and an innocent man to be set free, with a detective element which brings the sagacity and astuteness of Abner into play. The characterization is rich in humor, and Abner's quaint sayings and anecdotes adorn the pages. The close has a touch of satire which respects the ingenuities. Abner's plans have succeeded in bringing to the young lovers. "Abner had gone to the grave among the rose-bushes. He stood looking at the well-kept mound and the weather stained headstone for several minutes, then he peered out at the couple. He saw them looking towards him as they stood, each holding the other's hand. They were signalling to him. He saw the smiles and the glow on their faces, and understood. He answered back with a silent waving of his aid hat; then he looked down at the grave. 'If you'd just let me be,' he said, looking up, 'you'd see I'd be like them two.' He walked round to the headstone, his eyes full; a sob was shaking his breast. Suddenly he lowered his wrinkled brow to the stone; a lock of his gray hair fell over it carelessly." It is the last look we get at Abner Daniel—a beautiful finishing touch to the old man's portrait.

Will N. Harben, author of "The Georgians"

Readers of Wentworth Ho! will perhaps recall the famous paragraph on tobacco: "When all things were made none was made better than this; to be a lone man's companion, a bachelor's friend, a hungry man's food, a sad man's cordial, a useful man's sleep, and a chafy man's fire." There is a more modern and refined appropriation of the word for the curious connoisseur in the philosophy of smoking—it is from that popular novel of the moment, The Masquerader: "A cigarette is for the trivial moments of life; a cigar for its fulfillments, its pleasant, comfortable retrospectives; but in real distress—in the asking of questions, the fighting of difficulty—a pipe is man's eternal solace."

When The Masquerader appears on the stage (as it is announced to appear at the St. James Theatre, London, shortly), it will be interesting to see how the dramatist has succeeded in killing and silencing "forever after" the knowing Lady Asquith, who is the only one cognizant of John Leder's identity. Who should know it better? Had she not had an affair with him herself in that past they have both sufficient reason to ignore and forget? That, and the fact that she would probably be laughed at for her pains if she tried to expose Leder, are probably considered effective enough for the strong sway of audience with which the author closes her story. She simply lets it go at that, and leaves it to the imagination of the reader to weigh the possibilities or impossibilities of discovery. But on the stage it is different. There you must extricate your characters from a doubtful situation and satisfy your audience when the curtain falls that the villain is down and out and the hero and heroine beyond the power of villainy. Mrs. Thurelle's case is the more difficult because she rose above the ruling of The Prisoner of Zenda or Rupert of Hentzau, in which Anthony Hope found his solution. In the first through fight, and in the second through death. She has not only given room for the endurance of Italianism, she has taken her courage in both hands and defied convention by nuzzling her lovers in a daring yet reasonable way. For, as one writer puts it, "this is a story of a strong man and a strong woman, of their high-banded grasping of happiness in the face of the mental law and the boundaries set by social organizations."

A short time ago I learned that the original one of the three curates, per- of the three curates, per- trayed in Charlotte Brontë's Shirley was still alive. Miss Brontë's sketch, it will be recalled, was far from flattering, yet the Rev. James C. Bradley, who was the David Swetling of the story, not only bears no resentment toward the author for the liberty she took with him, but is inclined to be proud of the little immortality afforded him by Miss Brontë. Swetling was the young curate who played the flute and accompanied the young ladies at their music. "Charlotte was twenty-one or twenty-two," said Mr. Bradley, "and I must say I had no idea that she was writing books or was likely to put me into them. My impression always was that the girls were rather prim, but then they lived a very quiet life. Charlotte showed wonderful knowledge of character and great power in working out the characters of men and it is all the more wonderful because she never said anywhere and could never have seen any one."

A link with the Carlyle household has just been severed by the death of "Jennie," the "hereditary maid," frequently mentioned in Mrs. Carlyle's letters. Jennie—or Mrs. Brontë—always denied most indignantly the tales of domestic infelicity in the Carlyle home, and insisted that so far from being "a very ill to live with," Carlyle was the easiest man in the world to serve, so long as he could have peace and quiet in the house.

The American Idea

By Franklin H. Giddings

Professor of Sociology at Columbia University

PATRIOTISM is an ardent passion, but no patriot in his senses would make a supreme sacrifice for his country if he could foresee that her laws and institutions would be overthrown by a foreign power, which no human power could resist, or that her virtues and ideals would perish. If no patriotism is thus more true than of America, the American believes that his country is consecrated to supreme ideals. These he sees already realized in her life and institutions as nowhere else in the world. But he thinks of our country as the promise only of a democratic republic that is to be. His faith is strong that in the coming day America will be as much nobler in every moral excellence, as it will be greater in material power, than any other nation of the earth.

Yet because this faith is the substance of things hoped for, and not a certainty, he watches with a jealous eye every change in the composition of the American people and every development of manners, policies, and laws which seems to depart from the habits or the standards of earlier days. He has been taught, and never has doubted, that America stands for something new, peculiar, and infinitely important in human progress. He believes that there is an American idea, which has possessed the people from the beginning, and that to be faithful to it is our supreme duty.

If he were pressed to analyze this idea, he would tell us that America stands for freedom and opportunity, for popular sovereignty, for unexampled enterprise, pure morals, and enlightenment. He minded that the nineteenth century witnessed in other lands also the establishment of liberty, and a material and moral advancement of material conditions by science and invention, and that in art and literature America cannot as yet claim the foremost place, he would possibly condemn his thought into the assertion that the American people are "a chance every man," irrespective of his birth or belief, and backed up by his faith, whereby he creates certain objective conditions of equality. He would say, moreover, that other lands, in striking off their ancient fetters, have but accepted more or less hesitatingly the American idea, and he might justify his position by quoting Bryce's assertion that in her scheme of popular government America has set the pattern which all the world must follow.

Assuming that the American idea is a concept of freedom combined with certain essential modes of equality, it may be worth while to study it closely, inquiring how it came to be, and what it has already undergone significant changes; and asking then how it is likely to be affected by the revolution which is taking place in our industrial organization and methods, and by the re-composition of our population consequent upon continuing immigration.

Perhaps the most direct way to come to the kernel of the matter is to ask how far the American scheme of society has made the individual the object of its organization and effect. The objects which the Revolution and the framers of the Constitution had in mind were: independence of every power outside of their own land; government instituted, controlled, and removable by the people themselves; the securing of inalienable rights of life, liberty, and property to each individual. It is plain that the first two of these objects are means to no end, namely, individual freedom and opportunity. In the idealization of independence that end was put prominently first. The articles of the Constitution, however, which specifically guarantee individual rights, were an after-thought, embodied in amendments. This is not an insignificant fact. It testifies of conditions that must be understood if we wish to know when and how far the liberty of the individual became a controlling American ideal. Looking into them, we may discover that the disregard of individual interest which gives us so much sentiment in its modern manifestation by trusts and labor-unions is, in effect, all too true.

In one of his stories of Wyoming, Mr. Owen Winter remarks that "our man has been as good as another in three places—Paradise before the Fall, the Rocky Mountains before the wire fence, and the Declaration of Independence." This bit of satire is in a truer outline of American history than most of the text-books. American political history as it has been written has read back into the records of colonial life the thought of a later time, and has given an exaggerated color of idealism to the colonial purpose, thereby making our later progress seem less than the reality. So far from beginning its career with an ideal of individual freedom, the American people began with an exceedingly vivid idea of group freedom. Only through its regression and the disintegration of group solidarity has construction of the individual been made possible. The struggle for group freedom, at first all-controlling, continues, and the group idea still has a powerful hold upon the people. There came a time, however, when the idea of the individual emerged, and it is slowly gathering strength.

The Pilgrims were our first advanced in their political thinking that most folk of their day; but they deserted England and afterwards Holland, not with any thought of establishing each Pilgrim to hold his own conception of God or of the state, or to worship or not as he pleased, or to enable Pilgrims colonies to flourish without external restraint, and to create a commonwealth according to their own ideas. The Puritans would have laughed to scorn the radical who should have suggested that in the colony of Massachusetts they might render a moral verdict of variance with the theocratic code. The Quakers and the Baptists, presumably, had consciences, but freedom to follow the guiding rays of their own inner light they certainly did not enjoy. Their history perfectly exemplified the early American idea of group freedom. All that they had to do was to get out of the community in which they were not satisfied, and establish a plantation, a town, a city, and make a community of their own; not, however, of free individuals, any more than their parent colony was. As a group they might be free; no one would interfere with them. As individuals they must accept a common judgment and bow to a common will.

The same thing was true in its various degrees of all the other groups which together made up the colonial people. In England, in Holland, in France, in northern Germany, and in Sweden, there was an every hand a sorting out, a congregating of buds from a further into colouring groups, each of which wanted freedom in the sense of independence from outside interference. Subsequently, in the colonies, the process was repeated. The dissatisfied or persecuted formed new groups, which broke away to lead an independent life. Such, for example, was the history of the river colonies of Connecticut—Hartford, Wiedner, and Waterbury.

During the Revolutionary and nation-forming periods the older group consciousness became partly merged in the principles of local self-government and State sovereignty. Through the process of sorting out and segregation, which has been described, nearly every one of the thirteen colonies had acquired a certain character of its own.

If, now, we ask what influences have been effective in partially disintegrating group solidarity and bringing forward the concept of the individual in the American mind, the answer is that attention will be directed upon communities later in origin than those thus far considered, different in character, and brought into existence by a different process.

Population can be democratic only if it is composed of elements sufficiently like-minded to agree upon a general scheme of social order, and to hold in common hatred an authority imposed upon them without their consent. A democratic community gives free play to individuality, however, only if its units are in most respects alike, or if they are so little acquainted, that they can be no means agree upon an elaborate plan for the detailed regulation of individual life. Self-governing societies which have so strong a sense of "purpose" that they need must control the individual in every thought and act of his existence are not only highly unsocially like-minded, but are also unsocial. They have long been acquainted, and are acutely aware of one another's "isms." Usually they have sprung from bands of kindred or neighborhood acquaintances like the Pilgrims of Scrooby, or the Companies of Puritans from Dordrecht. Since, which from the first have given full scope to individual initiative, are organized in a congregation of units originally strange to one another, hailing from various parts, and having at first so thought of any common creed or policy, but alike in their venturesome nature and in their conviction that the restriction of individual freedom in their practical, unrestrained life. While the American nation began in a phenomenal aggregation of highly self-conscious communities, each caring supremely for its own group freedom, it has subsequently grown chiefly through the multiplication of communities sprung from unacquainted elements, and in these the true American idea has been nurtured. Because these communities created from elements in a broad sense like-minded, but otherwise most heterogeneous, have been more numerous and vigorous than in any other land, and have spread over a continental domain, and because already they are shaping our polity and destiny, the vital individualism which they have created is rightly called American.

Apparently the first American society formed from imperfectly acquainted and somewhat heterogeneous units, seeking only economic advantage, and cherishing no collective purpose, was that of Virginia. The homogeneous Bernaboe company which went to the coast of Maine, became discouraged and returned to England. The Virginia colonists were an aggregation of adventurers, so that as they tried to get out of the country, a common scheme imposed upon them at the outset nothing went well with them. Their differences of individual nature and interest shattered the plan, and they scattered over the fertile land, every man for himself, and all as crazy over fabulous wealth in tobacco as the men of the time for plundered California gold. In that free life of the tobacco-planning adventurers of Virginia was born the spirit of the Western pioneer, to whom, far more truly than to the men of the East, we owe the creed of individual liberty. Abraham Lincoln, the type of American individuality, perfect embodiment of the American idea, was a son of the pioneer and of the blood of Virginia.

In the mountains of Pennsylvania there presently appeared, quite independently of any of the earlier colonial enterprises, a hardy Scotch-Irish stock, endowed with instincts which particularly were for the pioneer life. Keeping close to the Alleghenies, they stock spread southward through Virginia and the Carolinas into Georgia. Their contact and intermingling with the Virginians moving westward, was particularly fruitful of mingling enterprises and personal self-reliance. From Virginia the great current of the "western movement" swept over the coast of the Alleghenies and through Kentucky into Indiana and Illinois, and thence on to the plains and the Pacific coast. To a remarkable degree that early spirit of individualism has persisted in its pioneer communities.

What has been the process of individual emancipation in the (Continued on page 1713.)

The "Sivoutch" as she looks now in the Liao River

A View of the Deck of the "Sivoutch"

THE ABANDONED RUSSIAN GUNBOAT "SIVOUTCH" IN THE LIAO RIVER

The photographs show the Russian gunboat "Sivoutch" as she lies at present thirty miles up the Liao River. She wintered at Nerechuan, and was unable to join the Russian fleet in the spring. She was disabled by an explosion of her magazine, after which her crew abandoned her. The natives have looted everything aboard, including the masts and rigging.

Miss Edna May in a Scene from "The Schoolgirl," at Daly's

Miss Edna May heads the company which is appearing at Daly's Theatre in "The Schoolgirl," a musical comedy by Paul M. Potter, Henry Hamilton, and Leslie Stuart. The central character is a schoolgirl at a French convent, whose parents are determined to marry her to a rich unknown, while she prefers an imperious young artist. The situation is relieved, after various comic adventures, by "the schoolgirl's" elopement, who brings the lovers together at the same time that she succeeds in capturing the heart of the wealthy suitor.

Marie Dressler and Messrs. Weber and Morris in "Higgledy-Piggledy," at the Weber Music Hall

The Weber Music Hall was opened for the season on October 20 with a new piece called "Higgledy-Piggledy." The piece is concerned with the love-affair of "Mlle. de Chartreuse," of the French aristocracy, and a young American dependent upon the bounty of his wealthy uncle, who desires him to marry the daughter of his friend. Complications of the old Weber-Field sort furnish the fun of the piece.

THE STAGE IN NEW YORK

MISS MABEL TALIAFERRO AS "LOVEY MARY," AT THE SAVOY

Miss Taliaferro, who is one of the youngest actresses on the stage, plays the part of "Lovely Mary" in "Mrs. Winslow of the Cabbage Patch," now playing at the Savoy Theatre. Miss Taliaferro's last appearance in New York was as "The Fairy Child" in W. B. Yeats's play, "The Land of Heart's Desire," given here last year by the Irish Literary Society.

His Back Half Hour

by
MARGARET SUTTON BRISCOE

"Is Miss Tannet at home?" asked Governor Worden.

Miss Tannet's butler opened the door widely and stood aside with the grave gravity by which he was wont to greet this personage, who was, no doubt, the Chief Executive of the State, but also as he had cause to suspect, the favorite lover of his mistress. With the latter growth of knowledge the manifestation of the nonaffection, however, was not so evident. When the ends betray like passions as ourselves we may love more—we worship less.

"Miss Tannet," invited her butler, "is expecting your Excellency. She is unavoidably detained, but will join your Excellency presently in the library, if your Excellency will wait there for her."

His much belated Excellency, with little choice in the matter, moved towards the library as one who knew the way, and entering the door, respectfully, thrown open for him and softly closed, was in the room which through these latter days had held his happiest hours.

It was a room of stately furnishings, yet homelike, seductive, with an atmosphere as of consumed reserve and peculiarly gracious welcome which lured every talking, and then—never talk. In a word, the room expressed its mistress. It would not have been like Milliecent Tannet to hold aloof from the political activities which were her father's life and make for herself a secluded feminine nest. Within these four walls State secrets had been discussed, diplomatic moves won and lost, and yet there were every where present those pretty, unobtrusive signs of a dainty woman's constant occupation. A woman's carefully appointed desk stood in the shadow of the curtained window. A woman's gloves, her veil, lay on a chair—Milliecent's.

Governor Worden crossed the room to where the gloves lay and stood drawing them across his palm slowly. Everything about Miss Tannet was exquisite: even her gloves seemed to have the suggestion of her sanguine yet delicate personality.

Years older than the woman he loved, engrossed in his profession, it might never have occurred to Governor Worden to seek what it now seemed impossible to think of living without, but for a sudden suspicion that Milliecent—smiling suggestion!—savored her him. Since his childhood, when his friend's motherless little girl had appealed to his sympathies, he had been wretched over her, kind in unexpected ways, more than once interfering to suggest a stricter care, a more close fatherly attention; then suddenly it was his right, his privilege, to be to her all that her father was not in care and tenderness, and her lover as well.

The clock above the fireplace struck the hour, eleven, and Governor Worden had down the gloves, looking up at the fireplace with dissatisfaction. He had an engagement to meet soon after the noon hour, and these last minutes were shortening his time allowance. He hesitated, glancing toward the library bell as if half desirous to summon Miss Tannet's servant, but on second thought he turned and took up a package which, on his entrance, was laid aside with his hat and gloves. It had been handed to him by a messenger as he left his house; the seal was still unbroken.

Breaking open the package, he now drew out the contents—a second envelope with envelopes and a letter. He glanced at the signature of the letter, and his frown deepened as he attentively read the communication itself:

"YOUR EXCELLENCY.—In the course of a recent call at the office of a certain journal whose editors are under some slight obligations to me, I was shown a package containing several letters and photographs awaiting publication. One of such of these I take the liberty to enclose, having with difficulty obtained them. How they fell into the hands of the above-said journal I was not informed. The publications contemplated would probably be in the customary semi-digested form, but it occurred to me that your Excellency might prefer entire suppression. If this is the case and I am notified, at the address above, by noon, or a little later, to-day, I think I can bring pressure that will secure the immediate destruction of the remainder of the package. Absolving your pressure in the matter. Yours respectfully, HENRY BERAND."

On the back of the envelope enclosed was scrawled the name of a notorious journal that lived by its lies.

"Blackmail! And the cheapest kind of blackmail!" said Governor Worden, aloud. He stood with the unopened envelope in his hand, looking down at it.

He knew what Henry Berand wanted and the least that would satisfy him. A third-rate politician, yet called a "useful man," his claim to some recompense for services in the late campaign had been persistently urged upon the Governor, and the minor appointment where his Excellency had refused to place Berand was still unfiled. Persuasion having failed, this was the next move in order. Governor Worden had not passed through his many years of public life to escape attempts at blackmail, and his simple, invariable custom had been coolly to show the donor to both evidence and sponsor. Why in this case he hesitated he hardly knew, but after a moment's pause he shook out the contents of the envelope: in so doing they somehow escaped from his hand and fell to the floor. As he glanced down, with a start of recognition he saw the lovely, piquet face, the girlish, appealing eyes, of the woman he loved looking up at him. His instant emotion was a quick, instinctive repulsion from the thought that Berand, a camp-follower of the great political army, whom Milliecent could never have known, should never so boldly intrude in his possession, however briefly, so intimate a memorial of her. It was a photograph, one he had never seen before, a charming likeness, but a younger Milliecent, less formed, less conventional than the world more knew her, though no more freshly beautiful. Across the center of the card in her unique, graceful handwriting—this, too, was formed then more—was traced "Your Milliecent." Beside the photograph lay the scattered pages of a letter. The letter, paper, blue-lined, with an odd interred fibre, Governor Worden recognized as familiarly as he had the photograph. Although a woman of noble, Miss Tannet was independent and faithful in her fancies. This blue, watered paper, on which her lovely womanly letters now came to him, was the same that she had used in her young girlhood, when she had acknowledged the little gifts he sent to her. It was a paper her father imported for his dainty, fastidious daughter, whose whims he was thus as careful to indulge as if he were the thoughtful parent he never had been when more serious matters were in question.

Governor Worden stooped hastily gathering up the letter and photograph. Milliecent's light step was on the stairs, the rattle of her gown at the door. But as he thrust the blue sheets, with the photograph, into their envelope, one of the loose pages unfolded in his hand, and his unwilling eyes identified that same immature handwriting, caught the repeated signature "Your Milliecent." He flung the package aside on the table as the door opened.

"I have always thought," said Governor Worden, as he stood looking into the antique, round mirror that hung above the library fireplace, that this was the most fascinating thing I ever saw. Apparently he was thinking aloud, his elbow on the mantel, his back to the room, but his eyes were not on the mirror's beautiful, gilded frame, with its ropes of wreathed garlands, its cupid; he was gazing at the charming image crossing the glass. The image responded by drawing nearer and lifting a laughing, mischievous frown against his shoulder. She was so near that her lover had only to raise his arm to draw her close to him, only to bend his head, and his face was pressed upon her soft filled cheek, her soft dark hair.

"Do you really like that mirror as much?" said Miss Tannet. "I don't know—I don't think I admire it extravagantly, not today, anyhow."

"Not that is too farfetched, Milliecent!" laughed Governor Worden. "Suppose I did not contradict you—how disappointed you would be."

"Yes, I think I should," she admitted, "for, you see, I kept you waiting in order to appear in my new, new gown. Don't tell me you didn't notice it, George. You would break my heart. Isn't it lovely?"

She tried to move aside to show her pretty flowing plumage, a gown of soft, shaded, pastel gray that both enhanced and subdued her brilliant face, her deep, dark eyes. It was the color which, as they both well knew, he loved best to see her wear.

"It is—it is perfect!" said Governor Worden, his eyes never leaving her face.

"Flatterer! But then I love to be flattered. I never was particular about hearing that truth and other make such a lot about. It's these unobtrusive, delightful bits, particularly from your Excellency"—she curtsied low in her frothy gray mist—"that I have a weakness for; when you, the Governor of the State—"

He stretched out his arm and drew her back to him, bending to show her trailing lips, but again she broke away, and from a little distance looked up at him, her manner, her face, altering suddenly, still laughing, but wistful.

"Why do you care for me, George? What made you? You could have had— Why, you could have had—any one! And yet, you—"

"Hush, Milliecent! Come here, sit by me. I want to talk sensibly with you."

"Is that sensibly? Then tell me first what you have here in

"Once? Only once!" said Governor Worden.

"Don't laugh! I wanted you to know, because I really want to try to be worthy of you—to be as direct, as truthful as you always are."

"My dear, you are not a man!"

But she went on unheeding. "I don't want you to be thinking of me as better than I am."

"Not, dear child," don't. Have I ever said I thought of you as a particularly good little girl?"

"No, don't be nice to me yet. I haven't confessed the worst yet. I don't think you can know how hard it is for me to tell."

"It's hard because it's so totally unnecessary, Millicent."

He looked down at her, smiling quizzically, but in earnest.

"Do you think yourself quite the type that is made in a hurry? When you did not the honor to accept me, I never, not for a moment, was in latitude as to breathe. I dropped from a perfectly clear sky into your full, brilliant life. I knew I fell on my feet—that's enough for me."

Miss Tarnet laughed in spite of herself.

"I don't think this is very nice of you. You make me feel as if I were a morbid, confounding schoolgirl. But I know I am right. I know it is important for me to be frank with you."

"Is it half as important as that I can not stay with you longer than noon to-day? All this retrospection and introspection is crowding out something so faintly more precious and ennobling. But clear your conscience if you must, drastically, first understand clearly, whatever has been, can only have helped to make you—just what you are; and that—to me—is perfect."

She drew a little away from him, as if his nearness unnerved her, and spoke gravely:

"From the day I was engaged to you I have known I should sometime feel I must tell you all this, and I have considered over and over how, after I had told you, I could ever make you understand that it isn't exhibition now that—that—Oh! it isn't like me, saying all this. No. Let me go on now. What I want you to know is—It was not just a school-girl fancy that came and went lightly, wasn't much more than a schoolgirl—but I don't mean to begin with excuses. No one knew but our parents, and it was my father who broke the engagement. It had seemed to be a very wealthy marriage for me, and suddenly all the money was lost. It was then my father decided I was too young to know my own mind. But—he wasn't one to be lightly forgotten. I owed him, I owe him still, very much in very many ways. It was he who taught me to love little children. I have never seen any one who loved and perfectly understood them as he did. It was some time before I got over it. I couldn't at first part with his ring. I did worse! I let him love me, harm, and I love. I was to send his ring back to him in I ever wished to release him, and—I have only lately released him. I wear his ring on a chain about my neck up to the very hour you spoke to me. Then, of course, it was sent back at once. It had gradually come to be a kind of talisman to me, I think. It seemed to keep me from thinking of any one else; still I found myself caring before I knew it—for you knew it. I couldn't have acted worse, you see. I haven't always thought so, but now I think I have been seeing it as I thought you would. That's why I must tell you. But do you understand that it isn't satisfied ambition now that makes— Her voice died away.

Governor Worden had sat motionless, listening gravely, watching her white face, her quivering lips. As his tremor broke her voice he spoke at once, quietly and very gently.

"Yes, I ought to have known this. You were right to tell me. I have never seen you so stirred, Millicent. You are still so young there must be the natural appeal to you in the memory of a young lover with his future all before him. I have only the best of a life to offer you, and that—absolutely—tied my right to ask you for your youth, your bloom. Listen to me, dear! Don't speak yet. You say you have but lately released him. It is not likely that he has forgotten you—No! I can act as your father might—and this time—Millicent!"

She was in his arms, on his breast, clinging to him with a passion of adoring, an abandon of distress. He could only soothe her, holding her close, comforting her, his face against her tear-wet cheek, answering her broken sobs, his silent carousers. But she would be answered in words.

"Yes," he yielded at last. "Yes, Child, I am only too easy to convince! Yes, I promise. No, I will not again. But I can offer you as little that youth cares for—Love, can't you understand?"

"It seems to me," said Governor Worden, "that this is the ordained moment for the presentation of my gift. We can regard it—can't we?—as a second betrothal betrothal. Then you won't mind if it is a bit sumptuous; it ought to be."

Miss Tarnet smiled her answer. The bright color had come back to her cheeks, her eyelashes were still as he held them, her dark eyes shone out, brilliant, yet softened.

"Give me your hand and shut your eyes," said Governor Worden.

He was stripping the rings from her right hand as he spoke.

"Now remember, this cost much less than its value; think of it, oh, woman, as a bargain! I confess it does rather hurt out as one opens the box. It will be subdued on your hand. The setting is unusual, and the color is really magnificent. There! It fits to perfection—as if it were made for you. No, don't open your eyes yet. I'll tell you what it looks like. Of course you feel it's a ring. It's a great big antique gold ring, blood, blood-red, held between two emeralds and diamond hearts. I told you not to look yet!"

Miss Tarnet had opened her eyes and she sat gazing at the ring on her hand. She did not move or speak. The smile had bit her red lips, which were slightly parted. It was as if the sight of the jeweled ring had turned her to stone; she seemed set to bronze.

"You do like it, then?" said Governor Worden.

He looked at her quizzically, and her dark eyes met his, frightened, doubtful.

"Oh, take it away! Take it off—quickly! Suppose I hadn't told you, suppose you had learned it—this way. I can't wear it. Don't you understand? It's the—this ring I told you of, the one I have worn!"

"As for this," said Governor Worden, closing the ring-box upon its contents, "you have no cause to wonder what we can do with it, for I have already decided. I mean to have the beautiful

Not quizzing . . . as if the night of the jeweled ring had turned her to stone

Rulers of Kings

by
GERTRUDE ATHERTON
Author of "The Conqueror," "The Aristocrats"

IN this novel is pictured the conflict between the two greatest forces in the world—American wealth and European royalty—in which the former triumphs. Gertrude Atherton, from whom the reading public has learned to expect surprises, has evolved a story both daring and original. Fessenden Abbott, the son of America's most colossal millionaire, in the midst of great financial undertakings that are watched by all the world, falls in love with the daughter of the Austrian Emperor. In her heart duty to the weakening monarchy of her fathers battles with an overmastering love for the young American. How Fessenden Abbott bends the will of emperors and alters the diplomatic relations of kingdoms to win the girl he loves is an original and most romantic piece of fiction writing.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

In Search of the Unknown

By
ROBERT W. CHAMBERS
Author of "The Maid of Paradise," "Gardens," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

Sir Mortimer

By MARY JOHNSTON
Author of "To Have and To Hold"

THE love of Sir Mortimer for the fair Damaris Sedley, a lady-in-waiting, holds unswerving course through a narrative alive with stirring incidents of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh, when all England loved, sang, adventured, and fought, in the flush of youthful power. Herein is a love story of uncommon charm cast among stirring scenes—love in the lap of adventure, set forth with rare imaginative power.

Readers of "To Have and To Hold" will welcome in this tale of love and gallantry the distinct advance Miss Johnston has made upon her former success. The romance is instinct with new life and color, like the golden days with which it deals.

"The witchery of romance pervades its scenes, and once in the grasp of the story the reader will be swept along the current to the end."—Chicago Chronicle.

"Her thousands of admiring readers will thank her for the book—a strong, vigorous, original story, with honor as the theme."—Sprague Herald.

"May be classed among the gems of modern novels."—Birmingham News.

"She has reproduced in a wonderful manner the time of Elizabeth, with all its greatness and its littleness."—N. Y. World.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

THE GIVERS

BY
MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

HEALTH IN THE FOOD

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Everyone knows that Royal Baking Powder is absolutely pure. Hence all who bake use it with implicit confidence and without question, and they are justified in so doing.

But how few realize that Royal Baking Powder in its chief ingredient, cream of tartar, is a direct product of the healthful and delicious grape.

Fruit acids are indispensable to the health of the body, and those of the grape, as used in the "Royal," are the most valuable and healthful of all.

Hence it is that Royal Baking Powder produces food remarkable both in flavor and wholesomeness.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVING

HARPER & BROTHERS

NEW YORK

THE MASQUERADER

by

KATHERINE CECIL
THURSTON

ILLUSTRATED BY
CLARENCE F. UNDERWOOD

Two men, not related, but looking absolutely alike—one married, the other a bachelor—secretly change places. The novel develops along lines new to fiction, and is a forceful, compelling story; not a story of style and words, but a story of doing, a history of life in action. The moral problem involved is a strange one.

A CURIOUS LETTER

When this story was running serially people kept writing in begging eagerly for advanced proofs, one reader pleading that he had heart disease and fearing that he might die before the story ended. Such was the breathless interest in the story.

COMPARED WITH "MONTE-CRISTO"

While it was running in Blackwood's—the oldest magazine in England—one of the oldest subscribers wrote to the editor: "Never since I waited feverishly sixty years ago for 'Monte-Cristo' have I been so excited by a story. And Mrs. Thurston has given me what Dumas did not—a perpetually increasing wonder as to how the adventure is to end."

LIFE OVERRUNNING

The N. Y. Evening Mail says: "This is the story of a strong man and a strong woman and their high-handed grasping for happiness in the face of the moral law. The woman, magnificent in her love, rises above considerations of conventions, above fear, above conscience. Circumstances give her the right to follow the dictates of an overwhelming passion. . . . It will take rank with the few really good books."

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, November 12, 1904

NO. 2469

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved.

MARQUIS HIROBUMI ITO

The most influential Man in Japan—four times Premier, and now principal Adviser to his Majesty the Emperor

From a copyrighted photograph by H. G. Posing, world correspondent of "Harper's Weekly" in the Far East

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII

No. 2499

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 12, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post Office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 43 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

THE Herald's prediction has been triumphantly fulfilled. The people have decided. In view of the fact, however, that these words are written several days before the result is announced, our comment thereon must be postponed until next week. The duty which last week we said confronted every true patriot, namely, to be as cross as the finish as possible, was abundantly performed. The Judge himself blazed the way. In the interest of historical accuracy the fact must be recorded that on October 31 he woke up and began to run for President instead of for Chief Justice. He was a little late, but, having once started, did make life interesting, especially for the great and good father and his patient Fanny. He also checked up Mr. PLATTEN, whose distress of mind over the candidate's apathetic attitude had reached an acute stage. All other so-called issues were set aside, and the Judge personally led the last desperate charge up corruption hill. Whether he succeeded in driving all before him as effectually as his rival at San Juan the reader may determine by glancing at the head-lines in his favorite daily auction poster.

Despite the noticeable absence of silly street parades, blazing torches, and flapping banners, it has been an interesting and useful campaign. Genuine interest has really been aroused in our national problems. A sufficient number of speeches and letters have been heard and read to foster in the minds of the people a sober realization of the necessity of paying more strict attention to the conduct of our public affairs. We venture the prediction that the next Congress will be watched more closely, and its debates followed with keener zest, than has been observable in many years. While it is too much to hope that we may promptly overcome our happy-go-lucky tendencies, and take as serious a hold of the affairs of our great Federal corporation as the English do, for example, yet no observer can doubt that the wide-spread interest created during the progress of the campaign of 1904 will continue in a greater or less degree. If, as we believe, this should prove to be the case, the election, expensive as it has been in some ways, will have been worth many times more than it has cost.

Nor has the usefulness of the campaign been impaired by the injection of good nature. In common, we hope, with our readers, of whom, by the way, there are many thousands more than at the beginning of the canvass, we ourselves have the satisfying recollection of an enjoyable experience. Without pretending to be independent, we have been, and have therefore revelled in the opportunity to elucidate our simple but expressive platform. It is with regret that we now part with some of the more charming characters of the play. We shall miss the Colonel and the Judge, but there will ever remain a warm spot in our affections for Mr. ICEBERG, Grandpa, Secretary PEARL, sly old Uncle DAVID, Dr. NILES CANNON SWALLOW, TOM, GEORGE WILLIAMS FAIR, and even the COCKBURN and the CHIM. It is fitting, however, that now they should assume their more dignified parts, and with gratitude for the entertainment they have afforded us in the past, we look hopefully to further and better acquaintance in the future.

Nor should we overlook, as we approach the joyous Thanksgiving-time, our indebtedness to the solemn editors. It is a curious psychological fact that when a plain human being, subject to the ordinary frailties of mankind, gets to be the editor of a great newspaper he almost invariably becomes so convinced that he deceives even himself. Being so situated that the other man cannot even talk back unless he see fit to permit him to do so, there gradually grows up within the inner consciousness of the truly great journalist a sincere conviction that he really does know it all. Incidentally he is the most sensitive person living—a fact which has been of inestimable service to us in our gentle endeavors to encourage in their thoughtful intellects the growth of a love for truth and the exercise of common sense. On the whole, as we look back, we cheerfully bear testimony to the fact that they have done pretty well. It took Mr. PLATTEN a long time to find the penitent spirit which he had put aside temporarily, but he finally did, and now resumes his rightful position as the foremost living journalist. Dr. McKELVAY also ceased to be blantly fair after a time, and made an eminently successful demonstration of the fact that a strong clear light may burn even in darkest Brooklyn. MARSE HENRY, of whom Mr. O'SULLIVAN writes entertainingly on another page, slipped a minor cog, but it was with the tongue, not with the pen, which we are happy to observe continues to be as fascinating as ever. Upon the Tribune fell the burden of successfully defending the acts of an ideal administration, and we cheerfully testify that it has performed its part in a manner that should prove gratifying to the shade of HORACE GREELY. Mr. LIPPIN's previous expressions of approval of qualities not exemplified by Mr. ROBERTS left the San in a somewhat awkward position, from which, however, it extricated itself most nobly, by supporting the Democratic candidate for Governor.

The Evening Post's growing habit of criticism incurred a hasty utterance against the same candidate which was not calculated to aid materially the candidacy of JUDY PARKER, but it effected as complete recovery as was possible by promptly adopting a policy of oppressive silence. The Herald's departure from its traditional disposition to support nobody and nothing has been crowned by a result which Mr. BENNETT is now doubtless contemplating with divergent emotions. Of all the newspapers in New York, the one which has approached most closely to what an American newspaper should be in straightforwardness and tone, the Times stands first. To Mr. HENRY's papers must be accorded, at least, recognition of consistency. Being radical, their support of the Democratic ticket under the conditions existing could not be other than that resulting from a choice, as they considered, between two evils. Moreover, Mr. HENRY's refusal to decline a ratification of his nomination for Congress by the Populists, at the behest of the Tammany chief, was manly and praiseworthy. Finally, Mr. STODOLSKY, in taking a gentle hint gratuitously offered, did well in inducing Mr. HENRY DAVENPORT to inject ideas into his interesting caricatures in the Evening Mail. In breadth, sanity, and logic, no one of the hundred newspapers which we have studied more or less minutely during the campaign has compared with the Easton Herald, and second to that is the Springfield Republican. On the whole, we feel justified in reaching the conclusion that the newspapers have done well and may learn to do better.

Of the individuals who have been active, the great and good father himself comes in for first prize. Thoroughly appreciating, as he did, the great boon which could be conferred upon his fellow countrymen only through the continuance of an absolutely ideal administration, he put both shoulders to the wheel and pushed with all his might by day and night. Some say he even worked Sundays when not in church.

but this we can hardly believe. The bogus men of the campaign were the two chairmen. Mr. TAYLOR suffered ridicule and Mr. CORTELYOU abuse, both with less justice than propriety. The latter, at any rate, has proven himself to be a man of distinct executive capacity and industrious and patient to a degree. The members of the cabinet have been grievously overworked, but how else could they expect to hold the favor of the master? Senator PARANAKS has made a really wonderful canvass. Probably he himself could not tell how many speeches he has made, or how many miles he has travelled, but a more notable example of tireless energy resulting in a better and more favorable appreciation of true quality has not been seen in many a year. On the Democratic side, the gratitude not only of Judge PARKER, but of the entire Democratic party, is due primarily to Mr. NEWELL. Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. HAY, Mr. BELMONT, and former Senator SMITH. Mr. BRYAN's grumpiness also wore away, and there remains no suspicion of a lack on his part of sincerity and effectiveness. Of the young men not previously known in national politics, the two who have accomplished most in an undisturbed but effective manner have been CLARENCE H. MURPHY, Republican, and GEORGE W. YOUNG, Democrat. On behalf of the Populists, Mr. WATSON has fought single-handed and with manifestations of extraordinary intelligence and vigor. Last, though hardly least, the American people themselves have behaved extraordinarily well. Certainly in no recent year has a campaign been conducted upon so high a plane, and this could not have been the case if the managers had not felt the necessity of meeting that stern requirement of the men behind the ballots.

It was part of the sarcasm of politics that so much should have been made in the last fortnight of the campaign of Chairman CORTELYOU and the corporations. We don't believe there has been a more upright man selected to manage a national campaign since the Republican party came into being than CORTELYOU. We don't believe that there has been a candidate in the same period less tolerant of crooked means to compass his election than President ROOSEVELT. We believe that one principal reason why ROOSEVELT chose CORTELYOU was that CORTELYOU was sympathetic with his desire for a clean campaign. Nevertheless, the choice of a cabinet officer for campaign-manager produced a situation. The corporations have long been a reliance of the Republicans when it came to collecting campaign funds. CORTELYOU left the cabinet to be manager, and it has been understood that he would return to the cabinet as soon as possible after election. To pay money to him was the very next thing to paying money to the government itself. When a railroad was invited to contribute, its officers could say: "We have very important postal contracts. We know CORTELYOU was slated to be Postmaster. We paid up." That was the situation, and its weaknesses are obvious. That the Democrats should not have made the most of it was hardly to be expected. They certainly worked it for all it was worth, yet we doubt if the claim that the late Secretary of Commerce was chosen manager because he knew the secrets of the corporations affected many votes. Plenty of confirmed Democrats believed that story, but no voter who was intelligently doubtful did. The facts suggested the inference, but they did not compel it, and very few, if any, discriminating doubtful voters accepted it. The great fact that the trusts and the concerns that find a profit in the DINGLEY tariff expect, and are expected to, put up money to support the DINGLEY tariff affected many votes, but we can't believe that the baneful of CORTELYOU as a black-mailer was really worth the trouble that was spent to rig it out.

On Sunday, October 30, Dr. McARTHUR, a Baptist preacher in New York, said in his evening sermon (on Church and Politics): "Speeches have been made recently that are a reproach to American citizenship. I mean criticisms of President ROOSEVELT and Secretary HAY. . . . There is a man in our State to-day, a candidate for a high office, whose statements reflecting on Governor TAYLOR, ex-Secretary ROOT, and others, show merely ignorance. His very misstatements rob him of his power." Dr. McARTHUR seems to have meant Judge PARKER. That Sunday night our reverend brother evidently believed, on the word of various members of President ROOSEVELT's cabinet and other eminent citizens, that Judge PARKER had emitted a series of gross misstatements, that showed him so ignorant and so credulous, as to make him appear incompetent to be President. A good many thoughtful men received this same impression in the week ending October 26. Judge PARKER had said, for example, that the Philippines cost $650,000,000 and 200,000 lives, and that the islands, politically and economically, were in a forlorn condition. Secretary TAYLOR had replied that the estimated cost in money was about $450,000,000 too large, and the estimated cost in life was 195,000 too large, and he offered Governor WATSON's embold assurance that the Philippines were doing very well in all particulars, and that Judge PARKER had been grossly deceived. That was enough for the time being for a great many people. TAYLOR had said it, and TAYLOR was a good man. HAY had said it, and HAY was a good man. To doubters who questioned whether Secretary TAYLOR's figures were conclusive, or whether the Philippines were quite as prosperous and contented as Governor WATSON's solicited statement seemed to show, the answer was: "Do you think TAYLOR would lie? Do you think WATSON would lie? Can't you take HAY's word?" For Dr. McARTHUR—for many men who knew the character of HAY and TAYLOR and read their words, and did not get hold of Judge PARKER's own words, and discover the authorities on which he based them—it seemed obvious that PARKER's statements showed "merely ignorance."

Now the fact is that the Judge was not far out in his statements; many of them were disputable; some of them, doubtless, were partly erroneous; but they all had some basis, and they were all arguable. No more than that can be said of the counter-statements of HAY and TAYLOR. The Judge was a lawyer candidate arguing against the Administration. The other gentlemen were skilled advocates arguing for the Administration, putting their best foot forward, and hammering the rival lawyer at every fair chance. Counting in the indirect expenses (travel increase, and so on) fairly attributable to our possession of the Philippines, HAYEN knows what is the total sum they have cost us, but it can easily be computed to be double Secretary TAYLOR's estimate. Counting all the deaths directly and indirectly due to our forcible acquisition of the Philippines—of course including the Filipinos who died both in battle and of diseases consequent to the war—we candidly doubt whether Judge PARKER's estimate was excessive. We hope the condition of things in the Philippines isn't quite so bad as Judge PARKER's authority, Mr. WALLIS, makes out, but though it is just as good as Judge TAYLOR and Governor WATSON and the present Administration can make it, it is very, very far from being satisfactory.

Dr. McARTHUR was indebted to a certain extent—and so were many others—for the high personal character of the gentlemen whose statements he had read. Mr. ROOT once said in a public address that when he became Secretary of War he took the armor for his client. So he did, and worked hard for it, and defended it from aspersions as though he were retained as its advocate. In such matters as the water-cure scandals he was on the side of the army and made its case appear as well as he could, and admitted the truth of no accusations against it until he had it. In like manner, in the campaign just closed, he and Mr. TAYLOR and Mr. HAY and Mr. KNOX and Mr. MOONEY have been on the side of the Administration, and have defended it against attacks, and have made such counter-arguments as they thought expedient. It was all right. They haven't made any pretence of being on both sides at once. They have been valiant and efficient in their cause, and worked like good and able lawyers to make their side win. There isn't any other way to carry on a campaign than to speak up for your own side and hammer the adversary, making his statements appear as inprobable as you can, and his intentions as ruinous and discreditable as the obvious facts allow. That is what both the Republican and the Democratic orators have been doing, and those that brought to the work the most brains, the best language, and the highest personal reputation have done it to the best advantage.

It has been a fair fight. Lies have mostly failed. Shanders have prospered little. In the Presidential contest there has been very little personal vilification, but there has been the usual give and take between speakers. When the Judge finally jumped into the ring, he doubtless expected to be thumped, and he was not disappointed. When TART and HAY climbed over the ropes, depend upon it they were not looking for any ingenious man of God to declare from the pulpit that they were too good to hammer. Certainly they gave quite as much as they got, and have nothing to complain of. And as for the Colonel, if he had a sorrow it certainly was not that the lofty office which he holds did not protect him from criticism while he was trying to get a better grip on it. Not at all! If he could only have been in with the rest, getting home with his boots on the heels and slats of various adversaries, landing on their solar plexuses, and upon clinching with one of them and tearing up the sword, what a happy, happy Colonel he would have been! Ah, the gaudium ecclesiasticum! Dr. McKEWEN doesn't seem to understand about it. All the fighting-man asks is a fair fight and a just and sober umpire.

The Globe persisted to the end in the contention, repeatedly and feelingly expressed, that it was grossly improper to suggest anything derogatory to the virtue, probity, or discretion of the President of the United States. Its aspiration was lofty but impossible. Candidates are bound to be overwhelmed, no matter who is President. Yet we do not doubt that the Globe is of the sane opinion still, and will continue to think exactly the same in 1908.

Discussion of the trusts for the purpose of influencing votes ceased for the time being on Tuesday, but the trusts will still be discussed by persons of inquiring minds who want to know. Mr. JAMES BYRNE CLARK, Professor of Political Economy in Columbia University, considers in the October Century the real dangers of the trusts, and the possibility of regulating them into innocuousness. The greatest of the real dangers Mr. CLARK finds to be the alliance of the trust with the political machine. Appreciation of that danger brought Judge PARKER many votes, and will bring many more votes to some future party that deserves them better. At present the trusts (like the railroads) are compelled to be in politics. Self-preservation constrains them to it. But sooner or later, Mr. CLARK thinks, the people will regulate them. And how? He says that to make the trusts innocuous four things must be done. First, stop discriminations by railroads. Equal rates for car-load loads of goods of a certain kind will have to be established. Second, stop the flooding of particular localities with goods offered at cut-throat prices to kill local competition. This process is euphemistically called "cleaning up a territory." The trust stories have made us familiar with it. Third, stop the scheme of selling one kind of goods cheap to crush competitors who make only goods of that kind. Fourth, rule out the "factors' agreement"—the refusal of the trust to sell goods to a dealer at a living price unless he will promise not to buy similar articles of a competitor. "It is a hard and up-hill road," says Professor CLARK, "that Democracy must travel in its efforts to regulate trusts." It is indeed if the last three of his four necessities are to be accomplished. He admits the difficulties of the path he points out, but declares there is no possible doubt that Democracy must travel by that route, or a farther and far worse. Socialism is the alternative.

The opinions of the professors on these subjects are interesting. There has been more discussion of living issues in the campaign just closed than the country has seen for twelve years. The discussion will not all stop. A great many voters are sufficiently interested in these issues to wish for fuller information. They want to know what the trusts are really doing to them, what the tariff is doing, how conditions can be bettered, and what it will probably cost to better them. If they think the proposed betterment is worth the price, they will eventually go in for it, and once they get started they will not be scared off by the assurance—which will be well founded—that to dock the tariff and shake the trusts will, for a time, wear money into its hole and check prosperity.

Attempts to investigate and describe the condition of the Philippines tend to result in a blight on the reputation of the investigator analogous to that suffered by the presumptuous souls who try to plumb the depths of spiritism. There is a belief that there are existing facts of importance about the Philippines, just as there may be facts of great importance about the world of spirits, but whoever claims to have got hold of some of them is apt to be set down at once as "cracked," and not worthy of attention from serious minds. The reason, doubtless, is that what we have been able to learn so far either about the spirits or the Philippines has been disappointing. It is felt that the spirit-land and the Philippines are both domains permeated with illusions, and that folks who think they know about those must be treated with charity or with impatience, according to their standing in relation to other things. An effort to learn something about spirit-land has been imputed to Professor WALTER JAMES and to Mr. ANNAH LANG and to Professor HYDEOR. We treat them all with forbearing respect because they are men of note, the first in philosophy; the second in literature, scholarship, and book-writing; the third in pedagogy; but we shate our consideration for Mr. HYDEOR a little because we think he tries to know too much. He has just come out with a new spirit story about systematic, instantaneous thought-transference across the Atlantic, which, being outside of our experience, makes us speculate anew about the status of his discretion.

In like manner we respect Mr. TART because he is a statesman, and Governor WHITT because he is so honest and so a faithful administrator, and Mr. SCHERMAN because he is a college president, notwithstanding they assume to know something about the Philippines and the condition of the Filipinos. But when Judge PARKER's authority, Professor WILLIS, claims to know something too, evidence is submitted that he is the sort of man one might expect; that he is young (only thirty); that he is a reformer and prone to have illusions, as was demonstrated in Washington, where he once figured as a newspaper correspondent who wanted to know too much. The Sun discovers that he is a person with a gift for "butting in," whose characteristics are gullibility and meddlesomeness, and his specialty fly-gobbling and misstatements. It may be true—we don't know. For our part, we had far sooner credit Judge TART's and Governor WHITT's hopeful ante-election opinions than WILLIS's doleful ones. It is pleasant. But if we had a confiding young friend who believed he had special knowledge about the Philippines and applied for advice about disclosing it, we should say to him: "Let it perish with you. If you divulge it, it will impair your reputation for sense, even if it doesn't blast your character."

SOME of the newspaper comments on President ROOSEVELT's proposal of a second peace conference are misleading. It is not true that, in the note addressed to our diplomatic representatives in foreign capitals, Secretary HAY, either explicitly or by implication, endorses the establishment of an international congress to meet periodically in the interest of peace. In the invitation, the text of which is published, there is not a word that can be construed as advocating so visionary a project. Mr. HAY is at pains to point out that in suggesting a second conference he is but carrying out an express provision of the meeting held at The Hague in 1899, which recognized that it left temporarily unsettled certain specified questions relating to international law. The present war in the Far East has emphasized the importance of coming as quickly as possible to an agreement concerning those questions which relate, first, to the rights and duties of neutrals; secondly, to the inviolability of private property in naval warfare; and, lastly, to the bombardment of forts, towns, and villages by a naval force. Among the matters obviously affecting the rights of neutrals are the matters to be made between absolute and conditional contraband of war and the inviolability of the official and private correspondence of neutrals. It will be remembered that, after the outbreak of the present contest, Russia propounded the principle that food and cotton, together with certain other articles, should, under all circumstances, be treated as contraband, but subsequently, in deference to the protest of neutral powers, she agreed that such commodities should be placed in the category of things conditionally contraband. It will also be recalled that not only the private correspondence of American citizens, but also an official communication of our Navy Department to an Amer-jean war-ship, was seized on board the steamer Calecho. Here, again, our remembrance has been met with an expression of willingness to respect hereafter our official correspondence.

Attention is also directed in Mr. Hay's note to the fact that the treatment due to refugee belligerent ships in neutral ports requires precise definition. That, notoriously, is a matter about which there has been some difference of opinion, when Russian war-vessels have taken refuge in Chinese, German, and American ports. To suggest to foreign powers the expediency of declaring the inviolability of private property in naval warfare was made the President's duty by the resolution adopted by our Senate and House of Representatives on April 28 of the current year. The resolution advocated the exemption of all private property at sea, not contraband of war, from capture or destruction by belligerents, and pronounced it desirable that the President should endeavor to procure the adoption of the principle by the chief maritime powers. Not content with a precise indication of the aims of the proposed conference, Mr. Hay was careful to repel the imputation that an unavowed purpose of the meeting was to interpose in the conflict between Russia and Japan. He instructed our representatives to remind foreign governments that at the time (August 24, 1893) when the Emperor of Russia sent forth his invitation to the nations to meet at The Hague, no treaty of peace had been concluded between the United States and Spain; yet the Hague Conference, when it assembled, assumed no function of intervention or even suggestion with regard to the settlement of the dispute between Spain and the United States. Under all the circumstances, we are unable to see why Mr. Roosevelt's invitation should not be accepted by all the signatories of the Hague Convention; and the resultant of the reply understood to have been made by the St. Petersburg Foreign Office cannot be reconciled with the step taken by the U. S. while our own quarrel with Spain remained as yet unsettled.

Although we have, as yet, no complete official reports from Tokyo, nor from St. Petersburg, of the casualties suffered in the fiercely contested battle of Shaho—we have not even received full and trustworthy data regarding the losses incurred in the preceding battle of Liao-Yang—it is reasonable to conclude from the data thus far forthcoming that the aggregate number of killed and wounded in the latest action, or series of actions, which have taken their name from the Sha River, did not fall much, if any, short of sixty thousand men. This would represent a loss of about twelve per cent., if it be true that the total number of combatants who either were engaged, or might have been brought upon the field at the option of the commanders, was about five hundred thousand. We shall not ask the reader to review gruesome statistics, but students of military history are aware that the percentage just named, appalling as it is, was surpassed considerably in some of the battles of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, and has even been exceeded in comparatively recent times. What is likely to strike the chronicler of the pending contest as exceptional is the fact that, sanguinary as was the fighting at Liao-Yang and at the Shaho, it was in both cases indecisive as regards the outcome of the campaign. Unquestionably the Japanese gained a signal success at Liao-Yang, for they drove the Russian commander from that place, which had been carefully fortified with a view to prolonged occupation. General KUROKI, however, merely withdrew to Mukden, and proceeded to form a new line of defence. The battle of Shaho, also, must be reckoned a victory for the Japanese, because they repulsed an advance of the enemy, which was ostensibly intended for the relief of Port Arthur. The Russians, nevertheless, held Mukden, and seem likely to continue to hold it for an indefinite period. Meanwhile, they are being reinforced at a rate variously computed by eye-witnesses at from four hundred to a thousand a day. The hope of relieving Port Arthur by land is now avowedly abandoned, and can hardly have been entertained seriously, for, even had Marshal OYAMA been beaten, and General KUROKI had been able to reach the Liao-Tung peninsula, he could never—so long as the Japanese control the sea—have crossed the narrow isthmus connecting that peninsula with the promontory on which Port Arthur is situated. That the fortress will hold out until the arrival of Russia's Baltic fleet in Far-Eastern waters must be accounted improbable, in view of the straits to which the shrunken garrison is reduced, and of the remarkable progress lately made by the Japanese in the reduction of the defensive works.

That the Baltic fleet will reach the Yellow Sea without again perpetrating some grave violation of the rights of neutrals is probably too much to expect, in view of the extraordinary orders said to have been given to its commander by the Russian Admiralty, and of the pale-stricken condition of its officers. If it be true that Admiral ROZDZEVSKY was directed to fire at any vessel which he might encounter, and to which he should see fit to impute hostile intentions, the blame for the assault on the British fishing-craft in the North Sea must be shifted from his shoulders to those of his superiors. It must not be clear to the Admiral that, if he carries out such orders, he is likely to be made a scapegoat for the sins of the Russian Navy Department, and we should, therefore, not be surprised if the report that he has offered his resignation should be confirmed. As for the subordinate officers in the Russian fleet, there seems to be no doubt that they had been in a state of panic, if not of intoxication, since they left the Baltic, for it turns out that they had fired on a Swedish merchantman, and also on a German vessel, before they found themselves enveloped, as they imagined, at night in the North Sea by a squadron of hostile torpedo-boats disguised as trawlers. We are told that rumors had been current for some time at St. Petersburg and Cronstadt that Japanese naval officers had been seen in English and Swedish ports trying to equip steam fishing-smacks with apparatus for discharging torpedoes. Moreover, Admiral ROZDZEVSKY, who, hitherto, has been regarded as a man of veracity and honor, asserts that on the night of October 21-22 his fleet was actually fired upon by one or two torpedo-boats, possibly, in our opinion, his own, and that some of his men were wounded.

This is obviously an assertion which is capable of proof or of refutation at the official inquiry which is to be instituted by the Russian authorities at Vigo, and before the international commission which subsequently will review the evidence. According to one theory, which is not devoid of probability, the torpedo-boats, which the Russian Admiral says he encountered, belonged to a detachment of his own fleet, which had got separated from the main body, and rejoined it unexpectedly during the darkness. On the face of things, at all events, there are two sides to the story, and it would have been the height of folly for the British government to have rendered a war with Russia inevitable by insisting upon conditions to which no self-respecting nation could accede. Such conditions, we mean, as the immediate return of the Baltic fleet to Russia, or the demand that the Russian Admiralty should summarily punish Admiral ROZDZEVSKY without waiting to hear what the latter might have to say in self-defence. The only reasonable method of dealing with the North Sea incident was that which the British government had the good sense to adopt, namely, recourse to the international court at The Hague, under the convention which provides for the appointment of a commission.

In that one of REYNOLD KIRLAND'S Pynost stories which is entitled "Their Lawful Occasions," the torpedo-boat which figures as hero does its work under cover of a fog and a trawler. Now of course the Russians and the Japanese, as well as every one else who is interested in war, read Mr. KIRLAND'S stories. The one in question was enough to make Admiral ROZDZEVSKY suspicious of all trawlers, as well as to make the Japanese appreciate the news to which British trawlers might be put. Is KIRLAND to blame for that North Sea blunder?

Before these lines meet the reader's eye—that is to say, on Sunday, November 6—one of the most important general elections that have occurred in Italy, since it became united, will have taken place. The Giolitti ministry, rebelling at last against the insupportable exaction of its Socialist allies, has resolved to throw off their yoke, and has called upon the friends of order to give it a compact and homogeneous majority. There is no doubt that those who desire to see Italian society continue to be organized on the basis of individualism greatly preponderate in the qualified electorate; but, unluckily for statesmen of Conservative or even Moderate views, a very large fraction of the registered voters who, naturally, would side with them, have, since the occupation of Rome, refrained deliberately from going to the ballot-box. So long as Florence remained the capital of the grand-ducal House of Savoy, and so long as the Papacy, although dismembered, retained a part of its former temporal dominions, the Catholic electors habitually exercised the franchise in the Italian manner, and thus enabled the leader of the Conservatives, or of the Right—the late Signor Mancini—to exercise great influence in the Chamber of Deputies, even if he did not secure, as he often did, a majority. But, after the seizure of Rome and what was left of Pius's Patrimony by Italian troops in the winter of 1870, Pius IX. issued the memorable injunction non expedit, whereby he declared it inexpedient for faithful Catholics anywhere in Italy to recognize the existing conditions of things in the former states of the Church, by taking part in Parliamentary elections. From that day to this the fact has been scrupulously adhered to. The Catholics, who constitute about half of Italy's registered electorate, have voted for municipal and other local officials, but not for members of the Chamber of Deputies. The result has been that Parliamentary power has gravitated steadily toward the Extreme Left, and, for some time, has been in the hands of a coalition of advanced Radicals and Socialists.

Fortunately for the maintenance of the existing social, economical, and political institutions of Italy, the coalition between Radicals and Socialists has not been broken, and the former have shown a disposition to put up candidates of their own in many districts. The Conservative and Moderate parties have also received encouragement from an unexpected source. Throughout northern Italy, where the scenes of disorder and riot which marked the recent Socialist strike have been met with peculiar indignation, the Catholic voters have held a number of meetings, and have resolved that, while not calling upon Pope Pius X. formally to recall or suspend his predecessor's prohibition, they would disregard it on this occasion, and would support the candidates who seemed most likely to defeat the Socialist nominees. The effect of this converted movement should be that, even if Signor Giolitti did not secure a sufficient number of supporters at the first balloting on November 6, when no nominee would be declared elected unless he had a majority of the votes cast, he is almost certain to obtain the desired preponderance at the second balloting, which will take place later, and in which only the two candidates who on the first trial got the largest number of ballots can be voted for.

November is likely to prove a month of exceptional interest in France as well as in Italy. Although, on October 28, Premier Combes was nearly beaten on a motion arraigning General Astier's administration of the War Office—the national government majority of a hundred being cut down to four—he was not deterred from fulfilling on the following day his promise to introduce a bill for the abolition of the Concordat which was concluded between France and the Papacy in 1801, and has been operative ever since. The bill is not sufficiently trenchant and merciless to satisfy the Socialists, who have demanded not only the confiscation of all the buildings and other property which the Roman Catholics were permitted by the Concordat to acquire, but also the immediate and total suppression of the stipends hitherto paid by the state to the bishops and clergy. What these irreconcilable enemies of religion desired was to leave Christians without any consecrated places to worship in, and their pastors without any means of support. The scheme devised by the Prime Minister, on the other hand, evinces a shrewd intention of instituting as little sympathy as possible for his prospective victims. He has provided, accordingly, for a period of transition, arranging that an annual stipend of eighty dollars shall be paid from the public treasury to every parish priest for four years, at the end of which time it is assumed that a system of voluntary subscriptions will have been organized. Pensions will also be allotted to the present bishops and other living dignitaries of the Church; but their successors, like the priests, will have to depend upon private contributions. It appears further that the existing church buildings may be used for a definite term, by the expiration of which, however, they must be either leased or bought from the government.

Whether the French peasant, who is proverbially thrifty, not to say niggardly, can be prevailed upon to put his hand in his pocket and give his priest the meagre dose hitherto forthcoming from the public treasury, is, of course, the problem to be solved. M. Combes has professed to promote a solution acceptable to Catholics, by inserting in his bill a provision that, in every agricultural district, taxes shall be reduced by a sum exactly equal to that hitherto expended therein by the government for religious purposes. It will not, therefore, cost the peasant a sou to make good what his parish priest loses by the abolition of the Concordat. The anti-clerical predict, however, that Jacques Bonhomme will prefer to put the remitted taxes in his stocking. Different opinions have been expressed by members of the French Episcopate concerning the ultimate outcome of the divorce of Church and state. Some take a gloomy view of the future; others, alive to the progress which Catholicism has made under the voluntary régime in the United States and England, look forward with unshaken confidence. Meanwhile it is well to remember that the bill has not yet become a law, and is certain to encounter the most violent and stubborn opposition in both Chambers. We presume, however, that it will pass the Chamber of Deputies; but, while it is pending in the Senate, the government headed by M. Combes may be beaten in the popular House on the income tax, which, although it proved fatal to the Bourgeois cabinet, seems likely to be the next measure to be introduced.

America has acquired a new object of interest in our Subway, which was opened to the public on October 27. It works, and New York likes it. Just how much it likes it is too soon yet to say. As yet folks ride in it by the hundred thousand for fun, for it is the best fire-proof show that was ever offered. Its machinery, like all new machinery, cracks a bit at the start. Its trains do not yet make schedule time, and may not do so for weeks to come. We don't know yet how we shall like the Subway air, nor how hot it will be in summer, nor how our taste in transportation will finally adjust itself to the choices now offered. But already it is far beyond doubt that the Subway is going to be a great boon to New York. Its express trains are by very much its most popular offering. They are available at all hours and for a greater or less distance to nearly all the patrons of the road, whereas the express trains on the elevated roads only run in the morning and evening, and only carried passengers who lived far up-town. Travel on the surface or above it is more agreeable in the long run than travel underground. The Subway will not keep the patron who draws from the surface or elevated roads except as it can offer quicker transit or increased comfort. Meanwhile its immediate effect in diminishing travel and increasing comfort on the surface and elevated lines is marked, and greatly appreciated.

There is general disgust that the neatness and prettiness of the Subway stations are to be destroyed by unsightly advertising signs. These abominations have long disfigured the platforms of the Elevated. They have no business there, and are still less tolerable in the Subway stations, which but for them would be decidedly pleasing.

The sprinkling of streets in New York—especially of asphalt pavements—by a private corporation paid by subscription is a nuisance. The sprinklers leave the pavements in a sloppy condition, perilous to horses and disagreeable to pedestrians. No responsible official is answerable for their work or for the condition in which they leave the streets. Far better put the whole care of the street surfaces in charge of the Street-Cleaning Department, where it properly belongs. Major Woonnar is both zealous and efficient. Consign it to him and his men, and to them alone, to wash the streets, sweep them, and sand or sprinkle them when that is necessary. Then if the work is not done to our taste we shall have some one who is accountable. With two sets of men slopping water over the streets, responsibility for results is hopelessly divided. Give the Major the whole job!

Judge Parker's Campaign

THE last work of the campaign was marked by a change in the betting on the prospects of the candidates, a change which was coincident with a revolution in the attitude of the Democratic managers. We do not hesitate to say that if the revolving had taken place two or three months earlier the result of the contest might have been different. We are by no means sure that the enthusiasm aroused all over the country by Judge PARKER's many letter to the St. Louis convention did not exercise an unfortunate effect on the Democratic party and its standard bearer. The deep, but necessarily transient, impression made by that letter on the American people led a great many Democrats, including Judge PARKER's most ardent advisers, to consider the fight was already won. They took for granted that a large majority of voters, including not a few Republicans, sincere admirers of Mr. McKINLEY's devotion to constitutional ideals, were profoundly distrustful of Mr. ROOSEVELT, and that all they needed was to recognize in his opponent an unflinching upholder of the gold standard, and a man of order, judicial temperament. Acting on this assumption, Judge PARKER, or his advisers, no longer professed the St. Louis platform as the nominee's speech of acceptance and letter of acceptance as to leave little to choose between the programmes of the Republican and Democratic parties, and to cause the battle at the ballot-box to turn almost exclusively on the official record and personal temperament of Mr. ROOSEVELT. Only once in our political history on a Presidential election has such a close approach to certainty, to have proved upon so narrow an issue.

We refer, of course, to 1872, when, before the day for voting arrived, almost all Republicans and a large minority of Democrats had arrived at the conviction that, by his record and by his temperament, HORACE GRANTY was unfitted to discharge the functions of Chief Magistrate. We scarcely need recall the result. GRANTY obtained 286 electoral votes, against 62, or a larger majority than he had secured in 1868, when three Southern States were disfranchised. None of the lessons he perceived from the outset of the present campaign that a contest made to turn mainly, if not wholly, on the record and temperament of Mr. ROOSEVELT would inevitably insure to his advantage. After all it said, the principal offence of which he was accused is the crime of being a young man. That is not a charge which could be expected to ring him with as elaborate, a large majority of whom are under thirty years of age. Mr. ROOSEVELT's misdeeds had been those of a young man—mistakes of judgment, not of aim or heart. It is absurd to suppose that, when he impudently invited to his table BROOKS WASHINGTON, the most distinguished living representative of the colored race the President had any deliberate intention of humiliating the white people of the South. It is a matter of history that such an invitation was extended to a colored man by THOMAS JEFFERSON, and, however, when the letter was read Mr. ROOSEVELT knew better than Mr. ROOSEVELT himself that what would attract no notice eighty or ninety years ago under the slavery régime cannot be done with impunity today, in view of the conflict of races at the South. No body who has any intimate acquaintance with Mr. ROOSEVELT, and is aware of his earnest desire to act rightly and wisely, believes that the BROOKS WASHINGTON incident will ever be repeated. It is equally obvious that the President's intervention in the anti-slavery fight, after establishing, in our opinion, a dangerous precedent, was prompted by sympathy for the suffering caused among the poor of our seaboard cities, by the dearth of their necessary fuel. Much the same thing may be said of Pension Order No. 78. We have pronounced it, and still regard it, as a reprehensible stretch of Executive authority; yet, unfeignedly, it had no selfish, but a generous, motive. For the creation of the Philip Jones Mr. ROOSEVELT was not even aware of his responsibility. He found in the islands the flag for which he had risked his life, and a soldier could hardly be expected to find it in his heart to pull it down. All that could be done to reconcile the happiness and progress of the islanders with the maintenance of our own integrity he unhesitatingly did. He upheld with zeal the enlightened and philanthropic views of Judge TAFT, when the latter was Governor-General of the Philippines, and, to insure the continued application of such worthy principles, he made him Secretary of War. Mr. ROOSEVELT also did his best to buy the canal belt from Colombia, but when he found himself baffled by trickery and extortion he did not make, yet, when he found it ready-made, he seized an opportunity of slaking his country's age-long hunger for an inter-oceanic waterway. It should have been foreseen that every one of these acts, though justifying childing and rebuke in a circle of elders, would be more likely to evoke enthusiastic commendation than indignation or resentment, if discussed before a popular audience.

What Mr. ROOSEVELT may do hereafter we know not, and, certainly, we shall not withhold criticism when he deserves it. For some time, however, we have been convinced that a contest permitted to turn on what he has done already could have but one result. It was a fundamental and fatal blunder for the Democratic managers to offer the people nothing but a choice between two Republicans, in the hope that they would prefer a middle-aged man of judicial temperament, whom they had never heard of, to an impulsive, high-hearted young man, thoroughly known, and endeared not only by his virtues, but by some of his faults. Those who are wise after the event can now see clearly that a comparison of personalities should have been excluded rigorously from the canvass. The questions of philosophy and of politics should have received but cursory attention, unless the Democratic managers were prepared to take the splendid and electrifying stand which Mr. CLEVELAND took in the case of Hawaii. A discussion of the constitutionality of the President's intervention in the anti-slavery strike should have been recognized as a boomerang. One had but to mention it to cause a dereliction in the later days of the Democratic campaign. It is not necessary that the managers should have been judicious to say as little as possible about Pension Order No. 78. Was it reasonable to suppose that any old soldier, or any friend of old soldiers, would vote against Mr. ROOSEVELT because he had said that the attainment of a greivance advanced age was of itself prima facie evidence of disability to earn a livelihood?

The Democratic managers, from the outset, should have forced their opponents to meet them on a very different field. Republican newspapers and campaign speakers should have been nailed to the cross of the only issues that touch the pockets and inflame the feelings of the people—the issues of the monstrous DOLNEY tariff and of the lawless, plundering trusts. In hoc vinum riuus would have been inscribed on Judge PARKER's banner had he known how to bear it to victory. Had he demanded an immediate and a reasonable incremental reduction of the DOLNEY tariff, the admission of all raw materials used in manufactures to the free list, and the prompt ratification of all the reciprocity treaties hanging up in the protectionist Senate, he might have started a tidal-wave which not even such Republican strongholds as Massachusetts, Michigan, and Iowa could have resisted, and which almost certainly would have overwhelmed Illinois and Wisconsin, as well as the so-called doubtful States. As regards the trusts, he should have pointed out how farcical were the proceedings in the Northern Securities case, if they were to have an acquittal, and what lay behind the administration's promise that it would not "run amok." To what end has the antitrust act been adjudged constitutional, to what purpose was supplemental legislation enacted by the last Congress, if the powers of the Federal government, thus tremendously enlarged, were to exhaust themselves in a suit against a few obnoxious corporations?

The Democratic managers should have been confined themselves to an interpretation of the St. Louis platform that practically invited the American people to choose between two Republicans. Having made up their minds to ask the voters to choose, not so much between principles and policies as between two personalities, they should have forced their own agonies into the foreground. It is beyond doubt that Judge PARKER's campaign was a failure. He was not the man to captivate the people's heart; these things have been, and always will be, nature's prerogative to the good-will of the people. They ought to be. It is impossible that, at the age of fifty and upwards, a man should possess such visible consistency of disposition, unless he has a sympathetic heart. It consequently, seems to us that Judge PARKER's managers made a second and fatal blunder when they told him back from a personal estimate. It is true that many members of the Presidency have refrained from exhibiting themselves to their fellow citizens during a campaign. But they were men who were already well known; indeed, few well known in the opinion of some sceptical supporters. Then, again, there have been nominees for the Presidency whose appearance would undoubtedly have repelled many a prospective adherent. Such a man was SAMUEL J. TILNEY. Judge PARKER, on the other hand, is a man the very sight of whom excites the curiosity of the people. He has no convincing proof was furnished in Madison Square Garden on October 31, when the mere mention of his name before he entered the hall was greeted with applause that lasted fifteen minutes. It might have been supposed that the plauditory capacity of the audience was then pretty well exhausted. But when, subsequently, some one on the platform yelled, "Judge PARKER is here!" twenty-five minutes before the closing of the campaign in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, had been made throughout the doubtful or semi-doubtful States during the preceding two months, the result might have been very different. This, at least, we are able to affirm, that, if the full returns shall show that ALTON BRINSON PARKER has carried the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, or any two of them, or even one of them, provided that one be his native State, he is predestined to become the candidate of the Democratic party for the Presidency in 1908.

John Hay's Great Speech

THE culminating speech of the campaign on the Republican side was delivered by Mr. JOHN HAY on October 20 in Carnegie Hall, New York city. It was the culminating speech in respect of voting efficiency, as well as of literary form, and it ended with an eloquent appeal to Mr. ROOSEVELT's native State not to let it be said that it fell away, when almost all the rest of the country north of the Potomac and the Ohio remained faithful to the President. If the speech be carefully scanned it will be found an effective, if not conclusive, reply to the arraignment of the party in power, as this was originally framed by the St. Louis convention, and as it remained substantially unmodified in the nominee's speech of acceptance and letter of acceptance. It will be remembered that this arraignment, in the form which it retained up to the last two weeks of the campaign, made next to nothing of the tariff issue or of the issue of the trusts. Mr. HAY's speech will be searched in vain for more than a faint allusion to the trusts, apparently because, when it was penned, the author assumed that the issue would play no part in the contest, inasmuch as, until the fight was nearly over, Judge PARKER had shown himself inclined to rely exclusively upon the common law, as a remedy for monopolistic combinations of capital, although most Democratic, as well as Republican, lawyers have hitherto taken for granted that, in order to deal effectively with monopolies, the defects of the common law needed to be cured by drastic Federal statutes. Inasmuch as the Republican administration had demonstrated an elemental statesmanship, and, having secured them, had endorsed them in the Northern Securities case, Mr. HAY evidently thought that, if the trusts were an issue at all in the campaign, they constituted an impressive Republican asset, and it would, therefore, be superfluous to waste words upon them. To the tariff the Secretary of State devoted a paragraph, but here too he seems to have supposed that not much had been or could be made of the issue by the opponents of his party, and that independent or hesitating voters would see but little to choose between the moderate and gradual revision advocated by Judge PARKER and the Republican admission that a revision of the existing schedules might be expedient from time to time. We are far from concurring with Mr. HAY in accepting as too evident for argument the Republican assertion that tariff revision, when needed, must be made by its friends. The outcome of the last experiment in revision by the friends of protection—the experiment made in ANTHONY's administration—was not to lower, but, upon the whole, to increase the rates of duty. Mr. HAY should not credit independent voters with short memories. We are not struck, either, by the appearance of the maxim quoted from old English law: "A child should not be given in charge to a nurse that loves it." Would an able and judicious adjuster of epithets as is the Secretary of State describe as a "child" or as a "nurse" our iron and steel industry, which, at this moment, is tilting some of its products (in Canada for right) at rates of duty which are less than the price which it exacts for them from American citizens?

If, then, the only conspicuous features of Mr. HAY's address had been his reticence with regard to the trusts, and his cursory allusion to the tariff, we certainly should not have deemed his deliverance worthy of our admiration. As a matter of fact, the whole strength of the speech was levelled at the points originally made in the Democratic platform or by the Democratic nominee. What Mr. HAY undertook to answer were the charges of extravagant expenditures, of lawlessness and weakness on the part of Mr. ROOSEVELT, and of the renouncement of American ideals through the retention of the Philippines. In regard to every one of these accusations Mr. HAY took defiant ground. Except that he denounced as grossly magnified the figures purporting to set forth the cost of keeping the Philippines, he admitted that every one of the acts imputed to the Republican administration had been performed, and not only gloried in the performance, but declared that the party, if retained in power, would continue answering in the same course. Mr. HAY combined as "parasitic levity" Judge PARKER's latest proposal to issue forthwith a proclamation of an intention immediately to renounce the Philippines. Such a proclamation, the Secretary continued, would cover us with indelible discredit, because it would signify an abdication of our position in the Pacific, the surrender of our commercial prestige in the Far East, a base betrayal of the loyal and intelligent Filipinos who have trusted us, and a direct invitation to an insidious war and foreign invasion. If it be said that, while we should relinquish control of the Philippines, we should, at the same time, remain responsible for their acts—extending even then the angle of our protection, and standing between them and a hostile, covetous world—Mr. HAY replies that such a proposition is lacking in common sense. Is not this, however, precisely what we have done in the case of Cuba? Have we not, in return for a couple of coal-stations, agreed to defend Cuba against hostile aggression? In these very real reasons in the forum of morals why should not treat the Filipinos as generously as we have treated the Cubans? Mr. HAY tries to show that there is such a reason. He asserts that there is no analogy between the two cases: that we have never owned Cuba, and have never claimed to own it, whereas the Philippines are ours by every sanction known to public law—by fortune of war, by treaty, by purchase, by occupation, by undisturbed and undisputed possession. As a matter of fact, we could have had Cuba by all of those titles, and if, after a certain term of occupation, we relinquished the islands, was it, or was it not, because we deemed ourselves under a moral obligation to do so, having declared, in a joint resolution of Congress that: "The Cubans were, and of right ought to be, independent. We should like to get a candid reply to this question from Senator KILGORE. Is it not true, as a matter of history, that when our treaty of peace with Spain was signed, the Filipinos under ANTONIO were at least as independent, and as deserving of independence, as the Cubans had proved themselves to be in 1898? Is it not true that when the treaty was signed the Filipinos had the last considerable armed force of Spain pined up in Manila, and protected from capture only by American troops? Is the moral duty to recognize the independence of a people who have practically gained it for themselves, only binding upon us Americans when we have pledged ourselves thereto beforehand? Was, we repeat, our concession of independence to Cuba due to the possibly regretted circumstance that we had previously promised to make it, or was it due to our honest recognition of the solemn principle on which that promise pretended to be based?

With regard to the charge of extravagant expenditure, Mr. HAY challenged the opponents of his party to specify the channels in which extravagance should be made. They certainly do not seem pointed out, to diminish the appropriations for the irrigation of arid lands, for the improvement of rivers and harbors, or for coast defence. The Democratic nominee had ultimately said, indeed, that the regular army might be reduced if the Philippines were abandoned, but he had shrunk from pronouncing explicitly in favor of diminishing the navy. On the whole, Mr. HAY was doubtless justified in assuming that independent voters had not been deeply impressed by Judge PARKER's promise of economy. It was right, also, in thinking that much more could be made of the Panama affair so long as the Democrats proposed to retain the canal, the acquisition of which they denounced as a violation of international law and a breach of the treaty concluded with New Granada in 1846. Touching this flagrant inconsistency, Mr. HAY was particularly effective. He pointed out that, in the very same breath with which the Republican administration had been accused of being on the isthmus as the result of violence, bribery, and treachery, the Democrats had declared themselves not only of staying there, but of going right on and reaping the fruit of their opponents' industry by building the canal. Up to the time when the Secretary of State made his speech there had been no hint of restitution in any of Judge PARKER's utterances. So far as could be judged from the words of their nominee, the Democrats were perfectly willing to act as receivers of stolen goods, rilling up, meanwhile, sanctimonious eyes, and thanking heaven that they were not as those wicked Republicans. The whole party dealing with this matter is evidently clerical, because the inconsistency of the Democratic position was flagrant. But what could Mr. HAY have said had ex-President CLEVELAND been the Democratic nominee, and had he announced a determination, if elected, to give back the canal belt to Colombia and to postpone the construction of the canal until we could obtain a concession with clean hands?

To the charge that Mr. ROOSEVELT is "lawless," his Secretary of State rejoined that every act of the President's which is thus stigmatized had been performed after careful study of the law, and after consultation with the best lawyers. That is probably true, if the best lawyers are Republicans. It is also true that every act of Mr. ROOSEVELT's which has been brought to the test of the courts has been triumphantly approved by our highest judicial authorities. Nobody knows better than Mr. HAY, HOWEVER, that the constitutionality of neither Mr. ROOSEVELT's Interposition in the anthracite coal strike nor of his issuance of Pension Order No. 78 has been brought to such a test.

To the accusation that Mr. ROOSEVELT, in the capacity of elected Chief Magistrate, would be dangerous to the peace of the world, and would be likely to embroil us in a policy of adventure, because he is by temperament a war fuel, a fire-eater, it must be confessed that the evidence thus far adduced by his opponents has been weak. The Secretary of State had much the best of the argument at this point when he defied the President's critics to show that he and his predecessors had done more to increase the interest of universal peace than any other two Presidents had done since the formation of our government. It is true that they had composed more difficulties by friendly negotiation, and made more troubles advantageous to both signatories, than any other two Presidents in American history. It is indisputable that Mr. ROOSEVELT gave to the Hague Court of Arbitration the breath of new life as a world-breathed it, and that only the other day he was so kind to send his predecessors' most civilized papers and notes in conference at the Hague to concert measures for the peace and welfare of the world. In view of these facts, it certainly is difficult to convict Mr. ROOSEVELT of intentions dangerously bellicose.

VICE-ADMIRAL ROJESTVENSKY. COMMANDER OF THE RUSSIAN BALTIC FLEET WHICH ATTACKED THE BRITISH TRAWLERS IN THE NORTH SEA

At midnight on October 21 a fleet of British trawlers in the North Sea was fired on by Russia's Baltic fleet on its way to the Far East. One of the ships was sunk, two of the fishermen were killed, and many injured. Immediately after the occurrence the British Foreign Office asked to St. Petersburg a demand for apology and reparation. It has been agreed to refer the matter to an international commission, which will meet at The Hague and investigate the facts in the case. Their findings will be submitted to the two governments. Admiral Rozhatskiy's fleet, which was temporarily detained at Vigo, on the coast of Spain, by order of the Czar, sailed from there on November 1, arriving at Tsingtau November 2.

Captain Harlow of Harvard

Captain Hogan of Yale

Captain Foubler of Princeton (Putting on the Ball)

Captain Stangland of Columbia

SNAP-SHOTS OF FOUR LEADING PLAYERS IN THE FOOT-BALL WORLD—CAPTAINS AT HARVARD, YALE, PRINCETON, AND COLUMBIA

The most important game of the season, with the exception of the Army and Navy game at Philadelphia on November 26, will be the Harvard-Yale game at New Haven on November 19. The most important games usually played here have been the Harvard-Princeton game at Cambridge, the Yale-Columbia game in New York, and the Princeton-Cornell game at Ithaca—all on October 27; and the Yale-Brown, Princeton-West Point, and Harvard-Dartmouth games on November 6. The Yale-Princeton game occurs at Princeton on November 12. The photographs on this page show the captains of four of the principal eleven—Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and Columbia—in the field.

McGrathin, the Columbia Quarterback, making a Run from a Kick-off

Columbia attempting to go through the Yale Centre

SNAP-SHOTS OF THE YALE-COLUMBIA FOOTBALL GAME AT AMERICAN LEAGUE PARK, NEW YORK

More than twelve thousand persons saw the Yale football eleven defeat Columbia by a score of 21 to 0 on October 20 at American League Park, New York city. On the same day Harvard was beaten by Pennsylvania at Cambridge by a score of 11 to 0. The football situation this fall is unique, each of the three big Eastern teams having been defeated once. The victory of Annapolis over Princeton, West Point's defeat of Yale after losing to Harvard the week before, and the result of the Harvard-Pennsylvania game make the probable outcome of the Yale-Princeton and Harvard-Yale contests a matter of much uncertainty. Up to the present time Pennsylvania is the only one of the big teams in the East which has not been beaten.

Photographs by Foxfield

HENRY WATTERSON

Colonel Henry Watterson, the distinguished editor of the Louisville "Courier-Journal," is the subject of an interesting personal sketch published on the opposite page of this issue of the "Weekly." Colonel Watterson was a staff officer in the Confederate army during the civil war. He was a member of Congress from 1875 to 1877, and has served as a delegate-at-large from Kentucky to six national conventions. Among his published works are a history of the Spanish-American war and a life of Abraham Lincoln.

Photograph by F. H. Taylor

The Crowd in City Hall Park during the formal Opening of the Subway

Copyright, 1908, by Steinhilber and Lenz

Mayor McWilliam starting the First Subway Train with the Police Controller presented by Mr. August Belmont

PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN AT THE OPENING OF NEW YORK'S NEW SUBWAY

New York's new rapid transit subway was opened to the public on October 27. Between seven o'clock in the evening and midnight, 150,000 people were carried over the completed portion of the West Side branch. After appropriate ceremonies in the City Hall, during which speeches were made by Mayor McWilliam, Alexander E. Orr, August Belmont, John R. Wellwood, and William Barclay Parsons, the first train was started over the line, and was run to the 14th Street station by Mayor McWilliam.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF NEW YORK'S R

The main features of the transportation plans of the Pennsylvania Railroad, which provide for a tunnel beginning on the Jersey shore, running under the Hudson River, below the city, in all a distance of a little less than six miles. The New York terminal will be the most extensive railroad terminal in the city and will cover an area measuring approximately 460 feet north and south by 1800 feet east and west. In the drawing, 1, the tunnel entrances; 2, the Manhattan terminal; 3, a section of the tunnel under the Hudson River.

RAPID TRANSIT PLANS FOR THE FUTURE

1 station in Manhattan and through connections with the Long Island Railroad system, are shown in the sketch of Manhattan to the new station, to and under the East River, and from there to the exit on Long Island. It will be situated between Seventh and Ninth Avenues, Thirty-first and Thirty-third Streets, rowing, 1, is a general bird's-eye view of the route; 2, Long Island City, looking toward New York, and showing B, C, and D represent, respectively, the Brooklyn, Manhattan, Williamsburg, and Blackwells Island bridges.

From newspaper copyright, 1914, by H. C. Watt Co.

PHOTOGRAPH OF A WRESTLING MATCH IN TOKYO HELD FOR THE BENEFIT OF WOUNDED JAPANESE SOLDIERS

The photograph is a snapshot taken recently at Tokyo, and shows a Japanese wrestling match held at the Red Cross Hospital for the benefit of wounded soldiers from the front. The wrestler in the right is the Japanese champion (Utagarashi); his opponent is a Russian, his rival for the championship, and the second best wrestler in Japan.

The Farmer (Old Japan) rescues the Egg (Korea) from the Chinese Zepher

A Chicken (Korea) is Hatched from the Egg, while the Badger (America) looks greedily in at the Window.

The Badger (America) suggests to the Eagle (Russia) that the Chicken would make a good meal.

Whereupon the Eagle (Russia) makes off with the Prize

The Igniting of Hostilities—Young Japan (in the form of a White Rabbit) Blisks the Eagle's Man-of-war

The Rabbit pursues his Enemy on Land

Peace—the Eagle and Badger restore the Chicken to the Farmer

THE STORY OF THE WAR, PICTURED BY A JAPANESE ARTIST

The drawings are based on a popular Japanese fable, a description of which is given in detail on page 1755 of this issue of the "Weekly"

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

ABOUT three years ago I had the pleasure of introducing Dr. Robertson Nicoll's wise and helpful volume of essays, Letters on Life, in these columns. Many of these essays were reprinted from the British Weekly, where "Charles Chest" is the pseudonym of Charles Chest, now a famous pen-name, and belongs to Dr. Nicoll, who is the editor of the British Weekly. In reviewing his work, I called his little volume of essays Life as that of "a transitory of the common." The phrase recurs to me after reading Mrs. Dehland's new published. The title is The Common Way, which has just of thought that follows it. It is the sort of title that sets like a lion's "or - criticism," of letters of introduction, as an old friend of mine, and directly, innocently, seriously turns them about and back of them and through them. She gently leads us by a way we know not into a shining pathway that grows familiar, and we realize that our eyes have been opened to discern the truth and beauty that he in vain along life's common highway for him who has eyes to see. She translates the commonplace into a new tongue that unfolds its wonder and sources of power and strength. A few weeks ago I quoted Dr. Nicoll as saying: "Imagination is the power to see clearly, the power to understand - perhaps the greatest gift which God has in all his big box of gifts," and recalled the moral of one of Ian MacLaren's stories that we do not sin against our loved ones through lack of love, but because we do not imagine enough. Mrs. Dehland reiterates this truth again and again in these essays: it is the great desideratum in dealing with the practical problems of life. In a very large sense we are saved by imagination. "We must have imagination," says Mrs. Dehland. "Unfortunately, we are not all born with this heavenly vision; in fact, we are, most of us, born without it, as witness the innate cruelty of children." Nor must it be thought that Mrs. Dehland is an illigal quack. No one can read "Acquaintance with Grief" and entertain the notion for a moment. She knows, as well, this type of opinion we have in mind to fall into that extreme; indeed, in one of her happiest essays, that on Love and Quarrelling, entitled "Love my Day," she pillories the "blasted optimism" that leaves him without a leg to stand on. A wide knowledge and observation of human nature, and a ripened experience of life have bred in her a sure insight and practical wisdom and a boundless felicity and fervent sympathy with her kind. Imagination in her is anchored in common sense. Whether she is writing of "Anxiety" or "The Tyranny of Things," "Concerning Church-going" or "Concerning Christmas gifts," her counsel is wise and helpful, business and comforting, because it is brought down to the level of every day's most common need. It is the same uplifting truth and moral stimulus that one finds in Mrs. Dehland's stories, and that makes them so vital and exhilarating. There is always a tonic quality in her works; it is partly an effluence of her philosophy of life, and in large measure an emanation of her honest and loving personality. One feels that life has grown to the making of these chapters in practical philosophy: that the writer has herself trod "the common way," and learned to walk therein with patience and courage and tenderness. Many a reader will feel like sending the author a message of love like that she has been the ideal of a Christmas greeting: "I want you to know that the patience and courage and tenderness manifested in your book will help me to live more bravely and courageously and lovingly as I go on with the days." And, by the way, there could be no better kindness than to distribute this little book widely and to disseminate its doctrine of love and friendship and human kindness at Christmas-tide.

While Alice Mayan Rice and George Moders Martin have been rubbing elbows with neighborhood characters in their own town, a young poet in their immediate circle has been living in the far away past and dreaming its visions into poetic dreams. A year and a half ago Mr. Cole Young Rice made his first appearance with Pharos In Town, a tragedy of the fifteenth century as well as showed a remarkable sense of dramatic construction as well as poetic power and strong characterization. These were lines that stayed in the memory after the book had been put away. I remember:

"I am adrift on before
Her foot's last print, and cannot breathe or pray,
But where she's some time been and left a heaven."

And again:

"She is set in the centre of my need
As youth and fiercest passion could not set her."

Lately Mr. Rice has launched a second example of the poetic drama called David. It is the fascinating story of the young shepherd King of Israel, which furnished the theme for a spectacular play in New York last spring, now appearing in Boston, and also forms the subject of a prose drama, recently published, by Miss Florence Wilkinson. For Mr. Rice's David opens in the Hall of Judgment in the palace of Saul at Gibeah. Against the gloom and despair of Saul with his gloating mocking and challenging to combat, David, with his harp, casts his lyric note:

"Flinging enchantment on
The palace air
Till he repagions to him
All who breathe."

It deepens to a tragic note when Michael, who loves David, discovers that he is the Anointed. The act closes with David rushing forth with his sling to meet Goliath. Act II, widens the breach between David and Michael, and draws the numerous fault of Saul's "sins with a sword hand," against the young favorite of Israel. Act III, finds David in the rocky fastnesses of Eggeah, where he drinks to the bitter draught of love's treachery, and does from the temptation to slay Saul and succumb to the spell of Michael, whom he believes guilty of perfidy. Act IV, is passed in the House of the Witch of Endor, in Mount Gilboa, where Saul is enchanted against the Philistines. Saul and Jonathan are slain; David and Michal are reunited, and we leave them in the full brightness of the sun.

It will be seen even from this cursory sketch that Mr. Rice is skilled in marshalling the coldest series of this carefully handled story and giving them full dramatic effect. With his instinctive dramatic power and constructive ability he also combines a knowledge of the exigencies of the stage. If one were to offer any criticism it would be that he has yet to master the necessity of clear, cogent, articulate speech in his lines in order that they shall carry his meaning with simplicity and ready intelligence from the actor to the audience. It cannot be denied that in the reading his lines suggest the intent of the drama forcibly and convincingly, and that there are frequent passages of beauty and winning grace. But I take it that Mr. Rice has an ultimate eye on the stage, and the rendition of his lines and, therefore, he made to suit articulate speech and swift and clear apprehension. Mr. Rice has given strong evidence of possessing the dramatic imagination and the skill to use it to fine and artistic ends that it would be a pity not to pursue every means of developing and perfecting these rare gifts to a definite and practical end.

Mrs. Margaret Dehland, Author of "The Common Way"

THE SWAY OF MANHOLD

BY PHILIP VERRILL MIGHELS

TO big Donald Ormsby, mining for gold in the depth of his cavernous tunnel, the volatile joy possessing all his nature was at last a force dominating satisfaction. His heart had been beating in ecstasy for days, despite the hardships of his toil, despite the gloom of this hole in the earth where he labored.

This afternoon he could not work. He leaned on his pick and thought how beautiful was all the sunlight, all the sky outside his mine. He thought of Hilka, far more beautiful than day or loveliest heaven itself. He spoke her name in a whisper, and a keener elation surged in his being. Then he presently reflected she would be at home, alone, on such an afternoon as this, and excitement claimed him for its own. He dropped his pick and, gazing for a moment at his candle, abruptly turned and hastened down the long, irregular corridor formed by the tunnel, and so came out in the sunlight, blinking his eyes in the dazzling glare.

What a type of youth and strength he presented, in his wrinkled boots, his faded trousers, and his flannel shirt! He wore no hat; but thick hair was crumpled picturesque on his head. He was handsome, in a healthy, rugged, youthful way. A clean color gleamed in his face, and a light of alertness and humor burned in his eyes.

Yet when he came to the door of the gray little cabin, where Hilka made her home with her uncle, his strength died in panic from his muscles, and his heart could have given a lustier knock than he gave on the panel with his fist.

"Come in," called a voice, and he entered the house, to find that Hilka was back in the kitchen, making bread.

With her sleeves rolled up to her dimpled elbows, her face brightly flushed, her hands in the flour, and a wisp of her hair across her face, she was far more beautiful than even Donald had imagined.

"Why—it's you," she said. "I thought it might be Mrs. Croome."

"Nay—a bigger sort of a chicken," said Donald, and desperately wondering how he should bring about the subject on which he had come to speak, he added, "Maybe you're sorry it isn't Mrs. Croome?"

"Haven't got time to think it over," answered Hilka, kneading a spongy big loaf with her white-knuckled hands. "Busy."

"So was I," he told her, as the color momentarily left his face.

"Suppose I ought to be working right now, but I couldn't strike a lick." She suddenly knew what was coming—why he was here. The red burned deeper in her cheeks. Her heart in her bosom fluttered as if his hand encompassed it already.

"Were you tired?" she asked, in apparent calm.

"You know what was up with me," he answered, in a shaking voice. "I had to come and see you, Hilka—just had to come."

He had stepped so close that she trembled. Her one wild thought was of flight. She wished he was here, she needed the touch of his hand, the sound of his voice, for Donald's power not only swept upon her nature as it always had before, but it came with an added urgency that was frightening.

"Well—I'm very busy," she faltered. "This—this isn't any time for company."

"But I ain't company," Donald protested, suddenly catching her two soft hands and holding them hungrily against his breast.

"Hilka-giel, I can't be company any more. I love you—that's all there is about it! I love you! I want you all for my own! I love you so much I don't know how to hold it. I can't do a thing all day long but stand right still and think of you and let myself be crazy!"

He held her hands with fervid strength. His eyes were aflame; a seductive beauty, of fire and manhood, illumined his face.

Alarmed and the smothering pulse of her nature lashed in Hilka's heart for the mastery, Love could have flamed to meet this man's, but her love for Hugh stood out in tumultuous protest.

"Don't—let me go—you hurt my hands!" she stammered, as she tried to meet his gaze. "I can't! I can't! You hurt me. Let me go!"

She wrenched her hands from his and started back the moment his grasp was relaxed.

"Don't—don't say any more," she begged. "I didn't want you to come and—say—all this. I wish you wouldn't, Oh, I wish you wouldn't!"

"What's up with you?" he asked, his fire slightly hardening as he felt the rebuff in her manner. "Do you mean you don't want me to love you?"

"I'm sorry—I'm sorry if you do," she replied.

"We might be friends—if you wouldn't be so rough."

"Rough?" he repeated, an anger coming upon him with a divination of the full significance of her manner. "Rough? So that's the game? It's Willis—the preacher! Hugh Willis, with his nice soft hands and pretty voice and green eyes! Willis!—a preacher! I could break him in pieces to wear my pistol! A preacher!"

"He's a man," said Hilka, flushing with indignation. (Continued on page 1744.)

Drawn by Fletcher C. Rowland

"If he fights that Croome gang, he's in for a good chance of dying"

Mr. Pennington and "Kundry" (Madame Mara) in the Temptation Scene in the Second Act

The Temple Scene in the Third Act—the Death of "Kundry" during the Adoration of the Grail

SCENES FROM MR. HENRY W. SAVAGE'S PRODUCTION OF "PARSIFAL"—THE FIRST PRESENTATION OF WAGNER'S MUSIC-DRAMA IN ENGLISH

Wagner's "Parsifal" in an English version, is now being performed by Mr. Henry W. Savage's opera company at the New York Theatre. It is the first time the music-drama has ever been given with anything but the original German text. A full description of the story of "Parsifal" was given in the January 16 issue of the "Weekly," at the time of Mr. Coaried's production of the work at the Metropolitan. The reader is referred to page 1739 for a review of Mr. Savage's production

Photograph by Geo. J.

MME. GABRIELLE RÉJANE, THE DISTINGUISHED FRENCH ACTRESS, WHO REAPPEARS IN NEW YORK THIS WEEK AFTER AN ABSENCE OF TEN YEARS

Madame Réjane reappeared in New York at the Lyric Theatre this week, after an absence of ten years, in a three-act play by Georges de Porto-Riche, "Amouran," and a one-act piece by Verlaine and Halévy called "Lodovique." During her engagement she will also appear in "La Pausette," which was produced in New York last year, with Marie Trépoigt, under the name of "The Marriage of Kitty"; and in "Zola," "La Robe Rouge," "Le Bonheur," "La Pausette," "Jacqueline," "Dorcas," "La Douceur," and other French plays.

The Theatrical Shooting-Gallery

By James L. Ford

IN a certain Coney Island shooting-gallery revolving targets—rotating images of the cat, the owl, the lion, and the goat—except the skill of the marksmen, while offering rewards of Coney Island cigars in quantities that vary in accordance with his success. They are difficult to hit, these swiftly moving animals, and not unlike the fickle, ever-changing quality called variously "popular taste," or "sympathy," or "appreciation," that the marksmen of the stage may aim at. The cat, who is good for two cigars when hit, always seems to me to stand for the feminine element in the public—I say this with no disrespect,—while the goat, whose whickers alone offer a wide exposure to the marksmen's bullet, may be said to typify the commonplace, unromantic masculine auditor, and is good for only five cigars. The owl, which is the easiest of them all, brings but a single cigar, and represents the hypercritical, snobbish, cultured, but densely ignorant, element, which is, as every theatrical manager knows, the very easiest kind in the town and the least important.

Quite as elusive as the cat, the owl, and the goat of the shooting-gallery is that popular taste which each one of the three embodies, as a measure, and which the dramatist or manager must hit to achieve success. There are some men who have learned the knack of hitting one, two, and even three of these revolving targets with the same shot time after time without a miss, no matter whether the fact that they aim be that of tragedy or comedy or farce.

Belasco's Three Hits

Mr. David Belasco is the most notable example of this sort in modern theatricals, for whether it be Mrs. Carter in tragedy, Miss Cushman in comedy, or Mr. Warfield in character study, his aim is true and sure, and the clear ring of the bull-eye whenever he fires shows that he has struck its very center.

"The Music Master," the most recent example of this dramatic rifeman's skill, rings absolutely true so far as this quality of sympathy is concerned, for there is never a moment in the play when the sympathy of the audience, and especially the feminine part of it, does not go out to the fine old German musician in his troubles. Mr. Warfield is an actor who is never content to stand still, and it is safe to predict that in time his present personation will become as mellow and finished as the flower character in which his talents found expression for so many years. It is pleasant to note that in the strongly dramatic scene at the close of the second act—a scene in which he may be said to raise his voice for the first time since he placed himself in the hands of Mr. Belasco—his notes ring as clear and as bell-like as though he is a real German and a real man as well in "The Music Master." He is not quite a musician, nor will he be one until the dissonance of his pupil bring to his face that ring of mingled pain and dumb protest that every one who ever undertook five-finger exercises is familiar with.

But now and then even an experienced and skillful marksman misses his aim in a way that is unlooked for and disconcerting. A noteworthy case in point is that of the often fortunate but variable marksman, Mr. Clyde Fitch, who early in the season skidded into one of the Broadway shooting-galleries, (naturally took aim at the revolving cat which may be said to typify the feminine part of a New York audience, and discharged his trusty rifle; only to learn that not only had he failed to make a bull-eye, but had so far missed his aim as to have excited the ridicule of the bystanders. The play dealt with the marriage of an American girl to an English duke, and in its presentation he laid bare in all honest sincerity the natural outcome of such a union. He revealed the English code in his very worst possible light. He was careful, also, to point out in colors that can be readily noted in recent matrimonial history. Indeed, he kept very close to what has actually happened when he showed the manner in which the titled husband took money from his wife and the use to which he put it. He took pains to suggest that though he is a carefully prepared male world hit the revolving target squarely in the center, but, to his surprise, the cat turned indignantly away and would have none of his anti-dual sentiment.

A Failure by Clyde Fitch

His failure to score with "A Woman of Dishes" has been variously attributed to the dullness of his story, the utter incapacity of the woman who assumed the part of the cat, and the fact that the play did not to the end arrive at any definite or satisfactory conclusion. All these were doubtless contributory agents to the catastrophe, but far more important than all was the fact that the chief motif of the play was one that could not possibly win the sympathy of an average audience. We have only to recall the frenzy that takes possession of a large part of our feminine population who one of those widely advertised International matches is "palled off" at some fashionable house of prayer, to comprehend the fact that down in the bottom of her heart the average New York woman approves of such a marriage, and recalls the distinction that the purchase of an ancient and much-sought-after title confers upon one of her own countesses.

Nor is it reasonable to suppose that a woman who has sacrificed the fortune from the neck of her dress and her shoes and the hair from behind her head is a mad scoundrel to catch a glimpse of the heels of the matrimonial bridegroom as he passes from his carriage to the church door, will sympathize with any attempt to belittle such a union or to prove that this boarding-house god is one who is lost of clay.

Mr. Fitch's play proved a failure, but in its very lack of success, in the silent indignation with which hundreds of women resented its assault upon one of the most precious of their idols, it has taught a lesson that any manager of playwright can profit by. Most likely it may be to our regret that it did not, for that such a lesson has become an element too strong to be disregarded.

At another playhouse, a drama dealing also with aristocratic life, and taken from a novel which, more than any other book of modern times, shows the vanity of social ambition and holds mockery up to general ridicule, has, nevertheless, hit the bull-squarely in the center.

Mrs. Fiske's Revival of "Becky Sharp"

In a revival of "Becky Sharp" Mrs. Fiske has met with a degree of success that was entirely unlooked for, and has been variously attributed to her own rendering of the title role, to the magnificent performance of Mr. George Arliss in the part of Lord Steyne, and to the great interest which Thackeray's novel has always excited. These also are contributory causes to the success of the enterprise, nor should we lose sight of the fact that not only has Mrs. Fiske surrounded herself with a most excellent company, but that her own work as Becky is a very great improvement upon that of four seasons ago, when the piece was first given. She speaks with much greater distinctness, and in making public renunciation of many of her old sins of "naturalism" and "intellectual acting" into which she was led by the unwise praise of those ignorant advisers whose favor may be won by the very worst of the art, she has found their fitting symbol in the one ring of the shooting-gallery. But just now Mrs. Fiske seems to be aiming at the cat and the goat, and with an intelligence and good-will that manifest themselves in many ways, notably in the excellent company with which she has surrounded herself and in her willingness to permit them to earn their salaries. These are elements in which she rises almost to great heights; but although her characterization is marked throughout by that shrewd good nature which Thackeray made Becky's distinguishing trait and by a charm which I, for one, can believe to have sustained the greatest actress whose favor she has received, it would far better were it not on precisely the same line from first to last. In the great scene in which Becky attacks Steyne, she enters most forcibly, by swiftly uttered French prayers, and by the silver dissonance indicated in her own attitude, and she is a real woman who sees that social selfishness which has reared with so much skill and pains come crashing down in sudden and hopeless wreck.

When Thackeray wrote this scene, and under a sudden impulse, recorded the fact that for the first time in his life Becky Sharp admired her husband as he stood before her, strong, brave, and victorious, he laid down his pen and exclaimed, "There, my boy, is a stroke of genius!"

Skillful as Mrs. Fiske is in portraying her terror, she somehow fails to convey the idea that for once she utters the word, "stupid, adoring Becky," the gambler, swindler, and pedophile whom Charles Kingsley said he would rather have drawn than any other character in the whole range of English history.

A Shot with "The Harvester"

Mr. Otis Skinner has, I am told, received three fine Geneva cigars as a reward for the well-directed shot at the owl which he made in his play, "The Harvester." He has achieved what might be termed a half way success with "The Harvester," but he may console himself for his failure to secure greater rewards by reading those critical essays in which he not only describes his play as "a charming poetic idyll"—a term which with the cat and the goat know to be synonymous with an evening of boredom,—and declares that he deserves the cordial support of the public in his effort to establish the "poetic drama," those well that phrase sounds on a luck given over to the consequent, if jocosely, frivolities of the flippant brothers, the rule overmakings of Mr. Hamstead's variety acts, and the "mere popular success" of "The Music Master."

It is sad to see as fine an actor as Mr. Skinner trying to build his life into a part that offers nothing except what the owl calls his "virtuoso appearance," and to hear almost worthless lines hit in a voice worthy of Roscoe, especially when we remember that last season in this same shooting-gallery, in association with one of the finest of American actresses, this same dignified and capable player hit the owl, the goat, and the cat at a single mark. The real fault with this Canadian harvester is that he does not do anything on the stage that is worth looking at. He tells the audience that in the harvest-field he sings and leads all the other harrowers in their merry toll, and if we could only hear him sing, we might be wiser. We are wiser, perhaps, to hear him say, "I may add that unless the farmer, even him work and leave the voice that inspires the others to diligent toil he will not pay him his wages on Saturday night, and that is something that the manager should remember when he asks two dollars for the picturesque appearance of his cat and the recital of what he does when the audience is not looking.

Digitized by Google

(Continued from page 172.)

digitation. "He wouldn't treat a woman like this, whatever he did."

Donald looked at her almost feverily. "You don't deny it?" he said. "That sickly preacher?"

"You might be sick yourself," she answered, hotly. "When he's well he's as muddy as any one in all this camp. You haven't the right to talk like this. You ought to be ashamed. I wouldn't have thought you could do it."

Ormsby was for a moment ashamed, but he was angered—as deeply angered as a wounded grizzly bear. His face was a force, elemental, savage, dominant. The hatred suddenly stirred by jealousy within him at a thought of the slowest Willis was utterly impersonal, illogical, and wild. Yet there was infinite tenderness latent, if not yet absolutely developed, in all his love for the girl.

"I didn't mean to jump on Willis," he said, in his way of apology. "He's all right, as far as a preacher goes in the mines, but—you don't love him better than me—not when I love you with all my might?"

"I wouldn't love you—I couldn't," she answered, still in the heat of her anger.

Her words seemed to stun a something in his breast. He looked at her blankly for a moment. His face became pale; his hand was shaking.

She felt her nature respond to his sudden anguish depths herself.

His passionate resentment matured for a moment, but as strength was the dominant element of his being, he spurned the pain and scoured the anger that her words had won to his heart.

"I might have known it," he said, as he drew off his hands of the floor rubbed upon them from the contact with hers. "Oh, hell! I don't see why I didn't stick to work!"

Without, neither need he turned and left the house, and striding boldly across the hill, came at length again to his tunnel. Angrily he entered the lowing black mouth and felt his way along the walls to the end of the hole, where his candle was still burning as he left it. In all his fierceness he caught up his pick and banged the rock with blow on blow of the ringing steel.

In the mean time it might have afforded him a species of gratification to know that the fates that day were in a mood to fling not only hatred, but troubles as well, in the path of the man who had come to preach in the camp.

Silverdred was like an isolated herd of rabbits, stores, schools, and mounts of earth, scattered at random on the mighty slope of a mountain in a cold and barren universe of piled-up earth and adamant. It was thirtyodd miles from its nearest of kin, another camp by the name of Crocker Gulch, which was rougher, poorer, and therefore possessed of a population even less conventional.

This Saturday afternoon four ranchmen delegates from the neighboring settlement arrived in camp, and having partaken of whiskey fairly a-swarm with gams of unred and ingenuity, were eager to exercise their prowess in the line of creating excitement. They were housed at the Goldfarb saloon, however, and the day had gone by and the evening was come before they were finally patronized by Chance.

The room of the Goldfarb tavern was filled with miners, teamsters, millmen, bankers, and gamblers, grouped about the tables, or lined up thickly against the bar, where the four rough citizens from down the Gulch were holding carnival.

The place was alive, gloriously abuzz with lights, and stifling as to fumes of smoke and drink, when at length the door was opened and in three cases Hugh Willis, preacher of the camp, in swath of Tommy Todd, the cobbler, who held the key to the warehouse used as a church.

The men who turned at his entrance beheld a smooth-shaven man of medium height, slender, pale from recent illness, bright of eye, fearless of aspect, handsome in a way of refinement and elegance quite exceptional to see, and with features chiselled in a manner that imparted a positive exaltation to his countenance.

He looked about in the company to find the cobbler, who was leader of the visitors from Crocker except a trio of comrades from his line of vision and scrutinized the younger man aggressively.

"Here, you—my friend—come and have a drink," said he.

"I reckon you're needin' a drink," said the cobbler, who was staggered into front of Willis, heavily—a bulky, powerful lump of semi-intoxicated heathen.

"I mustn't be tempted to-night, but thanks all the same," said Willis, pleasantly. "I can't remain but a moment."

"Can't, huh? Can't remain? Can't drink? Well, you can't preach again till you drink with me; savvy that?" replied the visitor.

"My name a Blodt, and preachers a me food. I reckon per haps if you want to preach again you'll come and have a drink."

"I reckon otherwise," said Willis, quietly, "but he had become paler than before, but a bright flame of color now burned upward in his face, making it singularly radiant.

"I don't propose to drink with you, and I do propose to preach to-morrow," he said.

"The hell you say!" answered Blodt, in wrath, as he stepped between Willis and the door, to prevent his man's escape. "We'll see about that preachin', friend, for I'll be here to-morrow mornin' myself. I've got my 'pinion of a camp which lets a preacher hang around it more than a week. Say, boys, what does he do for his honest livin'?"

"Does some mine and cooks the richest doughnuts ever strack this side of the Mississippi," answered a half-breed, lowered.

"Cooks 'em for two bits a doze."

"Is that enough to drive you lands and gabotte in church and preachin'?" demanded the man from Crocker Gulch.

"Is that just only exercise for havin him stay into camp?" answered the man.

"He best Zine Pratt and Baldy White in a foot-ore all to pieces," answered the man, apologetically. "Some of the boys agreed to go to meetin' if he'd show himself a man, and he done it up first rate."

"Best a pair of limpin' rabbits, did he, in a meet?" inquired Mr. Blodt. "That all?"

"Cleaned up me and Navy Jones on pistol-shootin', slick as grease," intercalated a teamster, quietly. "He never set on odds, and went into any fair-and-square proposition, barrow gambling."

"And what's all of that amount to, anyhow?" demanded the visitor, itching for trouble. "Kid's play, that's what it is. We'll get up something decent soon to see how solid he stands. Look here, my friend, kin you do any regular fightin'?"

The time had been in the life of Hugh Willis when the man's insolent leer and challenge would have met with a knock-down blow; but he merely narrowed his eyes to-night and looked at the fellow before him coldly.

"You don't belong in this parish," he said. "Stand aside!"

Partially obeying this sharp command, the bulk of a rufian saw his man about to escape him. He hurled abruptly sideways to lay his hands in violence upon the preacher's arm.

But Willis dodged him swiftly, knocked his leg from beneath him with a dexterous turn of his foot, and sending him sprawling to the floor stepped across his prostrate form and gained the door.

The howl of delight that ensued was punctuated fiercely as the Crocker man arose, cursing and laying about him in fury.

"Don, don't stop to talk, Thuy'll kill him!" she cried and starting at once in pursuit. The first man he struck, however, was a friend as large as himself. This individual promptly stopped him with a sudden fist, and they instantly clinched for trouble.

By the time the two had begun to comprehend their previous relationship their noses were bleeding, their clothing was torn, and their anger towards the preacher was past all appeasing. It was when they shook each other by the hand and took a drink with the company, however, that the minister was brewing thickest for the morrow.

"You can see the preacher ain't no slouch," said one well-intending convert. "No telling what he might not do if he'd only once turn loose."

"We'll turn him loose to-morrow, don't you fear," replied Mr. Hildt, far more dangerous now in his evening than he had been before in his day. "I know the way we made a preacher fight at Redhorse Creek one Sunday, and I'll bet I'll make it work again. And when we get him on the fight—he'll have to clean out four of us before he opens up his yawp to preach again."

"Four of you? What's the matter with some of us regular citizens (them) here in camp?" inquired the gambler who had spoken up before. "I'll back two or three good men we've got ourselves."

John Morse, the uncle of Hilda, left his seat and studied the company in idle contempt.

"Four of these grizzles—enough!" he said to himself, and leaving that he went home and related what had happened to his niece.

"I reckon Hugh will have to quit the camp," he added, at the end. "I've heard of preachers being driven out before."

Hilda had looked at him throughout his recital with eyes a trifle wild. A flash of color had been flashing in her cheeks.

"Quit the camp—go away!" repeated, paling peculiarly. "Hugh Willis stand by and let a number of ruffians drive him away? He'd die first!"

"If he fights that Crowbar gang, he's in for a mighty good chance of dying; no mistake about that," agreed her uncle. "The men is weak and sick. He doesn't stand a show on earth."

"And you men let these hair-drunk brutes from Crowbar Gully—" started Hilda, arousing; but Morse interrupted.

"We didn't let. It wasn't a matter of let," he said. "A mining-camp is a tough sort of place. Hugh knew that when he came. He had to take it as it was; and he'll have to take it that way now, or pull up stakes and git. He had some friends—he had plenty of friends in the crowd to-night, but the gang for the most part likes to see a fight. They'd like to see him show his mettle; and not a voice could be raised to stop a game like this when once it gets a start."

"It's shameful!" cried Hilda. "He won't! He wouldn't stop in such a thing! He'll never fight them! They can't drive him out, and they can't make him fight!"

"I don't know," said her uncle. "He's a man."

"He is a man!" said Hilda, hoarsely. "That's the point. He'll never let them win! I know he'll be too clever for them all. He's got to be clever—he's got to! If he ever lets them drive him away—he could never come back. No one would ever want to see—his face here again."

"No one," agreed her uncle.

"No one," she repeated, and she knew that she even included herself. She hated the thought, however, the moment it came. He would not permit the brutes to drive him forth—to brand him a coward. And yet—how could he so demean himself and his calling as to fight these drunken ruffians?

"He'll surely know something to do," she said again, and vainly she considered what any man could do in such a position.

That he did not come to see her as the evening passed gave her cause for new anxiety. She wrung her hands as she passed in darning her uncle's stockings and wove she worked into heels and toes, and wove she went into dreams all night.

In the morning Hugh Willis prepared as usual to hold his customary service, Colony

1854-1904

WALTHAM WATCHES

ALWAYS FAITHFUL

Emerson, the philosopher, established the WALTHAM watch in common speech as a synonym of perfect adjustment. There are more than forty varieties and grades of WALTHAM watches. Ask your jeweler to show you some of them and tell you about them.

For sale by all Jewelers

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY,
WALTHAM, MASS.

Read Blaikie's HOW TO GET STRONG and How to Stay So

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

THE EQUITABLE

Wishes are good
When backed by deeds

Actions to-day bring
Results for the future

J. WALLACE

PRESIDENT

J. H. HYDE

VICE PRESIDENT

HENRY D. HYDE

DON'T WISH

that you and your family may always have as much reason for thanksgiving as you have now. Act and make sure of it.

A policy in the EQUITABLE on the New Continuous Instalment Endowment plan will provide a yearly income for your family—commencing just when they need it. Or it will provide a yearly income for yourself—commencing just when you need it.

Splendid opportunities for men of character to act as representatives
Write to GAGE E. TARBELL, 272 Vice President.

For full information fill out this coupon or write

The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, 100 Broadway, N. Y., Dept. 22.

Please send me information regarding a Continuous Instalment Endowment for $

If loaned to a person years of age, beneficiary years of age.

Name:

Address:

Carlton Club

MONTHPIECE

CIGARETTES

The Exclusive Cigarette

Smoked in select clubs, and by men who know and appreciate Turkish tobacco at its best.

If not at your dealer's we will send package of 10 on receipt of price, 25 cents.

The GAME
Sherlock Holmes NEAREST TRADE SHOW

THE LATEST CRAZE
LAUGHABLE. EXCITING
ENTIRELY NEW.

SOLD EVERYWHERE. PRICE 50¢. A PAGE.
PARKER BROTHERS INC.
CHICAGO 255, U.S.A. and California Bldg. NEW YORK

PATENTS

Our Head Office in Patents, Trade-Marks, etc., sent free. Patents procured through Munn & Co. involve less expense in the U. S. PATENT OFFICE.

MUNN & CO., 354 Broadway, N. Y.
Representatives, 205 F St., Washington, D.C.

From Subscribers

Cassius M. Harris, Iowa, October 29, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Mr. N. — Will you allow a dyed-in-the-wool Republican who has voted the party ticket in every national election since 1872 to voice his appreciation of your platform, "No Hambug," and of the able and felicitous support you are giving it? I own that you occasionally get on my partisan nerves, or with your pungent quill find a sensitive spot in the thinnest hide of my Republicanism, but down below the smarting cuticle there is usually the wholesome feeling that, after all, you are right. Of course, you, I and a billion for my part, are in the fact that you are more intelligible in showing up the humbug of the Democrats, and find, as it seems to me, more good occasions for directness.

I may add that my acquaintance with HARPER'S WEEKLY dates from away back in civil-war times, out on the prairies of Kansas, when my mother used to brighten the walls of our little pioneer cabin by pasting on them the saved-up copies of the WEEKLY, picture-side only. Many a time I used to linger over those stirring war-time pictures when I should have been splitting my kindling wood or hunking over for the ration. The pleasure of those days was my father's. He would sit there, in his infirmity, still as a statue, and the young folks would sit regularly ever since, but I wish to assure you that I have never found it safer, stronger, brighter, or more rationally indispensable to me than it is at present.

1. Am. J. Math. 87 (1965), 1131-1142.

Received 25 May 2006; accepted 11 June 2006

$\mathbb{P}_0, \mathbb{P}_1, \dots, \mathbb{P}_n, \mathbb{P}_{n+1}, \dots, \mathbb{P}_\infty$ and $\mathbb{P}_0, \mathbb{P}_1, \dots, \mathbb{P}_n, \mathbb{P}_{n+1}, \dots, \mathbb{P}_\infty$

Now all the questions were asked: "Why is the editor of Harvard's Weekly like Judge Parker?" I think the answer might well be, "They both are." The English language is so rich in metaphors that it is not surprising to find a devoted reader of your columns for some time. But I have, during the past few months, repeatedly asked myself what your politics are. You are certainly not a Republican, and you are certainly not a Democrat, so, but what do you honestly think about the Republican party in the present campaign? In one column you support "Ball and Clay" while in another you support "Mr. Hughes." You say Mr. Ellinger, what are your politics? I would really like to know.

I liked you to judge Parker because when a fellow journalist asks some pat question like "What are your politics?" I am sure the laughing stock of all creation, and leave your readers to darkness as to what your real opinions are. You seem to prefer D. B. H.

Keywords: 5-H-tryptophan; chloroquine; lithium; mood stabilizer

© 2004 Blackwell Publishing Ltd, Journal of Internal Medicine 255: 109–116

Sau-... I suppose a note of appreciation from a mere learner will not count for much with you when you are complimented so highly by editors and other distinguished people. Still, I feel like adding my mite to telling you how much I enjoy your "Comment" and your "No Humberg" platform, and how much I envy the fun you must get out of such writers as you publish, as the ones headed "Certainly" and an "Extraordinary Profound."

Can't you publish more of the same kind?

I am, sir,

490 STATE ST., BOSTON, MASS. - November 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:
 Sir.—For years I thought that George William Curtis would never be exceeded by any editor in your journal, but although was brought up a Republican in politics and still remain so, I read with a great deal of pleasure, if not profit, the editorial of HARPER'S WEEKLY of the present day and hope they will long continue. With that the WEEKLY could be read by ten times the people that it is read by to-day.

3 mm, all

The World's Commerce

The world's commerce in the latest year for which statistics are available, as noted in the annual report of the Department of Statistics of the United States, Bureau of Labor, shows the total exports of all nations of the world to be in the latest year available, $10,311,000,000, and the value of the total imports of all nations, $11,809,000,000. This would give the total value of the world's imports and exports combined as $22,120,000,000. Since all articles which were received in exports became in turn imports when they entered the country of destination, it would appear that the actual value of the service entering into international commerce was

The value of the articles forming the internal commerce of the United States was estimated at about 22 billions of dollars in a single year.

An Interesting Comparison

Thus while it has been customary to speak of the internal commerce of the United States as equal to the entire international commerce of the world, it appears from this statement that the actual value of the merchandise entering into the internal commerce of the United States is practically twice as great as that entering into the international commerce.

Europe, of course, supplies a very large proportion of the world's international commerce, both as to exports and imports. The exports of Europe amount to $6,498,000,000, out of a total of $10,515,000,000 exports of all the countries of the world, and her imports are $8,361,000,000, out of a total of $11,808,000,000 of the total imports of all the countries of the world. Thus Europe's total international commerce, combining her imports and exports, amounts to practically 15 billion dollars, out of a total of 22 billion of combined imports and exports.

Of the $8,304,000,000 of imports from Europe, $1,202,500,000, or 14.48 per cent, are from the United States, and of the $6,498,000,000 of exports, $467,858,000, or 7.20 per cent, are to the United States.

Typhoid Fever and Oysters

[illegible]

THREE NEW NOVELS

The Son of Royal Langbrith By W. D. HOWELLS

IT is recognized, not as one of Mr. Howells' strongest books of fiction, but as the strongest. It has a plot that grips one. The story cannot be put down; it must be read at a sitting. Special Binding, Crown 8vo, $2.00

The Truants A. E. W. MACSON

THIS new story by the author of "The Four Feathers" not only introduces the reader to strange phases of modern London life, but speedily involves him in a plot of engrossing interest, which centres round a man who must needs choose between military honor and the good name of his wife. The plot is intensely interesting throughout, growing more and more involved with every chapter. Illustrated, Post 8vo, $1.50

The Georgians

By WILL N. HARBEN

A NEW book about Abner Daniel, in which his shrewd wit is more keen and telling than ever. In the role of match-maker he adds a delightfully humorous touch to a sweet and tender love story. Post 8vo, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

A Five-Volume Encyclopedia FREE if accompanied by a five years' subscription ($5) to THE COSMOPOLITAN.

For $2.50 WE SEND THE COSMOPOLITAN and

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA

Over Three Thousand Pages

FIVE HANDSOME VOLUMES

Full Cloth Bound
Gold Lettering
Distinctly Printed in Plain Type
A Necessity for Every Office
And Every Home

The One Comprehensive Encyclopedia in such form as to be kept on a desk ready for constant reference.

No Business Man and No Home Should Be Without These Five Volumes. SOLD TO EVERY NEW OR OLD SUBSCRIBER TO THE COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE for $2.50, including one year's subscription to either THE COSMOPOLITAN or THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME. For $3.00 you can have the Encyclopedia and both THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME and THE COSMOPOLITAN for one year.

THE FIVE VOLUMES OF THE ENCYCLOPEDIA ARE SENT BY EXPRESS, THE CHARGES CAN BE PAID BY THE RECEIVER. IF YOU WISH THEM BY MAIL, SEND 50 CENTS FOR POSTAGE.

ADDRESS: THE COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE,
IRVINGTON, NEW YORK

TWO BOOKS BY GEORGE ADE

(Imprint of R. H. RUSSELL.)

THE GIRL PROPOSITION

A Bunch of He-and-She Fables

George Ade's fables are read the world over. The present volume is, as its title indicates, a series of extraordinarily clever sketches on a theme that is very dear to the author's heart, and which is vastly interesting to most people.

The Girl Proposition is packed with sense and wit and entertainment, all in the inimitable Ade vein. Profusely illustrated by Holme and McCutcheon. $1.00.

PEOPLE YOU KNOW

GEORGE ADE'S LATEST

No living writer could duplicate the work done here by this keen and humorous observer of American life. Among the twenty-six "people you know" are The Patient Toiler, The True Friend, The Self-Made Hezekiah, The Married Couple, The Samaritan, The Work Horse, and The Two Young People.

Over fifty quaint illustrations by McCutcheon and others. $1.00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK CITY

Gold Bonds for $10,000

Guaranteeing an Annual income of $500. for 20 years and then
$10,000 cash would be a fine
legacy for your wife and family

THIS AMOUNT OR MORE, IN

THE PRUDENTIAL

Write for Sample Bond
at your age to

THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO.
OF AMERICA.

John F. Dryden
President.

Dept. T

HOME OFFICE
NEWARK, N. J.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVING

HARPER BROTHERS

NEW YORK

THE MASQUERADER

by

KATHERINE CECIL
THURSTON

ILLUSTRATED BY
CLARENCE F. UNDERWOOD

Two men, not related, but looking absolutely alike—one married, the other a bachelor—secretly change places. The novel develops along lines new to fiction, and is a forceful, compelling story; not a story of style and words, but a story of doing, a history of life in action. The moral problem involved is a strange one.

A CURIOUS LETTER

When this story was running serially people kept writing in begging eagerly for advanced proofs, one reader pleading that he had heart disease and fearing that he might die before the story ended. Such was the breathless interest in the story.

COMPARED WITH "MONTE-CRISTO"

While it was running in Blackwood's—the oldest magazine in England—one of the oldest subscribers wrote to the editor: "Never since I waited feverishly sixty years ago for 'Monte-Cristo' have I been so excited by a story. And Mrs. Thurston has given me what Dumas did not—a perpetually increasing wonder as to how the adventure is to end."

LIFE OVERRUNNING

The N. Y. Evening Mail says: "This is the story of a strong man and a strong woman and their high-handed grasping for happiness in the face of the moral law. The woman, magnificent in her love, rises above considerations of conventions, above fear, above conscience. Circumstances give her the right to follow the dictates of an overwhelming passion. . . . It will take rank with the few really good books."

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, November 19, 1904

NO. 2500

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

Photograph copyright, 1904, by Arthur H. Heath

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND HIS SONS

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2500

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 19, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy — $4.00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post office as second-class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE

LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

On a guess was all right as far as it went. Its sole defect consists in the fact that it did not go far enough. We confess humbly that it never occurred to us that Maryland might go one way or the other by two hundred majority, or that Missouri, with Foss running for Governor, would vote for Roosevelt. We never knew much about Netami anyhow, and have never wanted to. It has no business to be a State. Still, its three votes become a part of the majority. With the exception of these States, the country voted as we guessed it would, — not as it should, perhaps, mind you, but as it would and did. The outcome, so far as we can judge, was typified once upon an occasion by an Irishman who, when asked what was the complaint which carried his mother-in-law to her everlasting home, replied that there was no complaint everybody was satisfied. In any case, we have observed no long faces, and all branches of business are pecking up.

The most effective words ever written in THOMPSON ROOSEVELT were those poured on election night:

WASHINGTON, November 5, 1904

I am deeply sensible of the honor done me by the American people in thus expressing their confidence in what I have done and have tried to do. I appreciate to the full the solemn responsibility this confidence imposes upon me, and I shall do all that in my power lies not to forfeit it. On the 4th of March next I shall have served three and one-half years, and this three and one-half years constitutes my first term. The wise custom which limits the President to two terms regards the substance and not the form. Under no circumstances will I be a candidate for or accept another nomination.

We say "effective" advisedly. To the hundreds of thousands who had voted on faith these words bore the definite assurance that their confidence was not mislaid. That Mr. Roosevelt had determined upon this course was well known to his friends, but with commendable pride he withheld the announcement until a time when by no possibility could it be construed as a bid for political support. We cannot say that we approve of his position, for the reason that circumstances might arise which would put it in flat opposition to the welfare of the country and the desires of the people; nor in these times do we attach much importance even to the wholly misunderstood two-term tradition. But if it was to be done, that was the time to do it. If, in consequence, anybody ever had a freer hand to write his name full and large upon the pages of history, we cannot recall his name. But the main point is that all now know that the THEODORE ROOSEVELT whom they voted for is the THEODORE ROOSEVELT they thought he was.

There is no doubt that Judge PARKER was grievously disappointed. He and his managers were curiously deluded by a certain conviction that he would be elected. There was no make-believe on their part. They felt absolutely sure of a result that would have been the most astonishing episode in American politics. It was, therefore, but natural, perhaps, that the Democratic candidate, while yet feeling keenly his disappointment, should have harked back, in his subsequent pronouncement to his party, to the causes which he had indicated with peculiar emphasis in the last few days of the campaign as the most potent on behalf of the Republican candidacy. "If," he said, "we would help the people, if we would furnish an organization through which they may be relieved of a party that has grown so corrupt that it would gladly enter into partnership with the trusts to secure money for election purposes, we must forget the differences of the past," etc. The plain implication from this assertion is that money contributed by the trusts constituted an important factor in the election of Mr. ROOSEVELT. The fact is that the funds disbursed by the two national committees differed very little in amount. The Republican fund was $2,250,000; the Democratic fund was $1,800,000. Neither of these amounts was excessive. Undoubtedly Mr. HARRIMAN gathered up a considerable amount of money to aid his Republican headman in New York, and so in all probability did Senator SMITH on behalf of his Democratic candidate for Governor in New Jersey, but so far as the national committees were concerned, there was no disbursement such as would involve the purchase of votes. Mr. ROOSEVELT was overwhelmingly on his own personality. Judge PARKER could not beat him, Mr. CLEVELAND could not have beaten him; neither, in our judgment, could the angel Gabriel. The people wanted a human being, forceful, resolute, patriotic, faultless maybe, but sagacious and appealing. They found what they were seeking in THOMPSON ROOSEVELT, and made his election so sure that the regret of a purchase is simply silly.

Judge PARKER chose his words with some discretion in dealing with the "corruptor" incident, but it would doubtless have paid him better as well as pleased him better to have declared frankly what everybody knew to be true, that the black-and-white insinuation was rubbish. As it was, the Republicans profited greatly by CLEVELAND's appointment, improper though it was. They got a good, clean man for campaign manager; they got the money of the business interests in due volume; and they had the final advantage of having their candidate ridiculously slandered for an act for which he might be justly censured. The slander killed the resource. Verily all things work together for the good of the candidate whom the people want.

We regret exceedingly to be obliged to record the impression that the Judge is not a good loser. On election night he sent the following despatch:

EIGHTH, NEW YORK, 2.30 P.M., November 4

The President, Washington, D. C.

The people by their votes have emphatically approved your administration and I congratulate you.

ALTON B. PARKER

This was usual, proper, and perfunctory. It was probably all that the Judge could find in his heart to say. He certainly could not consistently congratulate the people, but he could and did with manifold reluctance felicitate the winner. The reply was direct and to the point, as follows:

ALTON B. PARKER, ROOSEVELT, N. Y.

I thank you for your congratulations.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

The recipient of the congratulations could hardly have said less. As a gentleman, he would necessarily have made a like reply to EUGENE V. DEBS. It must be noted, however, that it would be difficult to read into this single line any particular amount of enthusiastic appreciation. The fact, of course, is that Mr. ROOSEVELT felt keenly that, in the latter days of the campaign, the man whom he had formerly respected and regarded, in a personal sense, as a friend, had not played fair. It may be that in this respect he was unduly sensitive. The appointment of Mr. CLEVELAND certainly invited attack, but he knew that the accusation implied at least by the Judge was wholly unjustified, and he was certain in his mind that the Judge himself did not really believe it had foundation in fact, and was making it for political purposes. His resentment, therefore, was natural, and was obviously shared by the people.

Mr. BAYAN behaved very well. He could not resist the impulse of human nature to brag a little over the fact that he received more votes than the conservative Democratic candidate, but he cooed gently, and insists rightly, so far as we can see, that the control of the organization should pass back from the East to the West. Upon this point, among the men who have been most active in the management of the Democratic canvass, one of the most influential declared on the day before election that unless Judge PARKER could carry at least his own State there would be no disposition to withhold from Mr. BAYAN control of the party. Another, stronger perhaps intellectually, but less potent financially, insisted that, whatever the result, an organization had been created which should be maintained at any cost and prepared to take instant advantage of expected extravaganzas of the Republican administration. Mr. HENRY is again a candidate for the nomination in 1898. Mr. DIES, in polling more than half a million votes, certainly established the fact that there is a nucleus, especially in the great cities of the West, of a Socialistic party of the German type, and as a result of these various and curious things we may reasonably expect that every act of the incoming administration, as well as of the new Republican Congress, will be subjected to the sharpest scrutiny, and will need more than in many years to be carefully considered. Meanwhile, stocks are going up far more rapidly than they ought to go, and, unless the tendency is checked, the inevitable slump within the next four years will greatly encourage, if not materially aid, the growing radicalism within the nation.

The solemn editors fulfilled our pleasing anticipations almost literally. The Times recalled, as we indicated that it would do, the fact that Mr. ROOSEVELT once upon a time did have a character, and added that "no one can deny the convincing evidence his career affords of great personal ability, profound knowledge of the temper and purpose of the American people, and extraordinary hold upon their confidence and admiration, and an almost unprecedented command of the elements of success in a democratic nation." It also points out how he may achieve a great success by reforming the tariff, and plainly intimates that in so far as he shall follow the suggestions freely offered he will receive the support of a truly moral journal. The World did not reprint its strenuous editorial of some time ago commending Mr. ROOSEVELT's action in the Northern Securities case, in conformity with our suggestion, but it refers to it with the utmost satisfaction, and recalls to his mind with particularity the fact that it, the World, gave such ample recognition to that achievement, and that it praised him for keeping the peace in Venezuela, and that it defended him against the criticisms of his hospitality to BOERER WASHINGTON. It then adds, as we said it would, that it "will sustain him when he is right, and criticize him when he seems to it, to be wrong," etc. Poor Dr. McKEE was the hardest time of all. The best he can do is to write a few thousand words upon the topic entitled "Where the Eagle was Right and the Party was Wrong." Demands upon time prevent the perusal of the essay, but if it refers to the conclusive evidence adduced by the Eagle's postal-card canvass of the overwhelming success of Judge PARKER, the average mind might be tortured by a suspicion that the good Doctor disingenuously reversed his adjectives. The Springfield Republican tells vaguely "How it happened." The Evening Post cheerfully grumbles, and there you are. We have not yet mustered sufficient courage to attack the comments of the Sun upon the result in New York State.

We venture a prediction that President ROOSEVELT will revise the tariff in the interest of the people.

One of the most cheering features of the election is the obvious fact that voters have learned to differentiate between candidates and how to split tickets. If anybody gifted with omniscience had said on the day before election that Mr. HENRY would receive 100,000 votes in the State of New York less than Mr. ROOSEVELT and yet be elected, he would have been regarded as insane, and yet that is what happened. The fact that Mr. OWELL's candidate was elected may seem to his friends sufficient justification for the hypocritical congratulatory telegram that he sent to the President, but as a matter of fact Mr. OWELL received a rebuke which was most scathing, and in any normal condition would have been crushing. The popularity of the national candidate was so overwhelming that it saved the boss. Nobody appreciated better than Mr. ROOSEVELT himself the blight put upon his own high-minded candidacy by Odellism, but he stood squarely by his original determination not to interfere, and his faith that the people would not confound his ideals with the sordid motives of the Governor-Chairman was amply justified. If the President has sent a gratifying reply to the fulsome communication from Mr. OWELL it has not at the time this is written been published.

We remarked some weeks ago "Give the excessive tariff time and it will feth Massachusetts." The untimely result in that State seems to warrant the accuracy of the observation. Mr. DWIGHT made his fight on the tariff. Some local issues were involved, but the main point of his candidacy rested upon undue and unjust exactions. As a consequence, Mr. ROOSEVELT received nearly 90,000 majority on the same basis as he swept the country—that is, upon his personality and the popular confidence in his integrity and ability, and Mr. DWIGHT was chosen Governor by nearly 40,000, a difference of fully 120,000 votes. Similar results were reaped in other States. While Mr. ROOSEVELT carried Colorado, West Virginia, Missouri, Minnesota, and Nebraska by substantial majorities, a Democrat was elected Governor in each State. Even in Rhode Island, where Mr. ROOSEVELT had 10,000 majority, the Democratic candidate for Governor was beaten by only a few hundred. All this is encouraging in showing that the electors have learned when and how to discriminate. Party ties have ceased to be binding. The man and specific principles have become essential to political success. Nothing could be more gratifying.

And Missouri! A great, big, jagged chunk blasted out of that stubborn boulder, the Solid South! Would that while he was about it, President ROOSEVELT had carried the other Southern States and given us a united country, that could in due time break apart on new lines. There were only twelve States left. If it had been a convention, instead of an election, the motion to make it unanimous would have been carried with such a roar that the dissenting voices, if there were any, could not have been heard. So long as things were going the way they went, we would have been delighted to see the President sweep Mississippi. And, by the way, now that he is in for four years more, and will not be a candidate again, cannot the remnant of the once solid South bring itself to take a more indulgent and hopeful view of his character and purposes, and try to coöperate with him in promoting the realization of any sound intentions he may disclose to do the South good? Mr. ROOSEVELT will want to give the country a successful administration. After such a victory he can afford to be extremely gentle and forbearing. He will want to be President of all the people, and he will doubtless prefer not to be regarded with bitterness even in twelve States out of the forty-five. The South will do well to take a fresh start with him, and letting bygones go, try again to work with him as it might have worked with McKINLEY.

NEW PALMER, November 3.

President Roosevelt, U. S. A., Washington:
Sincere congratulations. May Heaven give you prosperity.
Tum quod bonum felix faustumque sit populo Americano.

WILLIAM L. R.

May time be what is good, happy, and prosperous to the American people.

Oh, shucks!

Colonel WATTS' summing up on November 4 ran over four of the long columns of the Courier-Journal, and was all edifying and delightful. There are other men in the country who can write four-column editorials, but MARIE HENRY'S piece has the peculiarity that they get themselves not only written, but read. In elucidation of his views on blue-grass brother marshalled CHANCER KENT, GOLDWIN SMITH, Lord BYRON, Lord ACTON, JEFFERSON, ROBERT BROWNING, Doctor JOHNSON, BEN JESSON, MACHIAVELLI, THOMAS MOORE, HORACE, RAGHOUT, BECKLE, KIPPLIN, WASHINGTON, LINCOLN, AGASSIZ, and McKINLEY, and various documents and monuments of antiquity besides. But all mangled the current of his philosophy flowed on, adored but unimpeded by its rich freight. The papers say that Colonel WATSON is going abroad now for a long rest. He began his political career by being born early in 1840, just in time to take part in the great hard-cider and log-cabin campaign. The only thing that can break him of the habit of electing Presidents would be to turn from political polemics—as DOANE did at about his age—and write some books that might live.

DOANE was led to the trough, but would not drink. Again the unspeakable ASSICKS is bent.

The late Democratic candidate for Lieutenant-Governor of New York seems a likely young man and worthy of the confidence of the voters, but wasn't it ill-advised to recommend him to college men as a college man, and to members of the Psi Yu fraternity as a Psi Yu? It turned out that Governor ORELL is also a Psi Yu, which turned what was rather a silly impropriety into a luscious joke. The recommendation of another circular signed by excellent names was that Mr. HARMON was "a representative college man." To our mind it was an injurious recommendation as far as it went, which was not far. The very thing that college men who go into politics should avoid is to be classified as belonging to any small group set apart from the mass of citizens. A candidate for a State office appeals to all the voters in the State. It is all right to commend him as a man of competent education, but a mistake to put him forward as the candidate of a group of men educated in a particular way. Moreover, college-bred men don't vote for college men as such. They vote, as a rule, according to their political convictions. When they go to football games they go as college men, but when they go to the polls they go as citizens. The first thing for a college-bred candidate to do is to get out of college. That is well understood by Mayor McLELLAN, who was, not long ago, the object of some amusing criticism because he had never run for office as a graduate of Princeton.

After all, even the cry of "breakers ahead" isn't enough to make folks abandon a ship with competent officers for a raft with a green crew.

Just a word of warning to our Republican friends. THOMAS ROOSEVELT has won an enormous victory. In your natural enthusiasm over his huge success, don't boil over too much! Don't do to him what the American people did to GEORGE DOANE! Don't make an impossible hero of him! Keep down your raptures. He is a good man and has a big man's work ahead of him. Give him a chance to do it, and help him to do it wisely. His administration will have no immediate opposition of sufficient strength to curb it. If it needs to have the brakes put on, some of you will have to help twist them.

Secretary TAYLOR lifts the "Recessional" made in his after-election remarks. "The danger in the case of such a victory," he says, "is that it may lead to a relaxing of the self-restraint that is more certain to be exercised when the danger of a political change is more probable. It is no unknown thing to have a majority as large and sweeping as this, followed by a defeat equally emphatic at the next Presidential election." Evidently there is a three-hundred-pound weight on the right side of the balance.

Those Republicans who were going to vote for PARKER for fear ROOSEVELT would get too many votes didn't do it. You can't depend on such voters. They are blinde to panic.

In an editorial discourse the day before election our Republican neighbor, the Globe, inquired of Judge PARKER and various newspapers, "Do you think it paid to accuse the President of the United States of being a deliberate and wholesale blackmailer?" We won't discuss whether it paid or not, nor even deny (as may so reasonably be done) that Judge PARKER made such accusations. But the Globe's inquiry serves very well to introduce discussion of the reason why it has irritated so many observers to be told that the present

President of the United States is entitled, by virtue of his office, to reverential treatment, and must not be accused, even when a candidate for reelection, of conduct inconsistent with the loftiest virtue. It has always been taken as a matter of course that the President of the United States is entitled, as such, to the respect of all men. The office is one of the highest dignity. Not to show respect to the man who occupies it is not only bad manners, but implies in an offender an inability to appreciate his country's greatness which amounts to a defect in patriotism. All Presidents, so far as we know, have been treated with respect. But since Mr. ROOSEVELT succeeded Mr. McKINLEY there has been a very perceptible softening of the demand for increased veneration of the person of the Chief Magistrate. Whence it came we do not know. Mr. ROOSEVELT is not at all a formal person; his address is extremely friendly unless he has reason to make it otherwise; his manners are easy. Yet out of his immediate environment has proceeded this new gospel of increased veneration for the President of the United States.

It makes some citizens laugh and others swear. Certainly the White House is no place for barroom manners. When GUN-BLASE BALL STONE was elected Governor of Missouri his constituents were assured that when they visited the executive mansion they were welcome to spit on the floor. It does not seem desirable that the democratic sentiment should find that form of expression in the White House or the President's offices. Indeed, the White House has been conducted in the last three years very much to the admiration and liking of almost every one. Its generous hospitalities have been guided by excellent taste, and the faults that have been found with its management have been either ignorant or spiteful. And yet there does exist this noticeable irritation at the co-existence of some masters of etiquette upon the defence that is due to the President of the United States. They tell us that we are a world power now, and that we owe it to ourselves to remember that our President is one of the greatest potentates on earth, if not the greatest, and to give evidence of our own reasonable self-esteem by the deference with which we treat him. To which the objectors retort, "Why, that's imperialism." And they don't make that retort for the mere purpose of answering back, but because it expresses a real feeling.

There is a real reason why it makes us cross to have the Globe talk about what is, or is not, due to the President of the United States in the person of THOMAS ROOSEVELT. It is not because deference is not due to the President, for it is due to him—though his friends can't plead privacy for him when he happens to be a candidate. The trouble about Mr. ROOSEVELT is that instead of his personality being merged into the office, the office comes very near being merged into his personality. He is the President, but still more intensely and conspicuously and continuously he is THOMAS ROOSEVELT. Was that impetuous letter of denial at which the country chuckled five days before election the letter of the President of the United States? Of course not. It was the letter of THOMAS ROOSEVELT, and highly characteristic of that gentleman. And it is apt to be THOMAS ROOSEVELT who reviews war-ships, THOMAS ROOSEVELT who ranks his friends, the same who defies his enemies and performs many of the official acts which are included in the duties of the President.

He can't help it, being built that way. Neither can we. But our brethren who rub it into us so much that the President of the United States deserves our awful consideration might as well realize first as last that though there is a basis of propriety in what they say, President ROOSEVELT will never excite the degree of reverence which they enjoin, unless he succeeds in sinking his personality in the Presidential office. And that he will probably never do. None of the above reflections, however, should be understood as endorsing or extenuating that "blackmail" suggestion. That was folly; folly not because it was aimed at "The President of the United States," but because it wasn't true. If it had been true and could have been proved it would have been a lawful campaign missile, but it was inconsistent with the candidate's character, and it was unsupported by a shred of evtimony. It made thousands of voters angry, and remains now the one prominent feature of the campaign that decent Democrats regret.

Perhaps HARPER'S WEEKLY is conducting a growing contest.—Archibald (Wm.) Johnston.

That is all it was. We didn't really know.

The encouragement which the Democrats can derive from the election is exclusively of the darkest-just-before-the-dawn order. We see the announcement that Mr. THOMAS WATSON and Mr. WILLIAM HILBERT are going to hold a conference in New York this week. The announcement included Mr. HAYES, but he has excused himself. Of course they will climb to be the dawn. They are just about enough of a dawn to make conspicuous the morning star of Missouri, JOSEPH FOLK, elected Governor by a comfortable majority in a State that chose ROOSEVELT electors and a Republican Legislature. FOLK's election is the great source of the idealists, as DUBOIS's success in Massachusetts is the great Democratic surprise.

DUBOIS carried Massachusetts by 35,000; ROOSEVELT by 80,000. Obviously Massachusetts men can split their tickets. Presumably their efficiency in it is due to the high average of education in the Bay State. But MISSOURI gave ROOSEVELT 15,000 and FOLK 10,000, and eliminated COOK, who ran for Secretary of State on FOLK's ticket. Missouri at a pinch can split a ticket, too, though her educational qualifications are not so distinguished as those of Massachusetts.

The people of the United States have spoken for THOMSON (ROOSEVELT) and the policies for which he stands as they have spoken for no other man in our history since WASHINGTON.—The Tribune.

How is this, neighbor? Is he to be THOMSON ROOSEVELT when he wins, and "the President of the United States" when he is criticized? If it was ROOSEVELT who won, it must also have been ROOSEVELT who ran.

During the few days preceding the Presidential election some curious possibilities were suggested which are worth noting, because they will recur four years hence. Directing attention to the fact that the number of electoral votes based on the last census (1870) is an even number, some one pointed out in the New York Times that, conceivably, the electoral votes might be equally divided, in which event, under the Constitution, the choice of a President would be made by the House of Representatives, and Mr. ROOSEVELT would be chosen, because each State would have but one vote, and that vote would be determined by the majority of its Representatives. The Republicans control a large majority of the State delegations in the present House. The writer in the Times went on to show that what was conceivable was by no means improbable. If, in addition to the 151 electoral votes, which even Republicans assigned to Judge PARKER, he should be credited with those of Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Indiana, Colorado, Montana, Nevada, and Idaho, every one of which States are doubtful, with the possible exception of the last named, he would have exactly 238 votes. This computation gave to ROOSEVELT not only the States which he seemed certain to carry, but also West Virginia and Maryland, both of which were swept by McKINLEY at the last two Presidential elections.

Another interesting fact was pointed out in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, namely, that conceivably the Presidential election might be determined by women or aliens. Unquestionably women can vote in four States, to wit, Idaho, Colorado, Wyoming, and Utah, which collectively have fourteen electoral votes. It is also indisputable that aliens who are not yet naturalized, but who have merely declared their intention of becoming citizens, may vote in such possibly close States as Indiana, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Oregon, and South Dakota. In at least one State aliens need have announced such an intention only thirty days before election day. It is also quite possible that a close election might be decided by persons who are unable to read or write. Illiterates can vote in Delaware, Indiana, and Illinois, as well as in a great many other States. What was true this year will be true at the end of 1898.

While Mayor McCLELLAN was up the State, "trying to save the Constitution" he says, the local Goshu snubbed the outer surface of New York's City Hall. The Mayor is sorry. He didn't help the Constitution any, whereas if he had stayed on the bridge he might have saved the City Hall.

It will be remembered that the arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain, which was negotiated by Secretary OLNEY and Lord PALMERSTON, failed to secure the two-thirds vote in the Senate needed for ratification. We take for granted that Secretary HAY would not face the risk of a similar humiliation, and feels assured that two-thirds of the Senators will sanction the arbitration treaty with France, which was signed the other day by himself and Ambassador JESSUP. This is only the first, we are told, of several treaties, substantially identical, which will have been signed before the Fifty-eighth Congress re-assembles in December. It is said that Mr. HAY has in view an agreement for arbitration with Germany, with Italy, and with more than one other country on the continent of Europe. If all of these should be ratified, he will probably crown his endeavors in the cause of peace by re-submitting an arbitration treaty with Great Britain. There is no doubt that the feeling of the American people, which, as a rule, is reflected in the United States Senate, is very much more friendly to Great Britain than it was at the time of the rejection of the OLNEY-PALMERSTON arbitration treaty. For this change of sentiment there are several reasons, the first of which, in order of time, and the most potent in respect of influence, was the sympathetic attitude of the people and government of Great Britain during our war with Spain. There is no doubt that but for the firm refusal of the SALISBURY government to take part in such a repressive movement, our desire to liberate Cuba, which, after the destruction of the battleship Maine, became vehement, would have been checked in the spring of 1898 by a concerted protest of all the great European powers, which, in effect, would have been tantamount to a writ of prohibition. There is reason to believe that Lord PALMERSTON was inclined to combine with the representatives of other foreign countries in putting pressure upon our government, but we know that a very different view of England's interest and duty was taken by the British Foreign Office.

Those Americans who happened to be on the Continent after the outbreak of the war with Spain are not likely to forget the shameless manifestations of hatred of the United States with which the Paris press was rife. For twenty-four hours after DEWEY's victory in Manila Bay, and after the destruction of Cervera's squadron, we were told that the miserable Yankees had been annihilated. After our naval victory off Santiago could not be denied, however, the Frenchmen began to hedge, and have since reminded us effusively of the services rendered to the cause of American independence during our Revolutionary war. We have not forgotten those services; nor, on the other hand, the outrageous treatment to which American merchant vessels were subjected between 1793 and 1812; nor the difficulty experienced, even by ANTOINE JACKSON, in extorting a recognition of the debt owed to us by France from the government of LOUIS PHILIPPE. We remember everything; but we are magnanimous. Magnanimity, however, does not forbid us to recall the feeling of relief with which, in the spring and early summer of 1898, American travellers left the Continent and landed in Great Britain. It was like quitting an enemy's country for the house of a friend.

The subsidence of Anglophobia in this country is also due in part to the singularly improved relations of the Unionist government to the Irish people. Almost all fair-minded Americans concur with Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN in thinking that, with the exception of the splendid act performed by the Czar ALEXANDER II., history has no record of a more impressive determination to repair the errors of the past than was afforded by the BALFOUR government, when, although staggering under the cost of the South-African war, it appropriated from the British Exchequer an immense sum of money for the purpose of enabling the Irish peasants to become the owners of the land they till. Contributory also to the present feeling of good-will and confidence was the decision rendered in the matter of the Alaska boundary—a decision made possible only by the absolutely impartial attitude of the British member of the International Commission. When we call these things to mind, we understand why Americans have begun to feel that blood is thicker than water, and why an arbitration treaty, which would have had no chance of obtaining the sanction of the United States Senate eight or even seven years ago, has now a fair prospect of being ratified.

There is, of course, one objection to the arbitration treaty which has been negotiated with France, and to any other similar agreement. It does, so far as it goes, distrust the Senate of its share in the treaty-making power. It is true that the treaty itself excepts from the questions that must be submitted to arbitration those affecting the vital interests or national honor of either signatory. But the treaty leaves it to the Executive of each signatory to determine whether the vital interests or honor of a nation is affected. It is conceivable that, touching this grave matter, an American Secretary of State and the American Senate might hold different convictions in a given contingency. If, however, a general arbitration treaty had been ratified, the Senate would have renounced the veto power in any case which in the judgment of the Executive might fall under it. It will be observed that we have raised the question whether, under the Constitution, the Senate has the right to sanction in advance a general arbitration treaty. The inquiry obviously goes to the root of the matter.

In view of the official account, telegraphed from Tokyo, of the boobying operations from October 30 to November 3, inclusive, it would not be surprising if Port Arthur should be taken before these words meet the reader's eye. It has been for several reasons a memorable siege, but to speak of it as unprecedented, either in respect of duration, of the casualties incurred, or of the number of soldiers surrendered, would be absurd. The siege may be said to have begun on June 7 of the current year, and up to the present hour has lasted a little over five months. The siege of Vicksburg was considerably more protracted, if we count from the beginning of the earlier and unsuccessful operations, while Petersburg, to which Grant laid siege on June 9, 1861, was not evacuated until April 2, 1865. The defence of Sebastopol was maintained for eleven months, and the defenders did not capitulate, but withdrew by a way which had been kept open. The famous and successful defence of Gibraltar by the English garrison against the combined fleets and armies of France and Spain lasted about three years. The casualties suffered by the Japanese before Port Arthur have not been much known officially, but they almost certainly fall short of the losses incurred by the French and English before Sebastopol, which were computed at 60,000. General STROUSS has declared that his soldiers will fight to the last man. Even should the vault be fulfilled, they will do no better than the Greeks did at Thermopylae, or than the Texans did at the Alamo.

Nobody would now blame the Russian commander if he should capitulate, but it is improbable that he has much more than ten thousand soldiers to surrender. The Confederate General PEMBERTON surrendered upwards of 30,000 soldiers at Vicksburg; General WERDNER, 40,000 at Lim in the Austro-Italian campaign; and Marshal BAZINE more than 75,000 at Metz. The record of the siege of Port Arthur appears to demonstrate that the defences of the place could scarcely be improved upon from a military point of view, and that the fortress might have held out much longer had it been more strongly garrisoned and more amply provided with food, supplies and with munitions of war. It could not even have been besieged had the Russians retained, as they expected to retain, control of the sea. That section of the Liao-Tung Peninsula on which Port Arthur and Dalny stand is practically an island, for the neck by which the promontory is connected with the mainland is only about a mile wide, and could be raked by battle-ships stationed on each flank. For a time after the capture of that isthmus by the Japanese it was a question not easily answered whether Port Arthur should be reduced by starvation or by assault. The large force required for the prosecution of assaults would have been invaluable to Marshal OYAMA in his duel with General KUROKI. From the moment, however, that Russia's determination to dispatch her Baltic fleet to the Far East became known, the capture of the harbor, and of the war-ships which had taken refuge there, became indispensable. We note, finally, the interesting fact that the glory of the defence of Port Arthur, like that of the defence of Sebastopol, does not belong to a man of Russian descent. General STROUSS is said to be of Swiss, as General TOTLIEN was of German, extraction.

At the hour when we write, the outcome of the recent general election in the Dominion of Canada seems to be that the Liberal government, headed by Sir WILLIAM LAMONT, will have a majority of at least seventy-four in the next Ottawa House of Commons, or twenty more than it had in the last House. The fact that Mr. ISIDORE TUTT is no longer a member of the ministry has had but little, if any, effect on the Premier's control of his native province, Quebec. In the maritime provinces the Liberals are reported to have made a clean sweep, and they hold their own in Ontario, although there, at general, as contrasted with provincial, elections they have long been in a minority. In the Northwest, and in British Columbia also, the Liberals are now preponderant, although there, if anywhere, some influence should have been exerted by the fact that the Conservatives of Canada are much more outspoken than are their Liberal opponents in advocacy of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S preferential policy. So far as the United States are concerned, the renewed triumph of Sir WILLIAM LAMONT indicates that a reciprocity treaty, for which there is a strenuous demand in some of our border States, might be negotiated, provided we do not exact concessions fatal to Canadian manufacturers. The latter are determined not to be driven out of business by either American or British competitors, and the recent election would have had a very different outcome had they not been convinced that in the Liberal Premier they have a friend. So long as Sir WILLIAM remains in power it is extremely improbable that Canada will assume any larger share of the military and fiscal burden of the British Empire than she now sustains, or that, in respect of tariff concessions, she will go beyond the preference of 33 1/3 per cent. now granted to British manufactures. The preference is ostensible rather than real, because so many articles of American origin are on the free list that the aggregate imports from the United States are increasing much more rapidly than those from Great Britain. The almost simultaneous victory of the Boer government in the New-Foundland general election is also discouraging to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, for Mr. BOER is not only opposed to the annexation of the island to the Dominion of Canada, but is earnestly desirous of bringing about reciprocity with the United States.

Sundry scientific gentlemen have analyzed the Subway and discovered it to be seriously lacking in oxygen. We are their debtors. Will they add to our obligation by disclosing how far the deficiency of oxygen is repaired by the aroma of peanuts which pervade so profusely in the Subway cars in the hours when our citizens ride for pleasure?

Stung!

From the Potsdam (N. Y.) "Courier Freeman"

"We should have to have to be as fair as the Brooklyn Eagle."—HARPER'S WEEKLY.

We should say so. In fact, it goes without saying. It is many years since HARPER'S WEEKLY made any attempt to be fair. The late GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS was no outlier as they make 'em, and the WEEKLY finally went into the bag. Given HARPER a short time ago handed it out by the feet and presented it to our eyes for the public, which undignified, and it might be said indecent, posture it has since maintained. "Col." HARPER is a man without a country, and the WEEKLY is a journal without principles. It assumes the attitude of a pester about the things of life, but its jests always turn out to be blasphemy. Its apparent fastidiousness is generally a libel on something, and its editorialists are writers with the art purpose of adding to the sum of evilness and evil. It has no God, no party, no flag, no friends. The reason for Col. HARPER'S unpopularity has not yet been told, but his actions indicate dyspepsia or the long tortures of a hidden crime.

The Significance of the Election

It was a landslide for THOMAS ROOSEVELT. He has 343 electoral votes against 132 given to PARKER. He asked for a vote of confidence, and he got it, with overwhelming emphasis. Several causes contributed to his success, the chief of which was his personal popularity. In his native State, although he was running against a New-Yorker, he received a larger plurality than was obtained by McKINLEY in 1900. In Ohio his plurality is much larger than McKINLEY secured in 1900 or 1896. In Pennsylvania his plurality exceeds every that returned for McKINLEY, though twice the latter received nearly 300,000. In Illinois and Indiana, it not alone, but majority and close majorities. In New Jersey he has beaten the record made by McKINLEY four years ago. He has swept Minnesota, although that State is reported to have chosen a Democratic Governor. He has carried Massachusetts by a very large plurality, although that State has elected a Democratic Governor, who made his campaign on the labor issue and on the demand for the free admission of raw materials of manufacture. He has gained the electoral votes of Colorado and Montana, although in both States a Democrat has come near capturing, if he has not captured, the Governorship. Mr. ROOSEVELT got the woman vote. Every one of the four States in which women possess the franchise—Colorado, Idaho, Wyoming, and Utah—gave him a plurality, although BRYAN carried all four of them in 1896, and two of them in 1900. He must have got the union-labor vote, truly on that assumption can be returned from Massachusetts, New York City, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana. He carried the vote of the Democrats, by nominating ex-Senator DAVIS, appeal to the local pride of West Virginia; that State preferred Mr. ROOSEVELT to her own son. In spite of a franchise law devised for the express purpose of cutting down the negro vote, Mr. ROOSEVELT has carried Maryland. In the teeth of the race issue, which might have been expected to tell against him, he carried even Missouri, despite the strenuous efforts of the Democratic administration for Governor, gave to the Democratic ticket. Wherever we look, the proof of Mr. ROOSEVELT's personal ascendancy is unmistakable. It would not have been in the least surprising had he read in his astounding majorities the promise of a third term. Far from evincing exultation, however, he no sooner learned the verdict of the ballot-box than he announced that, under no circumstances, would he be a candidate for, or accept, another nomination for the Presidency.

Assuming, then, that the potential personality of THOMAS ROOSEVELT will be eliminated from the next Presidential contest, we are led to inquire what light this election throws on the prospects of the Republican party. Unquestionably his nominee's popularity, cooperating with other circumstances, has given the Republicans hope and power. As the Fifty-eighth Congress they have a majority of 31. If the Fifty-ninth Congress they seem likely to have a majority of 41. The ROOSEVELT landslide has given them preponderance in so many State legislatures that they need not apprehend any material weakening of their majority in the United States Senate for four years to come. Nevertheless, for the Republicans, this election, which, superficially, is so auspicious, is not devoid of warning. That, even in the face of an avalanche, a Democratic shocker has managed to ruin the Governorship of Massachusetts hints something ominous to the strength of the conservatism in that State. The fact, also, that a Democratism chosen, or some near being chosen, Governor in Minnesota, notwithstanding the tremendous plurality given to Mr. ROOSEVELT, indicates that uncontrollable forces are at work in more than one reputed stronghold of Republicanism. If the high conservatism, who, after having done so in the Republican campaign, have granted that their people have authorized them to persist in rejecting all entreaties for tariff revision they will have misinterpreted the verdict rendered on Tuesday at the ballot-box.

It seems to be a fair deduction from the returns that an Democrat, not even Mr. CLEVELAND, could have beaten THOMAS ROOSEVELT. Mr. CLEVELAND's nomination at St. Louis was impracticable, except by a stampede, because he was equally unappealing to Mr. BRYAN and the business class, who, between them, control two-thirds of the convention. That this should have been the case is probably well for the ex-President's reputation, for even those who would have liked to see the Democratic standard placed once more in Mr. CLEVELAND's hands must now recognize that, in all likelihood, he would have failed to carry it to victory. Events have shown that the reconsolidation of the Democratic party under conservative leadership was not possible at this time. Unquestionably the Democratic campaign fund would have been much larger had Mr. CLEVELAND been nominated at St. Louis. As it was, a trick of the money needed for legitimate expenditure tied the hands of the Democratic National Committee, and moved the Democratic Congressional Committee to disband practically at an early stage of the canvass. This fact accounts to some extent for the weakening of the party's position in the House of Representatives, but it does not explain why PARKER should have lost States which BRYAN carried, and should have secured fewer electoral votes than were gained in 1896 by BRYAN, who had an even smaller campaign fund. The former slave States, with the exception of Delaware, West Virginia, Missouri, and perhaps also Maryland, remained faithful to the Democratic nominee, as they had in 1900. It was the delegates from those States who rendered it possible at St. Louis for the conservative element of the Democratic party to regain temporary ascendancy. Yet, even in 1896, because it is improbable that the Southern States will again put much confidence in the promises of Eastern Democrats. They were told that if such a man as Judge PARKER were nominated, an ample campaign fund would, for the first time in twelve years, be forthcoming, and that such States as New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Indiana could be relied upon to return to the Democratic fold. The guarantee was based on the assumption that a conservative nominee could count upon the vote not only of gold Democrats and of independents, but also of all those radicals who had twice supported Mr. BRYAN. It is probable that Judge PARKER got almost all of the votes of those upholders of the gold standard who, previously to 1896, were ranked as Democrats. It is also probable that he got, not all, but a large majority, of the independent vote. He certainly had the support of almost all the independent newspapers. It is equally certain, on the other hand, that he lost a great many votes which in the two preceding Presidential elections had been cast for BRYAN. We have, indeed, no desire to dispute the sincerity of the assurance given by Mr. BRYAN to Judge PARKER. There is no doubt that, in Indiana and some other States, he did a great deal of zealous work. But he was unable to control all of his former followers. Some of them evidently had changed their mind this year, and this year, too, did WATSON; even more, perhaps, voted for ROOSEVELT. We shall not be at all surprised if, when the full returns are before us, we find that PARKER's aggregate popular vote falls short of that cast for BRYAN in 1896. Such a falling-off, if it shall prove to have occurred, may be explained only in one way. It would mean a far-reaching election on the part of the Bryanites; the outcome of a divided electorates to punish the gold Democrats for their success eight years ago.

The reconsolidation of the Democracy, which was effected in 1832, was complete and triumphant, although in the State of New York, four years before, the party had been split asunder by the Barnburner revolt. The attempt to bring about a similar reconsolidation this year failed, partly because the secession in the party was of longer duration and partly because the gulf between the conservative and radical elements of the existing Democracy is almost, if not utterly, unbridgeable.

What of the future? We answer that if the Democratic nominee for the Presidency had carried New York, though losing every other doubtful State, his friends would have had some chance of maintaining an alliance with the Solid South, which might have enabled them to secure a majority in the next Democratic national convention. Even had Judge Parker been defeated, and the Unionism of the Empire commonwealth been saved by Judge FLEMING, such a combination as we have mentioned might still have been attainable. As it is, Southern Democrats may feel that they have been deluded by their conservative brethren in New York. They were told that Judge PARKER would be backed by a huge campaign fund, whereas his managers have notoriously suffered from a want of the sinews of war. They were assured that, with the help of gold Democrats, independents, and dissatisfied Republicans, who would rally to the support of a conservative Democrat, not only New York, but New Jersey, Connecticut, and Indiana would be wrested from the Republicans. As a matter of fact, the Democracy under conservative leadership has shown itself unable to carry a single Southern State. Under the circumstances, it is not probable that many, if any, of the Southern States will submit to a reorganization of the Democratic party by the friends of Mr. BRYAN. We expect to hear of a concerted move in that direction at an early date, and we do not at present see how the plans of the radical reorganizers can be thwarted four years hence.

It follows that we Americans are confronted by a serious situation. On the one side, radical and conservative men in the Democratic party are divided, and the party is split. On the other side will be arrayed a party resolutely and avowedly Populist, and that party may choose to be successful should the next Presidential election take place in a period of industrial and financial depression. Such an alternative might have been avoided had far-sighted men awakened betimes to the importance of enabling Judge PARKER to carry at least the State of New York. Such an achievement may have been impossible, but was a grievous error to let him poll fewer votes in his native State than were secured by BRYAN four years ago. It should have been foreseen that such a disaster might give a deathblow to the conservative reorganization of the Democratic party.

There may, and doubtless will, be a change of leaders, but the Democratic party will survive, in name, if not in substance. It has outlived two centuries. What is really startling and profoundly disturbing is the election of the day. It is the fact that the party should have obtained fewer electoral votes than Mr. BRYAN did in 1896; and, if it be true that the Democratic nominee has lost

GENERAL PRINCE FUSHIMI, WHO HAS JUST COME TO AMERICA TO REPRESENT THE EMPEROR OF JAPAN AT THE ST. LOUIS FAIR

General Prince Fushimi, who arrived in America November 9 to represent the Emperor at the St. Louis World's Fair, is in the direct line of succession to the Mikado's throne, coming next after the Crown Prince and the latter's two sons. He was in command of the Japanese forces at the battle of Nanshan, being chief of the First (Tokyo) Division. Prince Fushimi served also through the war with China.

"Phaser" and "Miss Parvater" following a strong scent

Four of Mr. W. W. Rockefeller's Beagles

The Winners in Class A-1, tall-mast Bitches between thirteen and fifteen inches. From Left to Right—1, "Thornfield Marie," A. Stubby Doubt; 2, "Phaser," J. B. Post, Jr.; 3, "Miss Parvater," Chandler Bernard; (Kneeling), "Rock Ridge Fiddler"

SNAP-SHOTS OF THE RECENT BEAGLE TRIALS ON THE ESTATE OF THE LATE W. C. WHITNEY AT WESTBURY, LONG ISLAND

The photographs are snap-shots taken during the fifteenth annual field trials of the National Beagle Club, held recently on the estate of the late William C. Whitney at Westbury, Long Island. The winner of the derby, held on the last day of the week, was "Rock Ridge Admiral," belonging to Mr. W. W. Rockefeller's Rock Ridge kennel; "Fanny" was second, and "Barnard Fiddler" third. The cap presented by George B. Post, Jr., was won by the otter from Mr. Rockefeller's kennel.

Photographs by Fredrick

THE AIRSHIP "CALIFORNIA ARROW" IN FLIGHT AT THE ST. LOUIS FAIR

Captain A. T. Hildebrand's airship, the "California Arrow," has recently had several successful trials at St. Louis. During her first trial she performed some remarkable evolutions, moving 100 feet in the air against a wind blowing at the rate of eighteen miles an hour. In spite of the fact that the entire crowd of spectators, numbering 10,000, were restricted to the rear of the airship, the crowd was so close that the airship was visible from the rear of the crowd. The "Arrow" has a cone-shaped gondola of twisted Japanese silk, 24 feet long and 17 feet in diameter, with a capacity of 3000 cubic feet of gas. The net is 40 feet long, and has a light framework of white cedar.

THE LAUNCHING OF THE NEW SUBMARINE "SIMON LAKE X." AT NEWPORT NEWS

A new submarine boat, the "Simon Lake X," which is soon to be tested by the United States navy, was launched at Newport News on October 27. The "Simon Lake X" is equipped with twin screws, is 72.5 feet over all, and displaces 200 tons. She has an estimated surface speed of nine knots and a submerged speed of six knots. She submerges on an electric keel, and her periscope gives her commander a view of the entire horizon when the craft is completely submerged.

learned when a college student to play on the violin, he took great pleasure in performing on this instrument even in his extreme old age. He owned two first-class Cremonas, which were disposed of to New York upon his death; but I never heard what became of them afterwards, nor of the portable fiddle he gave me when a student. The latter was a small, serviceable one he had won in Paris in order to carry it about with him for practice. It was not a dudum, though its tones were none of the best. He played on it now and then, I thought best to return it to the estate after his death, although he had with his own hands made a present of it to me. His grandson, on hearing what course I had taken, told me I should certainly have retained it in my private collection.

The son of a staff member of Jefferson's household, who played the violin at balls and parties given at Monticello, gives these interesting reminiscences. "I knew Mr. Jefferson mightily well, and can see him before me at this moment. I commenced playing on the fiddle when I was a young man, and have played for all the weddings, balls, and parties in this neighborhood during two generations.

"Mr. Jefferson was himself a very good fiddler. But he never played long at a stretch.

"I was present at the meeting of Mr. Jefferson with General Lafayette at Monticello. I attended there when they went in a carriage to the banquet given to the general at the university. The carriage was drawn by four splendid bays, and there was no driver. They were ridden by postilion clad in gray roundabouts, without any brass buttons, though their caps had a large hall of lacy and buckles on front. Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe sat on the front seats of the carriage, and on the rear seats Mr. Jefferson sat beside General Lafayette. The general sat on the right, and looked very low to the people as he passed along. I suppose there might have been five hundred persons present at the banquet, but folks here at Charlottesville thought it was the biggest crowd ever got together. I was at the banquet, and escorted the carriage along the entire route. At Monticello I myself never played; that was a privilege Mr. Jefferson allowed to my father only. But I went there very often, and saw and talked with him nearly every day. He always had a kind word to say whenever I met him; indeed, he was a universal favorite. He was rather a thin man, and his legs looked very small arrayed in stockings and knee breeches, but he stood perfectly solid and straight on them till his last illness. He was never a complainer, and only alluded to his great age in a laughing way. I recollect he and I were stood up together to compare our heights, and we found he measured half an inch more than I did, and I am six feet two inches. When the university was being built he rode on horseback to it, sometimes every day, and then again only two or three times a week. He would start from home at nine and stay at the university till ten, when he would return home to dinner, and after dinner go back and stay till dark, looking after the workmen and directing the operations. When he remained at home all day he would frequently look through a telescope at the building, which was his pet scheme towards the end of his life. I was present at its opening in 1825. He was very anxious about its future when he died, and directed by his will that his monument should bear the words, Father of the University of Virginia. During all the time I knew him he kept a shop filled with tools, and was very fond of experimenting in every way. He made things with the tools, and I have often seen him planing, sawing, and hammering about his workshop. Carpenters, masons, plumbers, blacksmiths, millers, etc., lived on his estate merely to supply the wants of his household. He knew all about gardening and flowers, and always looked after them very closely. A worker himself, he liked to see others working, and I suppose he never passed an entirely idle day in his life.

A librarian for the university was appointed by Mr. Jefferson in 1828, and the appointment, in his own handwriting, now hangs in its library. This gentleman, William Wertenbaker, died recently at an advanced age. His manuscript collection is now largely impaired to others, orally and in writing, but he preserved many copies of his correspondence. To his son he often talked concerning Mr. Jefferson, and many of his sentences were communicated by this medium to the writer. "Old man Wertenbaker," as he was called by the students, was somewhat of a character. He used to get wrathful over the printed inaccuracies and "pure inventions" concerning his hero. Even at Milton, in the vicinity of Mr. Jefferson's own birthplace at Ashland, he was the grandson of an emigrant from Germany who crossed the ocean in the same vessel that bore over the ancestor of that distinguished lawyer, William Wirt. Young Wertenbaker served in the war of 1812, and was to the day of his death in receipt of his pension as a veteran. He had just entered the university as a law student when I first met him, and I remember those him to be the librarian. He manifested to him by a Virginia artist now hangs in the library beside that of his great friend and patron. "The last visit Mr. Jefferson made to the university," the librarian was wont to tell his son, "was to review the progress and operations of the collection of books which constituted the nucleus of the present library. He manifested the warmest interest in getting everything rightly placed at an early date. With his own hands he helped to unpack the books and to place them on the shelves, in the order and way he had chosen for them in his mind. I attended when he appeared before the Albemarle County Court to have Kossuth's will put to record. When he entered the court room all hats were doffed, and all the spectators maintained perfect silence while he was present. With great solemnity he went through his part in the proceedings, speaking in a clear voice, and holding himself very erect. It was a grand sight in its simplicity. After bowing, on the termination of the ceremony, to the assembled magistrates, he walked out of the court-room, mounted his horse, and we rode back together to the university. To show his love of merriment and industry with business details he told the holders the precise spots in Albemarle County where the requisite woods could be secured for the building of his drawing-room at Monticello. Indeed, any matter suddenly brought to his notice would at once be discussed by him with a perfect knowledge of its smallest details. Now and then, when passing through Charlottesville, his horse would cast a shoe, and thereupon he would go to a blacksmith's, and while the horse was being shod, he would hold him by the ear in order to keep him quiet. He had many little ways like this, but no one ever took him but as a curiosity."

The glazier who worked on the university buildings was a particular friend of Mr. Jefferson. His son recalled Mr. Jefferson as the coldest heart of his boyhood days. "During the long period that my father was engaged on the job, it was my supreme pleasure to go to ride behind Mr. Jefferson on horseback to and from the university. Regularly at the same hour he would come riding by, and I would be waiting for him on a fence, to which he would ride up close, when I would jump on behind him. Many is the time that I plucked my hands in the expensive pockets of his old blue coat and pulled out apples and nuts! He would chat with me all the way, and I recollect I often made him laugh by my childish sayings. At the university he would move about among the workmen, inquiring after everything, giving directions, planning, etc., and I would keep close at his heels or by his side. My father often complained that I was in the way, but Mr. Jefferson never did. When ready to leave, he would call to me to jump up behind him, and drop me at home on his way back to Monticello. He never once missed his riding, and I have a very plain man in dress and speech, and went about the village just like any other citizen. He greeted all alike, familiarly shaking hands, and he was never addressed except by the simple title of 'Mr. Jefferson.' That I am in a hurry now, having to go to a deer hunt this evening," said the old glazier's son, as he left to join the members of the Charlottesville "Deer Association."

After the close of the Revolution many of the colonial families and customs held over in Virginia till a very late day. Inasmuch as he was, Mr. Jefferson observed them, and was among the last to abandon them. Thus, all agree that he wore knee-breeches after others had discarded them; the modern style of pantaloons, etc., was adopted by him only a short time before his death, and the change was not to his liking. Mr. A. H. H. Stuart, who was a secretary in President Fillmore's cabinet, has said that Judge St. George Tucker told him that long after the Revolution judges in Virginia watched in scarlet chinks, knee-breeches, and cocked hats to the court-mouse, preceded by the sheriff on foot and bearing a drawn sword—evidently a relic of the royal wry was preserved in the colony. Mr. Stuart was well acquainted with Mr. Jefferson, and believed that the best portrait he ever saw of him was the one contained in the "American State Papers," published by order of the government. The portrait on the currency, which was a reproduction of the painting made for the Jefferson family, by whom it was considered a good likeness—though a perfect resemblance of the great original will never be seen, for he lived in an unphotographic age.

The Shrine

By Louise Morgan Sill

DEAR, I have built in a wood
A shrine that is sacred to you,
And there would I dream if I could,
But there's duty to do.

Deep in the forest it stands,
Fragrant with balsam and pine,
Built not by arduous hands
But by fancy divine.

Out of its twilight your eyes
Look into mine, with a gaze
Eloquent, wistfully wise,
Of impossible days.

Yet, though my joy and my we
Faded with the dimness of years,
Still to your shrine will I go
For my laughter, my tears.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

WHEN Tales of the Cloister, by Elizabeth Jordan, was published three years ago it contained a story called "As Told by May Iverson." In that story there lay the germ of May Iverson—Her Book, which has just been published. There was something about May Iverson that teased and tantalized Miss Jordan's fancy. It seemed as if she could have a lot of fun with her. Nobody else had ever taken the girl of fourteen or fifteen with that itch for the pen which runs riot on paper and makes a ludicrous and sometimes pathetic showing of literary recalcitrance. Here was a new type that might be developed and made distinctive in fiction. The idea grew in Miss Jordan's mind from the suggestion of her early inspiration until at once May Iverson sprang into being, as she would say, and from that moment she took the pen in hand, as she would say, and wrote Her Book, which is "a faithful chronicle of our life at St. Catherine's Academy."

This chronicle unfolds a series of chapters recounting various experiences and adventures of May Iverson in a convent school. Miss Jordan merges her literary consciousness in May's personality, and the narrative is wholly written in the style and from the point of view of the schoolgirl. One can readily imagine the possibilities of humor and sentiment flowing from so naive and uncut a situation, and Miss Jordan has made the most of these. May and her chums are delightful company, and one is sorry to leave them. May, you must know, dreams of being a great author some day. "I've just begun my literary career," she confides to the reader in her opening chapter, "but I'm sure as well practice as it is little before I leave school." She is tormented with a mighty sew of the seriousness of her vocation, and her remarks note ever regarding the art of writing, its perils, its difficulties, its responsibilities, are full of unconscious humor, and are highly characteristic of her type. "Isn't it funny," she declares, "how much you have to say in literature before you get to your plot?" ... Sister Augustine says to go ahead and tell the story, and never mind the rest. That isn't just the way she put it, of course, but that was what she meant. I don't agree with her. I always want to know just how the thing began and all that led up to it." She quotes her chum, Mabel Joyce, as saying that "when two human beings have gone together through a great, uplifting illuminating experience like ours, it should be given to the world." Mabel and she are just fourteen! She has, like all young adolescents at heart, a trick of ratcheting and caricaturing, all manner, the high-sounding phrases and dwelling portentously on the heroic and tragic. In "The ordeal of Mabel Joyce," she approaches the crisis of her story thus: "Already Mabel's doom was upon her, and she was in experience and suffer and have her soul crushed, just as she had long desired. But I am sure she would not have chosen the time or the day it was done if she had been asked. Thus it is with life. Thus it is with humankind in the relentless grasp of destiny. Little do we ask what's coming," she adds, "told me to put that in here. So Mabel and I are writing this book." The air of tragedy with which May Iverson invests her story is mitigated when the reader discovers that it is, after all, a girlish affair, serious enough in the contemplation to young fourteen, but having none of the grandeur that tragedy in it to the mature author. And so it is with all May's observations of life about her, and the experience she relates of her school life within the scope of her little world, just skimming on the borderland of imagination, unadorned and unswayed by stern reality, without knowledge of the actual world, beautifully innocent and healthily happy. In the closing chapter, "What Dreams May Come," there are recollections of the coming conflict, when dreams are tested and proved, lost and won, wrought into the flow of the actual, but they are only premonitions, and the dreams still lull and comfort the girls in their unmarked security. A look into the future brings prosaic thoughts to May; "suddenly, just as if some one had made a picture of it, that old house by the sea came before my eyes—the one, you know, where I am to live when I become distinguished and queer and have to be by myself and write novels. It looked so cold and lonely that I shivered and got close to Mabel. I could hear the waves beat upon the rocks, and see the gulls hovering over the water, and hear my own footsteps echo as I strode in lumpy down my desolate marble halls. Big tears rolled down my cheeks, but it was so dark no one saw them, and I remembered that if I was to be alone all my life I might just as well get used to it now and begin to bear my troubles without telling the girls. It didn't cheer me a bit to think of all the books I was going to write or the friends I was going to have, for I remembered that probably none would be interested in their own husbands and wives in the selfish way people have." Happily, Mabel blossoms giggled just then. "Dear, dear Mabel," is the tolerant comment, "we must make allowance for her youthful frivolities, but they try even our stanch hearts at times." Dear, dear May—she has no suspicion that she herself must have been very trying at times with her dreams and labors and self-adoration of the Artistic Temperament. But to the spectator she is a delectable creature, sufficiently real to create the ethereal dreams of youth with a good natural supply of unassumed tolerance at the fond recollection, and dwelling just enough in the realm of fancy to make her the laughing-crippled of our own childish fancies and follies.

An unpublished letter by the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" is a rare treat that will be welcomed and appreciated by my readers. It was sent to a Scottish minister, now resident in Edinburgh, who had written a review of Holmes's Life of Hawthorne for a Dundee paper. It recently came into the hands of Dr. Robertson Nicoll, the editor of the British Weekly, to whom I am indebted for its publication here.

DUNDEE, Feb. 20, 1878.
My dear Sir:—You very kind letter and the generous criticism which it enclosed have been lying on my table a week waiting for the leisure moments which the briefest answer demands. A writer ought not, I suppose, to treat a critic for his good opinion and his favorable judgment. He is supposed to be like Judaea with her balance, but with out her balance—no, but by no means blind. Yet we cannot help feeling differently to those who speak well of us, and those who are eloquent in exposing our defects.

I have felt very sensitive about this Memoir, which was in some respects the most difficult and delicate task I had ever undertaken. It has gratified me very much to find that it was kindly received by the family of Mr. Mother and the friends whose opinion I especially cared for. All the criticisms I have seen, both American and English, have been quite as favorable as I had any right to hope for. I have read your own with great pleasure, and I must follow the impulse I have spoken of, and thank you most cordially for it.

Nothing but secrets have ever come to me from Dundee—it is made in on my table daily. One of the prettiest of women, Mrs. Caird, also of Dundee, has screened the anonymity of my library with her gracious presence. And now comes your letter, with your criticism, sounding as mellifluous in me, as I read it, as our famous old time "Dundee" used to sound, as we sang it to the words:

"Let not despair or self-reverence

Be to my bosom known;

O give me tears for others' weeps,

And patience for my own."

I am very sorry that you did not look in upon me while you were in Dundee, and I trust if you visit us again you will not forget to remember that I am at Number 280 Beaton Street, where I shall be most happy to see you.

Believe me, my dear sir, very sincerely yours,

GILBERT WENDELL HOLMES.

Elizabeth Jordan, Author of "May Iverson—Her Book"

Carr

Backus, H. C.

De Mott

D. C. Hall

Kilmer

The Yale Football Squad of 1914.
Photograph by G. H. P.

Charles D. Rufferty, the Yale Coach

C. H. P.

H. C.

H. C.

H. C.

H. C.

H. C.

H. C.

The Harvard Football Squad

THIS WEEK'S HARVARD-YALE GAME AT NE
SUBSTITUTES ON T

Ham Blaney Kester Smith Hagen Capt. F. Kelsey D. Smith Kester Hils Elin Johnson Gledy Quill Harrison Pick the 'Varsity Team' was chosen from the Freshmen

Kramer Hickey Fisher Stevens from and Kahlilady
 by Pick

Edgar Wrightington, the Harvard Coach

EW HAVEN, NOVEMBER 19—PLAYERS AND THE TWO TEAMS

On the Summit of Mont Blanc

An Ascent of Mont Blanc by Americans

By S. E. Hilles

AFTER a varied European trip my son and I found ourselves recently in the beautiful village of Chamonix, having planned to make the ascent of Mont Blanc.

A thunder storm had cleared the air for us, and the guides—Gaspard Blazet and Paul Hueton—promised us good weather for the morning. After putting socks into our stoutest shoes, and securing spectacles, woolen caps, mittens, sweaters, leggings, and dark glasses which completely covered our eyes (very necessary on the higher levels—if one may speak of levels where there were almost none), we started out the next morning to climb to the summit, if it could be done.

The 200 guides in the Chamonix Valley have a regular organization, so that, after registering our names with their secretary in the village, we left Chamonix about half past eight. Our path lay up through the woods to the left of and gradually reaching past the lower end of the Glacier des Bossons, to the crêtes at Pierre Pointue. Here vegetation ends, as also does the trail for donkeys, who carry supplies thus far. Those of a liquid nature are taken up in rustic flattened barrels, secured open each side of a frame upon the animal's back. Luxurious travellers can ride up this steep trail to Pierre Pointue; we chose to walk all the way.

Reaching Pierre Pointue about 11.30 a.m. and passing only for breath and a little refreshment, we were now joined together young Simond the porter, my son, Gaspard Simond, myself, and Hueton. The next reach would involve more dangerous climbing and must bring us to the cabin at Grande-Maison, the famed but humble hostelry on a projecting Aiguille, or spur of rocks, which has been the temporary shelter of many a noted alpine climber.

The trail led zigzag, across and back, over snow and ice, and sometimes in the track of avalanches, where our guides would not permit us to talk, anxiously watching the overhanging masses of ice which any loud sound or false step might possibly start on their downward and destructive track.

In alpine-climbing there are several requirements for success. I scarcely know which to name first; but, independent of dexterity, "wind" and good heart-and-knee action might bring us to Pierre Pointue; beyond that, nerve comes into play much of the time, and it is perilous to measure the depth of the chasms one crosses, or speculate how far one would fall in case of a slip; such questions would be more safely left until one gets down again.

While to such inexperienced mountaineers as ourselves the climb to Grande-Maison brought running perspiration, which wet our underclothing through and through, we reached our projected point for the night at 3.30 in the afternoon, and were glad to get beside a kitchen fire to dry and a little and to get some warm food.

Here, on this lonely spur of rocks, our host and hostess, Mr. and

Crossing a Crevasse on the Ascent to the Summit of Mont Blanc

Mrs. Balmet, brave the dangers of the situation during the season, with no other help except as guides may come and go. It is possible that Balmet is a descendant of the famous Balmet who first ascended the mountain in 1761, and whose statue, with that of de Saussure, adorns one of the streets of Chamonix. De Saussure, with eighteen guides, including Balmet, made the ascent the following year.

The hotelery, too, I was told, caused by the town or association of guides, I forget which, and rented by them at what seemed a high price: this, with the fact that all supplies must be carried up on the backs of men over three or four hours' climb from Pierre Pointe is, naturally, full justification for their scale of charges. I was amused at their locking the outside doors at night—apparently a superfluous operation: for the chances of burglary were so remote as in any place I can imagine being in, and one might almost think a burglar entitled to anything he could carry off. My son suggested that the turn of the key was for the protection of possible sleep-walkers inside, for the cabin is about one hundred feet up on almost precipitous rocks, and a step too much in almost any direction from the house would have been decidedly dangerous.

We retired early, but sleep was difficult. The chattering of the French guides in the next room, with only a board partition intervening, the stillness of the Alpine night broken only by the occasional revelations of some falling rock or ice—more than this, the wonder growing in one's mind over the question how in the world one would get down again—made sleep almost impossible.

Waking at half past one, to get the full benefit of daylight, and taking only coffee and rolls for our early breakfast, we started a little after two o'clock by lantern-light, and, of course, roped together again.—our track leading across the Glacier des Bossons. Far below us in quiet slumber lay Chamonix, really identified by its five-fingered lines of lights, like a five-pointed star or the skeleton of a leaf with the longer portion or stem towards ourselves. By half past three the sun was lighting up the mountains to the east, and soon we could see it shining upon the highest peaks overlooking the Chamonix Valley, the luminous climb led, in perhaps three hours, to a comparatively level space known as the Grand Plateau, 12,900 feet high, or a lift of about 3500 feet from Chamonix, which is 3415 feet above the sea.

This plateau lies below the higher masses and ridges towards the summit, and owing to the confirmation of the mountain is somewhat shut in, the air lacking the freshness of the more exposed positions. This feature, with the altitude and the fatigue, gave me new sensations—a feeling of faintness after very few steps—so that frequently I seemed compelled to throw myself upon my face, my alpenstock underneath my body. After one of these rests, Breton called "altes" with more than usual earnestness; and the two guides each took a hand to assist me to rise, when, almost out slipped my alpenstock and went gliding swiftly down a declivity some 500 feet away.

Time was precious, as I was given the axe of young Simond the porter, with which to complete my journey, hoping to pick up my stick on the way back, as it had lodged where we could see it.

The alpine axe, which chiefly resembles the axe used by ship-carpenters, is provided with a handle about thirty-six inches long, ending with the usual sharp-pointed prong of steel.

My inexperience gave me increasing trouble, but as hopes were held out of "better air on the Bossons," I climbed mechanically on, with frequent rests, getting materially better, as the higher and more exposed situations were reached. Breton later counselled me for my difficulties by saying that the guides frequently become ill on the Grand Plateau.

The old route to the summit led to the left up the Aiguille du Midi, where permanent ropes were formerly relied upon to cover several especially dangerous places; the present trail, however, leads to the west.

About half past ten we reached a rocky projection to the west of the summit, where is the lonely cabin of Col des Bossons (14,312 feet high). We ate a light lunch under the shelter of a near-by rock, and could then really see much of the high and narrow ridge up which we must still climb. The day was passing, and if we were to reach the summit our safety lay in going alone. "We five go to the top," said Breton; so up the ridge of the Dromadaire we filed, stopping, where possible, in the footstep of a French party who had also spent the night at Grande-Mulets, passing on to the Grand Plateau.

The view of other peaks became more interesting: immediately to the west was Dome du Gontier; to the east, Dome du Midi and the other peaks of the Mont Blanc range; and across the Chamonix Valley was the Breuvet; but one felt, more than ever, the necessity of concentrating mind and body upon the next step, for a misstep or a slip here by any one of us meant, perhaps, the destruction of the whole party: we dared not attempt to measure the distance down on either side of the steep and terrible slopes of ice and snow. Once, in winter fatigue, I buried my axe in one side of this narrow path and threw myself down for a rest below it, receiving a merited rebuke from Breton. A slight downward slope of perhaps twenty feet (the first on our entire upward climb) with a small interesting spurs before reaching the next and final ridge, gave our resting-places.

The next ridge, Tourrette, though not such steep climbing, afforded an even narrower footing, the available path being only from six to ten inches wide for a considerable distance, but the summit was near, and we pressed on.

It was an almost perfect day, with no clouds on the summit and almost none in the sky, except a heavy storm below us to the northwest; the air was but little cooler than in the valley, and the wind was light. At a quarter past one in the afternoon of the second day we stood upon the summit of the ridge. Just below us, and partially sheltered by the ridge, was the cabin, or "observatory," 115.82 feet above the sea, established in 1893 by Dr. Janssen.

Almost at the Top—a difficult Crossing

We had reached the highest point in all Europe. Simond, the guide, faced Chamoni impressively, and, removing his rap, said, "Adieu, Chamoni." Would we ever get down again? The desire to stretch one's self level made us prefer to lie inside of the cabin for a part of our short stay; but thoughts of the descent and the shortness of the remaining time were not to be put aside, and soon the "alps" of the guides sounded in our ears.

Unlike the Jungfrau, the Aigle, or other European mountains,—including even Vesuvius,—which have been conquered by the most era engineers and now near the harness of a railway to or near their summits, Mont Blanc is an absolute monarch, and no mortal may set the limit of its reign. The Githas and Vauds of old, the armies, the thousands of day-laborers, once pour down through the Alpine defiles, but Mount Blanc through all such changes is monarch still. Its snow-capped peaks rising far above all else, and the vastness down its sides—more to be feared than any of its other dangers—defy the skill and courage of man's climber.

On the way up I asked Breton if his father was living. "No," he replied: "he was but thirty years ago with a party of nineteen who were overtaken by a storm on the summit." Our hostess at Grand-Mulets had also surprised me by telling me on my arrival that we were the second party to make the ascent this year; one other, an earlier party, had, however, gone up a few days before, prior to the opening of the cabin at Grand-Mulets, thus causing her notice.

But now for the descent! Again we were roped together, this time closer together, for the ice is free to be trodden for a space than the toe; the porter took back his axe and the lead of the party, while I had only the rope, my feet, and my head to depend upon. Next after the porter came my son, then Breton, then myself. "You are the last," said Breton to me, and I knew that meant that he was to hold me all if we slipped. The porter and Breton took turns in carrying the handles of their axes to the left in the ridge of snow, while we walked the 800 to 1000 feet along the first ridge (Tourette). The danger of the situation moved us in the rebel and slowly we crept along. As we neared later, some of our Chamoni friends, perhaps six miles away and more than two miles below us, watched our steps through glasses while we descended—minute black specks moving on the face of the dazzling white snow. No slip occurred, and after a short rest behind the rock at Col des Fleurs, we fell into a quiet step down the other tracks on one edge near Grand-Mulets sliding down perhaps 150 feet on the firm crust of the snow. Here we recovered the lost alpenstock, which we had traced by its track in the snow. As we progressed down we found the road more and more softened with the unusual mildness of the atmosphere, and for perhaps two miles we broke through at almost every step and plunged into the snow to our knees, and sometimes to our waists, often halting to preserve our equilibrium, and, when the rope lightened, having to ask for time to get our legs untied. This portion was not dangerous, but very fatiguing, as only those know who have tried similar tasks. The groves of legions perched variations, their loose tops folding the wet snow, which otherwise might have dropped free.

We had expected to get down to Chamoni late that night but on reaching Grand-Mulets about six o'clock, tired out and hungry, it was too late to attempt it. We were safe, and the wind and night was spent in this primitive, but welcome resting place. In my own case, a hot-water bag warmed off what might have been a dangerous chill from wet garments not removed quickly enough. As we all desired to reach Chamoni as early as possible on the following day, we again started on the descent at 5:30 in the morning, this time finding, in crossing the path of avalanches, that a considerable amount had fallen since our ascent the day previous, shattering part of our tracks; also that new and large crevasses had apparently opened so that there was some danger as to our getting down to Pierre Pointe, especially when I lost my footing more than once and started down on my own account, the danger being not so much from a direct fall as from starting an entire avalanche. The previous day having been so mild as to have caused overflowing masses of snow and ice, Pierre Pointe was, however, reached about half past eight in the morning, and from there down the way was easy, except for the ankle-and-knee action still required, which was made a little easier for my tired muscles by constant use of my alpenstock.

Taking a short cut through the woods east of the stream issuing from the Glacier de Bossoms, we struck the main road, and at 10:30 on the morning of the third day we were once more at our hotel in Chamoni. Our faces looked sun-burned, our muscles weary, and our minds not disposed to discuss at once a previous plan of walking north to Interlaken over the Grand Pass, but interested to know that we were the first Americans on the summit of Mont Blanc for this year.

Stage Humor and Comedy

By James L. Ford

THE dissolution of the famous firm of Weber and Fields and the probable outcome of the keen rivalry that is certain to ensue this winter between the two one-act performers and friends is already a subject of such lively speculation among their patrons of every class that we are forced to believe that in setting up two establishments, instead of one, Lew Fields and Joseph Weber have increased rather than diminished the popular interest which has been theirs ever since they first plumed their names above the doors of their Broadway playhouse.

New York's intense pride in the peculiar quality of entertainment given on the stage of that respect little house, as well as on that of Harrigan and Hart, their interminable of a short generation ago, has long been a subject of wonderment and even of jealousy to those smaller communities in which life may be compared to a placid slow-moving stream rather than to the foamy, raging torrent that dashes over the rocks and quicksands of metropolitan life.

Those who swim in the safe and shallow waters are content with amusements that are far too simple and rational to satisfy those hard worked, keeled-up, misanthropic eyes whose days are spent in fierce battling with the raging New York torrent, and whom night time in a quest for that complete relaxation from toil and worry that is found only in some purely fanned and irrational entertainment of the kind that Weber and Fields knew so well how to provide.

In dull hours, when business is almost at a standstill and the citizens of the town have time to think, the popular taste turns naturally to the various drama, and the result is not infrequently a revival of classic plays. But when the commercial pulse is the swiftest and fortunes are piling up with marvellous rapidity, when new buildings are going up all over the town and one great public work succeeds another, then the overworked man of affairs asks nothing but pure diversion when he enters the play house door.

It was during the period of commercial stagnation that followed close on the heels of the panic of 1874 that "Julius Caesar" was given, with its great cast of Booth, Barrett, Davenport, and Bangs, on the very stage where Edwin Booth had sunk his entire fortune during the Irish times that followed the peace gaining to revive that the attention of the wealthier—I will not say the better—class of playgoers was first drawn to the amusing farces of Harrigan and Hart, which had long since established themselves firmly in the esteem of every headbuck and headless in town.

In like manner did Weber and Fields, who may be termed the legitimate successors of Harrigan and Hart, take a firm hold upon the popular fancy during a period that has been richer than any other in the history of the town in general prosperity, in material development, in the rapid increase of its population, and in the

In many respects there is a close family resemblance between these two celebrated firms of funmakers. Both dealt exclusively in humor, each having its peculiar and unique brand, though in both the element of personal catastrophe invariably played an important part. Each one strayed its brief day across the brilliant stage of popular favor, only to end in a dissolution of partnership. Most important of all, each one was native to the New York soil, and found uncaring at its very roots in the rough subsoil of the New York street boy, without whose appeal no local entertainment can possibly obtain a sufficiently vigorous growth to attract the attention of Broadway.

Every local philosopher knows that the funny entertainment which wins general metropolitan favor springs direct from the soil, like a lusty plant, instead of descending upon us from above, like a fossilization thereby leaving its resemblance to the filly of the field, early strawberries, and other things that come high on Broadway. To be really successful, moreover, its stage and become the very fountainhead of current slang, and this slang is born in its own day and generation. For slang also springs only from the soil and not from on high. Old-time boys create very little slang that is worthy of the name, and college professors none at all; but those untutored creators of impulse, whose vocabularies are smaller than the imagination, are the ones who enrich our language with its gems of active speech.

Long, long ago the boys of this town founded a school of humor of their own—a school that showed plainly the influence of the song and dance on which they had been bred, and, ever too, that was genuinely native. It was a school of humor that was destined to wield a mighty influence on the local stage and one which gave us our most distinctive theatres. As for the very first of these, which school produced the great trio of Weber, Fields, and Bangs, when Saint Regisville with its two ten professors so far as work on the stage was concerned—we must go back to the time of the Grand Old Theatre. If we would here the true history of their beginnings.

The Grand Old Theatre was one of the institutions of the early set, and was the natural outgrowth of the taste for theatrical entertainments and especially for song and dance and for comedy that has always maintained such a strong hold on the youth of New York and had become a positive mania at the time of which I write. This playhouse was owned by the Backley Street cellar, was

(Continued on page 1772.)

FOUND: A SITUATION

By

E. S. Martin

BLISS CLARKSON had been a successful lawyer in New York. He had worked hard for thirty-five years, had earned great fees by honorable service, and, strange to say, had above more than ordinary success in the investment of his surplus funds. Good lawyers are not very apt to be good men of business for themselves, but it so happened that Mr. Clarkson had a sort of business instinct that served him as well in his own concerns as in his labors for his clients. He was not unduly interested in money-making, but when it came to a question of where he should put the money he had, he showed a very pretty talent for putting it where it would breed. Then he let it alone, and usually it did breed. His chief entertainment when he found in the practice of law, and being suited by a scale of living that he had adopted when his income was still modest, he stuck pretty close to it all his life. Evidently he was a fortunately constituted person, as men go, and yet he made one very serious mistake, for being well adapted to live happily and usefully, as well as profitably, on this earth for so many score years as human perishability ordinarily permits, he let his work crowd him a little too hard.

To keep alive and in the best working order in New York is a very fine art, which is practiced to admiration by many expert workers. It is a matter of so many months as ten, so many out of town but near by, so many weeks of clear rest in Europe or somewhere, so much horse exercise, so much golf, so many Saturdays away from the office. Age is a bad disease and finally a fatal one, and the sort of hard head-work that strains the nerves is another, and the man who works his wits hard in a great city has to fortify himself watchfully against both. Mr. Clarkson was duly kind and indulgent to himself, especially when his wife insisted, and he guffed on occasion, and had been seen on a horse, and he had rested himself, first or last, in convenient places all the way from the head waters of the Nile to the Sandwich Islands. He intended to be prudent, and he usually did what the duty of self-preservation seemed to demand. But sometimes crises in the affairs of his clients kept him up to his eyes in labors and responsibilities long after his rest-time had come. It is not healthy to go on after you are tired, and the older you grow, the more unhealthy it is. Mr. Clarkson did it once too often, and died at fifty-four, leaving a disconsolate widow, a boy in college, two grown girls, and about a million and a half of dollars. Half of this fortune went outright to his wife, the other half he directed presently go to his child.

The boy was a good boy, well born and well beloved, well schooled, and trained as soundly as intelligence and affection could compass. When the clasp of the good hand that had held his rebelling leg kept him in the path that had been marked out for him. He went on through college, graduated creditably, and took ship for Europe to join his mother and sisters, who had started earlier in the season. Julian Hatfield, a classmate, shared his stateroom. Judge and Mrs. Finch were aboard. He knew them, as he knew several others of his shipmates, as family friends, and he and Hatfield found acquaintances of their own besides. To be twenty-one years old, and just out of a great college, and to have your face turned towards Europe with nothing more perplexing in hand for immediate consideration than how best to look at and enjoy the great world, is not at all a bad situation. James Clarkson liked it. The only thing that bothered him at all was the choice of an occupation.

"Charles," said Mrs. Finch from her deck chair to her husband, "what is that young Clarkson going to do?"

"I don't know. He's a joy and comfort to his mother, I hope. He's just out of college."

"Yes, I know. Well, what is he going to do next?"

"He hasn't told me. Why? His father left him enough to live on, and he has more confidence in him evidently from his mother. Do you think he ought to find a job?"

"What do you think?"

"Every good American has to have a job. That's one of our national defects. But there seems to be no urgent haste in James Clarkson's case. I'd like to be a young creature just out of college and on my way to Europe with money in my pocket; wouldn't you?"

"I dare say, and yet it seems to me rather a critical situation. The boy has no father."

"He's got a mighty good mother."

"I dare say she'll spoil him. We all love to spoil our boys. That's his good a boy to waste. I think you had better talk to him."

And the Judge, being a dutiful husband, sat down next to James Clarkson in the smoking-room that evening.

"James," said he, "are you staying long abroad?"

"Two or three months, Judge, anyway. I suppose it will depend upon mother's plans. She engaged her passage home in September, but she may change her mind. The girls will probably want her to stay all winter."

"I suppose Europe is a fairly good place for girls for a while, but delays are dangerous, and I have known delays in Europe to have pretty serious consequences to girls as attractive as your sisters. How do you feel about it, as the man of the family?"

"I haven't had a large experience in keeping girls out of mischief. I'd like to look about a bit over there myself."

"Have you any plans for the fall? Are you going to study a profession?"

"Father expected me to study law, but going into the law with father was one thing, and going into it on my own account is another."

"The law is still a respectable profession. Livings are still made at it; but I don't know that the problem of making a living proves very hard as yet on you."

"I have not suffered yet for lack of necessities. I'd just as lief study law, but when it comes to going down town and practicing it—What do you think, Judge? Would it pay?"

"Now make it pay, James, who have to find it isn't the only reality. There's medicine. I invited my son to study law, but he liked doctoring better. Have you any taste that way?"

"I have not discovered yet that I have a strong bent towards anything."

"Did you do any work in college?"

"I didn't hurt myself, but I worked decently. It pleased father to have me do it respectfully, and I got the habit of it."

"What do you think you learned?"

"A little about things in general. I scattered a good deal. Father was to have me get a general education and specialize later."

"Let's employ the method of elimination in your problem. You haven't got to do anything in a hurry. You won't be a doctor. I judge that you won't be any kind of engineer or man of science, nor go into the army or navy, nor go on the stage. That leaves you law, politics, diplomacy, finance, art, literature, newspapers, business, and the life of leisure. How about the life of leisure? Would that suit you?"

"I guess so for a while, but don't you think it's pretty dull in the long run?"

"They say it's very much helped out by sport."

"Do you think there is much in that, Judge?"

(Continued on page 1750.)

Mrs. Gilbert in "Granny," at the New Lyceum
Mrs. Gilbert is appearing at the New Lyceum Theatre in the production of "Granny," in which the distinguished actress, who is now in her eighty-third year, makes her farcical appearance in New York after a theatrical career of forty years.

Julia Marlowe and E. H. Sothern in "Romeo and Juliet"

At the Knickerbocker Theatre, Miss Julia Marlowe and Mr. E. H. Sothern are appearing in the production of "Romeo and Juliet," which has been a great success. They have also appeared in a revival of "The Merchant of Venice" at the Knickerbocker Theatre.

TWO IMPORTANT THEATRICAL PRODUCTIONS IN NEW YORK

Miss Ada Rehan

Miss Rehan is writing a tour of the East in "The School for Scandal" and other classics. She will come to New York in February.

Miss May Irwin

Miss Irwin, who has not been seen in New York for several years, is appearing at the Hippo Theatre in a new comedy with music called "Mrs. Black is Back."

"The Rogers Brothers in Paris"

The Rogers Brothers' latest production is "The Rogers Brothers in Paris," at the Liberty Theatre. It is a musical farce of the kind in which these two comedians have become famous in New York and in the large cities throughout the country.

PLAYS AND PLAYERS IN NEW YORK

Correspondence

APPRECIATIVE

ROCHESTER, N. Y., November 3, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Please let one red-hot, dyed-in-the-wind Republican thank you for the great service you have rendered the American people during the campaign now closing. You have been truly independent from July to November, and that in itself is an immense achievement. Your platform of "No Humbug" is worthy of emulation by all.

You capped the climax this week with your learned editorial due November 9, but it was in perfect good keeping with the hearty good humor that has permeated all your writings during the campaign. It has been extremely pleasant to be sure of getting every Wednesday three or four pages of kindly and amusing comment worth reading from first word to last.

I am, sir,

WILLIAM G. NASEL.

GOOD ADVICE

PURE WINGATE, NEW JERSEY, October 30, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Would like to advise "Mr. Peppercorn, of Northampton, Mass.," to read HARPER'S WEEKLY conscientiously. HARPER'S WEEKLY has not only opened my eyes, but the eyes of a good many others, through the impartial statements of facts.

I am, sir,

FRANK WENKE.

REPLIES FROM MR. CHAMBERS

ROCHESTER, N. Y., November 1, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Among various letters received commenting upon the series of sporting articles contributed by me to HARPER'S WEEKLY three might be answered, with your permission, through the columns of the WEEKLY.

First.—I have been criticised for saying that the drake quailed "quacked." It is asserted that the duck does all the quacking. In reply I can only say that the last quail I drove to my stands was a drake that came circling overhead, quacking loudly for full two minutes before dropping outward. Two witnesses besides myself can affirm this.

Second.—Mr. Carplin's pleasant note I enclose. By reading it you will see that at least one bird, the hawk, does take a pecking. This is news to me, and I fancy, will be to many. However, I must repeat that I personally never knew of any fish taking an embryonic frog, and that I have yet to hear of a trout so conducting himself.

Third.—Several writers tell me that I slander the Florida quail; that the bird is just like the Virginia bird in every respect, including game qualities and table desirability.

In reply, my personal experience has been that the Florida quail of the flat woods is smaller than the Virginia quail, much darker in plumage, and not very desirable as food, being rather dry and tasteless. However, not being a culinary expert, I have no doubt that the bird might be prepared to suit the palates of the fastidious.

The Florida quail has always seemed to me to be a variety of night not even be a distinct species. That, of course, is for ornithologists to determine by structural examination and perhaps the test of breeding, if that be possible. One thing is certain—the Florida bird, superficially, differs from the Virginia bird.

Frank Chapman, the distinguished authority on ornithology and ornithology, associate curator in the American Museum of Natural History, New York, in his work entitled Color Key to North American Birds, says that the Virginia quail, Colinus virginianus, ranges from Dakota and southern Vermont in Georgia and eastern Florida. He then speaks of the Florida quail, giving it the name of Colinus v. floridanus, saying that it is "smaller and much darker; black bars below more numerous." The range of this bird is "Florida," and adds: "Typical only in southern half of peninsula, grading into No. 204" (the Virginia quail) "in northern and western parts of State."

I am, sir,

ROBERT W. CHAMBERS.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., October 8, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—In "Shot out," by Robert W. Chambers, Harper's Weekly, September 3, 1904, why did Charley drop a dozen shells in his "ragged pocket" if he used a muzzle-loader?

I am, sir,

FRANK ROGERS.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., November 5, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—"Charley" dropped a dozen shells into his pocket for the purpose of furnishing ammunition for his levelled gun. Charley was a shooting-out; his gun was in ordinary working order and knickerbockers; that also is why Charley pocketed the grouse, etc.

I am, sir,

ROBERT W. CHAMBERS.

Stage Humor and Comedy

(Continued from page 171.)

lighted by rambles, and charged six cents for admission. His performers were small boys of cultivated histrionic ambitions, and for a time it enjoyed a great degree of prosperity, contributing to the legitimate and variety stage of the country a number of meritorious performers, and among the seeds of one of the most original and notable schemes of amusement that has ever flourished in the town.

It should be remembered that this was a period when young persons of musical or dramatic aspirations enjoyed much better opportunities for giving expression to their talents than they do at the present day. In Hurry Hills and Harry Tildon's, which almost faced one another in East Houston Street, as well as in the various old-fashioned "free and easy" that were scattered about the town, the volunteer who could sing or dance or amuse an audience in any fashion always found a cordial welcome and substantial hospitality. Indeed, a fiftieth was conducted after the fashion of the "Cafe of Harmony," so well described by Thackeray, and its entertainments, given Wednesday and Saturday evenings under the direction of a professional chairman, enabled many a volunteer singer to make a desired reputation and secure thereby an engagement at Tony Pastor's. It was in this house that Edward Harrigan's earliest songs obtained their first metropolitan vogue. Moreover,insky was kept stirred as "amateur" night in every cheap East Side theatre; there a one-horse play which the custom-fall obtained—and more than one popular play of today made his first bow across the footlights of some dingy little stage on which he had earned the right to act by virtue of a sale of tickets among his friends.

It was because of the great number of these cheap places of amusement and the impulse that they gave to fledgeling, the singing of comic songs, and the reproduction of knockabout variety acts among the boys of the town, that the management of the Grand Duke's Theatre found itself at hand a vast array of eager amateur talent from which to select their company. I say remark is passing that the house was named in honor of the Grand Duke Alexis of Russia, who was in this country at the time of its inception. The house had not been in existence long before two bright little Hackney lads named Dick and Sam Bernard made themselves prime favorites there, and developed a vein of comedy that was unique and amusing. Headed by the Bernards the little underground playhouse gained such a vogue that a rival place of amusement was established in the cellar of the house occupied by the late Joseph Tooker, well known in his day as a theatrical manager. The new house was called this

Two-Cent Theatre, and was directed by Mr. Tooker's son George, whose natural taste for the drama had been materially strengthened by his father's connection with the business of theatric. Young Tooker saw the Bernards on the stage of the Grand Duke's, noted their great vogue, and determined to find some one capable of rivaling them. Chance led him one day to a street water fountain in what is now the heart of the Jewish colony on the East Side. Tending this fountain was a small boy in knickerbockers who was known to clever theatrical ambitions, and who even then had a small partner with whom he doubled up in primitive variety acts whenever the occasion offered. The two lads were only too glad to join the Tooker forces, and it was in this way that Joe Weber of the undoubted and his partner, Lew Fields, entered the arena as rivals of the Bernards.

Other lads whose names figure on the play-bills of one or both of the famous houses were P. Dailry, one of the best of modern humorists; Arthur Dima, now a well-known comedian; and a young amateur who in later years acquired fame as "Chick" Coomes, a picturesque East Side character and one-time star of "the Broadway."

Bulk houses were devoted exclusively to a mixture of song and dance, variety acts, and primitive melody which, while highly suggestive of the stage humor current at the time, was a veritable Weber and Fields show of later years, in embryo.

In due course of time the two juvenile theatres went the way of all things earthy, and Weber and Fields began to seek wider engagements at East Side benefits and charity entertainments. It was not until after several years of this sort of work that they secured a professional opening at the Chatham Square Music Hall, where they reviewed the joint sum of twenty dollars a week, for a couple of seasons, in a version of "The Engagement" began January 1, 1880, and from that time until the opening of their house on Broadway they grew steadily not only in popular favor, but in the art of acting as well. In establishing themselves prominently in New York, they associated themselves with their old playmates and rival, Sam Bernard, and the town has seldom seen better examples of legitimate acting than were afforded in those scenes—that of the "Bridegroom," for example—in which the three appeared together as absolutely equal terms.

A circumstance that no one could fail to notice in this familiar scene drawn to the fact, that one of the three men was out of the bill. The others had divided his work between them, and paid up his own share readily and skilfully that the two produced precisely the same effect that three had.

(Continued from page 1725.)

"I think that if a man is going to make a business of any thing, it had better be work, for if he makes a business of play, what is he going to turn to for recreation? Besides, leisure and sport are pretty dear. Could you afford us?"

"I have got plenty enough to live on now."

"But you might marry and have children. It often happens so. I dare say you have enough to support a family, but I doubt if you have enough to support a family and an idle man too. To maintain an idle man to his satisfaction costs a good deal. And some of your money may get away from you. I have known that to happen, too. Be on the safe side, and try to qualify yourself to make a living. At any rate, work hard at something, and get interested enough in it to find a satisfactory occupation in your work. A working man can feel rich on an income on which a man of leisure feels poor."

"That sounds like good advice, Judge, but I don't yet see my way clear enough to know what I want to do."

"That isn't strange, for most men are pushed into their life's work by circumstances and necessity, and you haven't the point of need to help you."

"Father's plan was that I should study law."

"Well, study law, whether you practise it or not. It won't hurt you to learn some law, even though eventually you come to be a minister, or a banker, or a railroad man, or editor and go to a war. Law's a good subject; only, whatever you take hold of take hold hard."

"I'm going to look about a bit first."

"You can't do better, but don't do it too long."

The Judge finished his cigar and went out. Julien Hatfield came up and took the seat he had left.

"You look thoughtful, Jimmy." Don't think, it's bad for you particularly in vacation time. Has the Judge been scolding you?"

"The Judge talks of putting me to work."

"All in good time. What at?"

"To study law, for a starter."

"Law's a pretty long row. You could go back to the Law school, though; that would be fair sport, though they work like niggers there."

"I don't think I could. Mother would want me to stay in New York. I'd have to go to the Columbia School."

"I suppose they'd let you work hard then if you insisted. And after three years of it, when you're burned the ruddiness where are you?"

"Still in New York."

"Yes; and you go into an office downtown and get a job as clerk, and in the course of ten years or so you get to be managing clerk maybe, and years after that you get so you can make a living. And whenever you want to go anywhere you can't leave the office and if you don't work yourself to death you don't get anywhere and if you work yourself to death you don't have any fun. Better go into a bank or be a broker."

"A bank, yes, and about your novel hearing interest. As for being a broker, there's more in roulette and it's just as respectable."

"You might marry and have children. It often happens so."

"No, it isn't. There's no money in roulette unless you run the dice, and that isn't respectable. You may get pulled to roulette is illegal. But brokers who run a fair game can't be pulled. Every few days maybe they buy or sell something for a real investor, and that leaves all the gambles."

"I'm not going to be a broker, anyhow."

"I dare say you'll do worse. It's the easiest trade to learn there is, and you have money enough to try a seat."

"That's reason enough for not doing it. Don't you know the story of the Arkansas man and the sawmill?"

"Tell it!"

"He wrote to inquire the price of a sawmill that would do certain specified stunts and cut so many boards a day. The manufacturer wrote him that it would cost sixteen hundred dollars. He wrote back, 'If a man had sixteen hundred dollars, what is thence would he want of a sawmill?'"

"Please! Jimmy, you are not of an aspiring nature."

"Yes, I am, but stock-broking wouldn't help me realize my aspirations. I don't aspire to be a banker, nor to own railroads, and for the moment I am not hard put to it to make a living."

"What is your lay, anyhow?"

"Just to take notice for a while, and find out what's going on, and try to get ready to take hold somewhere. By the way, Julien, we must get to know those girls at the captain's table."

"The Markham girls? Very pleasing ladies. That's their aunt they're with. But they're getting along all right. They don't need us."

"Maybe not, but I am out to take notice, and I notice these girls."

"Sail in; your friends the Fishes know them. They'll put you on."

Now the elder Miss Markham was a grown-up person, no less than twenty-two years old, and with vested interests in life and society which occupied a good part of her energies, and left her with only a limited share of attention to bestow on a youth just out of college. But Edith Markham was four years younger, and in college herself.

"We had to wait for her," Miss Julia Markham explained to James. "Barnum takes no note of the wishes of relatives, and doesn't let out until it gets ready."

"Never mind. You'll have a good month of London left if you want it. My mother and sisters are to meet me there."

"We don't want a month, but I think we'll take a fortnight. We're going to Scotland."

"I think you had better talk to him."

"Now I hope my mother means to take me to Scotland. She is keeping my plans hid until I join her, under pretence of consulting me."

"I remember your sisters at Miss Perkins' school. You must remember them, Edith. They were nearly your age; a little older than you and younger than I."

"I beg to offer you my sympathy in having the responsibility of a younger sister. I have two, as you know, and only mother to help me raise them."

"I have plenty of help with Edith—father and mother, and at present Aunt Sarah; but still it is a charge."

"You are sending her to college, which is more than I can do for my sisters. What drove you to that? Was her intelligence so defective as to need further cultivation, or so rare that nothing less than all the knowledge you could satisfy it?"

"You'll have to ask her. It wasn't I that sent her to college. She would go, and being her father's pet, she did go."

"Ineffective intelligence," said Edith. "Scarce, not rare. That was the trouble, Mr. Clarkson. It was a case of a desperate appeal to art in help out nature."

"You are a sophomore now, aren't you? I never met a girl sophomore before. I beg your pardon, but you don't seem to me nearly so rudimentary as the men sophomores are. Do you know very much yet? Have you any class yell, and can you smoke cigarettes?"

"I know too much to tell. Don't trouble with me like that. I am a serious person. We all take education seriously at Burnmore. We are not frivolous like you men."

"Are you on the basketball team?"

"Not yet. Were you on the nine?"

"I am surprised that you should have to ask. Don't they let you read the papers at Burnmore? Try to remember seeing my picture in the Sunday Review."

"We don't take the Sunday Review at Burnmore, and I don't remember your picture. We only take grave papers, and no Sunday papers at all. Our papers only print pictures of politicians and labor leaders and people of consequence."

"Then I'm afraid you haven't seen mine. And indeed I dare say the Sunday papers will print your picture many times before they print mine again, for I have passed out of public life into eclipse, and you—when if you rescue the basketball team and that grade of illustration were pretty rare to ornament the 'society page' a little later. You see, a man jumps from college into outer darkness, but a girl emerges into the strong light that leads upon a baid."

"Do you hear that logic? That's dinner."

"In college girls take thought of anything so intellectual as food?"

"They have to. Soup, meat, and vegetables are required courses."

"And pie and candy electives, I suppose. I congratulate you both on your interest in all of them on shipboard."

Acquaintance ripens fast aboard an Atlantic liner. James found no better occupation than to chatter when occasion offered, with Edith Markham and sometimes offered several times a day for the three days of the voyage that were left. Edith was nothing loath to chat with James.

"Don't you like him?" she asked her sister.

"He seems a pleasant youth, and has more ideas than one would naturally expect in a man just out of college. Has he told you what he proposes to make of himself?"

"He had not, Edith said. As to that, she had neither inquired nor wondered; but the question being suggested to her, she turned it over in her mind. It is one of the two questions which consideration of a new grade inevitably larries. What is he in the first one, and when some conclusion has been reached about that, the other is bound to follow.

James gave himself an concern about Edith's future beyond its immediate department, but with those he did conceive him Sarah Markham, and recommended the one where his mother was staying. The plans of people bent on pleasure are easily adjusted to include anything that promises to be

DuPont Smokeless

Is made by a company which has been in existence over 100 years -
Is our American favorite Powder -

E. I. DuPont Co., Wilmington, Del.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, NO. 59 WALL STREET.

Elements of Navigation

By W. J. HENDERSON

It is a very clear and concise statement of essential facts concerning the sailing of a ship at sea, and furnishes information indispensable to every one connected with the navigation of a vessel—Army and Navy Journal, New York.

With Diagrams. $1.00
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, N. Y.

MORTON TRUST COMPANY

38 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK

Capital	$2,000,000
Surplus and Undivided Profits	$6,000,000

OFFICERS

THOMAS F. RYAN, Vice-President
CHARLES H. ALLEN, Vice-President
JAMES K. CORBIERE, Vice-President
H. B. BERRY, Trust Officer

COUNSEL, ELIHU ROOT

DIRECTORS

JOHN JACOB ASTOR	G. G. HAYES	D. G. MILES
GEORGE F. BAKER	JAMES C. HAZARD	LEVI P. MORTON
FRANCIS J. BARNARD	JOHN H. JARVIS	LEAH A. McCORMY
FRANKLIN J. BURNETT	WALTER S. JENKINS	W. G. STANLEY
JAMES B. CLARK	A. D. JETTERMAN	GEORGE FOSTER PIERSON
HENRY M. FLAGLER	JOSEPH LAMARCA	SAMUEL RAY

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

LEVI P. MORTON	G. G. HAYES	ELIHU ROOT
THOMAS F. RYAN	JAMES H. JARVIS	JACOB H. SCHIFF
EDWARD J. THOMSON	GEORGE FOSTER PIERSON	HENRY FOSTER WHITEHY

6 Fine Souvenir Teaspoons $1.50

% ACTUAL PRICE

One of the most pleasing souvenirs of the World's Fair, St. Louis, is the set of Six Fine Silver Teaspoons, made especially to order for the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway by the Onoda Company. Each bowl contains engraving of a delightful World's Fair Building, and the handles are handsomely engraved. They are of best material, finely finished, ornamentation in rich and deep. The spoons are fully guaranteed, thoroughly serviceable for every day use, if desired, and will last for years. Do not fail to order a set. The spoons will please you.

For Christmas

A set of these spoons makes an appropriate and a very pleasing Christmas gift, either for children or grown folks.

HOW TO ORDER. Enter set with no cost, payable, in semi-annual bills for $1 in 10 (in Canadian post $1.75). Bank by express or postoffice money order direct to Onoda Company, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

For fully illustrated, splendidly jeweled boxes for the set and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, a very complete service of Shipping Cart, Dressing and Day Car, see full through rates. Set 100-cent stamp for World's Fair folder and booklet house list to A. J. SMITH, G. F. & T. A., Cleveland, Ohio.

pleasant. The Markham ladies and the Clarkson ladies found each other profitable company in London, made some explorations in common, dined together sometimes, shared knowledge and swapped suggestions, and formal themselves united in a good deal of harmonious cooperation. A family party is usually improved by the infusion of suitable intruders, and two family parties that happen to be congenial may be mingled, to the advantage of both. The summer aims of the Clarksons and the Markhams were substantially alike; common acquaintances turned up daily, and, without merging, they drifted in relations of confidence.

So it came about without cost of such contrivance on James's part that he found himself on an August evening sitting in the twilight with Edith Markham in the window of a Princess Street hotel in Edinburgh. They were talking with the ease of familiar friends.

"How is Burnmore going to seem to you," he asked her, "after this pleasant, idle summer? Do you think you will ever get down to work again?"

"Oh yes, and I shall like it. The summer is doing us good. Father and mother start from London, you know, to-night, and when they get here I shall like it better still. But I shall be glad to go home with them."

"Burnmore can't be half bad, if you like it so well. What put it into your head to go there?"

"It might be a pleasant enough process for a good many years to come."

"Oh no! It would be—oh, it would be just disgusting. It would be losing one's own soul, and not even getting the whole world."

"Awful! But I wouldn't have to go headlong to the devil's den. I could buy a farm, and raise pigs and hens, and travel a little, and go hunting, and fish, and keep in physical health, anyway. Would you have me go into business and lose my inheritance trying to do something without learning how?"

"Why not learn how to do something?"

"I must, of course, but what? How are you going to stand off degeneration when you get through with Burnmore?"

"I don't know, but somehow. I'm not going to dawdle."

"Well, I tell you, I'm going to look around, and if I find anything that needs doing that's about your size, I'll let you know. And if you notice any likely job that's about my size, please remember me. It would be a high privilege to be of use to a lady in such straits as you are facing; and as for myself, you see my troubles are already on me, and it would be a work of mercy to thrust me a line."

"And meanwhile are you going to drift about and wait to be rescued?"

"Alas! I am not. I am going to take my mother and the girls to Paris, where they propose, as you know, to spend the fall or

"He was not pretentious, like you men."

"My teachers, kind, partly, and circum-stances. I planned yours up to go there. Didn't you always mean to go to college?"

"Yes; but college isn't so much a matter of course for girls yet."

"Do you think I could have done better?"

"Oh no, but you know plenty already, and you have three more years of studies ahead of you. Think how superior you'll be when you are completely educated. What are you going to do then?"

"I haven't got to that yet. You have been through college and are completely educated; what are you going to do?"

"I knew you'd come to that sometime. Everybody does. I have even come to it myself. I know I've got to find a job. It's different with a girl—with you at first. Even when you get out of college nobody will insist that you shall find a job. You'll just go on and wear tea, and shawls, and make calls, and shop, and dine, and go to dances, and adorn house-parties like the other girls."

"Isn't it a dreadful prospect? What would you do about it?"

"Don't ask me. I don't think it will be so bad. I think I would be a braver if it were not for my congenital convictions. You see, I am a working man's son, and suffer from the natural moral ineffectiveness of that derivation."

"Gracious! you wouldn't want to be idle, would you? Why, you'd never come to anything! You wouldn't even hold your own. You'd degenerate."

"Yes; that's the awkward part of it. Not but what degeneration might be a pleasant enough process for a good many years to come."

"Oh yes, and I shall like it. The summer is doing us good. Father and mother start from London, you know, to-night, and when they get here I shall like it better still. But I shall be glad to go home with them."

"Burnmore can't be half bad, if you like it so well. What put it into your head to go there?"

"It might be a pleasant enough process for a good many years to come."

"Oh no! It would be—oh, it would be just disgusting. It would be losing one's own soul, and not even getting the whole world."

"Awful! But I wouldn't have to go headlong to the devil's den. I could buy a farm, and raise pigs and hens, and travel a little, and go hunting, and fish, and keep in physical health, anyway. Would you have me go into business and lose my inheritance trying to do something without learning how?"

"Why not learn how to do something?"

"I must, of course, but what? How are you going to stand off degeneration when you get through with Burnmore?"

"I don't know, but somehow. I'm not going to dawdle."

"Well, I tell you, I'm going to look around, and if I find anything that needs doing that's about your size, I'll let you know. And if you notice any likely job that's about my size, please remember me. It would be a high privilege to be of use to a lady in such straits as you are facing; and as for myself, you see my troubles are already on me, and it would be a work of mercy to thrust me a line."

"And meanwhile are you going to drift about and wait to be rescued?"

"Alas! I am not. I am going to take my mother and the girls to Paris, where they propose, as you know, to spend the fall or

"My teachers, kind, partly, and circum-stances. I planned yours up to go there. Didn't you always mean to go to college?"

"Yes; but college isn't so much a matter of course for girls yet."

"Do you think I could have done better?"

"Oh no, but you know plenty already, and you have three more years of studies ahead of you. Think how superior you'll be when you are completely educated. What are you going to do then?"

"I haven't got to that yet. You have been through college and are completely educated; what are you going to do?"

"I knew you'd come to that sometime. Everybody does. I have even come to it myself. I know I've got to find a job. It's different with a girl—with you at first. Even when you get out of college nobody will insist that you shall find a job. You'll just go on and wear tea, and shawls, and make calls, and shop, and dine, and go to dances, and adorn house-parties like the other girls."

"Isn't it a dreadful prospect? What would you do about it?"

"Don't ask me. I don't think it will be so bad. I think I would be a braver if it were not for my congenital convictions. You see, I am a working man's son, and suffer from the natural moral ineffectiveness of that derivation."

"Gracious! you wouldn't want to be idle, would you? Why, you'd never come to anything! You wouldn't even hold your own. You'd degenerate."

"Yes; that's the awkward part of it. Not but what degenera-

Music

New Works by Mahler, Elgar, Suk, and Dukas

The opening works of the season have been unanimously prolific in novelties of interest. Since the beginning of November we have heard new works by Gustav Mahler, Sir Edward Elgar, Josef Suk, and Paul Dukas—not very contemporary works, it is true, from the standpoint of historic musical importance, but variously noteworthy and suggestive.

Mahler's Fourth Symphony

Mahler's Fourth Symphony, which Walter Damrosch made the feature of his New York Symphony Concert on November 6, had aroused great expectation. Alas, Mahler has achieved high distinction as a composer of brilliant technical skill and original individuality; and it was a commendable act on Mr. Damrosch's part to impart one of his characteristic works—the Fourth Symphony. But it is to be hoped that this work does not represent Mahler at his best; for, not to put too fine a point upon it, the music is unambiguously dull—though there is no doubt of the subtlety and ingenuity of its technique. Mahler has resorted to the curious expedient of choosing for his thematic material the most barren and archaic of subjects—subjects of an eighteenth-century simplicity,—and subjecting them to the most complex and sophisticated treatment—bedecking the naive, Haydn-like themes with incongruous harmonic and orchestral adornments; recouping dissonances, chromatic progressions, staccato horn effects, elaborate cross-rhythms, and all the other paraphernalia of the contemporary time-spirit. The result can be adequately described only as an artistic anachronism of the most flagrant sort; it is music without point, without beauty, without individuality.

Elgar's New Overture

If Elgar's "South" is the South of Italy, and all that Italy means to the imagination,—as there is reason to believe it is,—he has not given a convincing account of it in the new overture. In the "South," which Mr. Damrosch placed on the program with the Mahler symphony, there is little of poetic or romantic suggestion in the music, little of the color and warmth, the rich and ample beauty, which belong among the characteristics of his subject. But perhaps it is not possible for the composer of "The Dream of Gerontius" and "The Apostles" to write eloquently of matters so far removed from the world of spiritual and ecclesiastical speculation.

Suk and Dukas

A symphony in E major (op. 14) by Josef Suk, the Bohemian, was played by Mr. Gerike and his band on November 5. It was not altogether a novelty, as it had been given some years ago by the Philadelphia Society. It was scarcely new, but it was a welcome reminder of the north revival. Suk is apparently little more than a colorless replica of his master, Dvorak, whose idiom,—romantic, constructive, and orchestral,—he employs with but a slight contribution of personal style.

Of the orchestral sketches by Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," which Mr. Gerike also produced, for the first time in New York, there is quite a different report to be given. Dukas is one of the liveliest of the school of brilliant young composers who give distinction and animation to the musical life of contemporary France. Slight as his subject-matter is,—merely an amusing fairy-tale of a sorcerer, an enchanted stick, and an impudent apprentice,—Dukas has found in it the inspiration for as charming a humorous as we can recall among the orchestral novelties of recent years. For this young composer (he is not yet forty) displays what Mahler, Elgar, and Suk have not displayed in their works,—personality, a rich and telling style—in a word, ideas,—without which the subtlety of the German, the earnestness of the Englishman, and the persuasiveness of the Bohemian have proved powerless and inconsequential.

A PERFECT COCKTAIL

Is a drink in which all the ingredients are so carefully blended that without any particular one it is as delicious as the delicate flavor of each is apparent. This result is difficult to arrive at, as a few drops more or less will destroy the balance. The only safe way is to buy which are the original and best, scientifically blended from the choicest and purest and properly aged before being bottled. The most perfect variation of the Club Cocktails are the Martin and Manhattan, the former having a gin and the latter a whiskey base.

Club Cocktails

All grocers and leading wine merchants sell them. G. F. BEUBLEN & BROS., Sole Proprietors, HARTFORD, NEW YORK, LONDON.

99¢ of a camera's value is in the lens

THE GRAND PRIZE

at the world's Fair has been awarded to the in competition with the world. Goerz lenses are essential in the making of perfect pictures.

GOERZ LENS

The manufacturers have always claimed to make the best lenses in the world—competition has proved it. Catalog Free.

MAIN OFFICE: Berlin-Friedrichsberg, Germany.

BRANCH OFFICES: 10 & 11, Holborn Circus, London, England.

at Rue de l'Europe, Paris.

C. P. GOERZ,

Rue 33, St. E. Union Sq., New York.

MODELS FOR THE COMING SEASON OF 1905

Type E 15-20hp $2800

Type D 20-25hp $3700

Type H 30-35hp $5000

Type F 40-45hp $7500

The Locomobile Gasolene Car

"Easily the best built car in America"

Locomobile Gasolene Cars have been on the market for three years, and have won a great reputation for Reliability and High Grade Workmanship. Four-cylinder, front vertical motors, sliding gear transmissions, and side entrance tonneaus will be used on all of the new models. Send for complete information. Order NOW and secure early delivery.

THE LOCOMOBILE COMPANY OF AMERICA, Bridgeport, Conn.

Member American of Licensed Automobile Manufacturers

NEW YORK—Broadway, corner of 24th St.
PHILADELPHIA—No. 249 N. Broad St.

BRANCHES

CHICAGO—No. 1284 Michigan Avenue
CINCINNATI—No. 15 Berkeley St.

Portraits of the Sixties

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY

Author of "A History of Our Own Times," etc.

An entertaining and valuable book of reminiscences. Dickens, Thackeray, Carlyle, Tennyson, Cardinal Newman, and a long list of people of note are pictured, as Mr. McCarthy himself saw and knew them in daily life.

Uniform with Mr. McCarthy's "Reminiscences."

Crown 8vo, Uncut Edges, Gilt Top, $2.00 net (postage extra)

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

THE ONLY SALESROOMS IN GREATER NEW YORK FOR THE CELEBRATED

PIANOS SOHMER PIANOS

ARE LOCATED IN THE SOHMER BUILDING

FIFTH AVENUE CORNER 224 STREET

THE "SOHMER" HEADS THE LISTS OF THE HIGHEST GRADE PIANOS

THREE NEW NOVELS

The Son of Royal Langbrith

By W. D. HOWELLS

IT is recognized, not as one of Mr. Howells's strongest books of fiction, but as the strongest. It has a plot that grips one. The story cannot be put down; it must be read at a sitting. Special Binding, Crown 8vo, $2.00

The Truants

By A. E. W. MASON

THIS new story by the author of "The Four Feathers" not only introduces the reader to strange phases of modern London life, but speedily involves him in a plot of engrossing interest, which centres round a man who must needs choose between military honor and the good name of his wife. The plot is intensely interesting throughout, growing more and more involved with every chapter. 3rd ed. Post 8vo, $1.50

The Georgians

By WILL N. HARBEN

A NEW book about Abner Daniel, in which his shrewd wit is more keen and telling than ever. In the role of match-maker he adds a delightfully humorous touch to a sweet and tender love story. Post 8vo, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

OCTOBER 4-6, 1904, a Columbia 35 H. P. Touring Car established a new record from Chicago to New York, covering 1127 miles under all the miscellaneous conditions of cross-country touring in 58 hours, 35 minutes, 10 seconds, and breaking the previous record by 14 hours, 8 minutes. A Columbia 12-14 H. P. Light Gasoline Car won a first prize in the Mt. Washington climbing contests last July. These and other achievements of regularly equipped stock Columbias contrast strongly with the performances of specially built cars on race tracks or selected stretches of level roadway, and are full of significance to all persons whose interest in automobiles centers in their practical use for purposes of recreation or necessary travel.

General catalogue will be sent on request; also special catalogues of Columbia Electric Tonn Carriages of the coach class and Electric Commercial Vehicles.

ELECTRIC VEHICLE COMPANY, HARTFORD, CONN.

NEW YORK 154 156-158 West 59th St. BOSTON 74-78 Statehouse St. CHICAGO 1415 Michigan Ave.

(Incorporated in England, Limited in U.S.A.)

A TIMELY AND SUGGESTIVE BOOK ABOUT MUSIC

PHASES OF MODERN MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

In this book Mr. GILMAN, who has been musical critic of Harper's Weekly since 1904, brings to the reader sympathetic and insight of such unusual topics of present and past music as "PARADISE" AND ITS SISTER AND "RICHARD STRAUSS, the most important modern composer; the fascinating Norwegian EDVARD GRIGG; WAGNER and his great contemporary VERDI; WOMEN AS COMPOSERS; RALPH IN MUSIC; the interesting Englishman Sir EDWARD ELGAR, and other subjects of timely appeal.

16mo, Ornamented Cloth, Uncut Edges, Gilt Top, $1.25 net.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

Did You Ever See a Nervous Beer Drinker?

Nervousness comes from two causes. One is half-fed nerves.

The malt in beer is a food to them; the hops a tonic. The slight percentage of alcohol is an aid to digestion, and that means more food.

Another cause is the waste that clogs the nerve centers. That waste results from drinking too little to properly flush the system.

The habit of beer drinking gives the body the needed fluid.

Schlitz

That is why beer is prescribed for nervousness.

That is why beer-drinking nations scarcely know what nervousness is.

But drink pure beer—Schlitz beer. Bad beer may be worse than the lack of it.

Half the cost of our brewing goes to making Schlitz pure. Ask for the brewery bottling.

The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER & BROTHERS

NEW YORK

THE GIVERS

BY

MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER @ BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

IMPORTANT.

THE FOUR-TRACK NEWS

The Popular
Illustrated Magazine of Travel and Education

From 130 to 160 pages each issue, every one of which is of human interest.

Subscriptions for 1905 only will be received until December 31st, 1904, at 30 cents per year; to foreign countries $1.00.

After January 1st, 1905, the subscription price will be $1.00; to foreign countries $1.50; at news-stands ten cents per copy.

SUBSCRIBE NOW and take advantage of this extraordinarily low rate.

GEORGE H. DANIELS, Publisher,
7 East 42d St.,

Box No. 155.

New York.

CHRISTMAS

"A de Luxe Volume"

HARPER'S MAGAZINE

BOOTH TARKINGTON'S
NEW NOVELETTE BEGINS

MARK TWAIN
HENRY JAMES
MARY E. WILKINS
SIR WILLIAM RAMSAY
NORMAN DUNCAN

W. D. HOWELLS
MARGARET DELAND
JOHN LUTHER LONG
RICHARD LE GALLIENNE
THOMAS A. JANVIER

WARREN HASTINGS'S OWN ACCOUNT OF HIS IMPEACHMENT — A newly discovered document

Pictures in Color and Tint by HOWARD PYLE, ELIZABETH SHIPPEN GREEN, W. T. SMEDLEY, LUCIUS HITCHCOCK, ALBERT STERNER

A magnificent volume of 180 Pages, containing 23 Separate Contributions

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII.

New York, Saturday, November 26, 1904

No. 490

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

GENERAL NOGI, THE JAPANESE COMMANDER, STUDYING A WAR MAP AT HIS HEADQUARTERS BEFORE PORT ARTHUR

From photograph made before Port Arthur on September 23, 1904, by James Keating. Copyright, 1904, by Colburn & Underwood, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVII.

No. 2501

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 26, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy — $4.00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tonkin, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post office as second-class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT will be only fifty-four years old in 1912. Suppose the Republicans should be beaten in 1908, and four years later should implore him to lead them once more to victory, could he not deem it his duty to obey the summons, as GRANT would have done in 1869, and as, we cannot but believe, GARFIELD would have done this year? We should bear in mind that the popular objection is not so much to a third term as to a third consecutive term. If the series be broken, the danger of the Federal patronage being used for the perpetuation of personal power is, manifestly, eliminated. It might, indeed, be well for the people that the occupant of the Chief Magistracy for a second term should know that at some future day—not less than four years after he left the White House—he might be invited to return thereto, provided he had earned the respect and confidence of his fellow countrymen.

There is no doubt that Mr. ROOSEVELT received the largest plurality of the popular vote ever recorded for a President, for it must be remembered that in 1820, when MONROE got all but one of the electoral votes, the Presidential electors were chosen by the State Legislatures. The largest previous plurality—$49,000 in round numbers—was given to McKINLEY in 1896; the next largest, to GRANT in 1872, namely, 763,000; and the third largest to McKINLEY in 1896, when he got 604,000. The fourth largest, namely, 406,000, was given to BUCHANAN in 1856. BUCHANAN, however, was a minority President. So was CLEVELAND in 1884 and 1892. GRANT and McKINLEY, on the other hand, were majority Presidents. ROOSEVELT, for his part, is not only a majority President, but his plurality will probably reach, if it does not exceed, two millions. In this respect his triumph is unprecedented, as also in the fact that he is the first Vice-President who became President by accident, and who afterwards was elected Chief Magistrate. It is almost, however, to speak of his majority in the electoral college as unparalleled, or to assume that the Democratic party can never recover from the defeat which it has experienced. In 1872 GRANT had 286 electoral votes against 63. Four years before, he had 214 against 80. In 1864, LINCOLN had 212 against 21 cast for McCLELLAN. In 1852, FRANKLIN PIERCE had 254 against 42 given to SEYMOUR. SEYMOUR carried only four States, and came within a hair's breadth of losing two of them. Vermont, indeed, he secured by only about five hundred plurality. In 1848, WILLIAM HENRY HUBBARD had 234 electoral votes against VAN RENEN'S 60.

This year ROOSEVELT will have 336 against 140, if we assume that seven out of Maryland's eight electoral votes are awarded by the State Board of CANVASSERS to PARKER. It is evident that the Democracy has survived worse defeats than it sustained this year. In 1844, only four years after the tremendous rout which it suffered at the hands of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, it obtained for POLK and DALLAS 170 against 106 electoral votes. In 1876, only four years after its seemingly irreparable collapse under GARFIELD, SAMUEL J. TILDEN received 256,000 plurality of the popular vote, and was acknowledged by the Electoral Commission to have won 184 electoral votes against the 185 awarded to HAYES. For the circumstances, the vitality and elasticity of the Democratic party are indisputable. Its name appeals too strongly to the popular imagination ever to be surrendered. Indeed, its original name, Democratic-Republican, or Republican-Democratic, was so taking that the opposition had to borrow half of it in 1850. The future of the two chief political parties will be found discussed elsewhere.

Many and ingenious are the theories that have been advanced to explain Mr. ROOSEVELT's tremendous majorities of the popular and of the electoral votes. The primary, the fundamental, the decisive cause, undoubtedly—what the logicians call the causa causans—was the good times and the widespread anxiety lest prosperity might be checked. No overwhelming was the influence of this factor the almost any respectable Republican would probably have been successful this year, though he would not have gained the overwhelming triumph achieved by THOMAS ROOSEVELT. He would doubtless have lost some of the trans-Mississippi States. Another cause which contributed to the magnitude of the Democratic defeat was the failure of the Democratic managers to foresee, or to discover betimes, that the people cared but little about the Panama issue, or the Philippines issue, or the constitutionalism and imperialism issues, and were not deeply impressed by the difference between Mr. ROOSEVELT'S and JUDGE PARKER'S positions on the tariff. Every man and woman, on the other hand, was keenly alive to the fact that they were paying considerably more for beef and mutton than they had been a few years ago; and if the Democratic managers had from the outset concentrated their batteries on the trusts they would have lost no BAYAN Democrats, and they would have got a much larger proportion of the union-labor votes than they actually received.

When all is said, however, we deem it just to add that, although any respected Republican might have come out ahead this year, more than half of the popularity obtained by Mr. ROOSEVELT was due to his personal popularity. In no other way can we explain the extraordinary pluralities secured by the Republican nominee in California and other States on the Pacific slope; nor in any other way can we account for the fact that he carried States which elected Democratic Governors, such as Massachusetts, Minnesota, Colorado, Montana, and, greatest wonder of all, Missouri. The women turned out for him en masse in the four States where they possess the suffrage—Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, and Colorado—every one of which went for BAYAN in 1896. He seems to have got almost every negro vote in the doubtful States, although smiling TOM TOWNSEND strove to win over some of the colored brethren in Indiana. It is obvious that many BAYAN Democrats must have voted for ROOSEVELT, not so much from love of him as from dislike of the reorganizers who had supplanted their favorite in the control of their party. It is only, however, by union-labor votes, normally Democratic, that the victory, or the remarkable proportions of the victory, gained by Mr. ROOSEVELT in certain States is explicable. The fact that he got the Presidential electors in Massachusetts, while the Democratic nominee for Governor was chosen, is manifestly due to union-labor votes. The mixed result in Colorado is attributable to the same agency. There is now no doubt that the upset in Rhode Island, Maryland, and Missouri; the failure of the Democratic nominee for the Vice-Presidency to carry his native State, West Virginia; and the stupendous majority rolled up for the Republican ticket in Pennsylvania, should be imputed partly to the instinctive sympathy felt by union laborers for Mr. ROOSEVELT since his interposition in the anthracite-coal strike.

In an interview on November 12, Mr. WILLIAM L. DEXTER, the Governor-elect of Massachusetts, testified that during the campaign he had been assured that 20,000 union laborers would vote for him, together with more than ten thousand who previously had voted for Socialist candidates. According to Mr. DOWD's informant, it was the first time in American politics that it had been arranged to throw the labor vote of a State almost solidly for one nominee. Mr. JAMES A. JOHNSON, Governor-elect of Minnesota, in an interview which took place on the same day, had nothing to say about the labor vote, but ascribed his victory to the fact that the people of Minnesota regard the Republican organization as a servant of the railroad corporations. They were evidently convinced, however, by the proceedings of the Federal government against the Northern Securities merger that Mr. ROOSEVELT, personally, could not be controlled by railway corporation influences. Mr. JOSEPH W. FULK, Governor-elect of Missouri, who was interviewed on November 11, recognized that Mr. ROOSEVELT's individual popularity was a great factor in the result, so far as Missouri was concerned. It is already probable that Governor FULK will be put forward not only by Missouri, but by many other States, as a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency four years hence.

A Massachusetts manufacturer who voted for PARKER has been holding an inquest, and reaches this conclusion:

ROOSEVELT has now the largest chance for good of any man in this world. Let him take what is shown to him by the Democratic doctrine, and go in for it, including a revision of the tariff by its friends. Lord JOHN RUSSELL did not do so much for England by a repeal of the Corn Laws as it is within ROOSEVELT's power now to do for the United States.

Secondly, he should enforce the laws against trusts which exist in other lands, follow the course which he undertook in the Northern Securities matter, but has not pursued.

Then let him give some reasonable assistance to the Philippines of independence at no distant day.

If, by such positions, he alienates the forces in the Republican party which have hitherto prevailed, he can form a new party of moderate Republicans and gold Democrats, and the Socialists, whether under BRYAN or under extreme protection leaders, may stick together and be completely licked in one hour.

If he does not take this course, the next period of depression will bring in a Socialist President, and the whole conservative fabric will be overthrown.

This is an intelligent diagnosis of the situation, though of course its accuracy is open to discussion. Was ever so much expected of a President as of ROOSEVELT? Much was expected of LINCOLN, but it was that he should do what the party that elected him wanted done. But a good part of the party that elected ROOSEVELT is expected to object to those things that our Massachusetts friend wants done. Yet we believe that he will try hard to do the first two of those things. He will almost surely try hard to have the tariff revised, and a great many Republicans will be with him. Whether such revision as they can accomplish will amount to anything, we cannot tell until we see it, but there must be a show of revision at least, if only to hold the present Republican voters together. The tariff has nothing to fear just now from Democrats, but in the very security of the Republican ascendancy the Republican revisionists will find their chance to free their minds and fight obstinately for what they want. This is the time of all others for free speech about the tariff by the friends of its friends. We don't doubt they will avail themselves of the opportunity.

The suggestion that President ROOSEVELT by striving for tariff revision might split his party is very interesting. No doubt he won't, but still, let us consider. Colonel WYTERSON holds, as many Democrats do, especially in the South, that the wreck of the Democratic party is due to Mr. CLEVELAND's failure to press the tariff issue in 1892. Congress of course would have denied him a tariff-for-revenue bill, but he would have kept alive the issue, and the Democrats could have gone to the country with it in 1894 and carried the elections, and Mr. CLEVELAND in 1896 would have been master of the situation and able to name his successor. As it was, the Democrats in 1896 instead of being united on tariff were divided on silver. Colonel WYTERSON believes that as the slavery oligarchy finally hustled the Democratic party off it had been sixty years in power, the high-protection oligarchy will some time bust the Republican party. But he does not look to see it bust for some time to come, and until it does bust he does not expect to see a shadow of the turning that will bring the Democrats or their successors back to power.

The advocates of "stand pat" have faithfully brought it home to us that the tariff is dynamite and will do awful things if you touch it. It is the open season now for conjectures about the awful things it will do if let alone. We welcome Colonel WYTERSON's suggestions. If President ROOSEVELT, moved by a bold resolution to get so much of the dynamite out of the tariff as he can, runs up against the high-protection oligarchy, it is conceivable that he might eventually become the leader of tariff-for-revenue Republicans, as in 1848 an ex-President from New York became the leader and candidate of the Free-soil Democrats.

And hath it not been written that the voice of the people is the voice of God?—MARSH TRENTER.

It hath; but Bishop POTTER, in response to a direct inquiry in Cooper Union the other evening, said it is not always so. And if the Bishop doth not know, who doth?

One of the acts for which Mr. ROOSEVELT deserves praise is the promptitude with which he confirmed out of his own mouth the report circulated toward the close of the campaign that Mr. JOHN HAY had been invited, and had consented, to remain Secretary of State for the four years beginning March 4, 1905. In no more conclusive way could Mr. ROOSEVELT demonstrate that he has no intention of playing the "war lord" or of brandishing a "big stick." Laudable also is his determination to uphold with all the weight of his endorsement the request that will be submitted by Secretary-of-War TART to Congress on its re-assembling in December, the request, namely, that the duties levied in our ports on sugar and tobacco coming from the Philippines shall be reduced hereafter to only 25 per cent. of the DUTY rates, instead of the 75 per cent. now levied, and that all other products of the Philippines shall be admitted duty free. Such a fixed change would be calculated to impart a signal and beneficent impulse to the insular industries. Perhaps nothing, however, said or done by Mr. ROOSEVELT since his triumph at the ballot-box is more likely to gratify the whole American people, including his opponents as well as his supporters, than the announcement made on November 11 that Mr. GUSTAVUS COMMISSIONER of Corporations, has nearly completed his report on the operations of the Beef Trust; and that if, on the submission of it to the President, it proves to contain anything—as undoubtedly it will—that will give the government cause for action against any conspirators striving to circumvent the SHERMAN act, the Department of Justice will be ordered to attend to the matter in exemplary fashion. Thus all Mr. ROOSEVELT pay his debt to the union-labor vote, and justify the faith reposed in him by what some of his critics have been pleased to call the "common people."

Mr. "Ireneuil" WALK has made a faithful Commissioner of Pensions, and almost all the taxpayers are sorry to see him resign. No conscientious man of proved ability will want his job, and no other kind of man ought to have it. The President will have to draft somebody to fill Mr. WALK's place. We presume he will draft General BLACK, a good man, who used to be a Democrat, and compel the victim to serve.

With many apologies, and begging his auditors not to host him out of the room, Mr. MONLEY said at the New York Chamber of Commerce dinner:

I have seen nothing, as evidence during this run through some of the centres of your country, to make me believe that you would not have been just as great, just as mighty—I mean, in industrial competition—just as prosperous, just as strong, as you are to-day, if you had taken that worn-out shibboleth, as I am told—"No tariff excepting for purposes of revenue."

And they did not host him out of the room, but listened with "laughter and applause." After election folks will listen to any kind of sense that is interesting enough to gain their attention. Before election we are all credulous to one line of argument, and all incredulous to another. After election the discriminative faculty begins to operate again. There was something more than good-nature in the friendly attention that was paid to Mr. Mowley at the Chamber of Commerce dinner. Mr. ALLEN it says, somewhat sadly, that if the election settled anything, it settled the tariff question for the present on the side of "stand pat." But evidently it didn't. Evidently many men are turning it over in their minds, and our leading merchants and financiers were glad to hear Mr. Mowley bear testimony for his side of it.

The opinion seems to be unanimous that while the President makes Hay, the sun will shine.

It has become a matter of routine, in our public life, whenever a consequential officeholder dies or resigns, for somebody to propose Mr. SEAN LOW as his successor. Whence the suggestion comes we know not, but its arrival is as invariable and inflexible as the rising of the sun. This time Mr. Low is "prominently mentioned" for Postmaster of this city. Senator PATTY pronounces the proposal "a joke," but we can hardly believe that in saying so the venerable Senator himself is serious. Mr. Low is anything but a joke. He is a solemn fixture. He never sought an office in his life; the office is always seeking him, for the reason that he is the one solitary being who is perfectly equipped for whatever position happens to be vacant. Sometimes it catches him and sometimes not. Last time it didn't; this time we hope it will. We cannot rest easy while Mr. Low's fabled probity is confined to private life. The public needs it, and always will. Moreover, we know him to be able personally, if appropriately he can be thus spoken of. We have doubted sometimes whether he is real, whether, for example, if he should happen to sit upon a tack he would jump. But, real or unreal, he is a necessity. We pray for his immediate appointment. We want to get him off our mind.

The opinion that since the late election every kind of Democrat is absolved of obligation to vote in future for any other kind of Democrat finds a reflection in a Washington despatch to the New York Times, which declares that the Southern Democrats are considering the expediency of flocking alone. A call, says this despatch, will soon be issued to Southern leaders to meet in Washington and consider the question of the political independence of the Southern States. The proposition is not, of course, to secede from the Union, but merely to let the Northern Democrats slide and cease to go to their conventions. Some of the Southern Democrats think the better way will be for them to wait in Presidential years until both the great parties of the North have made their nominations, and then to endorse the candidate they like better, or if they like neither, put up a man of their own and vote for him. There would undoubtedly be advantages in this plan. For one thing, the South would soon cease to be solid. For another, the South, pursuing this waiting policy, would be worth courting, and would receive polite attentions from all parties in the North. If no one knew, for example, what the affiliations of the Southern Democrats would be in the next election, it might seem less expedient to raise the question of cutting down the representation of the South to match the disfranchisement of some of the negroes. The very fact that such a proposition as this Washington despatch suggests seems reasonable enough to discuss illustrates the uncommon possibilities of our political Earth as it emerges from the recent deluge. Nobody knows what landmarks, if any, the flood has left; Colonel Noyt and his political family and a lot of the animals are afloat in a seaworthy ark, and we shall doubtless soon see the great investigator experimenting with ravers and doves to discover how things go. But as the great and lasting divisions of mankind date from the great clean sweep that antedates history, so new divisions in politics are likely to follow our political deluge.

Mr. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS is not so great a figure at this writing as he was last June. In the first half of the present year he attracted the attention of a large number of his fellow citizens, who examined him with recurring scrutinies to see what manner of statesman he was, and in what degree he seemed to measure up to the stature of the Coming Man. They do not look his way so much now, but they wonder about him, and occasionally some one asks his fellow, "What's the matter with WILLIAMS?" The question is not a jocular exclamation, but a sober inquiry, and the answer is apt to be: "The trouble with WILLIAMS is that he is a cynic. He is not seriously enough in earnest. He does not care enough. His cynicism even takes the uncomely form of neglected raiment and an unshaven chin. It's a pity about WILLIAMS." We presume that when Congress meets again Mr. WILLIAMS will turn up in Washington and resume his duties in the halls of legislation. He is an able man who has been useful to the country, and doubtless will be again. But it would please his admirers to see him readjust himself a little to his environment, get some new shirts and neckties, scrape his face regularly every day, discipline his natural impulses, and acquire carefulness and earnestness. It is a considerable chase to be earnest, but that is part of the price of high efficiency. There is lots of earnestness that is not efficient, but there is very little efficiency that is not earnest. The admixture of earnestness would increase Mr. WILLIAMS's efficiency, and it need not spoil all his fun, either.

Colonel WATTERSON demurs to the description of himself lately printed in the WEEKLY on the grounds that it does much more than justice to his sporting features and much less than justice to his record as a very painstaking and hard-working newspaper man. He thinks a man who has played roquet not more than six times in all his life, who personally set the format of his paper to press for twenty-five years, who eschews clubs, lives in the country, and finds his solace in intellectual and domestic pleasures, ought to be painted in more sober colors than our contributor has used. The subject is one that Colonel WATTERSON knows better than we can. There is such a halo of romance around his young white head that it is hard for any one who is not his daily companion to see him quite as he is.

It now seems to be generally acknowledged in Great Britain that London newspapers were not warranted in the inflammatory appeals to public opinion by which they sought to make a cassus belli of the North Sea incident. As we pointed out at the time, the assumption that in the explanation given by him, Admiral ROUSSELEUX was guilty of a deliberate untruth, was contradicted by his reputation for uprightness and intelligence. Evidently, Premier BALFOUR, in the speech which he delivered when the war scare was at its height, went too far when he described the Russian version of the affair as absurd, and threw doubt on its veracity. But perhaps he devoted it prudent for the moment to bend to a storm which, if too stiffly resisted, might have overthrown the ministry. The storm has subsided, and all sensible Englishmen are now thankful that Parliament was not in session during the crisis, and that the helm of government was in the hands of thoroughly sane and cool-headed pilots. Lord LANSDOWN'S repute for wisdom, which could not be deserved as high when he assumed charge of the Foreign Office, has been notably enhanced by his judicious management of a collision which at one time threatened portentous consequences. No reasonable person doubts that the exact facts will be brought out by the Commission of Inquiry, which, it will be recalled, is to consist of five members,—an Englishman, a Russian, an American, and a Frenchman,—who, by a majority vote, will agree upon a fifth. We shall not be surprised to see it acknowledged that the Russian battle-ships had some ground for expecting to be attacked, and that, owing to a misinterpretation of signals, they mistook two Russian torpedo-boats for assailants. They are not likely to make a similar blunder hereafter, much less to fire intentionally upon vessels known to be neutral.

Meanwhile the fortunes of the Baltic fleet will be watched with growing interest. That part of it which will traverse the Mediterranean and the Suez Canal will be at liberty to coal in a French seaport on the northeast coast of Africa, not far south of the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb; again at the French port of Pondicherry, on the southeast coast of India; again at Saigon, the principal harbor of French Indo-China, after which it may, if it chooses, coal once more at a German port in Kiao-Chow Bay. That section of the fleet, on the other hand, which will proceed by the Cape of Good Hope route can coal at a French port in West Africa; again at a port in Madagascar; and then go on to the rendezvous, which, as yet, is known only to the commanders. Whether the requisited fleet will put in at Kiao-Chow Bay depends upon whether Admiral Rozhdestvensky deems himself strong enough to cope with the force under Admiral Togo, which will probably await him off that harbor, or whether he thinks it more prudent to postpone the fight for maritime ascendancy until he can effect a junction with the Russian cruisers at Vladivostok, and with such war-vessels as may manage to escape from Port Arthur. In the latter event he would naturally divide his fleet at Seipon, and the two divisions would seek to reach Vladivostok by different routes.

Although, at the hour when we write, the remnant of the Russian garrison of Port Arthur still holds out, the Japanese commander of the besieging force has been authorized to offer generous terms, and a surrender is expected to take place quickly. What is left of the fleet is expected to follow CORYSEA's example, and, at the last moment, attempt a sortie from the harbor, in which case it will probably suffer CORYSEA's fate; though, as the vessels are much more numerous, a few may succeed in reaching the high seas, and ultimately make their way by a circuitous route to Vladivostok. The downfall of the fortress will set free a large part of the besiegers, who have been variously computed at from 15,000 to 55,000 men. As about 15,000 would doubtless be retained for the occupation of Port Arthur and Dalny, the number of soldiers who would be at liberty to join the Japanese army at and around Liao-Yang would range from twenty to forty thousand. Inasmuch as the railway from Port Arthur to Liao-Yang is in Japanese hands, they could, of course, be sent swiftly to the front. Such a reinforcement, coupled with the additions which are known to have been made since the battle of Shaho, would undoubtedly give Marshal OYAMA a considerable preponderance over General KUROKI. When that hour arrives, provided the Japanese stores of ammunition have also been duly replenished, we may expect to hear of a third and even more desperate battle.

MISS KATE CARW is a clever, cynical, and cheeky young woman who makes and illustrates interviews with conspicuous people for the Sunday World. We recall with infinite zest the picture she drew a while ago of Secretary TATE with his great good nature and splendid "ha, ha." Also at the end of the campaign she did tired and injured Chairman CLEVELAND most graciously and sympathetically. We have never seen the lady, but this is the way she herself thinks she looks. It is probable that her auto-portrait accentuates her peculiarities, but if this is how she would like to have the public think she seems, we can see no good reason why anybody else should complain. Miss CARW's latest victim was Governor-elect HOBBS, who apparently became very uncomfortable and cross under her ingenious old-maidish scrutiny. In the first place, despite the fact that the levin caricaturist had gone all the way to hogwash Oleas in pursuit of her quarry, he tried not to see her at all. In this, of course, he failed. He surrendered at 1 P.M., and, hustling into some sort of reception-room, "shook hands quickly but flabbily."

Then comes the inevitable, yet interesting, personal description of our next Governor: "A fat little man—as fat as if he lived on butter and cheese and bacon—dressed out in a dark-brown velvet smoking-jacket which had all the haughty splendor of a Christmas present, a waistcoat which a haberdasher would describe as 'chaotic,' a puffly, purple Ascot tie; trousers of black relieved with fine white stripes, and a pair of comfortable red Morocco slippers." Having taken in and sketched—in her mind—the portrait reproduced herewith, Miss CARW congratulated him upon his election, sharpened her pencil along with her wits, much to his obvious discomfort, and proceeded to ask pointed questions. But the attempt was futile. Although she spoke "mildly," yet, we assume, firmly, "he was very fidgety" and "a little choky and short of breath." There was nothing to say, and he "didn't want to be bothered."

That, however, was a matter of slight concern to an experienced interviewer, and, "finding his irritation amusing," Miss CARW made "a dignified little speech," though still in vain. "None, none!" was all she could get out of him, hurrying a statement that Governor OLEAS is "a splendid man and a splendid Governor," and that his own chief duty in Albany would be "to discharge the officials of the executive department." This, of course, was not what Mr. HOBBS meant to say, and it was unbecoming in Miss CARW to quote literally and mischievously, when she knew perfectly well that he was too embarrassed to put into words a perfunctory intention. However, the relief obviously experienced by the Governor-elect at the departure of his persistent inquisitor must have compensated for much of his discomfort. The impression created by Miss CARW's slightly malicious amusement is not altogether pleasing, but we apprehend that after Mr. HOBBS becomes Governor and gets used to the interviewing audience he will appear to better advantage, even though in less striking attire.

A different sort of picture is painted in the Sea of the incoming Governor of Massachusetts, whose election astonished even himself. Mr. DOUGLAS was only five years old when his father died. Two years later, in conformity with the custom of past people in those days, he was bound out to his uncle, a shoemaker, during his minority, and learned his trade. Becoming of age, he got a job in a factory in Brockton, and two years later married an attractive girl, who became a thoroughly sensible woman. After a time he became foreman, and, at thirty-one, had saved a few hundred dollars. He then went into business for himself, employing five hands from the beginning. His product found a ready sale, machinery was introduced as rapidly as possible, and there came to this steady-minded man the idea that made his fortune. It was nothing else than to individualize his brand and advertise it as none had ever been advertised before. The result was amazing. Last year he sold nearly seven million dollars' worth of shoes. Of course, in doing this, he has become rich, but better yet, he himself has grown with his business. During the campaign we noted the fact, surprising at least to us, that the most telling tariff speeches were being made by Mr. DOUGLAS. And his knack at advertising had taught him how to make a canvass. All over the State he plastered big placards showing his familiar shoes, and underneath the words: "I sell these shoes for $3.50. If I could get my raw material free of duty, I could sell them for $3." This direct, homely, convincing way of driving truth home, along with his reputation for generous treatment of his employees, elected him.

Mr. DOUGLAS bears his exceptional honors as modestly as might have been expected. It is easy to see, however, that he is not wholly self-made. He has had assistance from the New England girl who joined hands with him thirty-six years ago and promised to help. "We did not believe," Mrs. DUNLAP said on the day after election, "that Mr. DUNLAP would be elected. It is most surprising. The people must have known that he would do the best he could for them. He has always done right, and I know he will do the best he can always. I feel, in a measure, as though I had lost something. It will take a year away from me. I have always had my husband. He has not been a club man; he has been a home man. We must not consider ourselves too much, though. If we had, we would have urged him more strongly to run for the office, but still I am glad the people have elected him. It will be a sacrifice for us, even though it is an honor. We are glad he carried Brooklyn. That was really all we cared for. I never wanted to be the Governor's wife; I just wanted to be Mrs. DUNLAP." We have become so accustomed to silly, priggish talk from women whose husbands attain high public places that the genuinely American note struck in this simple, modest utterance is as refreshing as a moonday shower. It carries us back to ANNE ARDEN, MARTIN WASHINGTON, and the other real women who did as much as the men of their day to stamp out folly and frivolity and make this the great, wholesome, unpretentious republic it became.

The Episcopal convention to would be divorcees: Better hate than serve.—Life.

A grim jest, but uncomfortably accurate.

On November 14 a mass-meeting of Episcopalians was held in a church in New York to start a campaign in favor of action by the next Episcopal general convention in 1907 to prohibit Episcopal clergymen from marrying divorced persons during the lifetime of their divorced spouses. It appeared at the recent convention in Boston that a substantial majority of the delegates favored such prohibition, but because of certain technical rules which govern how the vote must be taken by which a canon is to be changed the opponents of remarriage failed to carry their point completely, though they did gain a good deal. Disappointed at failing of complete success, they are already in training to win a sweeping victory next time. The chief point made at the meeting last week was that divorce was making such alarming progress in our country that everything possible must be done to make it less prevalent. The Episcopalians at least cannot do a great deal, but they want to do what they can. The chief service of which they are capable is to make divorce somewhat less agreeable to polite and scrupulous people. There is no doubt that the Episcopal Church is the most fashionable Church in the country. That statement must not be understood as one of disparagement, but merely of fact. That Church seems to suit people of wealth and fashion rather better than even the exceedingly respectable Presbyterian Church. It suits the taste and feelings of many persons who, so far as their religious convictions go, would find no special grounds for preferring it to the other leading Protestant bodies. Being a Church that appeals to leaders of society who set the fashions, it is especially solicitous that its influence with such persons, and through them with a great many others, should be as favorable as possible to sound morals and right living. It wants its example to be as good and as useful as possible, and that is a thoroughly creditable and patriotic aspiration. And it is moderate in what it attempts. It does not propose to forbid divorce or to visit harsh penalties on divorced persons. As represented by a majority of its authorized spokesmen it only asks that it shall be excused from marrying a second time persons who, having already once been married, have not been released by death from that former compact.

This is a reasonable enough desire, and if the Episcopalians can agree to realize it, we don't see why anybody should complain. They will want the other Protestant Churches to follow their example. If they should—which won't happen right away—a legal remarriage will still be obtainable by persons who have secured a legal divorce. The divorce laws in this country will never be made unduly strict. Public sentiment will never condemn that, though it is very much to be hoped that sometime the divorce laws of the several States may be brought much nearer to uniformity than now. Divorce in the United States needs no encouragement, but the contrary. At the meeting last week Bishop GAZZARD declared (so the newspapers quote him) that in this country there were 23,000 divorces in 1900, and 60,000 in 1903. Mr. LEAN declared that in thirty-four years there had been 700,000 divorces in the United States. That seems an enormous number, but if the present increasing rate reported by Bishop GAZZARD should be maintained, there will be far more than that number in the next decade. We wonder a good deal about these figures. When the papers report that two or three million shares of stock have been sold in a day on the Stock Exchange we know that a great many of the shares which make up the total of transactions have been sold (and counted) several times in the course of the day's work. Picking up a morning paper, we observe a record of the case of a woman thirty-one years old who is trying to get quit of her seventh husband. She will doubtless succeed, and the husband says she will probably marry seven times more. We infer from this case that the divorce statistics are considerably swollen by persons who have the divorce habit, and that each case does not necessarily imply a serious failure of matrimonial hopes.

But undoubtedly there are far too many divorces. Bishop PORTER, who has very liberal ideas on the subject, and has been especially desirous of fair play for "the innocent party," declares in his pastoral letter that it is in vain that our people concern themselves about such matters as municipal improvements, "if these moral sewers which we call the divorce courts are not flushed from time to time with the tide of a purifying and cleansing public sentiment." Yet in this very phrase that Bishop PORTER uses there is perhaps a little more truth than he took note of. No doubt the divorce courts are moral sewers through which a lot of filth constantly flows. It is argued that it is at least as well for the public health to let this current go the way it is going. A newspaper (the San) lately reported that a London journal which incited a discussion of the marriage question by voluntary correspondents, got in a great mass of correspondence so many letters that were unprintable because of their "horrible" contents that it stopped the discussion. That would not happen here, and it is the testimony of very well qualified foreign observers that morality in the United States is at least as high as in the best European countries. There is a strong argument, therefore, for letting the divorce courts alone (except so far as to make the laws of all the States more nearly similar), but it does not apply to the Churches.

Possibly the editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY is now well informed as to the location of Secretary SHAW.—Burlington (Iowa) Herald.

He is in Washington, D. C., at present, but you need not be surprised if you see him out your way before long.

The report that the Pope had been inconvenienced by bad heart action transpired within a short time of the news that a very rich American lady had renounced her connection with the Roman Church, but it is very unlikely that there is more than a fortuitous association between the two items. The action of the Marquise des MORSTRENS in announcing publicly with a good deal of emphasis that she has quit the Catholics is unusual, and excites special interest because of her large gifts to that Church in times past and the honors which were bestowed upon her in recognition of them. When hereditary Catholics quarrel with their Church they usually come back to its fold in the end. This lady's case is not of that species, but is an example of the recurrence of a born Protestant to Protestantism. What is in the blood usually tells in these matters more than what is at any given time in the mind.

It would be a good idea if HARPER'S WEEKLY would still keep at the head of its editorial columns: "Platform, no hunting." It is well to be constantly reminded that there is no place at any time for hunting in discussion of our political affairs.—Springfield Union.

It is no longer necessary. That sturdy platform has become an established institution and lives in the hearts of our countrymen.

The only paper in the country that ground the PABER vote was HARPER'S WEEKLY, which, for once in its life, hit the nail on the head.—Jacksonville Times-Union.

The Future of the Two Chief Political Parties

THE colossal anomaly by which Mr. ROOSEVELT has been elected President—colossal, but not, as we point out elsewhere, unprecedented, except in respect of the popular vote—may, we apprehend, determine the attitude of the Republican party for some years to come. The cadre of Republican Senators, who for a good many years have shaped the policies of their party, and who a year or even six months ago would gladly have not forward some other candidate for the Presidency, if they could have relied upon controlling the Chicago convention, will not be in the least disposed to give Mr. ROOSEVELT credit for the whole, or even most, of the triumph achieved at the ball-box. Of course, as we have elsewhere shown, Mr. ROOSEVELT does not deserve credit for the whole of it, but indisputably he was a far more potent factor in the evolution of the result than is likely to be acknowledged by the Senatorial cabal. That this should be so is unfortunate in the eyes of those who believe that the Republican party has a great part to play in the twentieth century as it had in the nineteenth. That the drift of events has made it, originally radical, a distinctly and no doubt permanently conservative party, will scarcely be denied, nor is it, indeed, to be regretted. A conservative party we might always have, if only to balance and check its radical counterpart. There is all the difference in the world, however, between a large-hearted and a cynical conservatism, between a conservatism that disdains, even amid the gaudy glories of triumph, when and where it may do well to yield, and the stiff-necked conservatism that, because it refuses to bend, gets broken. If, during the ARTHUR administration, the Republican leaders had listened to the Chief Magistrate and to his prudent associates, they would have subjected the protective tariff to a genuine revision at the hands of its friends, and thus they probably would have averted the defeat of their party in 1894 and in 1898. As it was, the judicious recommendations of the Tariff Commission were rejected, and the sham revision on the whole resulted in a substantial increase, instead of a reduction of duties.

It will have been observed that hitherto the same Republican leaders or their successors have paid very little heed to Mr. ROOSEVELT's suggestions relating to the tariff. They long refused to make any concession in favor of Cuba's sugar and tobacco. What they did ultimately make was jeune in itself, and coupled with a stipulation that an similar concession should be made to any other sugar-producing country, a stipulation that practically prevents the conclusion of reciprocity treaties with France, Belgium, Germany, Austria-Hungary, or Russia. Again, Mr. ROOSEVELT, and his representatives supervising Philippine affairs, did their best to stimulate in the archipelago that industrial activity which lies at the root of prosperity and progress, but all they could obtain from the Senatorial laze was the derisory concession that Philippine products exported to this country shall pay 75 per cent. of the DUTY rates, instead of the full rates.

We need not say that the anti-trust legislation demanded by Mr. ROOSEVELT was minimized and emasculated as far as possible in the Senate. Yet nothing is more certain than that, as to every one of the points named, Mr. ROOSEVELT was right, and the Senatorial cabal was wrong. In all of his proposals he had at heart not only the nation's duty to Cuba and the Philippines, but also the reputation and true interests of the Republican party, which, in order to retain ascendency must deserve it.

It is obvious that Mr. ROOSEVELT, no longer a President by accident, but a Chief Magistrate chosen by the largest anomaly of the popular vote ever recorded, will exercise an incomparably greater influence over the Senate, as well as over the Lower House of Congress, than he has hitherto possessed. A plebiscite has made him the virtual dictator of his party. It is well for his party that this should be so, as far as domestic legislation is concerned, while, as regards foreign affairs, the President has given a guarantee of circumspection and caution by requesting and securing the retention of Mr. HAY in the post of Secretary of State.

We have no doubt that the campaign just ended, the first in which Mr. ROOSEVELT can truly be said to have been under fire, has had an illuminating effect upon his mind. In the fight which he has had to wage for the prize which he coveted, he has gained not only the civic crown, but withal some salutary lessons by which, if he has in him the germ of true greatness, he will be sure to profit. We are inclined, therefore, to believe that, under Mr. ROOSEVELT's guidance, the Republican party will show itself during the next four years, not defiantly but supple on servative, not impatient but tolerant of resignation, and far-sighted enough to heed the warning uttered in those States which chose Democratic Governors, while giving their electoral votes to the Republican nominee for the Presidency. If our forecast should be justified, the Republican party in 1904 will prove a very hard party to beat, unless, indeed, that year should be marked by such industrial paralysis and financial prostration as afflicted the country in 1893.

How will it be possible for the Democratic party four years hence to cope with the Republicans, provided the latter exhibit here a conciliatory and progressive spirit? We do not hesitate to say that we deem such coping extremely difficult, if not impracticable, in view of the labyrinthine and seemingly intractable elements of which the Democracy is composed. It is as certain that in the doubtful States of Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Indiana Judge PARKER had the votes of many Bryanized Democrats, as it is that Mr. BRYAN in all of these States four years ago failed to get the votes of many conservative Democrats.

Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that Mr. BRYAN and his friends will be able to control the next Democratic national convention. Let us assume that he will be able to dictate a programme providing, among other things, for the acquisition of all railway and telegraph lines by the State through which they run. Is it not likely that such a proposal would repel quite as many conservatives as were driven from the Democratic standard by the demand for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1?

Let us assume that Mr. BRYAN has his way also in the matter of demanding a constitutional amendment that shall permit an income tax. Are not Eastern and Western Democrats sharply and irreparably divided upon the question of the expediency of taxing investment? Is it probable that, by the lure of an income tax, or of the State ownership of railways and telegraphs, Mr. BRYAN could elicit a fatal or even considerable secession from the Republican ranks? That is a question which, of course, can only be answered by experiment, but, for ourselves, we may admit that we should not look for an affirmative reply.

It is true that some of the spokesmen of the Bryanite wing of the Democracy seem willing to face another defeat in 1904. They seem to think that the party will profit in the end, if all the conservative Democrats could be driven into the Republican ranks. They appear to be coerced, in other words, that two birds in the bush are worth much more than a bird in the hand.

The metaphor does not feed justice to the position which conservative Democrats occupy at present in the councils of their party. It is, as a matter of fact, in their hand that the Bryanites are flailing. Unquestionably the conservatives control, and doubtless will continue to control, the Democratic National Committee until the next national convention of their party shall assemble.

In other words, the machinery of the organization is in their power. Whether they will use four years hence the ascendancy which they now possess depends upon the question whether the Southern States, which gave Judge PARKER 140 electoral votes, will continue to cooperate with conservative Democrats of the East, or revert to the position which they took in 1896 and 1898, and support Mr. BRYAN and his following. We do not believe that Southern Democrats want railways and telegraphs to be owned by the States through which they run, and we doubt very much whether they care much for an income tax.

The truth is that the Southern people, viewed as a whole, are by principle and temperament conservative, and it is probable that, but for the rare issue, certain Southern States, for example, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and Louisiana, would normally vote for the Republican ticket and for a protective policy. Beyond a doubt, Southern Democrats, like Western Democrats, desire to see monopolies extinguished and trusts curbed. They are not a jot more earnest in this matter, however, than are the rank and file of the Eastern Democrats, whose feeling was expressed with fidelity and energy by Judge PARKER in the closing days of the campaign. If the next election is to turn mainly on the trusts issue, as now seems probable, we can see an reason why Judge PARKER, or an Eastern Democrat of his type, should not be as acceptable to the mass of the Southern Democracy as would Mr. BRYAN himself. It is true that, even in 1904, Mr. BRYAN got fifteen more electoral votes than will be recorded for Judge PARKER; but it should be remembered that four years ago Mr. BRYAN was not running against Thompson, Tamm, or Velt for the Presidency. In 1896 the latter's personality was scarcely so said to have figured in the canvass. Neither can we see any reason why Judge PARKER and his friends, or, for that matter, any conservative Democrats in the East, should object to such a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency in 1904 as Governor-elect FOLK of Missouri. In Mr. FOLK the South has produced a man of the ROOSEVELT type, and she will be entirely justified in demanding that he shall go up higher.

Mr. FOLK, it will be observed, is not committed to any semi-Socialistic proposal, like that which would make the separate States the owners of telegraphs and railways. No far as we know, he has not even demanded an income tax. What he does stand for in spotless purity in public life; such a reasonable readjustment of the tariff we shall shield our native consumers from paying more for American manufactures than these are sold for in foreign countries; and such drastic legislation as shall make it a crime to monopolize traffic in the necessities of life. Judge PARRER stood for all of these things; and, therefore, his supporters in the East could not consistently fail to acclaim the selection of such a man as the young Governor-elect of Missouri.

This thing seems tolerably certain, namely, that, if Mr. ROOSEVELT takes warning from the criticism to which he has been recently exposed, we are likely to hear little, if anything, in the next Presidential campaign about "constitutionalism," or "imperialism," or about the retention of the Philippines, or about the method by which the Panama Canal belt was acquired. The contest which has just ended—up to the last few days—turned almost exclusively upon these topics, and the people brushed them aside.

It now looks as if the next campaign would pivot on the two capital issues of the trusts and the tariff. Granted meanwhile Mr. ROOSEVELT shall not have stolen the Democratic thunder. If we are right in this forecast, we can see no reason why Southern Democrats and Eastern Democrats should not join shoulder to shoulder, and, under such men as PARKER of New York, DIXON of Massachusetts, JEFFERSON of Minnesota, FOLK of Missouri, DANIEL of Virginia, WILLIAMS of Mississippi, and HARLEY of Texas, continue to control the organization, frame the coming platform, and choose the next nominee for the Presidency. They might not win, but at least they would have a better chance of winning than would the Democrats if they were relegated to the hands of Mr. HAYES and his partisans.

Color and Temperament

If human life were known to test every doubtless question without number would arise, and in part, at any rate, answered as to the complexity of antipathetic forces. Curiously checked by the thought of its being of best for us, that a faint or another life revealing all knowledge to us, or quelling all questions in a dreamless sleep. Yet as it is, no recognition in a casual and drifting way that life is not merely respect of human affections.

Certain sounds given repeated sounds in a deeper, certain colors quell a given temper of mind, and certain colors have an unexpected associational value inducing alien and unlooked-for trains of thought. Easily or grasp that we live in such but strong relations to all the phenomena of Nature. Can sound, or music, or color, or light, or heat, or cold, or any one of the other particularly set man on seeking from the unseen, veritable third of the universe that sound which is in tune with our own mental make-up. And the colors we choose to keep about us, or instinctively note in our surroundings, disclose more definitely than any of the other choices the latent temperament.

Color and sensibility are closely allied, and our intelligence to clothing combinations is likely to be also a little blind to the finer moral and intellectual distinctions, a little unresponsive to the more delicate tastes and outer pain.

"Men and women write," Mr. KIPPING, in his last volume, "may sometimes, after great effort, achieve a creditable life but the house which is their temple cannot say anything save the truth of those who have lived in it." If character is choice trained and modified by will, the temperament which lies at the base of character is the racial and instinctive choosing unassisted by discipline and rule. Even expectations and lack of purpose are shown in the entire way of choice in many lives—the indolent drifting through existence, allowing whatever is nearest to attach itself and accumulate about me. The place upon which a man is born can be fairly accurately summed up by the necessities he drops about the gift of a noble life.

In the study of literature as a study of divination can yield the fruit of a thorough inquiry into a writer's unstudied preferences. The entire work of any writer will give up in such investigation a general trend of feeling, an intimate bias toward certain forces of life.

No two great writers could be chosen to point a more definite contrast in this matter than SHELLEY and PATER: both of them were extraordinarily alert to impressions of color, odor, and music, and yet their choices were directly discrepant. It is impossible to go over the bulk of SHELLEY's work without seeing his longing always for clear, bright light, and his feeling that any half shadows, any veiling of light, any indefinite tones in color, were related to the illusory nature of mortal life, its mutability, its limitation, its transience. The quivering vapors of moonlight, dim, misty days, or the star-enveloped darkness awaken his mourning note, his laments over the irrevocable past, the unrecuperable won. The moon was "like a dying blue, lone and pale," or "pale for weariness of climbing heaven," or "was, with diminished beams, climbing the azure steep." But wherever SHELLEY sang of the future, of liberty, truth, or conquering wisdom, then pure, white light and brilliant color prevailed. Thus he sang "the unpavilioned heavens," "aerial, golden light," "the thunder-smoke of dawn," sudden lightning flashes, and the burning stars of the aethers. Even the Lady who watered the Sensitive Plant sprinkled "bright waters," and the skyward sang in the "golden lightning of the sunken sun," and the sun's tones was bound with a "burning noon." Oddly enough, in connection with this comes the fact that SHELLEY, of all poets, is the one to see himself, in The Dream, gathering black flowers, and this quite evidently with a genuine satisfaction, as if Nature had aimed upon possible charms. It seems not an unreasonable if one refers upon the power of black to throw out all surrounding colors into high light.

SHELLEY was a very rare combination of great poet and great moralist. He demanded that the Church Triumphant be lowered to earth, that the flooding light of full knowledge and liberty be poured upon us freely. An interesting analogy occurs in THOMAS KNOTT'S Apollon Daphne, where Pegasus yawns to show the moral decision forced upon her. She says:

"O, I am sick at heart; the eye of day,
The insistent summer sun, seems pitiless,
Shining in all the barren crannies
Of weary life: leaving no shade, no dark."

In contrast with SHELLEY stands PATER, with his overcast shrinking from all bright light. Above all, an æsthetic dreamer, desiring a life of high distinguished beauty, free from ugly defects and petty details. PATER took refuge in the vague and wraith-hall lights in which a man may see what he chooses, and avoid the general glare of existence. "Color," he says, "is no more delightful quality of natural things, but a spirit upon them by which they become expressive to the spirit." And the colors out of which he continually made harmonies of prose are yellow and gray.

A way of gold through the darkness, the color of a basket of crab apples, the diluted English sunlight over soft coral beds, the gentle yellowness of the autumnal and autumnal colors in the human skin, the honey color of hair, the shaft lights of growing in morning day, certain shadowy changes wrought on lace wall or ceiling, the brown light of the rain-swelled cloud, the gray immensity of sea over through the autumn twilight are the selected colors he sings in a prose as harmonious as any poet's numbers.

PATER seems to have striven to the merest issues of his time such as he saw. And as to his— "is an uncertain twilight." There is something lost and defined in its translucent faith; and PATER told kindly the charm of secrecy and silence. The profound thought, the rarest emotion, escapes the venture of words.

As we turn the pages of PATER's volumes and tell of his hero, one by one, we find them of the same fold.

BORTHWICK lived in "a middle world in which men take no side in great conflicts, and decide no great causes, and make no great reforms—condemned perpetually by the shadow upon them of great things from which they shrink." The Venus stands in a world in which "the light is cold—more useless than . . . Men go forth to their labors until the evening, but she is awake before then, and you might think the sorrow in her face was not the thought of the whole long day of labor to come." And again he notes that BORTHWICK paints "never without the shadow of death in the gray flesh and worn flowers."

He tells of MICHAEL ANGEL, that "he loved the very quiver of URBINO, the strange gray peaks which even at midday carry into any scene from which they are visible something of the loneliness and stillness of evening—wondering among them till at last, 'their pale, ashen colors passed into his painting.'"

MARIA, dying in a stranger's bed, still from his death-bed takes solace in the dark beauty of the regions round him, "the street—sunrise and placid spaces of evening."

SERAPHTAS, whose one may think of an expressing a kind of weariness and exclusiveness belonging to PATER himself, "preferred winter to summer: watching pleasantly how the colors fled out of the sky."

In GASTON, the last of the wonderful line, there was no certain appetite for darkness, "he n dined place—albeit with some suspicion of a preference for darkness." He loved the Cathedral of Chartres, "a dim, spacious, fragrant place about with golden lights."

However little such choice may denote the man of action, it is so vague or primitive soul that can see about the glare of day and live in less issues with vague fancies, prevailing which shift and mix and half define themselves and fade again, to whom a dream that lingers as transient before dawn, a breath, a flower in the doorway, a feather in the wind, an accidental play of light or shadow falling thence some trivial thing can bring a dream so profound that it awakens in others the sense of the diagonal forces at play about the soul of man.

THE STATUE OF FREDERICK THE GREAT, PRESENTED TO AMERICA BY EMPEROR WILLIAM, AND UNVEILED
AT WASHINGTON, NOVEMBER 19

The statue of Frederick the Great, presented to America by Emperor William, was unveiled on November 19 in Washington. The ceremonies attending the unveiling were elaborate. Special representatives of the Kaiser were present, together with the entire Hydrantic Corps, officers of the army and navy, and a military escort. President Roosevelt delivered an address accepting the gift. The statue stands on the esplanade of the new Army War College at the Washington Barracks.

Japanese Officers observed in a Ridge Parallel before Port Arthur

On the Summit of Taikouan, one of the Peaks at Port Arthur, looking toward the City—the Japanese captured Russian guns now used by the Japanese

THE FIRST PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN OF SCENES IN AND AROUND PORT ARTHUR DURING THE PRESENT SIEGE

These photographs, together with those on the opposite page, were taken by the Japanese during the present siege of the Russian stronghold. The photographs were taken by the Japanese during the present siege of the Russian stronghold. The photographs were taken by the Japanese during the present siege of the Russian stronghold.

These photographs taken at Port Arthur by Japanese soldiers. Copyright 1904 by Universal & Underwood Co. N. Y.

General Noyl and his officers feasting at the Japanese Headquarters before Port Arthur. A Welsh Bannan shell dominates the lunch table. This Photograph was taken October 9.

General Amazo and his staff in an underground dug 100 Yards from the Russian Trenches at Port Arthur

THE FIRST PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN OF SCENES IN AND AROUND PORT ARTHUR DURING THE PRESENT SIEGE

For Photographs in the at Port Arthur by Louis Blumstein Copyright, 1904, by Underwood & Lothrop and N. Y.

How a Great Merger is Handled in Wall Street

By James F. Everett

THE "merger" which has been recently voted almost unanimously by the shareholders of the tobacco companies for fusing them into one corporation is the greatest operation of its kind ever carried out in Wall Street. It does not differ in kind from some smaller mergers, but involves such large amounts of capital and such a variety of securities that the clerical work and the supervision of the records go beyond anything in the previous history of American finance.

Exactly what is a "merger," or perhaps the first question which would be asked by an outsider not familiar with Wall Street methods. It is a new word, even in dictionaries which are comparatively up to date. It means, in Wall Street parlance, that two or more corporations are brought into one. This does not involve any change in physical properties, which often include a dozen or more separate mills and factories, but involves a material change in their legal status. In spite of current foliosations against "trusts," the original of the trust has long ceased to exist. The trust in its legal sense was a deposit on the securities of several corporations in the hands of trustees, who administered the trust for the benefit of all. This was followed by the "holding company," which was organized as a distinct corporation but whose chief function of but its only one, was to hold the stocks of these

On the type of the holding company was the Consolidated Tobacco Company, which held the bulk of the common stock of the Thomas F. Weston, President of the American Tobacco Company.

American Tobacco Company and the Continental Tobacco Company. Under the new arrangement it is proposed to "merge" these three companies into one compact corporation under the name of the American Tobacco Company. An important result will be a change in the status of the four per cent. bonds of the Consolidated Company, which will be reduced in amount by one-half. The remaining half will be represented by six per cent. preferred stock in the new company, which will have the advantage of paying a higher rate of interest than the bonds, although heavily coming after the bonds in the way which they will have upon the gigantic earnings of the company. The Consolidated Company in 1910 was able to pay the interest on all its bonds and keep a surplus in the treasury of more than $10,000,000. About this amount was distributed in dividends the previous year upon the capital of the company, but was held this year with a view to strengthening the hands of the company in carrying out the merger.

The four per cent. bonds of the Consolidated Tobacco Company amounted to $157,578,200. These were only a part, however, of the outstanding securities of the three companies, which included eight per cent. preferred stock of the American Tobacco Company, seven per cent. preferred stock of the Continental Tobacco Company, common stock of the Consolidated Company, common stock of the American Company, and common stock of the Continental Company. This variety of securities is now to be converted into four new types—six per cent. gold bonds, which will be paid to take up the preferred stock of the Continental and American companies; four per cent. gold

Levi P. Weston and H. H. Francis, President and Secretary of the American Tobacco Company, which is carrying through the greatest merger ever undertaken in Wall Street.

Charles H. Allen at his desk in the Marine Trust Company Office

Charles A. Conant, Treasurer of the Marine Trust Company

bonds to replace those of the same type of the Consolidated Company, six-per-cent, preferred stock to take the place of one-half of the old four-per-cent, bonds, and common stock of the new company, which will take the place of the common stock of the three old companies.

The new securities proposed foot up about $255,000,000, not including the reserved right of the new American Company to issue additional common stock. The old securities to be retired amount to $262,500,000, so that there will be a contraction of about $10,000,000 in the present volume of outstanding securities. The totals of the securities to be received and issued represent, therefore, more than $260,000,000. This figure, however, large as it is, conveys only a vague idea of the amount of work falling upon the Marine Trust Company, which is acting as trustee for the tobacco companies. The work is to be simplified by first issuing receipts for the old securities surrendered and after a certain date substituting the new securities for the receipts. This is the method usually employed in carrying out such transactions, and avoids the confusion of attempting to deal with the whole problem at one time. In exchanging six types of old securities for four types of new, sixty-four different stocks and bonds will be used.

In order to guard against mistakes, which would be awkward in cases involving millions of dollars, every security exchanged passes through at least a dozen hands and processes of verification. With every four-per-cent bond, for instance, which is presented for conversion, must be instructions in writing as to change. If the holder desires in exchange, if he presents stocks, he must specify whether he wishes fractions which do not represent a complete share, to be paid for in cash or whether for an additional fraction of the type of these tickets to represent the six classes of securities subject to conversion, such bearing the name of the owner of the security, his address, the amount deposited, what he is to get, and whether a check for fractions is to be received or paid. The second process is the verification of the securities surrendered as to the correctness of the assignments. The next step is the verification of the amount of the securities and the making out of a special form of schedule. The numbers on all the blank forms are the same for each transaction, so that in case of necessity it can be quickly identified by number.

As soon as the verification of the securities is complete, a ticket is made out, showing the amount due one way or the other. The papers then go to a fourth clerk, who verifies all the computations made by those who have previously handled the papers, and tears off part of the ticket, showing the state of the account. Next the papers go to a bookkeeping man, who writes up all the facts relating to the securities deposited, showing at a glance the history of each individual deposit. The sixth link in the chain is the man who draws checks for dividends and fractions. Then comes the seventh link, represented by a clerk who draws the certificates of deposit which are to be issued in exchange for the incoming securities. There are six of these classes of certificates, representing the different types of securities surrendered. The eighth man simply perforates each certificate with the amount which it represents, and the next one rubs the blank spaces which have been left around the amounts, so that nothing can be added.

The papers then go to the secretary or an assistant secretary for signature. They are signed in blank by one of the vice-presidents, but the final signature of the secretary or an assistant is only added after the process of verification have been gone through. Even the signing officer makes a memorandum of the amounts of the certificates which he signs, in order to see that they prove up with the more formal records kept by the clerks. The papers then go to another clerk, who verifies every completed part and certificate of deposit to see that the amounts in all cases

A corner of a vault stored with retired bonds, each of which represents a value of $1000

Checks at Wash. on the Details of the Tobacco Mergers are being carried through by the Morton Trust Company ages. This is the final process of verification. The twelfth man simply separates the certificates according to whether they are to be handed out over the counter or sent by mail. They are mailed with return receipts so that at every step track can be kept of their origin, then course in the company, and their destination.

Many are the puzzling questions which come before the trust company officers for decision. In each case where four per cent bonds are surrendered, the holder has to be asked in what manner he wishes to exercise his option to take one-half in new bonds and one-half in preferred stock. If he is a man of habitual drunkenness he always takes the option to receive even if he wishes to hold bonds and not stock, he can sell his stock amounting and buy bonds amounting to a block of ten bonds, representing a par value of $10,000, he would simply throw away $1250 by taking all bonds. Then as this is to the detriment, there are cases where the conservative holder of the old bonds has come in and asked for new bonds, by losing the option to take six per cent preferred stock. The officers of the trust company make it their business to point out to him the disadvantage of pursuing such a course and in most cases have no difficulty in convincing him, but in case of obstinacy they have no option but to give a man his property in the form in which he prefers it.

Every certificate issued for the deposit of bonds and stock must bear the authentic signature of two officers of the Morton Trust Company. Under a ruling of the Stock Exchange every bond for $1000 has to be represented by a separate receipt in order to constitute good delivery on the exchange. It was at first hoped that the Exchange would accept receipts in bulk—that is, a man with $100,000 in bonds could take a single receipt for the amount. Under the ruling for a separate receipt, the signatures required in the case of the four per cent bonds alone will be 217,356. Each bond calls for two signatures—one by a vice-president of the Morton Trust Company, and the other by the secretary or an assistant secretary. The number of signatures required has been keeping busy for days the higher officers of the company—Vice-presidents Allen and Corbiere, Secretary Francis, and Assistant Secretary Berry. Taking the bonds alone, at six signatures per minute, making 360 per hour, a working-day of seven hours of steady work without interruption would permit the signature of 2520 receipts. At that rate a month of twenty-five days would permit the signature of 63,000 receipts, and the entire job would be completed by two men in about two and a half months. This represents, however, only a small part of the signatures required, for it does not include the 2,000,000 old shares of the common stock and preferred stock and the final signatures on the new securities bond.

The nearest parallels to this operation have been the issues of the United States Steel stocks and the popular loan of $200,000,000 in three per cents, made by the government during the war with Spain. In the case of the Steel stocks, however, the undertaking was absolutely so large that it was distributed among two or more trust companies, each company taking in only the securities of one or more of the merged institutions. The history of the government loan was graphically told in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1918. It appeared that allotments of bonds were made to the number of 232,221 in amounts of $300 or less, and to the number of 88,092 in larger allotments. This required the handling of about 320,000 separate items, although subsequently the bonds offered back into the hands of barely more than one thousand holders. The act authorizing the bond issue set aside one-tenth of one per cent, of the amount for the expenses of the operation, but this amount was found inadequate. The series was organized in a systematic manner by Assistant-Secretary Van derlip, and in order to handle the awards as much as possible several scores of temporary clerks were enlisted. The total cost of handling the bids and distributing the bonds was $292,956, of which $160,000 was expended for temporary clerks, $48,356 for engraving and plate printing, and $10,578 for the item of bond-paper alone. An effort has been made yet to figure up the cost of the tobacco merger, but according to the usual rule that private business is done more economically than public business it will probably be kept well within the cost of the government bond issue.

The Answer

By Louise Morgan Sill

TELL me no more that once you loved me well,
For love is still immortal, and its day
Dies not in night, but at the evening bell
It flames anew, and drives the dusk away.

Nor tell me that you love me still despite
Some passing tribute to another heart.
For love demands the rapture to requite,
And asking all, disdains the lesser part.

Ah, speak no more of love not in your ken.
Love is a joy that first to lovers seems Too subtle for reality, and then
Too real, too potent, too divine for—dreams.

THE END OF THE FOOTBALL SEASON—A SH AT THE YALE-PRINCETON

The most important football game of the season in the East was decided on November 12, as Princeton was the last game of the season for Princeton. Yale ended her football year with the annual contest with Army-Navy game at Philadelphia on November 26. The football championship this year is undecided, by some that they should be credited with supremacy over Yale, which was defeated by West Point.

of Yale tackling Riner of Princeton, with Shewlin of Yale running up

Photograph by Postfield

AP-SHOT OF THE SPECTATORS AND PLAYERS IN GAME AT PRINCETON

When the Yale eleven defeated Princeton by a score of 12 to 0. Nearly 30,000 persons were present. It was Harvard on Saturday, November 19. The football season in the East will be brought to a close with the University of Pennsylvania eleven has an unbroken record of victories, and for this reason it is claimed the question will have to remain open, however, as no game has been scheduled between the two teams.

Digitized by Google

is conducted by the department of conciliation. When its good offices are requested by one of the parties in a dispute, it ascertains indirectly whether a conference would be agreeable to the other side. If a conference is declined, the action of the conciliation committee ceases. But if the overture is favorably received it becomes comparatively easy to bring representatives of the two parties together. The mode of personal contact, experience shows, facilitates amicable settlement of difficulties. Of the 126 cases treated by the conciliation committee, eighty-two applications originated with employers and seventy-four with wage-workers. The work of this department is often of so delicate a nature that publicity would do harm. Hence much of its successful work is unknown to the public, and is duly appreciated only by the parties directly interested. Thus it happens that the public, which always receives an abundance of information about a strike, may hear nothing at all about the inner negotiations which resulted in its settlement. In this respect the conciliation committee has the prevention of a strike that would have caused enormous inconvenience and incalculable loss.

An accurate and detailed history of all the work involved in the cases treated by this department would require a volume. It will suffice to cite a few that will illustrate the national scope of this work, the value of its results, and the methods employed in their accomplishment.

The five-year contract of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association with the Telegraphers' Union was in jeopardy on the day of rupture on account of a serious misunderstanding in a Western office. This contract was regarded as a model in some respects, and since the presidents of both organizations were members of the National Executive Committee of the Civic Federation, naturally an extra effort was made to prevent the threatened rupture. The effort was entirely successful. One of the difficulties, however, that developed in working under the contract was the inability to agree upon an umpire when any dispute had gone to arbitration. This matter was left for future conferences, by an amendment being made to the contract, referring the selection of the odd arbitrator to the National Civic Federation in all cases where the parties were unable to agree upon one.

An official of a transcontinental railway, with offices in San Francisco, wired the Telegraphers' Union that the National Civic Federation that a strike of the longshoremen was threatened at Iberia, Louisiana. It was soon learned from the headquarters of the International Longshoremen's Association at Detroit, that the president was fortunately at that time in San Francisco. He was promptly contacted, and was asked to call upon the railway official. This he did, and within six hours from the receipt of the first message an order had been issued postponing the strike until an investigation had been made by the International president, that investigation resulting in a settlement of the grievance. The marchants' throughout the system of the Southern Railway Company. The president of the Marchants' International Association asked the good offices of the Civic Federation in securing an audience with the president of the railway company. This conference was brought about, and a satisfactory settlement resulted.

The threatened strike on the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad last year, which for about two or three weeks seemed almost inevitable, and which filled the news columns of the daily papers for several days, was averted by a conference arranged by the president of the Civic Federation (then J. P. Morgan, one of the directors of the road, at his residence, and F. E. Clark, Grand Chief of the Order of Railway Firemen). At this conference, which lasted over two hours, Mr. Morgan went carefully with Mr. Clark into every detail of the situation, and took steps which brought about a settlement of the controversy.

In the preliminary work leading up to the settlement of the great New York Building Trades lockout last year, the conciliation committee of the Civic Federation took an active but quiet part, and finally brought about the joint conference of the thirty employers' organizations and the thirty unions involved in the controversy. This conference was presided over by the New York chairman of the Civic Federation Committee. Many times since has the Civic Federation been similarly called upon, and the chairman of the Board of Governors of the Employers' Association has repeatedly and publicly testified.

In the strike of the Marine Trades' Union against the New York Metal Trades' Association, which at one time involved the whole ship-building industry of New York, a conference was brought about by the Civic Federation, at which an arbitration agreement for one year was reached. This was renewed for another year.

A very bitter controversy arose between the Associated Brewers of New York and vicinity and the Brewery Workers' Union, threatening a boycott, strike, and lockout. The contending parties came to an agreement among themselves to refer the questions in dispute to arbitration. The Associated Brewers preferred that the matter should be decided by labor men exclusively, and called upon the Civic Federation to furnish arbitrators, which was done, and the decision was satisfactory to both sides, the Associated Brewers winning their contention.

An illustrative example of successful conciliation is shown in the matter of the negotiation between the organizations of employers and workers which contain ninety-five per cent. of all the rapid and labor involved and employed in the lithographic industry. These two forces were at a deadlock over the demand by the employers for an arbitration to settle the question of the employment of the laborers in a surrender of the right to strike upon any question, and that had been answered by several new demands on the part of the workers. The services of the conciliation committee being requested by an officer of the employers' association, negotiations were begun that resulted in the signing of a trade agreement in April, 1904, that included a provision for arbitration and a section providing compliance with demands. Some of the differences of the representatives of the two sides were so long as to reach the point of physical exhaustion, one of them at which the chairman of the conciliation committee presided lasting eight days.

A conference, suggested through the efforts of the Civic Federation, averted, in June, 1904, a strike of organized teamsters that would have tied up every truck in New York and caused untold inconvenience and distress throughout the city. The International Brotherhood of Teamsters declined to recognize the union, and the exclusive employment of members of their organization. The Truck Drivers' Association refused to recognize the union at all. A strike was imminent, when the secretary of the Truck Drivers' Association invited the chairman of the conciliation committee of the New York Civic Federation to revise the situation. Two face-to-face extended conferences were sufficient—although the situation contained elements of bitterness—to reach a year's contract as to wages, hours, and conditions of work, the truck owners agreeing not to discriminate against union drivers and the drivers agreeing not to discriminate in handling any merchandise.

Conferences brought about by the Civic Federation in the summer and fall of 1904 prevented trouble between the theatrical managers of New York and the unions of musicians and theatrical employees who would have been involved in the strike resulting from the Metropolitan Opera House to the rural "one night stand." Instead, a harmonious agreement was reached, and such prominent managers as Messrs. Comed, Manager, Erlanger, and Hayman became enthusiastic advocates of applying the principle of trade agreements to the production of public entertainments, while both theatrical managers and the organized musicians and stage-hands expressed their gratification at the result.

The good offices of the conciliation committee have been invited by one party or the other in many street-railway controversies, as in the following instances: A strike threatened to tie up the entire system of street-railways in San Francisco, but was averted by a conference in the New York offices of the National Civic Federation, between the owners of the road and the presidents of the Amalgamated Association of Street-Railway Employees. All points of difference were agreed upon excepting two, and they were submitted to arbitration, with the vice-president of the National Civic Federation as the third arbitrator. Through conferences secured by this committee, both in New York and New Orleans, a threatened strike on the street-railway in New Orleans was averted, and contracts were signed between the contending parties. Other conferences secured by the Civic Federation prevented street-railway strikes in Jersey City, Newark, Trenton, Pittsburgh, Newburgh, and other cities. The Union Traction Company of Chicago was faced with a crisis in the company of the city of Chicago, and a committee of the new to discuss grievances. Application to the New York office of the National Civic Federation resulted in the Chicago members of the executive committee bringing about a conference which prevented a strike. Both sides publicly give the Civic Federation credit for settling the matter.

Probably no clearer example of the value of conciliation and conference could be given than their employment in relation to the Elevated and Subway systems of transit in New York city. When the Elevated and Subway systems of transit in New York city were organized, and no one seemed willing to listen to the committees representing the men. The employees were impatient and restless because of these delays, when the Civic Federation secured them a conference with the managers of the road. This resulted in a contract for one year, which was renewed at its expiration this spring.

The opening of the Subway, however, introduced a new series of difficulties to be met. But the fact that August Belmont, president of the Interborough Company, and Messrs. Mahon, Stone, and Wilson, president of the three labor organizations involved, were all members of the executive committee of the National Civic Federation, opened the way to conference and agreement.

The welfare department educates the public as to the meaning and value of welfare work, which is especially to be given consideration for physical comfort wherever labor is performed; opportunities for recreation, educational opportunities, and the providing of suitable sanitary homes. Plans for saving and lending money, insurance, and pensions are also included in welfare work.

The department interests employers in giving special attention to the physical or mental welfare of their employees, through conferences, the publication of reports, and of illustrated articles in the Federation's organs, the Monthly.

It has requested a consulting agency to be furnished to study the particular needs of employees in a given plant, to advise the best way of introducing such methods of welfare work as may be deemed essential, and to direct their installation. When desired a permanent agent or welfare manager to administer the work is recommended. A central bureau is maintained to furnish information relative to the success or failure of experiments in this work, the causes of either, and with reference to the latest efforts of employers in this direction. Some of the subjects covered are: Sanitary work; housing; social rooms; health; hospitalities; recreation; education; devices; housing of labor; pensions; insurance associations.

All the educational activities of the National Civic Federation recognize the proposition that its fundamental work is not merely the prevention or settlement of strikes or questions, but its deeper work reaches to the underlying causes of industrial disturbances.

The Civic Federation promotes its work of education through (Continued on page 1812.)

A NEW PORTRAIT OF MISS ETHEL BARRYMORE

Miss Barrymore, who was last seen in New York in "Cousin Kate," is appearing at the Hudson Theatre in a new play by Thomas Russell entitled "Sunday," a story of life in a Western mining-camp

Plays and Players in New York

By James L. Ford

THE ever-changing conditions of our national life are so sharply accentuated by the swift metropolitan pace as to multiply the difficulties encountered by the dramatists in no less than the resulting targets symbolizing the popular taste. Consequently, however, a lucky man has no sooner struck the bull's eye than a host of imitators arise to appropriate a share of his reward, provided he be not clever enough to keep to himself the secret of his success.

Two recent examples of successful theatrical marksmanship are to be found in the persons of Mr. George Ade and Mr. A. H. Woods, both of whom were shrewd in lucky enough to take advantage of certain entirely new conditions which materially affected the popular taste.

Mr. Ade came along with some easy and original American humor at the very instant when the public had had its fill of French and German later, warmed over for American production. Mr. Woods is the manager of the Windsor Theatre, and is appealing with such success to an audience that has come into existence only within the past decade and whom he addresses with melodramas of a kind quite unlike those usually seen in the up-town theatres.

Both Mr. Ade and Mr. Woods are victims to have many imitators, and already the failure of "Bird Center" shows how far astray a shaft may get that is aimed with the unvisionary aim of ignorance or incompetence at a bull's eye which is still vibrating with the true ring from such an effective bolt as "The County Chairman."

In the history of the Windsor Theatre, which just entered upon a new life under the skilled direction of Mr. Woods, we may read also something of the racial history of the densely populated East Side. As the Stadt Theatre, it was the earliest home of German theatre and opera in New York. It was here that the great Davison played, and it was here, too, that Janineck was first discovered and reaped for our stage. Wassel took over and lived here, and it is from this house that he went to the Academy of Music to take the town by storm with his high "t" in "Di quella jura" in the glad and simple days of Nilsson, Santley, and Caprai, and when Wagner, interpreted by Theodore Thomas, was just beginning to make himself heard in the Central Park gardens.

A quarter of a century ago there was no immense German population on the lower East Side. The old Bowery Theatre, over the way from the Stadt, was reborned the Teutonic, and became the home of the Teutonic muse, as well as an adjunct to the beer bar of the Atlantic Garden situated next door and part of the same property. A clause in the theatre lease stipulated that the English language was not to be spoken from its stage, the owner of the two buildings knowing perfectly well that the throat framed for gutturals was suited also to the consumption of beer.

About the time that the Bowery became the Thalia Theatre, the Stadt was converted into the Windsor by John A. Stevens and Frank H. Martin, who saw in the increasing native population of the East Side—the theatre was now beginning to move up town—a scheme to reconvert the same as theatregoers as characterized by local to the neighborhood as those who made up the audience of the Grand Opera House on the West Side. In the early days of their management they offered such attractions as "The Unknown" with Mr. Stevens, who is still alive and running Broadway, in the chief part; "Manzara," impersonated by a yellow-haired Englishman who called himself Maude Forrester, and weighed about a ton; and some of the Broadway attractions as could be induced to try what was considered then a rather risky experiment.

It was in this house, if my memory serves me right, that Buffalo Bill made his metropolitan debut in a play written for him by the late Colburn Printing firm, and it was here, too, as the audience grew larger and larger, that such stars as Lester Wallack, Clara Morris, and Robinson and Crane family came, and played to business that enabled their managers to make a great deal of money.

Then came the enormous flood of immigration of Russian and Polish Jews, before which the native residents retreated up-town, while the audiences of the Windsor grew smaller and smaller, until its managers were glad to lease it to a company of Yiddish players, who put upon its stage dramas of the kind that were already installed in the theatre grown larger and larger. For several years the Hebrew drama flourished in the old house, and then, for no apparent reason, the audience began to dwindle, while at the same time certain English-speaking houses on the Bowery grew more prosperous.

The truth of the matter was that the children of the Russian and Polish exiles had mastered the English language, and were eager to shake off the language, customs, prejudices, and racial quarrels of their forefathers and become Americans not only in speech, but in everything else as well. It is from this class that the audiences which fill the huge Windsor Theatre to its utmost capacity are drawn, and it is to its imaginative Oriental nature that such plays as "Fast Life in New York" and "Dealers in White Women" appeal with tremendous force.

We have only to visit the Windsor Theatre to realize how remote in every respect save that of distance alone some quarters of the town are from Broadway and Fifth Avenue. And certainly the community that finds its entertainment in this house is even less like either a Maude Adams or a Lester Carter following, let us say, than are the people who check their habes in the back rooms of the Brooklyn stock houses and tramp up on the stage for a peek too with the leading lady after every matinee.

Indeed, so far removed are these aliens from the better known and more fashionable quarters of the town that their dramatics are permitted to indulge in the wildest flights of fancy in the delineations of metropolitan life as it exists north of Eighth Street.

Thus in "Fast Life in New York," whereas the domestic position and Sumner Thorne's Hester Street apartment are portrayed with a reasonable degree of accuracy, the studio of the refined villainist is without a counterpart in the town, while Canfield's gambling establishment is as devoid of the ordinary paraphernalia of play as if it had just received a visit from Jesus, and is represented as a favorite meeting place for ladies and gentlemen in evening dress, waited on by waitresses in disguise. Moreover, the game of poker is played by the villain and an innocent lamb with a disregard of all rules and customs that would awaken the contempt and derision of almost any audience, save this one in the land.

"Dealers in White Women," which has already been seen elsewhere, but will do better here, permits even ruder and more central flights of the imagination than "Fast Life in New York."

A central figure is a Hindu doctor, the head of a band of evil-doers who go about kidnapping young and innocent girls and conveying them to a mysterious underground establishment, where they are placed in a huge steel cage and their attention is to the highest bidder. Among the doctor's accomplices are a very wicked lady called Karina, a young girl, a Chinese, and an American sailor, who, having been wounded at the battle of Manila, has become a complete tool of the doctor, who compels him to do his wicked bidding by causing certain bones to press upon that part of his brain which contains his moral sense. The abduction of two young girls is the chief motive in this play, and its dramatic incidents include the blowing up of the underground chamber, the auction sale of human flesh and blood, the horrible devilship of the conspirators, the murder of the wealthy but immoral husband of the lady robbery, and other scenes incident in pastoral as domestic life.

It may seem to the superficial observer that the success or failure of such efforts as I have described and on such a stage as that of the Windsor Theatre, are matters scarcely worthy of consideration. Their success, however, and the temperance of the audience that has arisen to greet them, have a significance that no real student of the drama will afford to ignore or despise. For while these rather primitive but always stirring plays attract very large audiences and hold them spellbound until the final curl of the curtain, even then one Broadway playhouse, presenting a drama that is infinitely better written and of much greater pretence, opens its doors nightly to an audience in which the paying element is fast a mere handful of the humankind.

There are altogether too many words in some of these related plays, although devoid count on Broadway as well as on the Boer. As for "Bird Center," it is probable that by the time these lines are printed it may have disappeared from our stage forever, but the story of why it failed is one that future generations of dreamers may read with profit.

It is astonishing, by the way, how keen the nostrils of upper Broadway are in sensing a failure from afar off. In the case of "Bird Center," the actors found themselves obliged to face an audience that came prepared to scoff rather than to be amused. To those who have not heard upon Mr. McArthur's witty and delightful book the attention that it deserves, it seemed incredible that even the most hardened dramatic ticket should succeed in robbing it completely of its charm. Its humor is so genuine, its characterization so distinct and original, and, above all, so well adapted to the stage that it seemed me in a word: "County Chairman" might reasonably be expected.

Now the only stupid character in the book is a mysterious Stranger, and Mr. Glen MacDonagh, the dramatist, seized upon him with unerring instinct as a suitable central figure for his play.

Ignoring the kindly, wholesome, and altogether neighborly spirit which pervades the village of Mr. McArthur's creation, resulting in turning his back upon the opportunities afforded by such colorful and so likely personages as Mr. McArthur's witty and delightful book the attention that it deserves, it seemed incredible that even the most hardened dramatic ticket should succeed in robbing it completely of its charm. Its humor is so genuine, its characterization so distinct and original, and, above all, so well adapted to the stage that it seemed me in a word: "County Chairman" might reasonably be expected.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

HAS Mr. George Meredith, grown puerile, or has he been caught napping in his dreamy old age by the wily interviewer? After so many years of dignified silence which has sheltered the privacy of his name and reputation with that of his peer, Mr. Thomas Hardy, and his younger contemporary, Mr. M. Barrie, it is pathetic to read the floundering and injudicious comments on mental and social institutions with which he has been credited lately. I have had conversations with friends of mine here and there with Mr. Meredith reported to me on various occasions during the last ten years, but none of these ever looked out into publicity, nor were they marked by any traces of senility. Mr. Meredith is at least more interesting and sagacious in his literary judgments and in his outlook on the future of literature, if not always sound and well balanced. What he had to say in a recent interview of the conditions of American literature may not have been profound, but his remarks were suggestive and indicative of his mental attitude towards us. The conversation which took place "over the incense" is reported verbatim.

"You have a high opinion of the future of America?"

Mr. Meredith. "The possibilities of American development are boundless."

"In literature?"

Mr. Meredith. "In everything. They are a great people."

"But has America ever produced a great writer?"

Mr. Meredith (personal). "No, not a great writer, but there you must emphasize 'great.' She has produced excellent writers, some of the best writers, but not great."

"She has not produced a great novelist?"

Mr. Meredith. "No. But again I say you must emphasize 'great.' Some of the best literature is American. Take Emerson. Emerson is a grand fellow. There is no more hopeful writer for young men than Emerson. He gives strength in the right direction, high ideals, noble thoughts. No better present could be given to a young man than Emerson's Essays."

"Do you mean in a literary or a moral sense?"

Mr. Meredith. "I mean in a moral sense; I mean for the moral development of youth. Emerson is a good man, a man of thoughtful mind."

"America has produced no great poet?"

Mr. Meredith. "No. But again emphasize 'great.'"

"What American writers besides Emerson first occur to you of the moral type?"

Mr. Meredith. "Lowell is excellent. Then there is Edgar Allan Poe. Edgar Allan Poe is the best writer of short stories we have. Bret Harte is good. Henry James is admirable."

"America has produced no great dramatist?"

Mr. Meredith. "No; but you must not be in a hurry. How old is America? How old are the other countries which have done great things? How long have they taken to do great things? America is young, very young. She is still growing. She has not reached maturity. You must give her time. Remember also that she cannot be making great manifestations in all directions at the same time. Her great manifestations at the present moment are in the direction of inventions. The Americans are the greatest inventors in the world. Her commercial manifestations are also great. She stands in the foremost rank."

"What will be her position in relation to other nations fifty years hence?"

Mr. Meredith. "Fifty years hence—twenty-five years hence—America will be the first nation in the world. America and Japan: these are the nations of the future." . . .

"To go back to American literature. Do you think America has produced a great stylist?"

Mr. Meredith. "No; you cannot have a great stylist in the English language."

"You ought not to say that."

Mr. Meredith. "But they say I am obscure."

"What is the language of style?"

Mr. Meredith (traditionally). "French. French. They are the stylists of the world. The language lends itself to style. The genius of the people is creative of style. Look at Chateaubriand, at Flaubert. Romanesque d'Espagne et de Jeuneur is the perfection of style. There is no style in the literature of France. French drama is excellent. There is a theatre of ideas in France. Think of that. Splendid!"

When Mr. Vincent Brown's powerful novel, A Mother's Husband, was published in the spring, certain sapient critics saw in the tragic dénouement a striking likeness to that in Mr. Hardy's Tess of the D'Urbervilles, and were not slow to charge Mr. Brown with what they believed was the source of inspiration for his good impression scene. I feared subsequently from a friend to whom Mr. Brown imparted the information that the idea of the book came to him from a terrible personal experience, and, strangely enough, I have just heard that Tess also had its inception in an actual experience of Mr. Hardy's boyhood. His Tess came to be written has never before been told in print. I have the story from Mr. Neil Munro, to whom the circumstances were narrated by a personal friend of Mr. Hardy's, living in Dorchester. When Hardy was a boy, he used to come into Dorchester in school, and he was the acquaintance of a woman there, who, with her husband, kept an inn. She was beautiful, good, and kind, but married in a dissipated household, who was unfaithful to her. One day, when the cup of her misery was overflowing, she discovered her husband under circumstances which so roused her passion that she stabbed him with a knife and killed him. She was tried, convicted, and condemned to execution. On the morning of her execution, young Hardy, with another boy, came into Dorchester and witnessed the execution from a tree that overhung the yard in which the gallows was placed. The scene impressed itself indelibly on the boy's memory. He saw the woman who had been his friend, and had done him many kindnesses, led forth by the warders, and the rustle of a thin black gown she was wearing was forever after in his memory. A penetrating rain was falling; the white cap was no longer over his head, and the rain had so wet it that it clung to the features, and the nose was put around the neck of what looked like a marble statue. Hardy looked at the scene with a strange illusion of its being unreal, and was only brought in his complete senses when the darkness fell, and his conclusion as a lover branch of the tree fell fainting to the ground. This tragedy and the domestic story that led up to it haunted Hardy, and at last provided the emotional inspiration and some of the matter for Tess of the D'Urbervilles.

Austin Hardly McCarthy
Author of "The Lady of Loyalty House"

In The Lady of Loyalty House Mr. Austin Hardly McCarthy has set out our common notion of the Puritan as a miserable, unemotional creature, and has made his Roundhead hero as gay and romantic as any bearded darling of the Cavalier and Charles's court. And he has made him real, too, else he would not have succeeded in capturing the reader as well as the fair Lady Brilliana. The story is related in a series of dramatic scenes, breathless in interest and picturesque in treatment, which suggests an eye to the stage, and I presume it will eventually arrive there.

Myers, DeLoar, Burton and Collins (from left to right), and Gracie Quinlan, in a scene from "The College Widow"

The Meeting between "Bolton" (Fred Truesdell) and his rival, "Larrabee" (E. J. Davenport)—the "College Widow" (Dorothy Tennant) in the Background

SCENES FROM GEORGE ADE'S PLAY, "THE COLLEGE WIDOW," AT THE GARDEN THEATRE

Mr. Ade's play, which is having a successful run at the Garden Theatre, New York, tells an amusing story of life in a small college town. The story revolves around the football rivalry of two provincial colleges, in which the president's attractive daughter, known as "the college widow," induces a certain cock-brained half-back to become a student at "Auster," where he wins a game from the rival team of "Brimham," which his father is backing. The climax of the action occurs when "Bolton" (the half-back) learns that the "college widow" has hoodwinked him into entering the wrong college, causing his father to lose his money on the rival eleven.

MISS GRACE WASSALL, A NEW AMERICAN COMPOSER

Miss Wassall's new "Shakespearean Song Cycle" was sung last week by Madame Godski, Mr. Bingham, Miss Marguerite Hall, and Mr. Kelly Cole at Carnegie Hall, New York

Correspondence

WHAT HAST THY SERVANT DONE?

NEW YORK CITY, November 12, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—Actuated by a fear that you may have failed to observe it, I put out to you that the sinister effect of the workings of a certain class of independent editors has been previously ascribed by the wise correspondent of the tribune, whose communication was honored by a repetition in your columns.

After pursuing a fruitless search for an adequate explanation of the appalling catastrophe precipitated without warning upon our devoted lands, I have been led to credit the above-said learned correspondent with a profundity of wisdom and a depth of penetration that I confess I was not at the time disposed to accord him. While the brazen temerity of the Democratic press in presuming to govern Republican infidelity or to dominate intimate relation with the Providence which rules us, unobtruded (mis-constructed, I formerly thought) by our worthy correspondent as mendacity, most undeniably share the responsibility for the disaster, it cannot in any considerable degree suffice to account for the magnitude of its proportions.

What shall we say to thee, then, thou Prince of Independent Editors (with whatever apologies may be due Mr. Charles Francis Adams), whose lurid shafts, speeding often in the deceptive guise of friendliness, or perhaps even more frequently winging their pathless way in open hostility, but always piercing our sore rose and too thin shield, wrought our ignominious downfall? What shall we say, then, as, miserably recovering from the terrific blow which prostrated us among ruins of fair hopes, gazing sadly at the ghastly devastation surrounding us, we venture to cast timid and repulsive glances at these causes which even in the most minute way contributed to the sweeping power of the nerveless tempest? Shall we not, rising to the heights of the dramatic, with the feeble voice left us, exclaim: He Thou, A.—I.

But no. The enormity of the crime does transcend the human bounds set by the weakness of our earthly justice, stills the unavailing voice of the denunciator, leaving as his sole resource that resignation of impotence with which one contemplates the colossal form of a monster, so hopelessly gigantic as by no conceivable exertion of human indignity or courage he is possible to smother or quell it, and he fervently thanks a frowning heaven which vouchsafed a seer to discover the odious and pitiful presence, than we may evermore beware of it.

In the hour of our enlightenment, therefore, let us heed you, when the conflict shall be renewed, be either for us or against us. It matters not which, for so both our peoples speak. We hath set a duty for the proof, and who now doubts that the proof hath not been forthcoming? I am, sir,

A SUBVERSIVE DEMOCRAT.

FOR A SOUND PLATFORM

FAIR CHANCE, N. J., November 10, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—Announcing the efforts of two leading New York editors to explain how it all happened, without admitting that they have lost practically all influence with their readers. The journalist, who confides his news estimates to what is "it to print" and reserves the right to editorially make denial of proof insinuations of blackmail, would have us believe that Democratic votes divided the result in New York State, the independent votes of all readers having been cast in accord with his views. On the other hand, the greatest living journalist, whose news estimates were fouled with the disgraceful fake story, constructed for many weeks, and whose editorial columns lured with open letters to the President, holds that it was the independent vote that did it. Neither of these great news estimates is the father of your savings, but, unless they came forward with proof of their charges, they themselves would rest under a cloud. Their readers, however, evidently saw the point, and voted for "no housing."

Can't you do something to escape these humiliating wrangles? May it not be that they had some influence with their readers, after all, and that, had it not been for their desperate efforts, the people would have made it unanimous? And what would we have done then without "an opposition"?

You have the secret of a veritable opposition—Ye Aukman! Let the words which down the wind, about the big dome across the bridge to the bird that did soar, but is sore, and back to the new tower on Forty-second Street. Three great editors will listen to you now. I am, sir,

S. W. WILLIAMS.

MR. WATSON IN ARKANSAS

LARK VILLAGE, ARK., November 7, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—You cannot, you state, understand how a man of Mr. Watson's apparent intelligence can want the kind of money he argues for, which you declare is bad money. And you in emphasis the fact that such is the opinion of an admirer and sincere believer in Watson, his honesty, patriotism, and judgment, I reply by stating that I cannot begin to understand how the patriotic, brilliant editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY can advocate that monetary system which is so dear to a few thousand plutocrats, and therefore necessarily opposed to the interests of the millions of real wealth producers, throughout this broad land. Do not think that I would draw you into a discussion of the money question, for has it not been decreed that it is for the present "settled" I believe, in conclusion, I must say that I regard the money trust as the greatest of all trusts, so big, in fact, that political parties say around it as one would a yawning chasm. It is generally regarded as such a complex problem that ordinary minds should not dare approach it, and it may be true that it is hard to understand, still to my plain mind it has long since resolved itself into the proposition: a struggle between those who are out of debt, and having accumulated wealth are interested in such policy as makes the dollar buy much, and on the other hand, those who are in debt, have yet to accumulate, are interested in such policy as will make the product of their toil buy much.

I am, sir,

FOSMATE FORT.

A BUSINESS MAN'S COMPLIMENT

NOTICE HERMICK, MAINE, December 3, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—Your notification of the expiration of my subscription to HARPER'S WEEKLY just received. How quickly time slips away when one is amused, and the WEEKLY has been a constant source of amusement, especially during the prosecution of the political campaign so gloriously ended yesterday. As I am an ardent Republican, and always glad to have my pet publications in vogue with my views, I am very much in hopes to find that Mr. Harvey will subscribe to the almost unanimous verdict rendered at the polls yesterday, and constantly sustain with his trenchant pen our cause. I started out to say in a few words that I wish to renew my subscription. Pardon me for the divergence.

I am, sir,

WILLIAM B. TORY,
Treasurer of the North Berwick Company.

"THE GOD OF BATTLES"

KNOWVILLE, TENN., November 7, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I will bet you four dollars to a Parker badge that the man that signed "Constant Reader" to that "God of Battles" letter in the last WEEKLY is Mark Twain. I spotted him before I was half-way through the first paragraph, and feel I should afterward be repaid as having bet on a sure thing. I want to tell you that I also spotted the same man under another alias when he was publishing his Joan of Arc story in the MASSACHUSETTS, and you money on it. I am, sir,

A CONSTANT READER.

[The original "Constant Reader" requests us to express his gratification at having been taken for Mark Twain.—EDITOR.]

FOR AN INDEPENDENT PRESS

BRONXVILLE, N. Y., November 8, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I presume your flattering remarks about the New York Times was written before you read their editorial of November 4, 5, 6, 7. I cannot conceive why the press of New York and papers that it is common knowledge are supported in the main by the public readers and advertisers should take the license that they have in this campaign. And to make it appear more ridiculous, after the people have emphatically paid their respects to the President and also to the press, and they come in double columns with advice in Mr. Roosevelt how to conduct the next campaign that they have even expressing doubts of his sincerity in his anti-election statement.

The Bronxville Eagle has practically apologized to its readers, but in the same issue lauds Mr. Parker.

Now Mr. Parker was deliberate in a campaign of evasion, misstatements, vilification, and general insinuation. The letter is proved by the criticism by Mr. Parker in his recent statement to the press and also the Bryan and Hearst vote-election articles. They are all a crazy lot, and the voters knew it all the time. In your issue of November 5 you deplore the absence of the tariff issue. Since that issue we have had an avalanche of that sort of thing from Mr. Cleveland; apparently that was all necessary to settle the matter. The silver issue was only hidden, as it now appears plainly. The Democrats worked everything else for all it was worth. They had the bulk of the press of New York with them.

I think a few words to a long-suffering public would be in order. You devoted considerable space to the professional courtesies of the occasion. How about the people that support the organ? There is altogether too much space allotted to editorial writers who fancy themselves superior to any criticism, and step right in where angels fear to tread. The reading public is entirely helpless except in expressing themselves in this way, which is my only object of writing into you. I have enjoyed the WEEKLY very much in this campaign. It was decent, mainly accurate, and always having the ring of truth—deliberately refreshing. Shall we ever have non-partisan papers? Do the people need editorial instruction? As it appears now would not the Democrats have made just as bad a mess of it as they did in Cleveland's second term?

I am, sir,

D. S.

His Masterpiece

By Stephen Chalmers

(To the memory of Verezhagin, the famous prisoner of war, who was on the Russian battleship "Pobeda," when she was sunk by striking a mine at Port Arthur on April 13.)

His brow was furrowed and his eyes were wet,
This!—this was war! No more the sailors' met,
Struggling ahead: no more the cross-trees locked,
And eaked men, repelling, held the deck,
While heavier hearts crawled where the great spars rocked
To free with spike and knife the tangled wreck.

Now spread the iron line of the battle race,
By squaring the iron band and torn by shell
That shrieked across the sea's astonished face,
And, striking, loosed the fends of a tortured hull!

Like midnight monsters fleeing from the dawn,
That dim revealed the land the powers fought,
All Russia's pride to sea steep madly ran,
Balked at the gateway of the port they sought.

And he who watched, indifferent to the game,
Now holoast through eyes that oft had seen
In vision and reality the same,
Only less strange, yet ghastly in the shroud
Of red and tinted vapor, haze, and shame.

And he who watched, th' indifferent partisan,
Now without fear the shell he hurled by,
Noting its lurching shape with flashing eye,
Now with hoarsest hoars the gunner reel
And die.

Marking the silent glory of the sea;
The white mist that hung aloft the land,
The pall of smoke that wrapped the distant sign,
The excited line, the twitching, clutched hand,
As played the juggernaut upon the mine!

The sea, earth's mantle, torn like a rag, rose high,
And, light as wind-blown snow, drove hissing by;
Fell and rebounded, thundering as it ran
Upon the bounding, doomed Leviathan—
That long had heaved and spurned its mighty bows—

Now wreathed in crackling fire and lumes
That rose
Up from its reeking heart and spitting joints,
And so on the prey that God to the waters appoints,
Triumphed, strange hillions snarling tell
Upon that hurried semblance of a belt!

But once the mighty war-god rained its hand,
Like some old gladiator loth to trust
The melancholy splendor of the dead
For a last defiant shout or snoring threat—
The battle stilled: the sea and earth gripped hands;
And those who saw the shuddering monster reel,
And heard a sob, as if the thing could feel
The doom that drove it, shinking, to the sands!

Now beat the master-hand that once had been
And now was stilled, yet touched by war's grim red,
Could e'er have drawn the glory of that noise

As, driven by torture, sundered the red-hipped cloud
That was the sole but honorable shroud
Of mighty Makaroff and all his dead!

Beloved of the battle-gods! His brow-deep eyes,
Sightless but seeing, jeered the enveloped ships.

As it upon that universal page
He saw the dogs of war in undimmed rage,
As if, while yet the masterpiece he scanned,
Death from the canvas reached and stayed his hand.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has said that the Springfield Republican has the best editorial page in the United States, which, despite occasional vagaries on the part of the S. R., is very largely true. We have watched in vain to see the S. R. unled long enough to say what is equally true, that Harper's Weekly to-day has the brightest editorial page in the country. It is as attractive and agreeable as a galantine does a la financière. —Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

THE man in all this country who got him out of this campaign was the editor of Harper's Weekly. The many bright and witty things he got off on all sides will live in history. While his criticisms were sharp and keen, they were not offensive, not malignant nor did they appeal to the prejudiced or ignorant. They were strong, broad lines. Mr. Harvey will not have a word to regret or take back, no matter what the result. —Rockbridge (N. C.) News.

ARMY OF MORRIS.—Mr. Woodrow Wilson's Secretary should advise us what for children's reading. It is the child's safety, the parent's duty, to read, and it is the child's duty to read. —(Advt.)

IDEAL-KEEPERS
know the advantage of having always on hand a perfect remedy for general household purposes. Bausch & Lomb's Stereoscopic Binoculars are superior to any other, and being powerful and portable, they are an indispensable part of every outfit. —(Advt.)

FOR BROWN'S Compositing apparatus, BUNTING, for the 1891. 25 cents a set. —(Advt.)

PRO'S CURE FOR COUGHS, BRONCHITIS, and other ailments, is a pleasant and effective remedy for coughs and colds. —(Advt.)

ADVERTISEMENTS

Pears'

"A shining countenance" is produced by ordinary soaps.

The use of Pears' reflects beauty and refinement. Pears' leaves the skin soft, white and natural.

Matchless for the complexion.

All over the civilized world
THE IMPROVED
BOSTON GARTER
IS KNOWN AND WORN
Every Pair Warranted
The Name is stamped on every loop—
The Velvet Grip
CUSHION BUTTON
CLASP
Lies flat to the leg—never Slips, Tears or Unfastens
ALWAYS EASY
EEO. FROST CO., Makers,
Boston, Mass., U. S. A.
REFUSE ALL SUBSTITUTES

Copyrighted by the Cotton Ministry.
Photographed at New York by James W. Hart, with a Bausch & Lomb Lens.

Bausch & Lomb-Zeiss
STEREO Binocular
Field Glasses

STEREO Field Glasses are used by the masses and saves all the great Nations because they are the best Field-Glass made.

Everyone who travels, sails, boards or lives where there is an extended view should have a STEREO.
It is the only sense that brings the out-of-reach into your view. STEREO has become a power, size of field and stereoscopic proof in the image.

Get out STEREO! Booklet free for the asking.

Bausch & Lomb Optical Co.
New York, ROCHESTER, N. Y., Boston, Chicago,
San Francisco, London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, etc.

COCKTAILS drunk right after making are raw.
The rare flavor of CLUB COCKTAILS is due to exquisite proportions of choice old liquors and thorough wood ageing.
Manhattan, Martini, Vermouth,
Whiskey, Holland and Gin,
Tom Gine and Yolk.
G.F. REEBLEN & BRO.
Rite Producers
Barclay New York London

FOR MEN OF BRAINS
Cortez CIGARS
—MADE AT KEY WEST—

PISO'S CURE FOR STOMACH AND LIVER DISEASE
Dose: 10 drops 4 times a day, before meals. Do not eat rich food. Do not drink alcohol.
CONSUMPTION

ALL SUNDAYS' DAY

By SYDNEY CARLETON

MRS. CARMARTHEN looked out through the gray-white lace curtains that veiled the hotel window, on the gray-yellow morning of the first of November.

Down the dingy street rose ugly green arches spatched with crude red and blue shields and extravagant nosegays; tight rolls of red and blue bunting that would have been flags if the wind had but then, marked the overhead trolley wires at regular intervals; every window, every ceiling, was covered with red, white, and blue; every cornice and ledge flittered with little red flags that were feverish on their dirty background in the yellow light of a cloudy sky.

Mrs. Carmarthén observed these things with as much artistic disgust as was compatible with profound indifference. She had come in Halifax to meet at the reception of the first contingent of Canadian troops returning from South Africa as she did most things, because she was the wife of her husband. She was weary of patriotic leagues, sick of the famous chant of "Soldiers of the Queen," that had made the streets ring for the last year. She turned impatiently from the window, and set herself to her toilet. She knew perfectly well that the People—with a large P—were right and the wrong; would have given a pearl necklace for one spark of the enthusiasm that every street boy flamed with; it was she who was at fault, not the streets with their flags and arches; the morning of them no better than the morning of her soul that despised them. A church bell, harsh, insistent, began to clang in the gray-white steeple she had seen over the opposite roofs; it had no sound of rejoicing in it, and, oddly enough, it startled Mrs. Carmarthén. There was mourning, exaltation, despair, in that clanging bell, it.

"Oh! All Souls' day, of course!" she said to herself with a curious relief; somehow the preparations for requiem, the flags and luted nosegays, had made her feel superstitiously that this was a hallowed old town, sitting dead in gaule to invite disaster. But the bell that had caught her ear with so ill-omened a sound was nothing but a summons to the faithful to come and pray for their dead.

Mrs. Carmarthén had no need to pray for: besides, she was not a devout woman unless it were devout to pray half the night for her shepherd lost for a man who was a vagabond on the face of the earth, a flowerer of oaths, a gambler, and a hard man at that. She thought so sure of that recalcitrant hell. It had nothing to do with her, who was not a religious woman.

Sometimes the secretary of the private secretary thought Mrs. Carmarthén's religion was Carmarthén's comfort; she observed it scrupulously enough. His house, his parties, his well-being that ran on wheels, were all her work; he was countless and unimportant details such as searching out people who might have ruined him, and she could find him so much about him. Even the private secretary never wondered whether she cared for Carmarthén or not; she felt no impulse for wonder. But he had once or twice found her with a deadly weariness on her face.

She was oddly dressed for a woman with copper hair when at last she joined Carmarthén in the hotel lobby. Her blouse gown was turned back with doll white lace and satin, the neck of it filled in with a curious pale pink, very soft and transparent; there seemed to be scarcely anything between her white throat and the long chain of faint anasthesia that encircled it twice and fell to her waist.

"Shall you be warm enough?" said the private secretary, faintly. He was Carmarthén's cousin and white slave for an excellent salary, and perhaps for the barren joy of sitting at Mrs. Carmarthén's table. If her religion were Carmarthén the private secretary was clever enough to hint that his was not.

"Oh, I'm warm a cut!" She knew perfectly well that though Carmarthén had never looked at her, he would have looked hard enough if she had been absolutely bald, and she laughed with real amusement. She had, for once, forgotten all about Carmarthén when she dressed. The new French gown had framed her of a day long ago when she had worn the same scheme of color with a girl's clumsy negligee. She had tucked that blouse up herself, and tucked an old eider as China wool round her neck under the collar. There had been no anasthesia to put over the pink then, and yet—she would not finish the thought. She took her place in the carriage beside Carmarthén, and as she drove through the crowded streets, and wiped their eyes and noses on the Minister's wife was totally uninterested in the house she was going to see had.

At the threshold gates the hall washed, recklessly neckled and boistered crowd who were interposed against the guard of marines and the rubbily shutting gate as the Minister's carriage passed through. Only two relatives of each returning soldier had been allowed admittance tickets; the herd of cousins and friends and well-wishers outside had to wait; they tramped the street into clanking shoes and wiped their eyes and noses on the Minister's wife; handkerchiefs with union-jacks on them were waving, not for business use.

Mrs. Carmarthén, with a curious glance at the sea of working faces, had driven through them dry-eyed. Neither the pathos nor the joy of these faces came home to her; she felt a little sorry for the men who were coming back to people like these.

She slipped on her coat with the emine as she got out of the carriage and walked down on the jetty. There was the Admiral to shake hands with, the Governor, the officer commanding the garrison, a few women to be civil to; the band hurried by her, and the guard of honor, speckless in their red tunics, and lined up behind the Minister's wife, the group of ministers and politicians. In a few minutes the band began to play, and then—she did not till then—did Mr. Carmarthén look at what she had come to see.

The trumpet lay broadside on to the jetty, her bowline high above the dull green gap of water between her and the land. The raw red-orange of copper paint glared a full third up her side in the gray morning, and the dull black above it made it even silent. Mrs. Carmarthén's glance went higher up, to the double line of white rails round the jetty. They stood out sharply against a sandy background of khaki that meant men who had been dead but not starved and rotted with fire, but Mrs. Carmarthén only saw it was an ugly mass of color after the scarlet uniforms below.

Some of the khaki background came alive, and turned into men who lagged with a will at the slowly rising gangway that had lifted sufficiently half way up. At the foot of it, crouching forward with ruck neck it gave, were these relatives of soldiers who had tickets. Some of them were of Mrs. Carmarthén's class, and they were as strained and pathetic as those of the women in pink; best clothes, who showed them. The gangway began to note up the jetty, the band stopped in the middle of a blaring march and slipped softly into something else—Horne, Sweet Home! with chords.

They were the landmaster's pride, those chords. Slow, yet very peaceful they came on the air, without ornament or riot of rejoicing.

"It's a dirge," said Mrs. Carmarthén sharply to the secretary, who only nodded absently.

It seemed to him very clever. The landmaster's son had been killed in the war, and he must welcome home the five sons of his fathers. He did it; without a chord or modulation; but even the visiting Mayors of other towns saw the dead on the wharf, though they shut their eyes to get rid of the mist in them. The landmaster's eyes were open and hard.

Came next the crowd of Mrs. Carmarthén's relatives, the secretary was in an unrelieved for epithets applied to heads of departments in affable conversation but that "Home, Sweet Home" had but unpleasant.

"Up here," said the secretary, briskly. An iron slide with a derrick on it was let rise higher than the jetty, and he led her to get within speaking distance of the Governor-General's A. D. C. whose gold aiguillettes were gorgeous over the white rail of the transport. A dozen people followed them up the wire ladder, no official strangers who had no hand to snatch at as the men came down the gangway. There was plenty of room behind the derrick, and a level of platform and sea of green water all there as between them and the lowering black transport.

The secretary shouted gleefully to the Governor-General's aide who had distinguished himself into a personnel, and Mrs. Carmarthén's eyes followed the secretary's. For her the thing had dropped back again into a stage full of marionettes with the ruling of that "Home, Sweet Home." Her glance ran lightly along the row of officers, tall and stout, tanned and pale. Every man of them had a look he had not gone away with, a hardness or a long fought brittleness and anxiety; their smiles seemed only to trap it thinly over. Mrs. Carmarthén looked for it in the eyes of the row of privates, and saw it was not there. They were gleaming from ear to ear, clean and cheerful and in good case, their faces a line of content and pink over their cheeks.

"They're not a handsome lot, to be honest, nor particularly useful in every-day life," thought Mrs. Carmarthén, pessimistically. They had better enjoy their little day of being heroes. They were starting out to star when people are tired of it. "Her thought broke off in her head as if someone had hit it with a sledge-hammer. Who was that, leaning tall and quiet over the rail, his brown eyes on hers, his handsome face very still?

Mrs. Carmarthén's heart stopped beating. She had never known he had come to Africa; had not known where he was these five years past; had prayed for him in her sleep; had these eighteen hundred and twenty-five nights, and said to herself that she had forgotten on each relentless morning.

Her lips, unthinkingly and without her knowledge, opened in a silent smile at his answer, and as they did his eyes answered. And the answer claved at the soul of Mary Carmarthén.

It was no matter where he had been—he was—wherever he was—she knew where she stood—he was coming back! He was there before her eyes. God's mercy had given her back the sight of his face. And the men were beginning to come down the gangway!

It was for pure convenience that Mrs. Carmarthén turned her back on her husband's private secretary, who had forgotten all about him; also all about Carmarthén, who, aside from the jetty, had been looking down at her, as the Mayors of St. John. Her eyes were faithless shining jewels, her face taut beneath with the light of her soul, that was in rapture. Nothing nothing at all could matter after this; no duty he too was a self-dedicated man. To-day was his day, and he would not mean damnation. "From—the very beginning, perhaps, had meant so to pay Mary Carmarthén her wages, then—stamped itself on his brain forever—was Philip Crickton coming down the gangway.

Mrs. Carmarthen threw back her head as if it were her business to be proud of him.

"He trod the ling like a back in spring, and he looked like a leave at rest," she said to herself, which was perhaps very little appropriate to a lean, dark man walking down a gangway. She knew without seeing what had become of the single file of men who had gone down before him. They had been swallowed up by the crowd of relatives who smiled crookedly and gulped in their throats as they turned away to the left with them. post Carmarthen said, and the heads of departments, off the jetty, and out on the yellowing grass of the free yard. The only difference with the men who had as relatives was that they here away to the left alone. It would be an hour before they left in again company after company; an hour—

The private secretary turned from the disappearing line of his friends on the trower as one by one they came down with their snow, and perhaps his slits were not ripe for the reaping, for his state did not take him into the water below his toes.

Mrs. Carmarthen, in her Paris gown, was on her knees on the dusty iron grating, her ermine-trimmed coat trailing in a pool of rusty water, her hands stretched down to a man who stood on a long level her. Mrs. Carmarthen, who was always caring for appearances, was caring for nothing now but the hands that held hers: was crumpling, dervish with joy and wonder, over the edge of the slugging: was saying something over and over again.

"You, you, you," she said, and the secretary jerked himself round that he might not see the look on her loved face.

"Him!" he said to himself (and his elegant grammar had dropped off his speech and left it what it was in his first country school). "Good Lord, him! And I never knew she knew him. What if I do? What on earth will I do?"

He was doing it even while he was wondering, putting his lonely shoulders to the weather side of her, which meant Carmarthen, noting with his sharp little eyes that the rest of the people on the staging were nobody, who did not even know her name, were nothing but a living screen between her and the people who did.

"Bill Crickton—and her!" he growled (it was not to be conceived that there was anybody in Canada who knew Crickton by his name of baptism); "and back in Canada, Bill! There'd be black trouble if it were anybody but her."

The grim loyalty that belies in spite of being set well enough on his ugly face, but it did not comfort him. Every single evil thing he knew was embodied for him in those two words, "Bill Crickton."

"Pray the Lord he hasn't distinguished himself, got whiskered out there!" muttered the secretary, devoutly. "If he dares to stay in Canada and be about with decent people he'll be breaking her heart inside a month; and there'll be an holding Carmarthen without her break on his."

He was so dazed that he forgot to take out of his pocket a paper obtained from a friend in the militia department for Carmarthen's benefit—Carmarthen always wanted to be up to everything, whether it concerned him or not—the record of every man in the contingent, his wounds, his services, his officer's report of him. It was the only thing Carmarthen's thirst for information could have been of any use to his secretary, and he forgot it like a mere out-let; perhaps because he was sick with the groundless apprehension that Carmarthen might walk round the corner of the staging and see his wife holding Bill Crickton's hand.

For she was clutching them still; she had never stirred except to clutch a little lower towards him. She knew (though perhaps there were women who knew better) that the smooth, quick touch of his lips would be under the mistake that was so much fairer than his hair; she would have set away her hope of glory to have felt that touch now.

The sun came out and struck these rows of flags, that had been foolish, grating rags in Mrs. Carmarthen, into a blazing glory, alive and exultant in the wind. The

1854-1904

WALTHAM WATCHES

ALWAYS FAITHFUL

Each WALTHAM watch has behind it the guarantee of a responsible maker, and back of that fifty years of successful effort to realize an ideal by means of the best brains, the best tools and the best material American genius could command.

For sale by all Jewelers

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY,
WALTHAM, MASS.

A KEYSTONE OF EMPIRE

By the Author of "The Martyrdom of an Emperess," "A Dotted Coronet," etc.
Illustrated from Private Drawings and Photographs. Crown 8vo, Ornamented Cloth, Docket Edges, Gilt Top. $1.25 net (postage extra)

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

THE EQUITABLE

Wishes are good
When backed by deedsActions to-day bring
Results for the futureJ. WALL KAMMER
PRESIDENTJ. H. HYDE
VICE PRESIDENTHENRY B. HYDE
TREASURER

DON'T WISH

that you and your family may always have as much reason for thanking as you have now. Act and make sure of it.

A policy in the EQUITABLE on the New Continuous Instalment Endowment plan will provide a yearly income for your family—commencing just when they need it. Or it will provide a yearly income for yourself—commencing just when you need it.

Splendid opportunities for men of character to act as representatives
Write to GAGE E. TARBELL, 2nd Vice President.

For full information fill out this coupon and write

The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, 130 Broadway, N. Y., Dept. 23.

Please send me information regarding a Continuous Instalment Endowment for $ if issued to a person..... years of age, beneficiary..... years of age.

Name.....

Address.....

meaning of them heaped to her blood; the victory of them; the rejoicing; the tears. She was sister to the women with tear-washed smiling faces and unspeakable fancies; to the zara who spat in the gutters while they cheered in the street above. Life surged and thundered in her veins that had been stagnant, burned in her eyes and in her hands that gripped Crickton's.

"Aren't you glad?" she cried (and Carmarthen would not have known her voice). "You're so quiet." It was she who had been quiet when last she saw his face.

"Child!" said Bill Crickton, and it was queer that she felt as if she saw his soul; mostly she had not even known if it lived in his body. "It's all I asked for. Mollie, do you remember?"

"You've got a brown and pink gown on—it was like this once before!"

"Never," she whispered under the name; no one ever called her, "never! I didn't know we were happy then. Now I know we're in heaven."

"It's a good exchange," he said, simply as a man does of a satisfactory bargain. "I'd rather have this than heaven. I've seen a long way and for this."

Cautelously he looked round him for that she was living before, and not at the husband's day. Any second time might call him strange, call him away and at last there could be no more looking of hands after to day.

"Where are you going?" she said with smiling eyes, and the thought that would shelter would feel his step. "Are you going to stay in Canada?"

"I don't know," he answered almost carelessly.

"But you're this close to you like, 'on the shore, are you a dead head, as if they were heads of Paradise?"

"I'm not worried," he said.

"Mollie," he said, his hands were waving, as if he had helped blood was thinned to that force. "You know I love you always from far back."

"And out beyond it," he said, "I would be altered with her head—its till as she moved at him as she believed."

"I believe," he said, "it might have been the first she was saying."

"But you're this close to you like, 'on the shore, are you a dead head, as if they were heads of Paradise?"

"I'm not worried," he said.

"Mollie," he said, his hands were waving, as if he had helped blood was thinned to that force. "You know I love you always from far back."

"And out beyond it," he said, "I would be altered with her head—its till as she moved at him as she believed."

"I believe," he said, "it might have been the first she was saying."

"But you're this close to you like, 'on the shore, are you a dead head, as if they were heads of Paradise?"

"I'm not worried," he said.

"Mollie," he said, his hands were waving, as if he had helped blood was thinned to that force. "You know I love you always from far back."

"And out beyond it," he said, "I would be altered with her head—its till as she moved at him as she believed."

"I believe," he said, "it might have been the first she was saying."

"But you're this close to you like, 'on the shore, are you a dead head, as if they were heads of Paradise?"

"I'm not worried," he said.

"No," deliberately, "but you and I won't meet again till after death, I suppose. Love, my love, don't forget me! I was a blackguard to you in my day, but all the same the thought of you kept my beggarly soul alive. It was always you, you know."

"It's part of mine," said the woman, slowly. "None of my bone and flesh of your flesh I never was, but as God sees I'll keep your soul mine, past death and the grave, if I never see my eyes on your face again."

"Mrs. Carmarthen!" said the private secretary, and touched her shoulder in terror—for the last man was almost in a frenzy, the hand was moving, the people who had screened off Carmarthen dropping away one by one—

"hadn't we better go?" and he started for the second time that day. For the face of Bill Crickton, never-to-be, however, and devil incarnate, whose where he stood like the face of a car in Paradise; it was as if death itself had wiped the evil from him and left him clean for God's sight.

It was Bill Crickton who answered; Mrs. Carmarthen neither heard nor spoke.

"I'll go, Mollie," he said, "the time's up," and what else he said reached no ear but hers, for the secretary was glancing in despair over his shoulder to where Carmarthen ought to be. When he turned again there was no one at his side but Mrs. Carmarthen, standing up and perfectly quiet.

In utter silence the secretary helped her to the ground; in amaze and rage left her at her entrance. She went straight to her hotel, there having kindly ordained that she was not asked to the banquet for the returned heroes. The secretary stood turning over in his perturbed mind what would happen if Carmarthen had seen after all and should run across Crickton at the banquet.

"I must smooth it over the best I can," he thought, and perhaps he was not without that "three o'clock in the afternoon" courage that is the hardest of all. He handed from his pocket his herrowed militia list, and glared at it to find some shred of heroism or even decent behavior on which Mrs. Carmarthen might have been congratulating Bill Crickton.

He found it.

He stood with his mouth open at the unbelievable record of Philip Hippobley Crickton (there was no Bill in the official list, but the almost forgotten name of an only son). Till there came a voice within a foot of his nose.

"This is an awful business about Crickton! What ought we to do?"

"What the devil do you mean?" said the secretary, in the cold fury of fright.

"He's dead," said the Governor-General's aide, simply. "What are you looking like that for? Are you going down from too much Carmarthen?"

"Dead?" the secretary's shrewd eyes stared glazed and stupid.

Mrs. Carmarthen and Crickton, with pay and wonder, were the edge of it. (Dress by Mrs. Lane)

They say the dead can come back if they the living case. If the dead dare come back why, as can I, Bill Crickton, blackguard

she wanted at him difference to you.

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

And you know it wasn't. I

"Dead! Why?" He never knew how he stopped himself (that he did) from saying that twenty minutes ago Crickton had been talking to Mrs. Carmarthen. "It's a mistake, a ghastly mistake!" he jaded. For a moment he was oblivious of everything but the paper in his hand. "This says he's down for a V. C. and Lord knows what."

"I didn't know he was a pal of yours," the A. D. C.'s face was very gentle, "he hadn't many pals, you know, though he's made up for all that; he'd have had his V. C. if he'd lived. But he was more dead than alive from his wounds when he was put on board at Cape Town. After I came ashore this morning I went back to look after my invalids, and found he'd got up and dressed and gone down the gangway. They said to speak to some woman. He came back as I was looking for him, and was dead before I could get my arm around him. The nurse says he'd have died yesterday if he had been any one but Bill Crickton; he was fabled to live to get home. He must have been dying when he went ashore."

The secretary looked sharply at the A. D. C.'s eyes; but there was no intelligence in them. He thanked Heaven that Mrs. Carmarthen stood clear of talk, and that she was not the kind of woman who asked questions. She would never know the whole of it.

But Mrs. Carmarthen, on her knees that night in her hotel bedroom, knew well enough. Bill Crickton, after all, had wished himself in Africa; and had kept out of his grave-holes long enough to come and tell her so, on the one day of the year that is free to the dead.

The Work of the National Civic Federation

(Continued from Page 188.)

annual national conferences, local conferences, the publication of an industrial monthly review, and a Department of Industrial Economics. The annual conferences are devoted to the public discussion of such practical topics as "trade agreements," "wages and cost of living," "the shorter work day," "the open and closed shop," "the minimum wage and restriction of output," "piece-work and day-work," "arbitration," etc.

The Department of Industrial Economics, just organized, is composed of economic and legal writers in the daily press, periodicals, trade papers, labor journals, and of teachers of economics in universities. Its members are brought together at a dinner four or more times during the year, to consider industrial topics.

Trade Sections of the National Civic Federation are being organized to consider the best solution of special problems relating to the employment of labor in particular industries. It is expected that the technical studies of these sections will ultimately be extended to all industries.

The purpose of the National Civic Federation and the success that its systematic efforts have attained in the United States are attracting much interest and inquiry in other countries. In order to extend a knowledge of its work, the Executive Committee of the Federation entertained in New York, on September 26, 1904, three delegates to the Interparliamentary Union, which had just closed its session at St. Louis, who were especially interested in industrial economies. The countries represented besides the United States, by members of their respective Parliaments, were Austria, England, Belgium, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Netherlands, Norway, Roumania, Sweden, and Switzerland.

The entire movement represented by the National Civic Federation aims to bring into cooperation the sane and patriotic leaders of the forces of employers and employed, and of the interested but too often forgotten and forgotten third party, the general public. Its purpose is constructive, not destructive. It would develop, through the agencies here described, the best elements in the organizations of capital and of labor, and it would keep awake a wholesome public concern in the profit of one, the welfare of the other, and the prosperity of all, through the diffusion of an intelligent understanding of economic laws.

Men of business prefer The California Limited

The train "wears well," mainly because the service is faultlessly good every mile and every minute.

Santa Fe All the Way—that's the reason.

Daily between Chicago and Kansas City and Los Angeles and San Francisco.

For pamphlet of the train, and California trip book, address Gen. Pass. Office, A. T. & S. F. Ry., Chicago.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, 20 WALL STREET.

Bill of exchange bought and sold. Letter Transfers in Europe and South Africa. International and Transatlantic Letters of Credit. Collections made International Cheques. Certificates of Deposit.

THE AUDIT COMPANY OF NEW YORK

ANALYSTS AND AUDITORS. 10 NASSAU ST. NEW YORK. Investigations for Merchants, Bankers, Corporations, and Committees. Mutual Life Buildings, 4 Cedar Street. Chicago, N. Y. 100 Broadway, La Salle and Madison Sts.

Bruvver Jim's Baby

By PHILIP VERRILL MIGHELS

A baby found on the plains and brought up in a rough dining camp is the angrier situation developed with humor and pathos in this tale of the West. There is much of Best Henty's subtle appeal in this work, especially in picturing the Arizona gold fields and the rough miners strangely softened by the advent of this tiny pilgrim among them.

Cloth, $1.50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

The Overland Limited

The maximum degree of safety, comfort and speed surrounds the passenger to the Pacific Coast on the most luxurious train in the world. The route is the most direct and is over the only double-track railway between Chicago and the Missouri River. The train is perfect to all its appointments, is electric lighted throughout and runs through solid without change every day in the year, less than three days en route, via the CHICAGO, UNION PACIFIC AND NORTH-WESTERN LINE leaving Chicago daily at 8:00 p. m.

Another stop through train to San Francisco, Los Angeles and Portland, without change, leaves at 11:00 p. m. daily.

The Best of Everything.

All agents will identify on the Chicago, Union Pacific and North Western Lines. For a complete list of agents, including the following names, send your address to the General Agent, Chicago, Union Pacific and North Western Lines, 100 N. La Salle St., Chicago, Ill. The best of everything is the best of everything.

W. A. ANDERSON, Passenger Traffic Manager, S. & N. W. Ry., 200 N. La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.

Mr. Punch: "Won't you step in here? There's an old lady who's very anxious to tell your fortune."
 Lord R-a-b-bit: "Yes, I know. But—er—I never show my hand!"—From "Punch"

CONSULTATIONS INVITED.

MODELS FOR THE COMING SEASON
OF 1905
 Type E 15-20 hp $2800
 Type D 20-25 hp $3700
 Type H 30-35 hp $5000
 Type F 40-45 hp $7500

The Locomobile Gasolene Car
 "Easily the best built car in America"

Locomobile Gasolene Cars have been on the market for three years, and have won a great reputation for Reliability and High Grade Workmanship. Four-cylinder, front vertical motors, sliding gear transmissions, and side entrance tonneau will be used on all of the new models. Good for complete information. Order NOW and secure early delivery.

THE LOCOMOBILE COMPANY OF AMERICA, Bridgeport, Conn.
 Branches: CHICAGO—No. 1884 Michigan Avenue
 BOSTON—No. 18 Berkeley St.

Read Blaukie's HOW TO GET STRONG and How to Stay So "DEFENDER OF THE RAILS—THE NEW YORK CENTRAL."

Uniform Excellence

The highest standard of quality in what is best in uniform excellence. That of

Hunter Baltimore Rye

is out of reach of competition. Popular preference, here, there, everywhere, has but one verdict for this whiskey, viz:—

There Is No Fault To Find

Sold at all liquor stores and by J. J. & W. W. LAMAR & CO., Baltimore, Md.

"THE ONLY WAY"

BETWEEN CHICAGO
 ST. LOUIS
 KANSAS CITY
 AND PEORIA

Hand-drawn, used in various forms in the world; guaranteed to be a perfect ball-point pen; no lead, no ink, no smudge, no eraser.

THE ALTON'S
 1905
 GYPSY
 GIRL

Copyright, 1904, by the Chicago & North Western Co.

Based on the famous "Pen, Ink, and Lead" by Gold and Colman.

FIVE SHEETS, EACH 10 X 15 INCHES

SEND 25 CTS.

With some of the pictures to which it is sent the subscriber to the Chicago & North Western Co. will receive a copy of the "Pen, Ink, and Lead" by Gold and Colman, a book of 100 pages, printed in colors, containing 100 illustrations of the most famous scenes in the world.

Copyright Notice

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS
 OFFICE OF THE READER OF THE MANUSCRIPTS

Class A. 222. No. 2728. The title of which is in the title of the book, "The Only Way" by the Chicago & North Western Co. The title of which is in the title of the book, "The Only Way" by the Chicago & North Western Co. The title of which is in the title of the book, "The Only Way" by the Chicago & North Western Co.

—Utica Herald.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER BROTHERS

NEW YORK

"THE STORY OF THE SCIENCES"

A HISTORY OF SCIENCE

BY

HENRY SMITH WILLIAMS, B.Sc., M.D., LL.D.

Author of "The Story of Nineteenth-Century Science," "The History of the Art of Writing," Editor of "The Historians' History of the World," etc., etc.

IN FIVE VOLUMES

Profusely Illustrated with Portraits of Famous Scientists, Diagrams, Facsimiles, and Pictures

A GREAT EDUCATIONAL
WORK

If you are a scientist, teacher, student, professional man, or layman interested in the world's progress, you will be interested in A HISTORY OF SCIENCE for it is a record of this progress from the earliest discoveries of primitive man to such recently discovered facts in modern science as radio-activity and the new theories of light and electricity.

It is a complete history of the development of the natural sciences—Astronomy, Physics, Chemistry, Anatomy and Physiology, Medicine and Surgery, Meteorology, Paleontology, Zoology, Geology, Biology, Psychology, and the various important subdivisions of these sciences. There are also biographical sketches of most of the great discoverers, with picturesque incidents that have figured in so many of their discoveries. The method of presentation as given in A HISTORY OF SCIENCE has all the charm of romance and all the authority of history.

IT IS A WORK THE LAYMAN CAN UNDERSTAND

IT IS UNTECHNICAL, YET ACCURATE

IT FASCINATES THE GENERAL READER
WHILE COMMANDING THE RESPECT OF
THE MOST CRITICAL STUDENTS

IT IS THE ONLY WORK OF ITS KIND IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE
SEND FOR THE BOOKS AND JUDGE FOR YOURSELF

Henry Smith Williams

Harper

& Brothers,

New York:

Please send me, free of charge, your illustrated booklet describing A HISTORY OF SCIENCE

Name _____

Address _____

OUR OFFER

On receipt of One Dollar we will send you the entire set of five beautiful volumes. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $2.00 a month for nine months. On receipt of your request for these books we will enter your name as a subscriber for one year, without additional cost to you, to either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. In writing, state which periodical you want.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, December 3, 1904

NO. 190

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

Copyright, 1904, by J. C. Brown, St. Louis

JOSEPH W. FOLK, DEMOCRATIC GOVERNOR-ELECT OF MISSOURI

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2702

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 3, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post-office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

THAT was an admirable letter which President ROOSEVELT wrote to Colonel Moody about a month before election day, but which, lest the writer's motives should be misconstrued, the recipient discreetly refrained from publishing until after the contest was over. We refer to the letter in which Mr. ROOSEVELT says that he was suddenly, not angered, by the unfriendly attitude of the Southern States toward him, because he is himself half a Southerner by blood, and because the welfare of the Southern States is as dear to him as that of the North. We recall the letter with pleasure, because it tends to confirm our prediction that those who had counted upon Mr. ROOSEVELT's success at the ballot-box to strengthen the race issue may find themselves mistaken. It is, however, the Southern States themselves on which the speedy extinction of the race issue mainly depends. We incline to think that hat for the so-called "solidity" of the South—that is to say, the inflexible resolve of the bulk of it to throw its electoral votes against the Republican nominee, no matter whether they approve or disapprove of the platform and candidate of the Democracy—there would never arise in the Republican party any organized and formidable movement for the enforcement of the Fourteenth, much less of the Fifteenth, Amendment.

An impression to this effect seems to be gaining ground among the Southern leaders, if we may trust a despatch from Washington to the New York Times, according to which they are to hold a conference in the Federal capital at an early date. The conference has been called, we are told, by those who hold that hereafter the Southern whites should detach themselves from the Democratic as well as from the Republican party, should decline to send delegates to the next Democratic national convention, and should form a party of their own, consecrated to the advancement of their view of the race issue, and prepared to cast its electoral votes for whichever nominee should be deemed most likely to promote their deepest interests. If such a party could be organized, it might command in the neighborhood of a hundred electoral votes, and, at certain conceivable conjunctures, it would hold the balance of power, and might determine the outcome of a Presidential election. It would play, in a word, the rôle which has twice been taken and may once again be taken by the Irish Nationalist party in the British House of Commons.

To such a course, however, there are some obvious objections. If, at any crisis, a majority of the South's electoral vote should be cast against the Democratic nominee, that section would be apt to forfeit the good-will of the Democratic party. That good-will it has always hitherto possessed, and the question naturally suggests itself whether it is wise to risk an assumed friendship in the hand for a doubtful friendship in the bush. It should also be borne in mind that the creation of a third and distinctively Southern party under a new name would almost inevitably lead to further mutilation of the "Solid" South. We will assume that a distinctively Southern party could rely upon carrying, as a minimum, Texas, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina. What of the remaining Southern States? The national Democracy would unquestionably retain an organization in every one of them, and, with the opposition thus divided, the Republicans would have a fair chance of carrying not only such former slave States as Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, and Missouri, but also Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Louisiana, Virginia, and North Carolina. Would, then, the plight of the South be any better than it is now?

The situation in Colorado is alarming to the friends of peace. On the face of the returns, the Democratic nominee for Governor was elected by a plurality of about 15,000. The supporters of Governor PRISONER, the Republican nominee, however, assert that this ostensible plurality is the outcome of gross frauds in a number of counties. An official recount will be needed to decide the dispute. Under the law, the recounting must be done by the State Legislature, but the composition of this body is itself in doubt. The election of no fewer than eleven State Representatives and three State Senators is disputed. The settlement of these fourteen controversies depends on the judicial decisions rendered in twenty-seven disputed precincts in the city of Denver. Now, the decisions thus far rendered by the State Supreme Court are regarded to these precincts have been favorable to the Republicans. It is therefore conceivable that the Republicans will control the State Legislature, and declare Governor PRISONER re-elected by an official recounting of the ballot. The Democrats, and especially the spokesmen of union labor, say, on their part, that they will not allow Governor PRISONER to retain his seat. We do not see what they can do about it, for if the Republicans control the Legislature, and thus secure the two-thirds majority, they will have at their disposal not only the State militia, but also assistance from the regular army of the United States, which the Constitution requires the President to furnish when requested by a State Legislature or Executive. The motion of the Cripple Creek miners that Mr. ROOSEVELT should or could interfere to seat ADAMS by force against the wishes of the State Legislature and Executive is, of course, absurd. There is, by the way, more at stake than a two-thirds majority in this contest, for the next Governor will have the appointment of two judges of the Supreme Court.

The idea of JAMES HAY as the conservative candidate of the inquisitive ROOSEVELT has been so universally accepted as to have attained a sort of canonical authority. But some of our more particularly thoughtful citizens will ask himself: "Who is really the man with the Big Stick, anyhow? Is it ROOSEVELT, or is it HAY?" The truth is that Secretary HAY is an extremely resourceful and well-equipped minister of foreign affairs, and always gives the impression of knowing what he is about, and being able to deal skillfully with any emergency that may arise. But it is also true that he is as bold a statesman as any now on earth whose responsibilities are comparable with his. He is not rash. We do not think President ROOSEVELT is rash, either. But Mr. HAY's reputation as a safe man owes more to mastery of diplomatic methods than to any disposition to defer, or hang back. A new policy has no terrors for him because it is new, not a quick turn because it is quick. He wears a velvet glove, but his reputation for conservatism is largely due to the chance that has associated him with a President who chooses in backskin a hand no more prompt than HAY's.

The Providence Journal thinks the $34,500 which Mr. DOUGLAS spent in the campaign for Governor of Massachusetts a pretty stiff sum. So it is for a candidate, but it is a bargain for an advertiser of the dimensions of WILLIAM L. DOUGLAS. Mr. DOUGLAS knows the value of publicity, and is used to buying it in large lots. He did so in the late campaign, and, as usual, with satisfactory results. Moreover, it is inconceivable that Mr. DOUGLAS's campaign was not incidentally worth a great deal more to the three-dollar shoe business than it cost the shoemaker candidate.

Report says that Mr. MOODY will continue to be Attorney-General during President ROOSEVELT's second term. It will involve a great sacrifice of his pecuniary interests, but he is a bachelor, and doubtless feels able to afford to deal generously with a country that is living beyond its means. So long as Massachusetts has practically let slip the opportunity to send Mr. MOORE to the Senate, we hope it is true that he has consented to stay in the cabinet, for he is the kind of man whom it is profitable to keep in the public service. He was a member of Congress from 1895 until he became Secretary of the Navy, so that his active concern with the affairs of the Federal government extends over a period of nearly ten years, which have been particularly fruitful of new situations and problems. President ROOSEVELT first called him to the cabinet. He has the best of reasons for wanting to keep him where he is.

TOM WATSON seems to think that he has been appointed literary censor of the Democratic party, deceased. His post mortem observations reek with the I-see-to-bury-Cesar-not-to-praise-him spirit. His methods seem well adapted to infuse new life into the alleged decedent's remains.

Interesting were the ceremonies which took place in Washington on Saturday, November 19, when the bronze statue of FREDERICK THE GREAT, presented by Emperor WILLIAM II. to the American people, was unveiled in the grounds of the War College. We learn that near it will be erected statues of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, of CÆSAR, and of NAPOLEON. The one speech worthy of the occasion was delivered by President ROOSEVELT. Some of the shorter speeches were conspicuous for the blunders which they embodied. For example, Major-General GILLESPIE, in his preliminary greeting of the German ambassador, showed himself far from conversant with military history when he asserted that the system of organization, training, and maneuvering of troops, instituted by FREDERICK II., has had its happy fruition in the imperial German army of to-day. It is well known that the military system instituted by FREDERICK II., and too scrupulously preserved for many years after his death, was largely accountable for the awful disasters encountered by the Prussian army at Jena and Austerlitz. Had the Prussian commanders in 1900 renounced their inherited system for the new formation, the new methods, and the new tactics introduced by French generals during the preceding decade, and previously exemplified in NAPOLEON and DAUFOUR, they might not have subjected their country to dismemberment and humiliation. It is certain that in 1870 the German commanders would never have conquered at Sedan and captured Metz and Paris had they adhered to the antiquated military system fashioned more than a century before.

The German special commissioner, Lieutenant-General von LOWENFELD, and the German ambassador, Baron STURM VON NEUBRAND, both made the mistake of reviving the pseudo-historical myth that during our Revolutionary war FREDERICK showed himself a friend of the revolting thirteen colonies. Neither, indeed, went so far as to recall the apocryphal story that FREDERICK sent to WASHINGTON a sword inscribed "From the oldest to the greatest general." The special commissioner said, however, that it was the Prussian King who, having greeted with warm sympathy, the rights and progress of the United States from the beginning, had been the first sovereign to conclude a treaty of amity and commerce with the young confederation after the conclusion of peace at Paris in 1783. He forgot to emphasize the word "after." What we wanted, of course, was recognition before, not after, Great Britain herself had acknowledged our independence. Although repeatedly solicited, the Prussian sovereign refused to recognize us while the contest was pending, although France had done so, and entered into an alliance with us early in 1778; although Spain quickly arrayed herself on the same side; and although the Low Countries and Russia entered into friendly relations with us, there is absolutely no proof of sympathy for the revolting colonists on the part of FREDERICK, although he had repudiated GEORGE III. with bitter dislike ever since the superseding of the elder PRY by Lord BURY had brought about the inopportune closing of the Seven Years' War. The German ambassador vaguely alleged that FREDERICK had shown himself a staunch and true friend of the forefathers of those people who in 1902 had welcomed Prince HENRY of Prussia on their own soil; having proved his friendship at a time when the young Republic was "in the course of her formation, weathering many storms and perils." The Republic had been definitely formed, and all serious storms and perils had been weathered before FREDERICK THE GREAT consented to imitate many other European states by recognizing our independence.

President ROOSEVELT, on the other hand, was guilty of no historical blunder. He placed our acceptance of the statue of FREDERICK THE GREAT on exactly the right grounds. This statue was fittingly placed, he said, in the grounds of a war college, for, when "soldierly genius and soldierly heroism reach the highest point of achievement, the man in whom they are displayed grows to belong not merely to the nation from which he springs, but to all nations capable of showing, and, therefore, capable of appreciating, the virtue and masterful virtues which alone make victors in those dread struggles where resort is had to the arbitrament of arms." Many students of military history may think that Mr. ROOSEVELT ranks FREDERICK too high when he groups him with ALEXANDER, CÆSAR, and HANNIBAL in antiquity, and with NAPOLEON and possibly GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS in modern times. For a man beaten so often, and sometimes beaten from an obvious lack of skill and judgment, it may seem overpraise to rate him above MYRABRON and WILLINGTON, who never knew defeat. It is even questionable whether, in respect of inborn military genius, as distinguished from gradually acquired efficiency, he should be classed with TERENCE and the Prince EUGENE. But that is a detail. Beyond cavil was the President's subsequent statement that he accepted the statue not only as that of a mighty soldier, but as a symbol of the kinship of blood between the American and the German peoples. It is true, as Mr. ROOSEVELT reminded his auditors, that even in colonial days the German element had become very strong among the inhabitants of certain parts of our country. It is also true that in the Revolutionary war one of the leading Generals was MÜLLERBACH, an American of German descent, and that it was a German, HECKMILLER, who won the victory which saved the valley of the Mohawk to the American cause. No less fitting was the President's allusion to the fact that on the platform whereon he stood, and among the officers of the army and navy whom he was addressing, were many Americans who were partly or wholly of German descent. We repeat that the only grounds upon which a statue of FREDERICK THE GREAT could be appropriately presented and accepted were distinctly perceived and effectively brought out by President ROOSEVELT, who raised what others might have made a silly and delusive proceeding to a plane of sincerity and dignity.

In one respect, at all events, the election is of interest. It is a distinct ratification of the "imperialist" policy.—London Standard Review.

It was a distinct ratification of THEODORE ROOSEVELT, taken by and large, without specification of details. If it was a distinct ratification of anything else, we don't know what the other thing was. If it didn't ratify "stand pat," it certainly didn't ratify the "imperialist" policy.

Now, when it looks as if the Unionists of Great Britain were doomed to defeat at the next general election, and as if the Irish Nationalist party would once more hold the balance of power, there comes ominous reports of a rupture in that organization. There is no doubt that, but for quarrels between Parnellites and anti-Parnellites, Mr. GLADSTONE would have returned to power in 1892 with a much larger majority than the forty he actually possessed, and it is probable that a split in the ranks of Irish patriots at this time would have a similarly untoward effect on the coming battle at the ballot-box. Nevertheless, it is alleged on what seems to be good authority, that MESSRS. DILLON and SEXTON, with their personal followers in the House of Commons and their Dublin organ, the Freeman's Journal, mean to decline to accept any longer Mr. JOHN E. REDMOND's leadership, who, on his side, however, will have the support of Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN, who is so powerful in Cork and throughout the south of Ireland. There is reason to believe that the two factions would have about equal voting strength in the House of Commons, and that Mr. TIMOTHY HEALY and his adherents could give either a majority by rallying to its aid. If Mr. HEALY had to choose, his influence would doubtless be given to the faction headed by REDMOND and O'BRIEN. The fact may possibly have been overlooked that MESSRS. DILLON and SEXTON did not approve of the Land Purchase conference with Irish landlords, in which MESSRS.

REIDENBERG and O'Brien took part, and which resulted in Mr. WYNNEMAN'S memorable Land Purchase act. Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN now maintains that the same spirit of conciliation, which prevailed for the Irish tenants the immense sum of money needed to transform them into owners of the soil, ought to be shown toward the proposals for political reform which have lately emanated from the association formed by Lord DEVEREAUX. Apparently one of the reasons why Mr. WYNNEMAN, Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, declined to consider these proposals was that they were condemned by Messrs. DILLON and SULLIVAN and other members of the Nationalist party. Mr. O'BRIEN, for his part, contends that the proposals were good, so far as they went, and should have been welcomed as a basis for larger concessions.

The London Spectator regrets that President ROOSEVELT has declined in advance to offer himself for reelection in 1908. "There was no necessity," it says, "for such a pledge, and we wish it had not been given." We agree that the pledge was not necessary, but, after all, Mr. ROOSEVELT will be fifty years old in 1908, and the Spectator must remember that that is an age at which a man who is not rich and has a family likes to settle himself down to some steady job and make his old age secure against want.

At the hour when we write, Marshal OYAMA, who is said to have been reinforced by 600,000 men, and is believed now to have at his disposal about 300,000, is reported to have made a concerted artillery attack on General KIMURA'S right, centre, and left. The movement against the Russian left is described as particularly formidable, and seems to be conducted by General KIMURA, whose death, though often asserted, is again contradicted. Owing to the intense cold which has set in and from which central Manchuria will not emerge before the spring, it is of vital importance to the Japanese, who, for some weeks, have been camping in the open field, that they should drive their opponents out of Mukden, and thus be enabled to take up their own quarters there. Otherwise they will have to fall back shortly on Liao-Yung for shelter. As regards the situation at Port Arthur, the truth seems to be that, for some three weeks before November 17, the Japanese attacks were repulsed, but that as a result of successful tunnelling by the Japanese, the Erismushan and Sandanshan forts, the principal outworks of the fortress, were blown up on the afternoon of the day named. The Russian war-vessel which escaped to Chefoo, and bore messages from General STRASSER, to the Czar, left Port Arthur before the catastrophe just described occurred. But little confidence, therefore, can be placed in the reassuring tour attributed to that despatch. STRASSER is said to have declared himself capable of holding out until March, when the arrival of the Baltic fleet would be expected, provided the Russian government could manage from time to time to supply him with some food and ammunition. There is no doubt that blockade-running has of late been occasionally successful, one large steamer loaded with provisions having entered the harbor the other day.

We repeat what we have formerly said, that until Port Arthur has fallen, and until one of the two armies now facing each other on the Sha River shall have been decisively beaten, we might now add until the Baltic fleet shall have been captured or destroyed—the talk of bringing about a peace between the belligerents is idle. Not even in irresponsible newspapers is the word "mediation" bandied any longer. When peace arrives, it will come through the direct application of one combatant to the other. If, before the close of the present winter, Japan should be everywhere the victor, and should herself propose magnanimous and liberal terms, which should leave Russian honor intact, it is possible that the peace party in St. Petersburg might contrive to bring about their acceptance. It will be observed that the hypothesis rests upon a long chain of "ifs." Meanwhile, the fact should be borne in mind that Japan seems to be nearing the end of her financial resources. Her second loan, like the former, is secured by a lien on her custom-house receipts; yet, although issued at six per cent., it brought only 88, from which the bankers' commissions must be deducted. In these times a poor country like Japan cannot afford long to borrow at such a rate.

The election of Mr. PHILIPPS MORGAN as president of the Metropolitan Museum of Art is an illustrious example of getting the right man into the right place. Mr. MORGAN seems to have all the qualifications for the work. He is the greatest organizer and the greatest patron of art in the world. He brings great energy and extensive knowledge to a work that will be full of interest to him, and that is of lively importance not only to New York, but to all Americans who care for art in any of its forms. The opportunity is worthy of Mr. MORGAN'S powers. General CENSAVA'S death, leaving the directorship vacant, makes it the more readily practicable to introduce whatever new methods are desirable into the management of the museum. The MORGAN bequest has supplied ample funds to add to the collections. There is a great chance to make the museum everything that it should be as a depository of art, and as a great factor in the study of art in this country. Mr. MORGAN seems the man of all others best qualified to aid the managers to make the most of their opportunity. That such a work should enlist a part of the energies of such a man is exceedingly fortunate for the art interests of the country.

The matter of the Subway signs will doubtless end in a local wrangle. We all hate the signs, yet we don't want the Interborough Company to be deprived, without compensation, of any rights to which their contract lawfully entitles them. The whole matter of public advertising and causing disagreement of which the Subway signs are an example, has got to be thrashed out and settled eventually in accordance with public opinion. Meanwhile it must be settled in accordance with such laws as we have, and not such laws as we wish we had. There has been so much irritation, and such an outcry about the signs, that public appreciation of the Subway has hardly found due expression. The Subway is fast running an enormous loss already to the people who travel up and down Manhattan Island, and bound soon to be a much greater loss than it is now. The air in it is not bad at this time of year, at any rate. Any one with the ordinary respiratory and olfactory organs can perceive that.

Professor JAMES HYSLOP, of New York, calls for $25,000 for the support and furtherance for two or three years of a work of psychic research and the publication of material already accumulated. He wants the money to be paid into the hands of the American Institute for Scientific Research, already incorporated, which has been founded to encourage certain scientific investigations. This institute is modeled after the Carnegie Institution in Washington, except that its field is limited to psychic research and psychopathology. It will not engage directly in investigations even in these two departments, but will supervise endowments and salaries for the benefit of qualified workers in them. Psychic research includes the study of such phenomena as telepathy, precognition, ghosts, phantasms, clairvoyance, and the various developments that come to justice through the co-operation of such a person as Mrs. Piper. It is a study which interests many distinguished, shrewd, and thoughtful men, including (in England) Sir WILLIAM CROOKES, Sir OLIVER LODGE, and Mr. ARTHUR HALLAM, and Professor WILLIAM JAMES and Professor S. P. LANGLEY in this country. Psychopathology has to do with such work as has been carried on under PHILIP JANET in the Salpêtrière in Paris. Mr. HYSLOP considers that for its proper study here there should be a clinic for the observation and therapeutic treatment of certain types of functional diseases of the mind—insanity, hallucination, secondary personality—and such troubles as may be made to yield to hypnosis-suggestion. The scheme is that the American Institute for Scientific Research, already founded, shall be sufficiently endowed to enable it to promote and direct investigation in both of these obscure and interesting branches of science.

Professor HYSLOP is an optimist about the usefulness of such investigations. He thinks they promise more for the race than any investigation ever undertaken by man—results more important than any economic or industrial investigation imaginable. The Institute, if it is ever to amount to much, will need a considerable endowment, but for the time being Professor HYSLOP is bending his energies to get the preliminary $25,000 for psychic research. He thinks that the results of two or three years' work which that sum would provide for will justify appeal later for the endowment of the Institute. The board of trustees (still incomplete) of the new Institute includes Professor WILLIAM JAMES, Dr. MISOR J. SWAGE, and Dr. R. HERBES NEWTON. There is a considerable outcry from the teachers of the people just now against our national leaning towards materialism. Here is an object which is as immaterial as any teacher could desire, and which combines with the pursuit of elusive forms of knowledge fair promise of philanthropy. Without having anything more than the commonest lay knowledge of the field that looks so ripe to Professor DIVON, we would be glad, on general principles, to see the money supplied to enable competent hands to work in it. If there were any harvest, even a small one, it would be of highly interesting quality.

The meaning of the Latin title to the German Emperor's eulogical congratulation to President ROOSEVELT is still the subject of diligent discussion carried on by schoolmasters and other learned men, chiefly in the columns of the Evening Post. Somebody ought to ask the Emperor to decide a bet by divulging how his Latin really read, and what it really meant. His greeting was illustrated with curious emphasis what a speculative occupation the study of the dead languages really is. The meaning of every difficult Latin sentence is guesswork even to excellent scholars, and we are told that that fact is one important thing which makes the study of Latin particularly valuable as a means of training minds.

The effort now in progress to unite Harvard University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology is one of the most edifying labors that have ever been put forth in the educational field. It used to be a familiar complaint that Americans who gave money to colleges would rather start a new college than strengthen one already founded. That disposition is not so prevalent as it used to be. The very contrary of it appears in this effort of Harvard and Technology to get together. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology has long been in the very front rank (perhaps the leader) of our technological schools. It stands at Harvard's door. Harvard has had a Scientific School for forty or fifty years. It has never been as strong as the Sheffield School at Yale, but it has been strengthened of late, and is in good condition. The late DONALD McKAY left nearly all his fortune—six millions or thereabouts—to Harvard to endow a school of Applied Sciences. Instead of weakening this great sum of money as a means of building up a strong rival to the Massachusetts Institute, President Eliot and the Harvard corporation have set themselves to avoid, if possible, the needless duplication of institutions in the same field.

The problem has been to devote this large bequest to Harvard to the development of Technology, which could only be done by bringing the two concerns together. Both have strong individuality and large bodies of alumni, and the "Tech" alumni have been very fearful that their institution would be swallowed by its bigger sister and lost. But President PARTCH and his officers have worked willingly with the Harvard people to discover a practical basis of amalgamation. Their first effort was a failure. The jealous "Tech" alumni would not hear of union. But they have worked on, and their latest plan for making the two great schools members one of another has every prospect of success. With the details of it we need not concern ourselves. The main point is that these eminent Massachusetts educators—barring, perhaps, a lesson from the mangled trusts—have put aside all small thoughts and rivalries, and are patiently working out a scheme of give and take, which shall avoid waste, and retaining the individuality of both institutions, make all the funds that they possess between them do the most possible good in promoting every kind of education. The result will be that each institution will be strengthened in its proper field; that Harvard will be relieved of a work which was no need for her to undertake, and that DONALD McKAY's money will do what he intended it should do, but do it better than he planned or could plan at the time he made his will.

Pension-Commissioner WARE, being about to retire from office and resume (we suppose) the practice of law, seems to be expediting his reputation preparatory to inviting his acquaintances to take him seriously once more as a legal adviser. When he was appointed in the post which he has so much adorned, the fact about his personal history which the newspapers most noised abroad was that he was the poet "Ironquill" whose verse had taken so strong a hold in the affections of the people of the West. He had gathered some of his "Ironquill" verses into a book, and the papers got hold of it, and reprinted many of his deliverances, with the result that the dominant thought that the average voter had in his mind about Commissioner WARE was that he was Ironquill the poet. Now we find him exulting himself with the assertion that his rule has been never to sell any of his poetry. He explains his poetical habits. Having done a poem—preferably on the back of an envelope—his custom has been first to throw it into his safe and let it lie six months. Then he "fires it into the broad paper." If it is copied he thinks it may be good; if it is not copied he lets it perish. But he never sells any verse. A New York paper once offered him money to do a poem every week, but he declined. "I want all my reputation," he says, "to come from the West."

There is no objection to a poet's reputation coming from the West, but if it comes, the money that it brings him in will be apt to come chiefly from the East, where the chief literary market is. Why not let it come? All the other Western poets have taken Eastern money and Western money indifferently. They took any good money that offered. So FIELD; so RILEY; so BURT HART; so JOSEPH MILLER. Statesmen have done it. Mr. JOHN HAY—but that was long ago. Every American citizen has a right to refine money for his verse if he chooses, but we do not consider that Mr. WARE has helped his case at all by advertising his exercise of that right. The two great natural divisions into which all poetry falls are marketable verse and unmarketable verse. Most of the good poetry and some of the bad are marketable. Some of the good—especially the more protracted pieces—and most of the bad are unmarketable. Poetry is a manufactured product. There is no way that is at once so simple and (on the whole) so reliable to find out its value as to fetch it to market. If any one will buy it, there must be something in it. If no one will buy it there is probably something wrong with the matter with it. There is an impression that poetry is a drug in the market, but so far as concerns good poetry, or even good verse, that is not so. The demand exceeds the supply.

The inference is unavoidable that Mr. WARE's practice of refusing money for verse is based on a sentiment that that is a more admirable or a more expedient thing to do than to accept money for verse. It does not strike us so. There are four things that the American people, even in the West, admire more in a man than the ability to sell his goods. Massachusetts has just elected a Governor whose chief claim to high distinction lies in that ability, and taste is as rare in Massachusetts as it is in Kansas. Moreover, a poet who avoids the market avoids comparison and judgment. He is open to the suspicion that he either fears his fate too much, or suspects that his doers are small. If his doers are not small the other poets may denounce him with some reason as one who demoralizes the market by giving valuable verses away. One of the complaints of the trusts is that they destroy competition by selling certain of their products for a time at a price below the cost of production. Poetry has its cost of production. With Mr. WARE it is doubtless a by-product. But is he justified—provided his product is valuable—in disposing of it in a fashion that tends to disturb value and deprive the professional poets of their reasonable gains? No doubt he would think it injurious to be called a "scab," but excellent men have suffered that indignity with less reason. Mr. WARE says that Mr. CHARLES GREEN once borrowed a sonnet of him and sold it for five dollars, which Mr. WARE refused to receive, and only accepted because he got tired of refusing it. The transaction reflects credit on neither gentleman. Mr. GREEN ought to have got at least twenty dollars for the sonnet, and Mr. WARE ought to have accepted it with composure. It is possible, however, that Mr. GREEN did better with the sonnet than we suppose, for Mr. WARE has put no copy of it in evidence.

Finally, then, is it avowed that though a man may need to excuse himself for writing poetry, it is no palliation of his act that he does not sell his verses. The less eminent poet who declined to receive money for the practice of his art was Lord Byron, and he was a man who did many things he should not have done, and left undone many things that he ought to have done, and incurred the unfavorable opinion of Mrs. Stowe and others, and was not a safe model for Mr. WARE or any one else. MUTTON took what was offered for "Paradise Lost" (illustrating an eternal truth that the sum paid for a poem may not be, and usually is not, a just measure of its value); TENNYSON was exceedingly able at a bargain, and probably put more money for his poetry than any poet has ever got, before or since; Mr. KILGUS ordinarily takes every shilling his wares will fetch, and does rightly—though for some political or dramatic poems he has for special reasons declined pay. We recommend Mr. WARE to pattern after these eminent practitioners in the field of versification and sell his verses if he can.

The game of football seems to have almost as chronic a need of revision as the tariff. Some attention has been paid to it since election, though politics have so considerably diverted the people this fall that they have not been able to keep more than one eye on the gridiron. There are a great many people not constitutionally unsympathetic with the strenuous life, who think that the present game of football as played by the college teams is a bad game to be in, a stupid game to watch, and a demoralizing spectacle. They insist that it is dull, brutal, and dishonest, and ought to be reformed or perished. For our part we should hate to pass judgment on so turbulent a subject, or even to declare whether we thought that the Eastern war correspondents or the football reporters furnish harder and more painful reading to the American public. Both war and football are sad and bloody subjects, and both the war stories and the football stories make laborious reading for every one but experts. But we heartily wish that football might be fixed up so as to be more amusing and give more general satisfaction. The crowds that go to the great games seem to like to go, but they are good-natured crowds, and easily satisfied, and might like a cock-fight just as well. Certainly they illustrate the perennial triumph of hope over experience, and they are not exerting about the quality of the spectacles they view.

It seems to be one thing to make rules for the elevation of football, and quite a different thing to make the players respect them. The game, as it is played, seems to consist very largely in transgressing the rules. It is no discredit to violate them, and no disadvantage if the umpire is looking the other way. A Boston commentator suggests that when a player is caught kicking in another player's head, or doing something else that is unsporting or discommenced in the rubric, and is ordered off the field, his place shall not be filled. This method, he thinks, would cause the rules to be taken more seriously. The way they do now when a player is removed for unplayful or aggravated assault, is to put a nice, fresh unutilized player in the criminal's place. Of course that is no punishment to the offender's team. To a harshest it seems as though the Boston gentleman's suggestion had good points.

Not all the football reading is dull. We confess, to reading joyously of the incident in the Yale-Harvard game where MATTHEWS, the colored Harvard player, after being kicked in the shin, to his great pain, and repeatedly slugged on the head, to the mortification of his intellect, baited one of the Yale giants in the stomach with such energy that both had to be removed in horizontal postures from the field. That may not have been good football, but it was good something, and it made delightful reading. There are good points about the game. We wish it might be bettered, but even as it is it is not intolerable so long as it is played by other people's boys. That parents should tolerate it in its more violent and encroaching forms as an educational experience for their own sons is wonderful.

We should have set right the slip of the correspondent quoted in last week's Comment who wrote, "Lord Jony Rescued did not do so much for England by a repeal of the corn laws as it is within ROBERTS'S power now to do for the United States." Of course our correspondent meant to say Sir ROBERT PEEL.

Is there Hope of Self-Government for Russia?

THE most memorable incident in the internal history of Russia that has taken place since the fateful day in the spring of 1901, when the Czar ALEXANDER II. was killed by a bomb fatally allowed to have been thrown by a revolutionist, although at that moment a decree convoking a Russian Parliament was signed and in type, is the meeting held in St. Petersburg on November 10 and 20 by upwards of a hundred delegates from the provinces, or provincial councils. That such a meeting should have been permitted by Prince MIRSKY, the new Minister of the Interior, was of itself profoundly significant, but even more impressive is the fact that the participants, although hitherto firmly opposed to revolution, and staunch upholders of the House of Romanoff, expressed the solemn conviction that an immediate concession of representative institutions is indispensable to the national welfare. The incident is epoch-making, whether or no the petition in which their views are presented shall be granted by the sovereign. Here again history seems to repeat itself. It may be remembered that, shortly before 1789, when the French States-General convened at Versailles, a so-called Council of Notables was summoned for the purpose of suggesting means of checking the popular disaffection, by which it was seen that the authority of Louis XVI. was being undermined. The proposals submitted by that council were not, indeed, drastic remedies, but rather judicious palliatives, by which, had they been adopted, the public discontent might have been for some time allayed. In that event, the States-General, had it still been deemed expedient to convocate them, would have met under very different circumstances, and they might have been able to bring about a pacific transformation of the ancien régime, constitutionally autocratic, into a constitutional monarchy, modelled upon that of England. As it happened, the moderate proposals of the Council of Notables were rejected, so that, when the States-General assembled, it was in an inextinguishable temper. The result was that the aristocracy, the Church, the law courts known as "parlements," and the monarchy itself went down, and the atrocious Reign of Terror followed. Russia now stands where France did one hundred and seventeen years ago. It is at the parting of the ways. If the Czar NICHOLAS II. shall heed the entreaties of his conservative counsellors, if he shall resume the work cut short in 1881, and summon a national constitutional convention, for the purpose of placing his country's institutions on a representative basis—and if, meanwhile, he shall escape assassination at the hands of the reactionists—Russia will be launched upon the path-way of constitutional progress, and the dynasty of Romanoff will be its sole heir in that of Hanover in England or that of Hohenzollern in Prussia. If not, it will be overthrown all over Russia, even by those who hitherto have been most loyal to the throne, that the doom of the House of Romanoff is sealed.

To appreciate the moderation of the requests now made by spokesmen of the provincial councils, it is aerial to look back some twenty-three years and recall the level of actual and prospective progress to which Russia had been lifted by the grandfather of the present Czar. Not content with abolishing serfdom, and with providing—largely at the expense of the crown property and revenues—the lands and money needed to make the ex-serfs self-supporting freemen; not content with reorganizing the whole judicial system of Russia, injecting into it the life-giving elements of trial by jury and of representation by counsel; to which was added the suppression of capital punishment; ALEXANDER II. went on to lay broad and firm the basis of national self-rule by encouraging local autonomy. All over European Russia he established provincial, and, under these, district zemstvos, or elective councils, to which were delegated functions previously reserved in an arbitrary fashion by agents of a centralized despotism. In these assemblies, the peasants, the artisans, and the merchants were represented, as well as the nobles; and, in their collective capacity, they were authorized to vote funds for local purposes, and, through their appointees, to apply the appropriations. It is the unanimous testimony of foreign and disinterested observers that for some years preceding the murder of ALEXANDER II. the Russian provinces and subordinate districts enjoyed such more self-government than was at the time possessed by Ireland. We are well understood, however, by the Czar's advisers, and by his far-sighted advisers, that the whole fabric of local privilege would be at the mercy of a change of sovereign and policy, unless upon it should be superposed a national assembly which would take measures to annihilate the organized bureaucracy which had come to be an incubus upon the state. The method of choosing that assembly, the guaranty of its continuity and the power to be vested in it, had all been formulated in a constitution, which, as we have said, had been actually signed, and would have been legally promulgated, had ALEXANDER II. been suffered by the reactionists to live for another day. With him not only vanished the dream of a national Parliament, but, through successive encroachments, the judicial reforms were shorn of their safeguards for civil rights, and the elaborate provisions for local autonomy were reduced to shadows of their former substance. Even the mirs, or peasant communes, which, under the zemstvos of self-dom, had been to a considerable extent self-governing, were gradually subjected to interference and spoliation at the hands of oppressive and corrupt officials representing the Ministry of the Interior. The reaction reached an intolerable maximum under the last occupant of that post, who eventually paid for his tyrannical excesses with his life. One would have to go back to the darkest period in the reign of Nicholas I. to find a counterpart in the baneful length to which arbitrariness, caprice, and greed have been carried in Russia up to the very recent date when Prince Minsky succeeded his assassinated predecessor as Minister of the Interior.

The demands, we rather requests, set forth in the petition drawn up on November 19 and 20 by representatives of the zemstvos have not, at the hour when we write, been published in St. Petersburg, but measures were taken to make them known to the outside world. They include a prayer for the restoration of the former guarantees of civil rights, and the substitution in all cases of prosecution before regularly organized tribunals equipped with juries for the present practice of trying certain offenders by "administrative process"; a prayer for the reversion to the provincial and district zemstvos of their original self-governing functions, and for the extension of autonomy downward by the creation of a zemstvo unit, through the delegation of executive control over their communal affairs to the ulias, or peasant communities; the main object of the petition, however—the object which, if unattained, would make all other become precarious, because arbitrarily revocable—is the immediate establishment of a national legislative assembly, which should be empowered to make laws for the empire, considered as a whole, and the executive representatives of which should, in conjunction with the existing Council of State, which, temporarily, act as the Czar's advisers. Whether, under the proposed system, the ministers would be directly accountable to the national assembly is not distinctly declared. We presume that, for the present at all events, conservative Russians would be satisfied with institutions modelled not so much upon those of England as on those of Germany, where, it will be remembered, the Imperial Chancellor and the Imperial Secretariat of State, though it is of great practical importance to them to secure the good-will of the people's representatives, are in theory accountable to the sovereign alone. Neither do the spokesmen of the zemstvos, so far as the rabid outline of their petition intimates, make any specific suggestion as to the method of electing members of the wished-for Parliament. They may hold that the masses of the Russian people are not yet ripe for the franchise, and it may be that they would be content with an arrangement by which the Russian Parliament should consist of delegates chosen by the provincial and district zemstvos. In that event, the assembly would correspond in principle to the French States-General, may we know by the experience of France that such a body, although ostensibly conservative, is capable, under the pressure of public opinion, of effecting very radical reforms.

It is evident that the participants in the conference held at St. Petersburg sincerely believe the salvation of their country depends upon the adoption of the plan which they propose. They point out that the deplorable and dangerous characteristic of Russian existing governmental system is a complete estrangement of rulers and people, due to a lack of mutual confidence. By such estrangement the governors have as much to lose as have the governed. In the present state of things, the Russian government, though it finds itself confronted by a formidable and exhausting war, has absolutely no means of learning the truth about the condition of its subjects and about the popular needs, and thus is reduced to settling upon what bureaucrats may think, or say they think, is best for the people. As a rule, actions thus prompted only make matters worse, and lead to blunders and deeper alienation. In this way the feeling of safety is impaired on the part of both governors and governed, and a disintegrating influence is exercised upon all branches of national activity. Progress is pronounced impossible, so long as bureaucracy withholds the guarantees of personal rights, and thus paralyzes individual initiative in every way. We observe, finally, that the absence of freedom of conscience, freedom of speech and the press, and freedom of meeting for the purpose of discussion, is singled out as a prime factor in the divorce of rulers and people. The only method of assuring permanent reform in these particulars lies in the regular participation of the people in the legislative government of Russia.

The fact that a meeting which should utter such demands as we have cited was permitted to be held at all is, of course, a proof that Prince Minsky, the new Minister of the Interior, sympathizes with its purpose. No doubt, also, the Czar, when the petition is laid before him, will recall the memoranda submitted by M. Witte just before the removal of the latter from the Ministry of Finance, in which the advisability of yielding to the people a voice in the government was eloquently argued. On the other hand, the petition is certain to provoke violent and powerful opposition on the part of men who, at a pinch, might resort to desperate expedients, and it remains to be seen whether the Czar Nicholas II. will have the courage to defy them. If not, he is likely to perish with them in the clearly predestined shipwreck of the autocratic system.

Mr. Roosevelt's Attitude Toward Tariff Revision

If anything is clearly demonstrated by an analysis of the returns, it is that the election was a personal triumph for Mr. Roosevelt, and in no sense a victory for the "Stand-Patlers." To say nothing of the result in Minnesota, where, notwithstanding the immense plurality given to the President, a Democratic chosen Governor, it is impossible to doubt that a majority of the people of Massachusetts, a State hitherto strongly protectionist, is favorable to revision and to reciprocity with Canada and Newfoundland. Upon no other assumption is it possible to explain the success of Mr. DOUGLAS, the Democratic candidate for Governor, who appealed to the voters on those two issues alone. Even if Mr. Roosevelt were an autocrat, a Stand-Patler—what a comedy his line would be!—he would still be confronted with the question whether, in the interest of his party and of protection itself, it is expedient to let the masses of the people be persuaded that from the Democratic party alone can they hope for a revision of the tariff and reciprocity with their neighbors.

There is no time to be lost if the President desires to take the revisionist wind out of his opponents' sails. Governmental Doctrines of Massachusetts has already announced a determination to bring early in the coming year the reciprocity and tariff reform issues directly before the people of his State, and, indirectly, by their action, before the people of the entire country. He is well aware that, as a State Executive, he cannot bring direct pressure to bear upon Congress, which, under the Constitution, is the tariff-making power; or upon the President and the Senate, by whom reciprocity treaties would have to be negotiated and ratified. He is, however, determined to make the voters manifestly out the opinions of his electors upon these subjects in unmistakable terms, and he considers it his duty to take measures to that end, inasmuch as his successful career was based upon the issues named. He proposes, therefore, to follow the example set by President ARTHUR, and to appoint a commission to make a careful study of industrial conditions in Massachusetts, and to estimate the effect upon them of reasonable tariff reductions and of better trade relations, ascertainable by treaty, with Canada and Newfoundland. His plan is that the commission, if its report were favorable to tariff reform and reciprocity, should embody its recommendations in a very brief resolution, constituting a distinct affirmation of the fiscal changes needed. This declaration he would then try to have submitted by authority of the State Legislature to the people of Massachusetts for a referendum vote. There is a great deal to be said for this proposal. In no other way but by a referendum vote can a categorical answer be given to the question whether either "yes" or "no," can the people express their wishes with regard to a single political or economical issue, irrespectively of their preference for this or that candidate, or their general predilection for one or the other political party. As is pointed out by the Boston Herald, which also advocates the plan of Governor-elect DOUGLAS, our political elections are ordinarily complicated by a variety of issues. No man may think that the success of the Republican party in national affairs is, upon the whole, desirable, in order to ensure a tolerably impartial administration of the civil service laws; another may deem Republican success indispensable in order to safeguard the gold standard; but both may repudiate the theory of "standing pat" on our tariff system. Nevertheless, after a victory at the ballot box in which such diverse motives contributed, the "Stand-Patlers" will assert that the pluralities given to their party's nominee must be accepted as proofs of the general popularity of the tariff system as it is. Mr. DOUGLAS proposes to put an end to such a construction of the verdict rendered on November 8 at the polls, by providing a means whereby public opinion in one State, at all events, can be sharply defined on a single issue, without regard to any other political or monetary consideration.

We perceive, however, that this plan is likely to encounter considerable obstruction. Should the revision and reciprocity commission appointed be made up wholly, or even partly, of outsiders, it is very doubtful whether its declaration would be referred to a popular vote by the Massachusetts Legislature, in which Republicans have a large majority. Even although all the commissioners should be chosen from legislators, and although Democrats and revisionist Republicans should constitute a majority, it is almost certain that a minority report would be made in favor of "standing pat," and of refusing a referendum. It is quite certain that the stand-patlers in the General Court, as the Massachusetts Legislature is called, would make tremendous efforts to ward off the adoption of this report. It is nevertheless probable that the majority report in favor of revision and reciprocity might be accepted, for there is reason to believe that the number of revisionists among Massachusetts Republicans has hitherto been greatly underrated. If we assume, for the sake of argument, that a referendum on the subject would be authorized, and that the response would be overwhelmingly in favor of revision and reciprocity, it is probable that the example of Massachusetts would quickly be imitated in some States on the Canadian border, and that indirectly, a mighty influence would be exercised on the Republican majority in the Fifty-ninth Congress. It is obvious, however, that, if such a movement were carried out against the wishes and efforts of the Republican leaders, it would issue inevitably to the benefit of the Democratic party, which alone in its national platform made a vehement demand for immediate revision and reciprocity. Such a strategic advantage would be lost to them if Mr. ROOSEVELT should spike the guns of the Democratic revolutionists by antagonizing Mr. DUFFEL, and by himself calling upon Congress to initiate forthwith a readjustment of the tariff.

The Outward Vision

And this there is good reason to believe that the President has determined to do. If he hesitates, it is only as to the date when he will do it. It seems to be settled that there will be no reference to the subject of tariff revision in the annual message which will be submitted to the Fifty-ninth Congress on its reassembling early in December. Mr. ROOSEVELT will thus be able to take counsel with all of the Republican leaders in the Senate and House of Representatives, before deciding on the precise scope of his recommendations. It is understood that the special message which he anticipates will not call upon the Fifty-ninth Congress to take up the topic of tariff revision during its short final session which will end on March 4, 1903. Its purpose will be to bring home to the public, and to those Senators and Representatives who will continue in office after the year named, the urgency of readjustment, and, perhaps—this is not yet certain—will intimate an intention to convene the Fifty-ninth Congress in special session immediately after the beginning of Mr. ROOSEVELT's second term. The history of the McKinley act affords conclusive proof that, if the tariff is to be revised at all by the Republicans, the revision should take place as quickly as possible, and not be deferred until just before the election of the Sixtieth Congress. The McKinley tariff, it may be remembered, was not enacted until near the beginning of the political campaign of 1890. There was much misunderstanding concerning the probable working of certain provisions, upon which, naturally, Democratic orators put the worst construction. The result was a landslide, which gave the Democracy a majority of 123 in the House of Representatives, a majority even larger than that obtained by the Republicans on November 3. The Republicans proved unable in the next two years to recover the ground lost and in 1892 Mr. CLEVELAND was elected President. It is evident that a similar mistake would be made this year if a revision of the tariff were postponed until the Fifty-ninth Congress should have assembled for its first regular session in December, 1901. It is extremely improbable, in view of the opposition certain to be offered by the "Stand-Idlers," that a revision of the tariff will be effected before the assembling of Congress when the campaign preceding the next election for the House of Representatives would be under way. Under all the circumstances, we are inclined to accept as well founded the report that a special session of the Fifty-ninth Congress will take place soon after Mr. ROOSEVELT's second inauguration.

Admitting that the President may be favorable to at least such an adjustment of the DUFFEL tariff as would commit itself to the Republican criticism of Massachusetts, we must still inquire what likelihood there is that his views would prove prepotent in the Fifty-ninth Congress. Touching this matter, Representative SMITH of Pennsylvania, chairman of the House Committee on Manufactures, is reported by the New York Tribune to have said that, if the President does call the Fifty-ninth Congress in special session for the purpose of revising the tariff, the matter will be settled as Mr. ROOSEVELT wants it settled. Mr. SMITH is persuaded that the President "can save very near to getting anything but wishes from the next Congress." Of course, Mr. ROOSEVELT's position after the 15th of March, or, for that matter, now, the people having spoken decisively, will be and is very different from that when President ARDEN occupied during his accidental term of office when his attempt at revision miscarried. The comparison, however, does not indicate adequately the grounds of the reverence which Mr. ROOSEVELT may be expected to exercise. In explanation of the anticipated willingness of the legislative branch of the Federal government to hand over practically its powers to the Executive branch, the Pennsylvania Representative just named pointed out that, under normal circumstances, many Republican members of the House would have been left at home at the late election; but that, owing to the President's extraordinary popularity, there was a landslide which "brought in dozens of men who would never have been heard of in the running had we not heard the national ticket." In other words, with so many men feeling that they owe their political existence to the President, Mr. SMITH could not see how there could be much question about Mr. ROOSEVELT's control of the Fifty-ninth Congress. To be sure, the House of Representatives is one thing, the Senate is another. But, with the halo of popular adulation on his brow, and with the enthusiastic support of the popular branch of Congress, it is unlikely that Mr. ROOSEVELT will experience much difficulty in coercing the high-protectionist cabal which for many years has controlled the Senate. The Senate long defied ANDREW JACKSON, but we doubt if it will defy the present President. It would be, at all events, an interesting fight, and we should record its vicissitudes with pleasure.

The first and most noticeable result of a change of scene is a gradual lightning of the spirits, a more hopeful tone about the course of the world, and a broadening charity toward mankind in the bulk. This is doubtless due to the fact that the eye is drawn toward outward things and the mind furnished with impersonal speculations. The very essence of happiness being self-forgetfulness, whatever tends toward sharpening the outward vision leads in health and happiness.

The danger of too great a solitude is that a man may become too exclusively concentrated on his own mental processes without widely enough garnered experiences to judge them by. It is easy enough to trace the effect of such seclusion in literature, where self-analysis has run itself into the ground. When a man like AMEL, of profound and wide knowledge, and endowed with a style translucent and beautiful, sets himself to the luring of his own soul, to an intent listening to every mental response and reaction, as in the Journal Intime, the result is literature, and literature of a very high and important order. Self-analysis shows its inner side, where a general fashion for it sets in and haphazard misadventures begin to look upon their personal confessions as important. From MARIE BARAKATSKY to the most recent woman who has printed her own estimate of herself the whole instinct is libeled, unpleasant, and usually insincere. Sincerity with and about ourselves is a high, moral reach, and almost as difficult an achievement as simplicity. It is only by a blessed original endowment of interest in the outer world, or by a careful training, that one grows to see life unobscured by the shadow of desire. The whole literature of feminine conduct, except in so far as it may serve as the datum of useful psychology, is no more important than a child's list of wishes stuffed up the chimney for Santa Claus. Compare the turbulent, silly, waste emotions of the unhappy wife of modern fiction with the wholesome simplicity of the small boy in a family of sisters, whose sole request at Christmas was, "A little boy, just my size, to fight with." This is a natural desire for a firm and sensible object upon which to try one's strength. The difficulty of self-analysis without wide knowledge is then we know only by comparison. Unless we know others—and only those who live today, but the causes which brought them forth, philosophy, the history of thought and events far and near—we cannot know ourselves, and all we can offer is some distorted and warped image of personal desire. A lifetime's solitude is, as Emerson said, only for a beast or a god.

The education of the child's perceptions is the best means of strengthening the powers of enjoyment. Of what avail is it to drag a child about the universe if he has neither learned to see nor to hear? He can go the rounds and come back gullible of a new idea. A recent experiment with a very high-pitched whistle of many thousand vibrations per second resulted in the discovery that while to many the sound was simply non-existent, to others its penetrating quality was most unbearable. The natural faculty of hearing differs from those who cannot recognize a true heard many times and those who can distinguish the minute differences between it sharp and a flat. Education is the process of so sharpening the powers as to offer the child the widest possible universe of perception and idea. And by so doing we best fit man to cope with the difficulties and with the sorrows of life. It may seem an absurd claim that any specific educational system should overcome the inevitable tragedies of living, and yet as a matter of fact the only impensable is to be limited by a narrow, defensive mind and unsympathetic heart. Who ever learns to identify his sorrow with the world's and the world's sorrow with his own, is lifted up to a plane where personal despair dissolves into nothingness. If our grief should be irremediable, and few griefs are, there remains always the service of humanity to reclaim our thoughts. The world cannot be limited to the fate of one person in it. There is a large scope left for nobility and enjoyment. We have learned that what the Buddha taught the stricken woman who came to him for help, her dead child in her arms. "Go," he said, "and bring me a million seeds from that barren tree where there is no life, no loss." And though she wandered in search the rest of her life she never returned to the Buddha. Her loss was a piece with the law of losses.

The joys of seeing and hearing right, a profound interest in any philosophy or science, a fervent faith in any ultimate truth, these lift a man above the grief of the mutability of all things, and despair of the ocean of mystery about it. It lifts man, too, to a better sense of proportionate values and to see that the first object of existence is to be, the second to do, and far down in the list comes the mere having.

Backerk of Yale kicking off at the Opening of the Game

Hugt of Yale punting down the Field

SNAP-SHOTS OF THE HARVARD-YALE FOOTBALL GAME AT NEW HAVEN ON NOVEMBER 19

The Harvard football eleven was defeated by Yale by a score of 12 to 0 in the annual contest which took place this year at New Haven on November 19. One of the largest crowds in the history of football, estimated at more than thirty thousand persons, witnessed the game. Harvard has been defeated twice this season and Yale once—by West Point. The football championship in the East lies therefore between Yale and Pennsylvania, which has a clean record of victories for the entire season.

The Franquia Airship 150 feet aboveground—the Aerodrome at the Right

The "Montana Butterfly" leaving the Aerodrome for a Flight

SNAP-SHOTS OF SOME RECENT AIR-SHIP TRIALS AT ST. LOUIS

The reader is referred to the article on page 1837 for a description of recent important air-ship trials at St. Louis

A New Epoch in Railroading

By William J. Wilgus

Vice-President of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad

THE electrification of the passenger traffic of two of the most important steam railroads in the world, for distances of from twenty-five miles to thirty-five miles, radiating from a terminus in the greatest city on the Western Hemisphere, may well be said to mark the beginning of a new epoch in the history of transportation.

For over seventy years the steam locomotive has held undisputed possession of the field of long-haul traffic, and has steadily grown in weight and power from the seven and one-half ton "Rocket" of Stephenson, with its train of two ancient coaches weighing nine and one-half tons, to the 150-ton "Central Atlantic" type of today, hauling trains of nearly one-quarter mile in length and weighing over 800 tons.

The time has arrived when changed conditions in great centers of population demand a different system of transportation on our trunk lines than has heretofore existed. Modern steam locomotives capable of hauling through passenger and freight trains will still dominate where units are comparatively infrequent and the haul long, but even for this class of service on roads with heavy traffic electricity will gradually supplant steam as the cost of producing current decreases in central power-stations and the cost of equipment is lowered,—due to cheapened methods of manufacture, the use of water-power, and the invention of labor-saving and more efficient devices.

The travelling public within what may be termed the suburban zone are no longer satisfied with trains of many cars hauled by heavy locomotives at lengthy intervals; neither do they longer tolerate with patience the smoke, gas, cinders, and noise inseparable from the steam locomotive. In other words, the steam railroad, if it is successfully to hold and multiply its suburban traffic, must offer the advantages to which the public has become educated by the marvellous development of electric railways within the past twenty years. Trains at short intervals, prompt acceleration, frequent stops for local trains, independent tracks for express service, and the absence of grinders of combustion, all of which are possible only with the use of electricity, make the motley throngs attractive to the tabor in the city, and thereby propagate traffic. The cultivation of suburban service, too often neglected and despised by steam railroads, in addition to its own primary reward, has the even greater advantage that comes from the long local passenger and freight traffic of the growing communities thus fostered by a popular local service.

Having these objects in view, the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company began in 1899 a careful study of the problem of changing motive power within what has been termed the "New York zone," south of Crotona, on the Hudson division main line, and on the Harlem division south of White Plains. This study also necessarily included the handling, in a similar manner, of the through and suburban service of the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad south of the point of junction at Woodlawn.

The natural conservatism of a large corporation like the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, and the unprecedented magnitude and importance of the change, led to a more than ordinarily careful and deliberate consideration of the abandonment of the long and well-tried steam locomotive for a comparatively new method which had not yet been employed for the peculiar character of service existing on two of the principal trunk lines of the country.

The hauling of 800-ton trains laden with passengers, mail, and express, at speeds exceeding sixty miles per hour, with regularity and safety, had not been attempted by electricity. The Grand Central Station, with its complex system of tracks and switches, and handling from 500 to 700 trains in twenty-four hours, presented a problem of unusual difficulty. Moreover, the change of power naturally involves the substantial rearrangement of the successful maintenance of an existing enormous traffic in conjunction with radical changes in road-bed and structures. As a result of this thorough investigation of the entire subject, the company finally, in 1902, decided to proceed with the change of motive power, and in the following year the State and municipal authorities gave their sanction.

This decision carries with it the accessibility for the improvement and enlargement of the Grand Central Station; the increasing of the size of the Grand Central yard, and the depression of the grades in such a manner as to permit the passage overhead of cross streets from Forty-fifth Street to Fifty-sixth Street, inclusive; a new underground suburban terminal beneath the station, with the possibility of a connection with the Rapid Transit Subway in Forty-second Street; the four-tracking of both the Hudson and Harlem divisions with the electrical zone; the elimination of grade street and track crossings within the same zone; the straightening of alignment at various places, as, for instance, at the Marble Hill cut off in the Borough of the Bronx; and important station improvements at many places.

The planning and executing of the portion of the problem (Continued on page 1851.)

The new Electric Locomotive of the New York Central which had an Official Trial recently at Schenectady, New York

Our Fighting Strength at Sea

By W. S. Meriwether

NOTHING could more emphasise the truth of the maxim that a powerful navy is the best insurance against war than the recent episode in the North Sea. Without touching on the right or wrong of the matter, it is safe to assert that the preparedness which enabled the British

"With ten battle ships," said a distinguished officer of our own navy, "it is probable that we could have won the war with Spain."

In a tabulation recently prepared by the Chief Intelligence Staff of the British War Office, it was the relative order of the strength of the leading maritime nations, Russia and Japan are not included in the count as, owing to the many changes in their naval armaments, they are not comparable with the other nations mentioned. The rest were then in the following order:

COUNTRY	1990-1991	1991-1992	1992-1993	1993-1994	1994-1995	1995-1996	1996-1997	1997-1998	1998-1999	1999-2000	2000-2001	2001-2002	2002-2003	2003-2004	2004-2005	2005-2006	2006-2007	2007-2008	2008-2009	2009-2010	2010-2011	2011-2012	2012-2013	2013-2014	2014-2015	2015-2016	2016-2017	2017-2018	2018-2019	2019-2020	2020-2021	2021-2022	2022-2023	2023-2024	2024-2025	2025-2026	2026-2027	2027-2028	2028-2029	2029-2030	2030-2031	2031-2032	2032-2033	2033-2034	2034-2035	2035-2036	2036-2037	2037-2038	2038-2039	2039-2040	2040-2041	2041-2042	2042-2043	2043-2044	2044-2045	2045-2046	2046-2047	2047-2048	2048-2049	2049-2050	2050-2051	2051-2052	2052-2053	2053-2054	2054-2055	2055-2056	2056-2057	2057-2058	2058-2059	2059-2060	2060-2061	2061-2062	2062-2063	2063-2064	2064-2065	2065-2066	2066-2067	2067-2068	2068-2069	2069-2070	2070-2071	2071-2072	2072-2073	2073-2074	2074-2075	2075-2076	2076-2077	2077-2078	2078-2079	2079-2080	2080-2081	2081-2082	2082-2083	2083-2084	2084-2085	2085-2086	2086-2087	2087-2088	2088-2089	2089-2090	2090-2091	2091-2092	2092-2093	2093-2094	2094-2095	2095-2096	2096-2097	2097-2098	2098-2099	2099-2100	2100-2101	2101-2102	2102-2103	2103-2104	2104-2105	2105-2106	2106-2107	2107-2108	2108-2109	2109-2110	2110-2111	2111-2112	2112-2113	2113-2114	2114-2115	2115-2116	2116-2117	2117-2118	2118-2119	2119-2120	2120-2121	2121-2122	2122-2123	2123-2124	2124-2125	2125-2126	2126-2127	2127-2128	2128-2129	2129-2130	2130-2131	2131-2132	2132-2133	2133-2134	2134-2135	2135-2136	2136-2137	2137-2138	2138-2139	2139-2140	2140-2141	2141-2142	2142-2143	2143-2144	2144-2145	2145-2146	2146-2147	2147-2148	2148-2149	2149-2150	2150-2151	2151-2152	2152-2153	2153-2154	2154-2155	2155-2156	2156-2157	2157-2158	2158-2159	2159-2160	2160-2161	2161-2162	2162-2163	2163-2164	2164-2165	2165-2166	2166-2167	2167-2168	2168-2169	2169-2170	2170-2171	2171-2172	2172-2173	2173-2174	2174-2175	2175-2176	2176-2177	2177-2178	2178-2179	2179-2180	2180-2181	2181-2182	2182-2183	2183-2184	2184-2185	2185-2186	2186-2187	2187-2188	2188-2189	2189-2190	2190-2191	2191-2192	2192-2193	2193-2194	2194-2195	2195-2196	2196-2197	2197-2198	2198-2199	2199-2200	2200-2201	2201-2202	2202-2203	2203-2204	2204-2205	2205-2206	2206-2207	2207-2208	2208-2209	2209-2210	2210-2211	2211-2212	2212-2213	2213-2214	2214-2215	2215-2216	2216-2217	2217-2218	2218-2219	2219-2220	2220-2221	2221-2222	2222-2223	2223-2224	2224-2225	2225-2226	2226-2227	2227-2228	2228-2229	2229-2230	2230-2231	2231-2232	2232-2233	2233-2234	2234-2235	2235-2236	2236-2237	2237-2238	2238-2239	2239-2240	2240-2241	2241-2242	2242-2243	2243-2244	2244-2245	2245-2246	2246-2247	2247-2248	2248-2249	2249-2250	2250-2251	2251-2252	2252-2253	2253-2254	2254-2255	2255-2256	2256-2257	2257-2258	2258-2259	2259-2260	2260-2261	2261-2262</
---------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-----------	-------------

The "Colorado" starting from Boston Harbor on a Trial Trip

This makes a total of thirteen battle-ships completed, twelve nearly ready for service, and one authorized—in all, twenty-six battle-ships of varying types, but of great efficiency. There may be added the changes which have taken place in the battery of modern battle-ships. It is significant that the trend is toward fewer guns in the main battery—an obliteration of intermediate pieces, such as the five and six inch rifles with which most of our battle-ships are now equipped, and instead the installation of a numerous battery of rapid-fire guns of small caliber, and designed for repelling torpedo-belt attacks.

The war in the East has taught some important lessons, among others that future naval battles will be fought at long ranges, varying from four to six miles. This, in the opinion of naval experts, means that the intermediate battery will hereafter be entirely discarded, and that dependence will be placed upon a few heavy guns of great caliber and long range. Set of our latest and greatest battle-ships—five of which are building and one authorized—will carry in their main batteries four 12-inch rifles, eight 8-inch, and twelve 3-inch. Besides, they will have a secondary battery of rapid-fire and automatic guns. These vessels are the Louisianan and the Conquerant, both of which were recently launched; the Vermont, Kansas, and Mississippi, shortly to go on board, and the New Hampshire, authorized by the last Congress, but not yet contracted for.

Foreign naval experts have sneered at the policy which places so many different calibers on one ship, but they have frankly confessed that in gunnery these vessels will float the superior of any of the battle-ship type.

All these ships, however, were designed before that elation of naval armaments in the East. The smoke of battle has not lifted yet, but enough has been disclosed to show that the nation which means to match others in naval armaments must hereafter build its battle-ships on a plan different from those now constructed. Already the experts of our own Navy Department have outlined what our next battle-ship should be, and looking a better name, have called this potential craft the T.S.S. Possible. If built according to the plans which these experts have drawn, this vessel, instead of mounting many guns of different calibers, will carry only three types of ordnance. As planned her main battery is to consist of twelve 12-inch rifles mounted in pairs in six heavily armored turrets, and in the secondary battery twenty-four 3-inch rapid fire guns and eighteen 6-pounders of the automatic type.

In the light of these recent lessons from the East, naval experts now believe that this plan of vessel deserves serious consideration. Records of recent battery practice show that the biggest gun makes the better record—that a pair of 12-inch rifles manipulated from a turret by hydraulic or electric gear can place more shells through a target in a given time than a pair of 3-inch guns mounted in broadside. As the 12-inch missile will cut through armor that the 3-inch projectile will not more than half, and as the razing power of the greater shell—the explosive effect—is more than ten times greater than the smaller one, the value of this theory seems well proved.

The value of the armored cruiser is still a moot question with navy men. Some hold that this type of vessel is an indispensable adjunct to a navy, while others maintain that the money expended for them could be better employed in building battle-ships. The most notable test in recent years was when four of this type, and four which were reported to be the best of their class, went to swift destruction under the gun-fire of the three battle-ships, the second-class battle-ship, and the armored cruiser which halted Terrence's effort at escape from Santiago. But whatever their worth, this country is not far behind other nations, possessing now five of this type which are ready or which could soon be made ready for service, and eight others now building and nearly completed.

Take with this the twenty-two protected cruisers, all of recent build, the eighteen new gunboats, the three scout vessels of twenty-five knots speed, the four new single-turret monitors, the five double-turreted ones, and the coast-defense armorial Destroyer, and it will be seen that the country has now a navy far more powerful and efficient than it ever before possessed.

It has cost nearly a thousand million, this new navy, and there are many to ask the purpose of it. Those who uphold the policy of naval expansion point to the Philippines, the projected isthmian canal, and the Monroe Doctrine, the last being a formula which does not rest on any law of nations, but on the ability of this country to maintain it. It is urged that any one of the three constitutes a good reason for naval strength, and that the three combined make a strong navy an essential to the welfare of a nation which has now irrevocably taken place as a world power.

The English Press

By Sydney Brooks

LONDON, November 26, 1894.

EVERY nation gets its opinions of every other nation from a cliché. This is not an epigram, but a fact, and a fact which is one of the most fertile and amusing sources of international misunderstandings. Americans who, as a nation, are unusually interested in what is being said about them abroad, constantly remember that the Europeans insist on treating as representatively American men and journals that are wholly without weight in their own land. But it should come them to remember that everybody else is making precisely the same complaint. Each one of us is a foreigner to some one else, and all foreigners fall into this habit of mistaking values. The habit springs, I suppose, in part from the sympathy we feel for people who are doing and achieving in other countries the very things we wish to introduce, or have succeeded in introducing, in our own. A community of sentiment and interest makes us fix our attention exclusively upon them, and we gradually come to regard them as the real spokesmen of their country. Thus the Liberals and reformers of Europe have always formed a sort of mutual admiration society. An English Liberal who wants to know something of Germany applies to Dr. Barth, of Franco to M. Guyot or M. Demolins or the Journal des D bats, of Russia to Knapskand and the revolutionaries, of America to the Anglo-American. The Continental and American Liberals repay in kind by treating Gladstone and Mr. Bryce and Mr. Morley and Mr. Lecky and Mr. Charles Dilke as the only trustworthy guides to English opinion. But the habit also springs from another and quite different source. The people of one country have always a considerable feeling for those who are in opposition to the policy of their own country. This has been especially the case since imperialism, which is a strictly selfish and strictly national policy, became the mode. An imperialist has no sympathy with the imperialism of other lands. A Jingo at home has necessarily nothing but hatred for Jingoism abroad. He gravitates instinctively towards the party that is striving to keep the course clear for the ambitions of his own country by preventing other countries from expanding. An English imperialist thinks the colonial aspirations of Germany, France, and Italy absurd, and any German, Frenchman, or Italian who opposes them is sure of his respectful attention. So, too, the most aggressively patriotic and expansionist paper in New York need never lose a chance of assuring its readers that British imperialism was founded on brutality and pillage, and to prove its point it would quote, and for all I know may still quote, solely from the speeches of "Little Englanders."

Great Britain and America have, indeed, been peculiarly given to the pastime of judging one another by fictions. For the past thirty years more Americans have been instinctive Gladstonians. Why they should elect to take the view of English politics from a party which has shown itself during the past two decades to be singularly out of touch with the real movements of English politics is a fruitful question. The fact that they do is undeniably a Englishman perhaps carries as much weight in the United States as Mr. Bryce. As the book we have shown, the stand which Mr. Bryce takes on any English question has an immense influence in shaping American opinion. And yet nine out of ten Englishmen would absolutely deny Mr. Bryce's right to speak for England in this position. In fact, they squint with the position of the late Senator Hoar towards American expansion, and when that is said all is said. In the same way Englishmen generally derive or, rather, used to derive, they do it less now—their opinions on American politics from the very able and unbiassed journal that has striving for many years to apply European standards to American affairs, and finds itself, in consequence, in opposition to almost everything on which nine hundred and ninety-nine Americans out of a thousand are agreed.

It may therefore be useful to set down as impartially as possible the standing which the leading London papers possess in England and among Englishmen. The Times, of course, heads the list. It is still really the most authoritative journal not only in England, but in the world, and it is the one to all the principal organs that share its views. The Times, indeed, is not a newspaper; it is the Times, it is an institution, a necessity, as much of a part of the unchallenged order of things as the monarchy itself. A short time ago when the Times was reducing the price of its subscription to $15 a year, the editor of a great London daily remarked to me that the move was a mistake. "Instead of lowering the price," he said, "they should double it. It now stands at threepence a copy (six cents); they should make it sixpence a copy (three cents). I cannot imagine them losing a single subscriber. Everybody who is anybody in England simply has to have the Times, whatever its cost." I do not know whether my friend's calculation was economically sound, but it shows what is thought of the Times that one of the spread-sheet editors in London should launch the newspaper idea of putting it at twelve cents a day. That the Times is sometimes wrong, that it is often prejudiced and mischievous, especially on Irish affairs, is undeniable; but its unrivalled foreign service, the excellence and authority of its special articles from all countries and on all political subjects, and its magnificent and unflinching open its correspondence columns to arguments on all sides of every public question more than justify its reputation and more than explain its position and influence. It comes nearer to being a national forum than any journal in the world. Whatever happens you may be sure of finding the best and fullest account of it in the Times—be it a law case, a debate in Parliament, an obituary of a great statesman, or a Far Eastern war. No paper that I know of in or out of England stands so closely allied with the army and navy, with the official departments, and with the leading politicians of the country. It made a tremendous mistake in the Piguet case; many people think it nothing less than sacrilege that the Times should condescend to selling Escherichia Brutemans on the installment plan; but for all that it remains the dominant organ of the educated class, its influence transcends all party lines, and though its political complexion is that of high Toryism and protection, it is not too much to say that it is the journal of all England.

The Standard seems rather to have fallen from its high estate of recent years. It is a two-cent morning journal, conservative, but not knee-deep in its sympathies, and has most honestly cut itself adrift from the bulk of its party by supporting free trade. At this moment it is the organ, the solitary organ among the Unitarian class papers, of that section of the clergy which is opposed to Mr. Chamberlain's Social Policy. England is a land of "old favorites." The Standard is somewhat in the position of an "old favorite." It has a devoted, but not, I should imagine, a very large following among "the best people." Before the fiscal split it maintained fairly close relations with the Conservative government, and when the Times, as it occasionally does, is inclined on Liberal policy, for our "best people" are "conservative," the Standard was apt to reflect official views more exactly. But its influence on the general public is small; one rarely sees it taken up in the club reading-room; one rarely hears it quoted. It is a paper which, in spite of its exclusivity and its conservatism, in Mr. Volney Davis of one of the most prominent and persuasive editorial writers in Great Britain, appears to be as the wane. Within the last few years it has been considerably overhauled by the Morning Post. This journal, the second in importance in the country, has the advantage of being connected with great families, has an immense social prestige, and anybody who wishes to get a servant of the best class advertises in the Morning Post; it is the recognized medium. But the Morning Post is far more than a merely society journal. Its foreign correspondence is of excellent quality, and covers an immensely wide ground. It pays more attention to imperial, foreign, and especially to American affairs, than any other paper in England; in Mr. Spencer Wilkinson it possesses the foremost expert of the day on all questions of national defense; and while strong Unionist and protectionist, it is more apt than any of its rivals to get the nation above party. The Morning Post made a superb bid with its war service during the struggle with the Boers, and the notice it then attracted woke people up to the reality of its many other virtues. Next to the Times and Standard, the paper most generally read by the new who are "doing things" in politics, administration, and especially in the army and navy.

The Daily Telegraph, which is incontrovertibly the most valuable newspaper property in the country, is the journal of the leading spirits of the radical and liberal party. It is a paper of an amazing mediocrity over "popular" topics, such as the birth of a royal prince or a court ball or a new play. Its ally-sensu subject is always the most seductive of the year, and its American editorials convey most successfully the impression that the United States is aware all else, the house of queer people and queer dogmas. It is a red-hot protectionist organ, and perhaps in close touch with Mr. Chamberlain than any other London journal; but though it has an enormous circulation and some very able writers, such as Mr. W. L. Courtney and Mr. Vernon Burleigh, the paper was corresponded, on its staff, its political influence. The Daily Telegraph, which boasts a "daily circulation five times as large as that of any penny London morning journal," and is well sold for a halfpenny, is a brightly written, "newspaper" paper, of miscellaneous character, and is the only one of the London papers. American lions, generally sensible and always splashy in its views, it is a journal which makes everybody read and nobody think. Its influence must be considerable, but I should be surprised to hear that it was of the best quality. The news it has to offer with its own forces, the Daily Telegraph, the Daily News, to reduce their price to a halfpenny. The Daily News, after being brilliantly edited for five years by one of the keenest and most astute minds engaged in English journalism, Mr. E. T. Parnell, changed hands a year or two ago, and is now the rallying point for all the extreme liberal and radical opinions of the London press and for its ultra-utopian imperialism. The Daily News makes the overwhelming majority of Englishmen, and increased to be a paper that is worth anybody's while. The Daily Telegraph, on the other hand, is not only a journal of great liberalism and intelligence, but a real political power. Its policy is that of Lord Rosebery—some imperialism and constructive reform. Like the Daily News it is opposed root and branch to Mr. Chamberlain's fiscal proposals. Unlike the Daily News, it will be the representative and to some extent the official organ of the old Liberal ministry.

Among the evening papers the Pall Mall Gazette, Mr. Asquith's publication, appears to live partly on its reputation, but chiefly on Mr. Asquith's dollars. It used to be almost brilliant; it is now, in its last days, a paper of the second order, and there is hardly a point at which its opinion carries real weight. Like almost all the other Conservative journals, it has surrendered abjectly and at a moment's notice to the protectionist propaganda. The Globe is a far less interesting paper, and its editor, Mr. W. G. Smith, is an intelligence. It is a Toryism of a somewhat ancient flavor, and finds a good deal of support among naval and military men. But aside the best of the London evening papers is the Westminster Gazette, the organ of all sections of the Liberal party and conducted with skill, with scholarship, with judgment and humor, by Mr. T. A. Spender. The Westminster Gazette happens in possessing an unrivalled cartoonist and caricaturist in Mr. F. C. Gould, about the only man connected with leading journalism who can always raise a hearty laugh. The best of the evening papers, the Evening Standard, and the Evening News—and do not count. They are halfpenny papers, and bought and read just for their sporting news.

But it is not to the daily press at all that I would recommend an American who desires to get the best of the London press. The Spectator is an everybody knows, it is weekly review. I imagine that nine out of ten educated Englishmen would be willing to be represented by it. It is a sober and philosophical periodical, of views admirably written and of the keenest political and literary insight. The Saturday Review, which was once the best of new authority, but is no longer, and the Athenaeum, which is a sort of weekly edition of the Daily News, are also published weekly. It is that sense they are the Spectator's rivals; in that sense, but in that sense the reader of the Spectator will always be well informed and interested, and may also be sure that there is getting the corner of the events of the week not only in England, but throughout the world.

Comparative Exhibit of American and Foreign Art

By Annie Nathan Meyer

TO begin with the splendid audacity of it all. Not that the work of the American painters is compared with the work of the foreign painters, but that it is really one generation pitted against another—the men of to-day against the men of yesterday, against the men whose work stands authoritatively before us cleared of all contemporary embellishment.

Of the thirty-four foreign artists represented, only ten are living; of the thirty-eight Americans, only eleven are dead. Among these, our oldest painter, William M. Hunt, has been dead twenty-five years, and George Fuller, twenty years; while next in order come Wyant, dead only twelve years; Wyatt Easton, eight; Homer Martin, seven; Whistler, six; and Minor, less than a year. One may well ask who are painting to-day in France and why their work is not held up against the work of our present-day painters? We may be answered that their work is not being bought in America, and therefore is not available, but after talking with those who have followed the exhibitions at the salons and at the recent World's Fairs, one suspects that there is still another reason. Besides, to have shown to the American public any foreign canvases that the very best known would be in haste to do the work all over again. In bringing before us the work of the best-known men, if not always, unfortunately, their best work, the committee sought distinctness in the comparison, and they certainly achieved it. It is not likely we shall hear anything for a long time of the failure of our American canvases to "hold up" with those of the foreigners. This was commonly given as the reason for certain well-known collectors not buying the work of American men. One even heard of paintings bought and sold again because of this mysterious failure to "hold up." I think this kind of thing will be as effectively silenced in the future as was the voice of the patriotic citizen a few years since—who claimed that no one knew anything about our navy until it was actually in hostile action. It seems to me I remember hearing at the time about our ships being torpedoed and certain to tumble themselves over no the first firing of a gun. I believe a prominent Democrat recently ridiculed the idea that the United States is any greater since the Spanish war than it was before. I suppose we are not. I suppose our greatness was all there, but somehow we didn't know it—and did any one else. The guns of Dewey and Nelson and Sampson may not have changed any thing, but they certainly made a difference. And so, because our painters have stepped into their right place, it has not changed their work any, but it certainly will change a certain attitude of condescension, not in this case to the foreigners, but he is too highly trained in art matters, but in the native. In deed, the devoted hand of our betters, who have been buying canvases of the Americans because they loved them, will now find themselves jostled by those who will buy them "because others covet them."

For what has happened? The masterpiece of Inness has been placed next to a large Corot, and one is only sorry that a more representative Inness was not chosen, for the R. A. Ryder shows Delacroix, and one marvels at Ryder's superb color; a recent landscape of Tryon looks more beautiful than ever before a glossy Daubigny; a Blackcock glows even between Diaz and Chardin; a Hotham is full of Monet; a Busee does not rest in the neighborhood of Turner. It will not be surprising if a new note of evaluation begins to creep into American criticism of art, a new consciousness of importance, when a Homer Martin, hung over a superb Monticelli and near an exquisite Daubigny, a glowing Fromentin and a bejeweled Diaz, is seen to be better than ever. It is even more to be desired when a big landscape of La Farge (big in the sense of distance captured), shows one painting after another from his side, not at all because it cannot "hold up," but because it looks down.

Naturally there will be surprises, and those who have believed in the Americans. Chief among these should be set down the marvels in any in which the Murphys come out. One would think, did they not emerge so triumphantly, that the hanging committee had tested them in the point of brutality. For, gray, quiet, of most subtle and delicate effects, they are canvases in one race against the superb colored Regnault, and in another against the radiant Monticelli. And the result is that the delicate, elusive, gray pictures, with their quiet, unseasonal appeal, look fuller, richer, stronger than ever. To me, if the exhibition did nothing more than prove the real strength of that thoroughly native painter, J. Francis Murphy, it would have justified itself. Another great revelation is the real richness of Wyant's palette, so often termed cold. His little gem, "Kewee Valley," owned by Mr. De Silver, fairly glows with the sunlight that streams through a hawk in the great silent clouds he looms so well to paint. And it glows, remember, hung as it is, immediately below a Monticelli.

next to a Diaz and a large Daubigny. This kind of argument seems his audience many pots of ink.

The splendid, animated mode of William Hunt and his "Joyous," with the quality of an old master in it, show him, of course, in our first rank. When one recalls that it is to him we owe our having shaken off the sway of Düsseldorf and gained the first appreciation of the Barbizon masters, we feel that our debt to him is indeed great. The work of George Fuller, for all its dreamy tenderness, for all its elusive charm and vagueness, is shown to possess these qualities from solidity, not weakness. Personally, I have always felt that George Fuller is our Hawthorne among painters. We have all felt his charm, but I think it was to most of us something of a revelation that he could make it so penetratingly felt while shouldering one of the strongest examples of that vigorous figure-painter Neuhays. Another surprise is the loveliness of the two impressive examples of Robert C. Minor in the presence of a Dupré, a Fromentin, and, just across the room, what is perhaps the leveled landscape of the entire exhibition, "Sunset on the Ohio," by Daubigny. Now that Minor is gone, it is pleasant to feel that we may rank him again by the kind of work he did before misfortune clouded his great talent. But perhaps no one emerges from the comparative test more brilliantly than Albert P. Ryder, who stands head and shoulders above his contemporaries in the splendor of his imagination and the power of his individuality. His "Custodian"

His and his young son in a white, sleeveless, stripes up with the same terror that bewildered the poor young nether as "the wild wave, woe his dry."

Perhaps the art of Ryder is not precisely what one would call realistic, but, after all, all art does not have to be founded on life, to borrow a phrase of Newman's; it is sometimes a retouching on life.

I have already spoken of Inness's masterpiece, the (Continued on page 1857.)

"Arrangement in Black and White, No. 1"

By James McNeill Whistler

From the Collection of Charles L. Freer, Esq.

Copyright, 1904, by Charles L. Freer

"A Romany Girl."—By George Fuller
From the L. T. Williams Collection

"The Gale."—By
From the Collection of J. M. W. Turner

"Moonrise—A Canadian Pastoral."—By Horatio Walker
From the Collection of Mr. Alexander C. Humphreys
Copyright, 1901, by M. E. Moorman, New York

"The Virgin Ex"
From the Collection of J. M. W. Turner

THE COMPARATIVE EXHIBIT OF NAT

One of the most important art events of recent seasons in New York is the "Comparative Exhibit Street. The purpose of the exhibition is to afford an opportunity for a comparison of the work mural and portrait painters, are shown to the number of about two hundred. The reader is

The Hour
—By Rhonda, Eng.

"The Reflection"—By Benjamin R. Fitz
From the William T. Krass Collection

"The Artist"—By John W. Hering
From the collection of John W. Hering, Eng.

"The Artist"—By John W. Hering
From the collection of John W. Hering, Eng.
Copyright, 1917, John W. Hering

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN ART IN NEW YORK

of Native and Foreign Art," which is now in progress at the Fine Arts Building in Fifty-seventh American and Foreign painters. Examples of the work of native and foreign artists, other than referred to the article beginning on page 1541 of this number for a further account of the exhibition

Three Views of the Stage To-day

I.—Presentation of the National Drama

By David Belasco

IN the case of any other nation except the United States of America, the present condition of theatrical affairs would present a sad and discouraging object-lesson to the manager who still clings to ideals of art on the American stage and would not willingly surrender his conscience for the sake of sale.

If many dramatic ventures have proved failures in this country it is because art for art's sake is an abandoned ambition. The one relieving feature of a bad situation lies in the fact that we may still place reliance on the sterling common sense and fitness of the American public to bring about radical reforms ultimately, where reform is much needed—and, I hope, in the near future. "You can't fool all the people all the time," and the reforms will be the more lasting because they will emanate from that irresistible power, more compelling than the laws of kings or parliaments—Public Opinion.

It is amazing that theatrical managers in a country like ours having at hand such excellent dramatic material and opportunities for its production should make such poor use of it. It may be true that we lack a preponderance of great writers, but our output of strong, virile, healthy dramas offers stage material of the first and an opportunity for building a national drama, now shamefully neglected.

I may be justified if I speak with warmth on a subject very close to me and of vital public interest, while availing a more potent voice against the wilderness. I can only offer as an excuse the generous appreciation and encouragement of my own work and the performance of my players at the hands of the public; the love of a career to which I have devoted thirty years of my life, embracing all positions from call-boy and prompter to playwright and manager; and an inherent hatred of that which is false and vicious.

There is always a right and a wrong way of doing things. The wrong way of stage management leads to disaster, but it is as self-assured under present conditions that I give it precedence here for that reason.

If my views seem pessimistic it must be remembered that I do not voice a personal complaint in pointing out the evils of the commercialism which has invaded the American stage. The truth of the matter is that a certain body of men discovered that the critical profession offered facilities for the formation of a lucrative trust, "a corner." Of three component elements—players, plays, and playhouses—the last offered a tangible subject. It was merely a question of leases and rentals. They could never personalities—playwrights and players—but they could corner the market for their products. Having cornered almost all the theatres from Maine to California, by a process of elimination they cornered plays and players. To-day, with something like 350 theatres in the fold, the outgrowth of an infant industry of about thirty houses, includes all houses of importance in the big cities of the country and all important one-night stands; all under the management of a half-dozen men; and every night in the season 350 attractions are offered, and the public is questioned to find the bill whether it likes them or no.

Now it is a fact that even mediocre plays may possess sufficient merit to raise them to the heights of success in the hands of a discriminating and competent management, especially with the impetus of competition, supplemented by spectacular effect, personal attention to details, and that intangible thing known as "atmosphere" or individuality. But competition done away with, there is no incentive to do good work. It is the contention of the trust organizers that they have played the managerial profession on a business basis. In a measure they have—so far as the box-office is concerned. But no manager can expect to produce plays, under such a short-sighted policy, that will meet the approval of the public, and it is the approval of the public that makes the permanent success of the play.

The management of a theatre is a man-made business. This was true in the days of Palmer's, Daly's, and Warfield's, and it is equally true to-day. Theatrical managers in the modern era had definite ideas about the art of management—the drama, the stage, plays and players—and they utilized their stages to illustrate these ideas. Each man was an artist in his chosen profession; they were giants in individuality of sympathetic temperament, and of unquenchable personality. The management of the theatre was decided independent of possible box-office receipts inasmuch as it represented the best thought and ability, the closest care and attention calculated to secure results which would return to the public value for its money. The box-office, however, as it is to the life of the theatre, could take care of itself. That is the one main secret of successful theatrical management. It would be well to take a leaf from the old masters' book.

Plays cannot be shovelled out to the public like so many pecks of potatoes. There is no royal road to the permanent success of a play, artistically or financially. Like all important enterprises, theatrical successes require care and attention to details—first, last, and all the time, the attention that one man can give to only one work at one time. Many causes go to make a play financially successful which might otherwise prove a dismal failure, or merely be accepted by a tolerant public lacking better.

Primarily, in producing plays, that elusive element, public taste, must be considered, to secure and hold a theatrical clientele, and the manager should meet the public on its own ground, on its own personal basis; at the same time the individuality of the author and manager must permeate and control the performance. Having his play, the manager must select and cast his players. No man or woman can be successful in a profession that requires the strongest and most convincing portrayal of human emotion and human nature who has not, in a most liberal degree, penetrated into the manifold mysteries of human nature; no playwright can produce a successful play who has not absolute conviction of the truth of the characters and situations he creates; nor can a manager properly produce the play and train those players who cannot create that sympathetic atmosphere which enthralls the unconscious interest of the audience. Automation cannot take the place of temperament no matter how perfect an actor may be in the unvarying but mechanical excellence of his performance—looking that compelling influence he is not worth his pay any more than the manager who attempts to direct him at long range is worth his salt. Seeking after strange gods brings its own punishment—disaster.

Other conditions being right it is in the small things that ultimate achievement lies. The manager should be of mental calibre to grasp and utilize the unexpected "bits of business" that unconsciously creep up during stage rehearsal—a chance speech of the actor, a spontaneous gesture or hapless touch that attracts for the very natural truth and human nature that is in it. Taking no consideration with another, the life of the theatrical manager is not dalliance upon a bed of roses. Like the policeman in "Pinfire," he has his hands full twenty-four hours, in the twenty-four. To properly stage his productions would be sufficient to keep him busy all day.

It is the day's work in itself were it not only a necessary part of the whole. But the reward is certain.

In the present state of theatrical entertainments the public may eventually realize the value of the old system and cast off the trappings of the trust. An anonymous commentary is afforded in the spectacle of six men endeavoring to maintain actual control and management of over twenty-four houses, scattered throughout the country, over scores of many days' travel, dictating policies, determining on the details of the business they control, deciding whether high priced plays shall be produced—musical comedy, drama, or vaudeville—each, incidentally, in this suburban, the slightest regard to the wishes of the people of any particular city. That is not the way to run a theatre—it is a trust method of running a commercial enterprise.

David Belasco in His Study

It is only by a comparison of methods that popular vendibles of plays are explained. The individual manager has all he can do to manage one theatre if he proposes to give to the public the best that is in him and his play. He must be able to judge a manuscript and to successfully develop it into a play. The story, no matter how primarily dramatic, must be presented in such shape as to appeal to the audience. Experience alone makes the playwright, and the work of the manager must supplement that of the author. The construction of a play must be its harmonious confirmation to dramatic laws. Good plays are made so by a process of elimination as much as by development. The work of the manager is to Italianize the characters and fitting them into a harmonious whole; train audacious vague characters won't do behind the footlights, notwithstanding the ability of the actors presenting them. He has to think out and develop scenic effects, to praise or expend plots and situations, train or untrain players. He has to secure the necessary atmosphere, individuality, and personality which impresses dislocation upon every performance and the work of every actor (and if every actor were an artist he would still need managerial assistance and direction). His is the work of revising, twisting, turning, adjusting, pruning, varnishing, and experimenting, until the finished picture is ready to be held up to the judgment of the audience. In the properly ordered disorder of managerial work it is "Manager here, manager there, manager everywhere!" And, in addition, he has to devote personal attention to the multifarious duties of house as well as stage. And all this while, during the entire performance.

These days the public is keen to appreciate excellence. It wants and is entitled to the best from both manager and actor. To secure this means a total outlay of work as well as capital. The actual presentation of the play represents but a small part of the work done behind the scenes. Writing a play is one thing, acting it is another.

It must be obvious even to the uninitiated that a tremendous amount of work must precede the production of any high-class performance calculated to obtain any measure of success. There is, in fact, an infinite variety of preparation. In a single production at my theatre three separate and distinct companies are trained. After selecting and rehearsing the first people there is still the training of the second understudies, and, again, the third understudies. Collectively and individually they are rehearsed and re-rehearsed, and even, after being keyed up to a proper degree of excellence, must be maintained at that point, for upon the sincerity and convincing qualities of every performance rests the fate of the play, its life, and its success.

Differs alone do not make a manager (in the sense of achievement, I mean) or develop successful plays. The work must be in sympathy with the public taste, and the manager must possess natural gifts and the literary faculty that will enable him to correctly judge a play and to make the author's intentions his own. Through study and experience he must know how to direct the vital spark of interest, illuminate it, and prevent it to the extinction of the critical audience. For there are no more intellectual theatre-diehard, and even the readers of books. With those illustrious I concur and believe that the vital essence of a play is seldom found in the original—"good plays are not written, they are rewritten." And the vitalizing and naturalizing process takes place at rehearsal.

Consequently, the failure of a manager has apparently the sole subject of our present-day management is to ring up the curtain and "get it on." If they have to "get it off" they have their own methods of "getting it on again." The effect is only imagined as the most of individual actors, most of individual managers, stage forty or fifty pieces, high-salaried actors are employed and left perfect to interpret the attraction. Theatrical management at long range is an imposition on a long-suffering public.

It is one of the revealing signs of the coming times that the attempt to fasten foreign plays upon the American public—whether or not the plays possess merit—has come a cropper in the "naturalization" process. The time is not far gone when English playwrights could make their own terms with American managers, but the latter found out that they had to pay dearly for the folly of imposing on a people capable of thinking for themselves. While there is plenty of good material here at home awaiting the producer's hand, it is not necessary to adapt or adopt the national drama of England, France, Germany, or Italy, excellent as each may be to his native soil. The liberal democracy was sharply drawn last winter when theatrical waters were plentiful. To-day the American public is offered a hash and relish of all that is good, bad, and indifferent. Plays are being played, and actors are being played with, with no more, and after a "business method" rehearsal from ready-made prompt copy, are thrown on the stage, to take or not, as may happen. And this to the exclusion of our own playwrights, who are patiently awaiting a hearing. Upon them rests the fate of our national drama; looking a hearing and consequently experience, the vital thing to both author and producer, the American drama is still in the process of making. Furthermore, poor foreign plays have weakened the drawing power of really capable actors, those legitimate "stars" who require a variety of roles to properly display their graces.

Conservation should not be the consideration in theatrical business. If the stage is properly looked after and plays properly staged attractions will attract and commercialize as represented by the box-office will take care of itself. Continue an audience that it has really viewed something that has appealed to intelligence and heart, and there will be no necessity to worry about financial results. That personal comment and telegraphic queries which spread a favorable impression of a good play, well staged, is more effective than any other influence that operates for a theatre's welfare, more powerful than the power of the press. "Pushed" houses follow.

Assuming a skilful and liberal management, the play which has received the greatest response from the public is the play that has given the most painstaking care in its preparation. That is the system of management that makes the successful play.

II.—Musical Comedy and Plays Abroad

By Sir Charles Wyndham

WHATEVER may be the concern of patrons of the drama about methods of management and play production, a promising sign of the times is found in the very evident interest of the American public in all matters that concern the stage, both at home and abroad. Doubtless to community of preference and taste is attributable, in particular, curiosity about English conditions and productions which any hold a promise of the future for the American audience; and, after all, the audience is the real judge and jury upon whose verdict hangs the fate, if not the selection, of the play; whether its plays are made for it abroad or at home, it reserves the right of final judgment on the play itself, and is not vitally concerned with side issues.

The present condition of theatrical affairs in England, while most promising in every phase, is notably so in what one is apt to regard as the most widely popular, the Musical Comedy—the prevalence of which would vitiate the public. The fact in England of the drama despair—the evoked and poor consequence the less dignified form of theatrical expression. Please understand I do not condemn it; on the contrary, I often find myself, on occasion of fillety, seeking relaxation at the feet of the gods and goddesses of this art.

It is easier in these strenuous days to take your nourishment in the form of farinaceous food. But farinaceous food is not long-lasting, and is a kind of diet which, if partaken of too long, is apt to pull on one and vitiate the public. The fact in England is being gradually recognized that it is possible to be fed on a mixed diet, as light as pleasant and digestible, but more solid; and it is supplied by a recurrence to the older form of musical comedy, adapted to the lighter taste of the day. The ideas are there. A year ago was produced a comic opera that I understand will be presented in America before long ("The Duchess of Dantzig"). Neither public nor artist will feel or need fed at the end of an evening spent with such a musical production that the evening has been wasted, or too frivolously spent. There is talent in the construction of the acting, and in the singing which above the plane on which musical comedy has flourished for the past ten years. I prophesy a great success for it, and, if she is in proper form, for the principal interpreter, Miss Evie Green—a charming singer, and a superb actress. I can speak impartially, for I have not the advantage of her acquaintance. "The Duchess of Dantzig" has been followed by "Veronique" to homes that not the most popular of musical comedies can outshine. I doubt if these former operas would have been possible five years ago, and their success to-day rings the bell of the last artistic of this latter.

In this connection, I have been asked as to the possibility of the revival of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas. As a matter of fact, they have never died. They only sleep in London. In the English provinces there is a constant demand for operas that travel year after year and plays to crowded houses. They are the truest, worthiest form of musical comedy. I saw them only a few months ago. They were, happily for myself, at Brighton the work I had to give there a little rest, and changing these operas as they did each night, found me and friends there, delighted spectators. The satire that characterized them is a little too familiar, but new plays written on the same lines will score as much as ever.

It is not surprising that in accord with the changing spirit and progress of the times, changes in methods of theatrical production should arise, or that the public should take more than a passing interest in what concerns a favorite amusement. But those things that concern solely the business or commercial side of theatrical affairs, as it respects the production of the late of dramatic productions, which rests solely upon the preference of the audience. Personally, I do not think the drama has ever been in safer hands than those at present. It is a curious fact that musical comedy is engineered by syndicates—the drama by individuals. The latter are more apt to offend the taste of the audience, whose tastes, interests, and personal ambitions are the last things for energy. It is the individual, not the syndicate, that aspires, in the manner of production, in the organization of proper ensemble, and the selection of the best available talent around him, in the construction of the acting, and in the singing which above the plane it is. I am surprised that the experiment is not tried here.

It is unfortunate that the outlook for new plays is

Henry W. Savage in His Study at Moscow

The Latest Photograph of Mr Václav Kynčel

and more encouraging. It is in England about the same as it is in America; more favorable promise could be desired. There is, however, for England a strong hope of assistance from the novelist. The English author is gradually awakening to the fact that a play will bring four times the amount of profit that a book will, and he is gradually studying the necessary methods of play writing, the greater convenience, the effect of appealing to the eye and to the ear, writing his dialogues as it were in telegrams, so that an idea is lost or ambiguities made inequitable and generally preparing himself to increase output.

I have been asked if it is the fact that our English dramatists are unduly influenced by the possible profits accruing to the American production. It is in no sense true. The problem raised which follows the production of a successful work is naturally a matter of consideration, but our dramatic art is in no danger because of the increased commercial opportunities that offer themselves to the playwright. The return, ready and generous, that naturally waits on achievement is sufficient to encourage our authors to produce the best that is in them. Of necessity the first consideration is to achieve success at home. Then American automatically follows. All the attention of the playwright must be centered on producing something acceptable to the audience—the English audience—they are addressing. There are some authors who are beginning to produce their plays first in America, and, consequently, to so fashion them that they shall be acceptable to American audiences. They are not, however, numerous, for such method of procedure may be likely to argue non appreciation first in England.

As a general rule, authors insist upon an English production first, and never dream of so shaping their construction as to make appreciation in America a certainty. It is obvious, of course, that the commercial spirit may influence the work of the playwright, as that it may enter into the management of a theatre to the extent of placing art in the second, rather than in the first place. In every country, there are successes where art is only a secondary consideration, though fortunes are rolling into the pockets of the enterprising managers, but under normal conditions the author may be relied on to produce sincere work, and I think I may say that when a theatre is in the hands of the actor-manager art must necessarily be predominant.

III. American Managers and Players

By Henry W. Savage

IN the development of theatrical enterprises, the manager must use as much judgment and system as the fruit-dealer or fruit-dealer, who also handles goods perishable and dependent on the caprice of the public. The business risks that he takes are still greater, for the untold wars of the florist can be turned over to the banker, or the fruit-dealer can send his wares of pineapples to the country, but to night's tickets will never be sold again, and from an unsuccessful production remain only stretches of canvas and tangles of useless costumes. Naturally, therefore, a man considers his market, just as a dry goods merchant, if he were establishing a branch in Havana, selects his lines and colors, and his assistants, who are familiar with the customs of the country and who can speak Spanish. So should the producer especially select his offerings for the public. That is the reason why in making up my productions for this great country of ours, with thousands ready to be amused by comedy, or to enjoy good music, I have addressed always the production of American plays, the advancement of American actors, and the rendition of grand operas in the language of the nation.

It is peculiar maybe to the American public to evince a personal interest in influences which affect a favorite form of amusement; and it is possible, too, that a fictitious value may be given to extraneous affairs. So far as theatrical productions are concerned, however, there can be no cause for apprehension, when necessarily the object of the manager and the desire of his clientele agree on one ambition—the successful production.

While there may be an element of sentiment in my advocacy of such productions, the basic principle underlying has been the appreciation of the business policy to make American theatrical productions for American theatergoers. The people who pay their money for entertainment in this busy country of ours like to see upon the stage characters with which they are familiar and to hear operas which they can understand. No nation in the world has a keener sense of humor or is more ready to laugh good naturedly at its own foibles. But we have had foisted upon us for years German farces and French comedies for which the average American has no more use than an Esquimaux has for winks; and then he has been blamed or censured for a lack of culture and appreciation. American humorists are known all over the world; yet only within the last few years has a generation of American playwrights arisen, whose satire is no keen, whose comprehension of our natural weaknesses as pointed, and whose character-drawing as admirable as anything France or England has to offer. It is not better to take the chance of producing a play written by an American conversant with, and observant of, American life, characters, and customs, and built especially for an American pub-for, than to take a foreign production which has to be cut and altered to suit our market.

Simply to call our witnesses, consider the record of Adèle's "Comedy Chairman," "Sultan of Sulu," and "College Widow;" "Bliss of the Yankee Consul;" and "Cherlock," "Pecary & Loder's" "King Dodo;" "Princess of Wales;" all dealing with American types, exaggerated, it may be true, but not outlandish, and with lines of class, wholesome American fun. These are all the first efforts of young American authors. The success shows the quick response of the public to the business-theater, and the advanced.

Musical comedy, with its gorgeous coloring of costumes, rhythmic and accurate movement of a well-trained and well-favored and musical chorus, a light and not too subtle plot, and clever, natural comedians, gives for the busy American, who likes his amusements in tabloid form, pleasure left to the eye and ear. If kept away from horseplay and the rough flavor of the burlesque, the musical comedy offers a form of amusement that will hold its own for years to come.

Comedy proper, lacking the assistance of color and music, demands still more the use of American character and American situations and background, so that it may be understood at once by the thousands of good theatergoers unfamiliar with London lodgings or German spas. It is the delineation of familiar everyday people that best appeals across the footlights to the look of Americans, provided the American author is observant enough to grasp and shape these types successfully.

In music, it is my opinion that the story should be unfolded in the language of the nation where it is sung. Just as in Germany everything is given in German by the will of the Emperor, and in France everything in French, so in America it should be given in our native tongue. If English is good enough to speak in, to write in, and to think in, it should be good enough to sing in, especially with a proper translation, and our singing heard to the requirement of the singer. I have yet to hear in English anything more odd than "Carmen" as given in German at every German opera-house. But by such performances in German is every German lad made familiar with Flot's masterpiece.

In our musical productions we are handicapped by the lack of any national conservatory, with its scores of graduates, who must, as in France, give their services to the opera of the nation as one of the conditions of their tuition. We have seen the subsidy granted by even the smallest cities in Germany to the local opera-house. But the ambition and energy of Americans apply to the artist, as well as to the business man, and the welcome given this year to the English Grand Opera Company on its ten thousand-mile trip over the United States and Canada shows that our American singers have the public their subsidies of an opportunity for an experience on the American stage without the loss of time and without the difficulties and hardships which an American singer must undergo abroad; and also that the day of the opera for the American singer has not come for the many is an absolute possibility of the very near future. As for material, for example, in our lighter musical works, the grade of intelligence of the audience is materially higher than formerly. This is partly due to the adoption of the same methods of training and promotion that prevail in a business house. To be sure, many a girl wants a speaking part immediately, and demands at entering the chorus, although she has no voice value. It is better to average for stenographers or teachers, and with possibilities of advancement infinitely greater.

In making the special English production of "Parafal," I had the desire to show, first, that with American mechanical ingenuity it was entirely possible to present this novel kind of production outside of specially constructed opera-houses. In some cases we are said to have improved. For instance, even at Bayreuth the lights are simply dimmed on the whole of each panorama during the scene showing the journey through the woods to the castle, but in the American production all border lights and footlights are so subdivided into sections, and every section so connected with the special switchboard, that not only do the panoramas, but also the light scenery, harmonize and Parafal on their journey. Each panorama with its scenery is moved by a special cable led to a huge wheel shaped like a telescope, the fastest moving gears for the largest section, and respective diameters are so adjusted that all panoramas must move together while at Bayreuth the scenes were landed hand over hand by the stage force, with four conductors, to have them finish as near together as possible.

Secondly, I wished to prove that with the enthusiasm and cooperation of young American singers and of foreign artists who are willing to sing in the vernacular it is perfectly possible to present in English the most-discussed opera of modern times, and the critics of New York and Boston have said that "Parafal," as presented in English, has lost none of the improviseness or the newness of the charm which have surrounded it in Bayreuth. There are persons in other countries who maintain that an American cannot make anything more pretensions than a syncopated ditty or a vandyke sketch, and these are among us who are inclined to that belief. While we are ready to sit at the feet of genius from whatever clime, I have a deeper hope, and I believe the day will surely come, and that not at a distant date, when the American author will have the first call on the American producer, not by a government ordinance or government subsidy, but by the positive workings of commercial demand, and supply, and that the American stage will be primarily for American productions and for giving first place to the efforts of American actors and composers.

The application during the past few years of business principles to drama is not only in production, but also in delivery to the public, has eliminated such uncertainty, insuring a more positive financial return both for manager and artist, and thus something the way for the unbiased judgment of the audience on whose acceptance or refusal of each production on its individual merits the future of the American stage depends.

Air-ship Trials at St. Louis

By Homer Bassford

WHEN the Nautilus-Dumont No. 7 met ruin at the hands of vandals late last summer, there was some reason to believe that the air-ship trials planned by the St. Louis Exposition management would come to nothing. If the famous Brazilian, with all of his experience and his best ship, could not repair in time for trials before the close of the Exposition, set for December 1, there was little occasion for hope that untrained air-sailors would get unfinished machines ready. There was no time to repair about the aeronautic concourse, however, with half a dozen participants, but it was not until the afternoon of October 23 that a flight was undertaken. At two o'clock on that afternoon, practically without notice, the Baldwin ship, sixty feet long, equipped with a small air engine, made a dash for the sky. The crowd, which numbered some of the heads of one hundred thousand in-clothed persons, who, up to this time, had crept themselves in looking about the more conventional wonders of the Exposition, for half an hour the Baldwin ship, manned by Ray Knabenshue, of Toledo, Ohio, responded instantly to rudder and propeller. It was not until Knabenshue, encouraged by his unexpected success, attempted to increase his forward speed, that he fell into trouble. For some reason—possibly nervous excitement—he failed to apply his power carefully; there was an accident, and the motor "went dead." The construction of Knabenshue's carriage did not allow him to get within close reach of the motor, and the consequence was that he found himself 1000 feet in the air, helpless except as to his rudder, which was still at his command. Falling in with the air current, the Baldwin ship started on a coasting voyage. With the aid of the rudder, Knabenshue, in a measure, controlled the machine's movements to the extent of choosing a landing-place. Late in the afternoon, the ship came down in a corn-field not far from Kaskia, in Illinois. After repairs and provision against a like accident, Mr. Baldwin's California air machine, with Knabenshue for a second trial. This time the ship rose to a height of 1200 feet, was lowered and raised at the will of the operator, circled the Exposition, went among the State buildings, passed over the Filipino reservations, in the utter astonishment of the strange people gathered there, returned to the aeronautic concourse, and landed within ten feet of the starting-point. It was probably one of the most satisfactory air-machine trials ever made, if not quite the most successful.

It did not require the testimony of Engineer Knabenshue to prove to the operators of the remarkable flight that the Baldwin ship was dirigible. No state was its response to the touch of the rudder that Knabenshue more than once turned the ship within its own length. He sailed into the wind, across it, and with it. The scientific value of this first entirely successful flight is undoubted. After another flight, the second of the series, on the first of the series, Knabenshue had not ascended more than 200 feet when he discovered that something was wrong with his engine. He at once alighted, and with Mr. Knabenshue and several assistants, made quick repairs. The three receptacles, and was sailing the ship unperilous when a loose-end bolt slipped from the engine, fell to the ground, narrowly missing one of the adjoining hundreds. Knabenshue was again at the mercy of the air currents, but by his skillful use of his rudder he managed to choose a landing-place and alight without untoward incident.

Spectacular as were the Baldwin flights, early interest attached to the Hippolyte Francois flying machine, the greatest air-ship ever built. The Francois, built by French capital in France, under the general direction of M. Prosper Lantier, was the invention of Hippolyte Francois, who, with several engineers, has been engaged for months in perfecting its equipment. The Francois is 150 feet in length, stands more than forty feet in height, has a gas-tank holding 65,000 cubic feet of gas, carries an engine of fifty horse power, and lifts about 1000 pounds.

The initial trial was made on November 14, when the ship was sent to the height of 100 feet, with M. Francois on board. In charge, and M. Henri Schneider as engineer. Count De La Vaulx, the celebrated French aeronaut, was the master of ceremonies for the first trip, giving the signal for the start. The ship acted well from the beginning, responding instantly to rudder and propellers, of which there are two. Although facing a breeze of seven miles an hour the ship proved her dirigibility beyond doubt.

The Renow machine from Montana has made two successful flights, both under unfavorable circumstances.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

THERE are books which are to the spirit of man what Nature is to the fagged and weary mind and body, books which remind us of Isaiah's words: "In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence is your strength." They throw a new serenity upon common life, and give it fresh significance and divine meaning. They cast a radiance upon the daily routine, and radiate its value in the light of experience and history. They teach us that there is a close relation between spiritual conviction and the ordinary events of life, and that life is governed by faith and controlled by mental law. Two such books have come under my observation lately, namely, The Wanderer of Laramie, by Mary E. Walker, and Doctor Luke of the Labrador, by Norman Duncan. Miss Walker's book has less an incident, less of humor, than Mr. Duncan's, but it is written with great simplicity and feeling, and handles character with sincerity and spiritual understanding. Both books have this in common; they are concerned with the forging of a character, with the redemption of a crushed and crippled soul through the love of a good woman, through labor and faith—"Love and labor and faith," as Doctor Luke told Davy, "Just faith," he repeated, "in the loving kindness of the dear God—with small regard for creeds and forms." Both books, too, are saturated with the invigorating breath of God's out-door; the scene of the one is laid among the Green Hills of Vermont, and that of the other among the islands of the Labrador. The people are simple, circumscribed, and, living closer to Nature, they are more elemental in their instincts and desires and aspirations, more appealing and direct in their ways of life. "Here are no brick walls," to quote Mr. Duncan, "no narrow and need or circumstance, no crushing invasions, no gasping haste, no spurious distractions, no clamor of a thousand senseless voices to blind the soul to the pure desires, to darken its fears, to divert its eyes to the career calls—to about it is, to thrive it, to sicken it in every part. . . . They who have not known before that the heavens and the earth are the handiwork of God, here discover it; and perceive the Presence and the Power, and the wisdom and the goodness. Thus our land works its marvel in the sensitive soul. I have sometimes thought that in the freshness and vitality of the life disclosed in it is sounded the great key-note of life—with which true hearts ever seek to vibrate in tune."

Much still is made at the fact that in Doctor Luke of the Labrador, Mr. Duncan has annexed a new territory in fiction, and this, no doubt, will enhance the value of his work and add to the attractiveness of his story. The intimate study and observation of the customs and habits of the fishing-folk of the Labrador have contributed to the freshness and vitality of the life disclosed in his pages; many of his revelations startle and amaze us, and we are moved to wonder and pity at some of the conditions described and hidden away in this corner of our land. But what I prefer to emphasize here is the remarkable human quality of the book. Mr. Duncan's discovery is greater than that of geographical or sociological import; he has rediscovered for us—and we stand in constant need of the reminder—he has revealed to us once more the depths of the human heart, its possibilities for joy and sorrow, for sin and righteousness, for comedy and tragedy. He has come to the task with the endowment of the artist: imagination, sympathy, reverence, and love. Like Barrie, with his native Thramis, Mr. Duncan loves and reveres the Labrador and its dwellers, and shares with him the spiritual vision that pierces to the marrow and sees divinity in the coarsest of God's creatures. Like Barrie, too, Mr. Duncan is a humorist, and his pathos is the more telling and reaching for the restraint which his humor puts upon it. Take, for example, the incident of Miss Threlk, a dull girl, shrewdly, shiftings, the mother of two young sons, who came to Doctor Luke upon hearing that he had just been appointed magistrate and was able to "marry folk."

"I heard, wot," she desisted, addressing the doctor, but looking where, "that you're just after marriage! Aunt Annah!"
The doctor nodded.
"I low," she went on, after an empty pause, "that I want t' get married, too."
"What's the man?"
"Jim he 'sawed two year ago," she said, staring at the ceiling, "that we'd go south an' have it done this way, an' I was to be married, but—"
"Well, now," said she, "Jim ain't here. You couldn't do it 'bout Jim he'd have, could you?"
"Oh, no!"
"I 'sawed you might be able," she said, with a little sigh, "if you tried. But you couldn't, say you?"
"No."
"Jim he 'sawed two year ago it ought t' be done. You couldn't do it now?"
The doctor shook his head.
"Couldn't make a skill at it?"
"No."
"Anyhow," she sighed, rising to go, "I low Jim won't mind now, he's dead."

Norman Duncan
Author of "Doctor Luke of the Labrador"

Could anything be savor or more poignant than the mingled humor and pathos of this passage? Then there is Skipper Tommy Lover, an original character of sheer delight, who deserves to take a place among the humorous creations of our literature. Nature alone forbids me to quote from the quaint and profound wisdom contained in the "gospel" according to Tommy.
The Lord showed what life was about," says Tommy, "when He made woman. He made them with His own hands, an' if He was a 'liffit' t' take the responsibility, us men can do no less than stand by as' whether it be 'Tis our own idea that He was more set on fair lines than saithin' qualities when He shabbed His model. 'I'll make a craft,' says He, 'for looks, an' I'll pay an heed,' says He, 't' the cranks she may have, hopin' for the best.' An' He done it. That He did! They're tidy craft—oh, ay, they're wonderful tidy craft—but 'tis Lord help us in a gale o' wind. For myself, I shud place Doctor Luke of the Labrador beside A Wizard of Thramis, and my hope is that it shall prove as strong and sound a bulwark for faith, for courage, for comfort, and for all that makes us love our fellow men.

Is "Edward Mott Woolley" another pen-name under which Mr. George Hays McCutcheon is masquerading? I find this name on the title-page of Roland of Aitkenburg, another Zenda story just issued by the publishers of Greenback. I had not read half a dozen pages of Roland of Aitkenburg before I was struck with the similarity of its style to Greenback, and as I read on I was more and more impressed with the turn of thought and fancy and phrase, and the general constructive plan common to both narratives. Mr. Woolley's name is new in the literary world, and as Mr. McCutcheon has already been guilty of hiding his versatility under a pen and name, it is pardonable to suspect him of another coup d'auteur. If Mr. McCutcheon is the author of Roland of Aitkenburg, he is to be congratulated upon a clever disguise, even if it is pretty much in the nature of a replica of Greenback; if he is not, then he may take solace from the saying that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery.

The manuscript of an unpublished story written by Robert Louis Stevenson when he was thirteen or fourteen years old has just come to light. Its publication, I regret to say, is being negotiated.

FRITZI SCHEFF, WHO IS APPEARING AT THE BROADWAY THEATRE IN "THE TWO ROSES"

Miss Fritz Scheff, who was last seen in New York in "Rebelle," is appearing at the Broadway Theatre in "The Two Roses," a musical version of "She Stoops to Conquer," written for her by Stanislaus Stancu and Ludwig Engländer. Miss Scheff's company this year includes Louis Harrison, Roland Cusinsingham, M. E. Whitley, and Ida Buehly.

Correspondence

A PLEA FOR THE BUFFALO

MANCHESTER, N. H., November 1, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—For many years now we have been talking to regard the American bison, commonly called "buffalo," as a doomed animal, and in truth few of our's realizers approach as close to the verge of extinction without becoming actually extinct. Just the time has now arrived when it should be generally understood that the American people have one more chance to save this the grandest hoofed animal which ever trod the soil of their country. This chance lies in the fact that the management of buffaloes is now understood, and that the animals have proved as easy to rear and less expensive to feed than domestic cattle. This has been demonstrated in every case in which herds of buffaloes have been maintained under reasonable conditions. For instance, in the Blue Mountain Forest Game Preserve, at Newport, New Hampshire, a herd of about thirty head, established there by the late Mr. Austin Corbin, has increased within the last few years until to-day there is a herd of over one hundred and sixty splendid animals. A small herd of twenty, established two years ago in the Yellowstone National Park, has already doubled in numbers. There are, however, so few buffaloes anywhere, that if any one of the two or three large herds yet remaining should be wiped out by disease or other cause, the chance of preserving the race would be materially lessened, if not lost forever. To avoid all possibility of such a disaster, all large herds should as speedily as possible be divided into a reasonable number of smaller ones, and each of these maintained on a separate tract of country adapted to its needs. The government should be strongly urged to take up this matter in the first instance and until all danger of the extinction of the species is past. Later on there is little doubt that buffalo-raising could be made a very profitable business in New York, New England, or in any other State included in the animal's former range.

I am, sir,

ERNEST HARRIS RAYNES.

APPRECIATIVE

PAVANNASDA, GA., November 22, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—In 1869 I first subscribed to HARPER'S WEEKLY, and although it was anti-Southern at that time, yet I read it with a great deal of interest, and have continued to do so ever since. When the WEEKLY had its brilliant editor, George William Curtis, I feared that his place could never be filled, but I must confess that the publication recently has far surpassed anything in the editorial line that has ever been published in HARPER'S WEEKLY. Your "Comment" and "No Humbug" have been irresistibly delightful, but, to say the climax, your editorial in the last issue (November 12) on the subject of Judge Parker's campaign, and when you could not possibly have been certain as to the results and of the Republican "landslide," was wonderfully prescient, and it is unfortunate that it could not have been printed early in the campaign and its edicts followed.

The readers of the WEEKLY could not afford to lose you as their editor, yet you would have made an able campaign manager.

I am, sir,

RENESE THOMSON.

A SATISFACTORY INVESTMENT

RECHON, VT., November 22, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—I have spent a good many $1's for reading material, but never have I got so much pleasure out of a single dollar as out of the one I sent for your paper in August, and when it runs out on December 3 I shall send another.

All your issues have been excellent; this last week is especially good.

Every man who voted for President Roosevelt owes you a word of thanks for your timely, benevolent stand in the Cortlyon affair. I believe you did a great deal to offset the World-Telegram-Eagle attacks.

You have good reason to feel proud of the place HARPER'S has held the last month in the public eye, and deserve all the praise that has come your way and more.

I am, sir,

B. B. PEABCK.

TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE

TUSKEGEE, ALA., November 25, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—During the twenty-three years that the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute has been in existence, counting those who have finished the full course together with the much larger number of those who have taken a partial course, but who have remained long enough to get into the spirit and methods of the institution, we have sent out quite 6200 men and women who are doing effective work, mainly in the South, as teachers both in the classroom and of the industries, as mechanics, and in domestic work. Practically all of our graduates are in demand even before they graduate, and a large proportion of our men and women are employed by Southern white people at an average daily wage that is nearly three times as great as that paid to the average ignorant, untrained colored man or woman. At the present time there are 1243 students enrolled. The institution has proven its right to exist and its claims upon the public.

Just now there are three urgent needs which I think the public would like to know about and assist us in meeting:

First.—The annual cost of operating the institution is $100,000. Of this amount we can depend upon $30,000 from assured sources, leaving $70,000 to be raised through the gifts of friends.

Second.—Lack of endowment fund from its present $5 figures, $1,030,553.28 to at least $3,000,000.

Third.—$65,000 with which to build a new dining hall—$19,000 of this amount now being in hand. None of the school is more urgent than this one. The students will make the bricks and do most of the work on the building, so that the money would not only provide the building, but would give students the chance to earn money and learn a trade.

We shall be glad of money towards one or all of these purposes. The smallest sum will be gratefully received. Money sent to the school for these objects will enable the principal to spend a larger proportion of his time and strength on the school grounds and in the South, where his services are much needed.

I am,

ROBERT T. WASHINGTON,
Principal, Tuskegee Institute, Alabama.

INCLUDE PENNSYLVANIA

PHILADELPHIA, November 26, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—I am a constant and appreciative reader of HARPER'S WEEKLY. It is with a feeling of disappointment that I read your critical articles on the various sports, and especially on football.

As an old Princeton football man I may, I think, express the following opinion with a clear conscience:

Your number of November 12 gives a page to four leading players of the football world, the names of whom, as set down, cause a slight smile of derision when read by one who has carefully followed the scores this fall. Of Captain Foulke of Princeton and Captain Hogen of Yale too much cannot be said; they are undoubtedly first-class men, but you seem to have forgotten the fact that both Harvard and Columbia have been defeated, decisively, by Pennsylvania.

Give credit where it is due! Pennsylvania has seemingly organized a championship team this season, and a supposedly impartial weekly as HARPER'S should not be backward in acknowledging it.

I am, sir,

J. VAN HENNELAND BARRETT.

WHAT WOULD YOU LIKE TO HEAR?

NOTLEY, N. J., November 5, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—I have read carefully your "guess" in the issue of this date, and supposing we add to this forecast of yours the 80 votes of New York, New Jersey, Indiana, Connecticut, and West Virginia? This would make a total of 242 votes, and would elect Judge Parker by 4 votes more than is necessary for a choice. I shall be pleased to hear from you after election.

I am, sir,

THOMAS J. O'NEIL.

THE SECOND LADY OF THE LAND

TOLLEDA, OHIO, November 21, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—We hear the wife of the President of the United States spoken of as the "first lady of the land." I am asked who is the "second lady of the land" in official society, and I am unable to answer positively. I thought perhaps the Secretary of State might rank next to the President. If you can enlighten me on the subject I will esteem it a personal favor.

I am, sir,

JOHN W. STONE.

[Until March 4, Mrs. John Hay; on and after that date, Mrs. Charles W. Fairbanks.—EDITOR.]

THANKS

REHOBOTH, MO., November 22, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—Alton Brooks Parker, as they are wont to print it, and Birrick also ran; we also notice that Grandpa Davis and Tom Torgart couldn't carry their own States. By the way, have you heard from Missouri? We have to be shown in Missouri, but Alton Brooks Parker couldn't show us. I am really sorry for you; it must have been a hard blow to have it so much better, such corresponding defeat, and last, but not least, we Mississippis elected. That's where the rub comes in, isn't it? I have always taken an interest in you in your paper, so I've got a feeling for you.

I am, sir, An Old Subscriber.

E. F. V. W.

us mindful of the thorns hidden beneath the rose and had raised us of our youthful aspirations. His effort was the same; it had left both of us cynical and scornful. He faced his trouble with a stern stoicism, while I writhed helplessly under mine; but then he had what I have not—an indomitable will. It gave to his pale features a strength, to his dark unattractive eyes a power, which compelled one's admiration despite our inherent enmities to the expression of the fiery enthusiasm which was his soul's life, and he drew me to him with that deadly fascination which water gliding over the brink of a precipice exerts. He was the man of all my friends who could pierce my disguise and lay bare my real self—and he did it.

We spent the following three weeks—Valeria Lovewell, John Randolph, and I—in rambles through the woods. Both Miss Lovewell and Randolph were good pedestrians. Under my leadership we explored shadowy ravines, traced the noisy streams to their sources on remote hill-sides, and climbed brightly lit from which we could look down upon the rolling valleys of forest and pasture to which the hills descended. It was hard for Randolph, yet he insisted. Spurred by Miss Lovewell's open admiration for brute strength, I took a cruel pleasure in forcing him to the limit of his endurance, and, to count my superiority, scaled cliffs and tried daring leaps when I knew he could not follow. Had Miss Lovewell been older and stronger, my actions would have won her contempt, and aroused a dangerous pity for Randolph. As it was, she both envied and admired me for my feats, seemingly overlooking my meanness. Towards Randolph her attitude underwent a perceptible change. Unconsciously following my lead, she began to underestimate him; and his brilliant smiles, his keen wit, his savage irony, soon faded, despite his efforts, to win more from her than polite attention or an indifferent smile.

It was very evident to me that Randolph had learned to love her with a love of which such a nature as mine is incapable. Yet God knows I loved her as much as a selfish man can love a woman. Randolph's position, restrained as it was under the curb of his will, burned with an intensity which does not destroy, but uplifts as it gathers force. Its depth made him forgive the slights she cast upon him, and meet every rebuff patiently and quietly. With brooding self-control he watched me slowly crowd him from the place he held in her esteem, saw me with a galling insolence chatter his hopes, and snatch from him his last chance of happiness. No sign of the torture he endured escaped him, save that his cynical smile became more frequent and his eyes but a little of his brightness. It was as if he viewed apart from himself, and with the professional eye of the physician took a brutish pleasure in studying the effects of the humiliation, the agony, the suffering, which were his lot in life, and in speculating with an unnatural sang-froid upon the limits of his endurance. We maintained the same attitude of friendliness we had held towards each other during the rivalries of our college days. There was this difference, however: when we stood for class-room honors, we had rallied and encouraged each other, freely discussing the subject; now by a tacit understanding neither of us ever alluded to Miss Lovewell if at any time she left us to ourselves and gave her attention to her chaperon—a fiery, fuming aunt.

My admiration for him increased hourly, causing me are paroxysms of self-accusation and reproach. I haggard my good name with the desperation of a man grasping in his hair strands he longed for the edge of the sword which is swung above him, threatening his life. What bitterness was mine, what anguish! The love which should have exulted and made glad the heart was arrayed against me.

conscious, trying me to further hypocrisy, smothering the cries of my real self, staggering my resolution. If I shook myself free of it, if I told them what I found I was, Randolph would understand, and come to me and shake my hand, that old, strange fascination in his eyes, his pale features faded with enthusiasm over my heroism! But Valeria, those simple Quaker ladies, the world—they would call me mad, or worse, with a fatuous smile, and nod of the head they would attribute it to my modesty, and regard it as a rare good joke at my own expense. And Valeria's love—rich out that, the consciousness of freedom, the real life, the heaven I longed for would be no longer, but a great waste, a desert of dead hopes. Better my anguish, my death in life, if I had her love, than the real life without it!

When Randolph announced his intention of returning home, we arranged a last expedition to a wild ravine known as the "Whirlpool." It was at the south end of the mountain, where three streams united and curved out in a series of waterfalls a path to the plain a thousand feet below. Only the more venturesome dared take the climb. There had been numerous accidents, which together with the wildness and loneliness, had given the place an evil name. I had explored, previously, every rock and crevice. At the most dangerous part of the climb, named

Drawn by W. G. Schuchman

Miss Lovewell leaned forward, trying to pierce the shadows in the ravine.

the "Basin," a deep pool which the ceaselessly falling state had hollowed out of solid rock. I had found a path, the either side the walls of rock rose bare and black, moist with condensation, casting ominous shadows on the water swirling at their base. Five or six feet from the top of the south wall was a ledge a inches wide running the entire length and breadth, and in a deep hold in the soil between the great boulders on the top of the rock. Using them as a hand-railing, after clearing the ledge of the treacherous moss and dirt that covered it, I had an excellent path which not only saved a hard, tedious climb by the old way, but also afforded a better view of the "Basin." The plateau in which it terminated would serve as a resting-place, where no could look back and see the water glide in a beautiful smilt curve over the brink of the precipice, follow its majestic descent, watch it whiten into foam as it hurled itself into the pool, mark its gaily whirling as it silently but fearfully swept around the walls of the "basin," and then listen to its solid roar as it rushed forth into the clear, slowly moving stream that crossed the plain.

Following the usual method of taking the climb, we started at the head of the ravine and slowly worked down. Although the distance is not more than a mile, it took us two hours to reach the "basin," so difficult was it to make our way around the series of falls. When we arrived at the ledge, Randall insisted on our taking the old and safer way, which left the ravine and did not re-enter it until below the outlet of the "basin." I said nothing, leaving it to Miss Lovewell to decide. Perhaps she read a challenge in my eyes, or possibly she was irritated by the doubts of her strength and nerve which his hesitation implied for she declined to listen to his entreaties and laughingly bade me lead on. The hazardous climb along the ledge was safely accomplished, and we gained the platform with even less difficulty than I had anticipated.

Miss Lovewell could not resist the temptation of exclaiming when she looked back over the way we had come. "If the shadows were not so deep, what a startling photograph one could take of a person standing on the ledge!" she shouted. "It would look as if he were clinging without support of any kind to a sheer, perpendicular rock!"

"How black the water is!" exclaimed Randall, shuddering.

Miss Lovewell, pale and trembling with nervous excitement, leaped forward, trying to pierce the shadows in the ravine.

"For God's sake, don't stand so near the edge, Valerie!" Randall shouted, in an agony of apprehension.

Miss Lovewell strained. Before either of us could lift a hand she tumbled and fell. Under ordinary conditions we could have caught her. But now, so startled and unmoved were both of us, we were powerless to move. As she fell her skirt brushed Randall's hand, yet his fingers seemed paralyzed, for he did not even clutch at her. The dull splash in the pool below brought us to our senses. We looked far over and gazed into the black water.

"There she is!" yelled Randall, vainly grasping my coat sleeve. "If the undercurrent catches her—the falls, the falls!"

"She's lost—lost! Do you hear me? Lost!" I cried, looking like a demented in his face.

I half tumbled, half ran, down to the mouth of the "basin," where the water left the pool in a deep, noisy, foaming turbulence around me. My real self, on long held in check, mastered me as it never had before. It crushed my love for the girl drowning there at my feet, it made me drunk with evil, and—lost help me!—I watched her struggles without a thought of helping her.

Randall stood for a second waiting until the current had carried her away from the base of the platform and he could dive without striking her. He was quite calm again, the old cynical smile playing about his lips. Our eyes met, and he understood. A look of scorn came over his face.

"You great, good man!" he exclaimed,—"you coward, you cheat!"

Then he leaped into the pool. I saw him swim from right and left, with a boat of Miss Lovewell. I heard his gasps as the cold struck to his heart. With one superb effort he raised her arm-length above his head, and with a mighty heave that took his last strength clad her body like a log over the surface of the water out of the turbulent eddy into the current, which carried her into the channel where I stood. The momentum pushed him underwater, and I saw the undercurrent slowly carry him back to the falls at the upper end of the pool.

With a great shout I plunged into the stream, waist deep, and braving myself against a breaker, caught Miss Lovewell as the water whirled her along. With hope my love for her returned. Exclaiming in my

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

December, 1904

- A Century of Politics W. A. DUNNING,
Professor of History in Columbia University.
English Feeling toward Americans W. D. HOWELLS
The Immediate Peril of the Negro . . . WILLIAM GARROTT BROWN
Nietzsche and the "Will to Power" VERNON LEE
A Filipino View of the Philippine Problem JUAN SUMULONG, Professor in the Manila Law School.
The New American Music LAWRENCE GILMAN
Present Status of Repudiated State-Bonds MARK SULLIVAN
British and American Naval Expenditure,
Lieut. CARLYON BELLAIRS, R. N.
The Irish Muse.—II FIONA MACLEOD
The Situation in Finland FINLANDER

WORLD POLITICS

London; Berlin; St. Petersburg; Washington

50 cents a copy

$5.00 a Year

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

Sir Mortimer

By MARY JOHNSTON
Author of "To Have and to Hold"

Readers of "To Have and to Hold" will welcome in this tale of love and gallantry the distinct advance Miss Johnston has made upon her former success. The romance is instinct with new life and color, like the golden days with which it deals.

With Frontispiece reproduced in colors of original painting, and eight other illustrations by F. C. Yohn. Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages

By HENRY CHARLES LEA

A history not less distinguished for amplitude of preparation and exhaustive research than by philosophical treatment and breadth of scope, which is impartial, candid, scrupulously equitable, above all the bitterness of controversy, opinions as survey, and profound in analysis, a history, finally, written with such graphic power that it exercises a fascination upon the reader, and leaves him impressed alike by the tragic horror of the facts and the dignified ease and felicity with which they are set forth. . . . The style is lucid, dignified, temperate, and graphic.

3 Volumes. Cloth, $9.00; Three-quarter calf, $15.75

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

MOTOR BOATS

LAUNCHES, STEAM AND SAIL YACHTS, ROW BOATS, CANOES

SPEED—PLEASURE—BUSINESS

Beautiful, Reliable, Economical, Simple, Safe

Our boats are built to last, and are guaranteed for five years.

Write for literature and prices to the Motor Boat Mfg. Co. (Box 17), Muskegon, Mich.

The Masquerader

Here is a book made of paper and ink like any other book—but different. Who shall say wherein the difference lies? Who can tell just why this book has been run away with by the public, why the presses are kept continuously busy over it, why the libraries cannot supply their patrons, nor book-stores keep it sufficiently in stock? The fact that it is a great story of a man and a woman with red blood in their veins does not entirely answer the question—there is more than that to it. Other novels languish, why not this?

When it was running serially people kept writing to the editor begging for advance proofs, one man pleading that he had heart disease and feared he might die before it came to a close. A reader of the famous English Blackwood's for sixty years says: "Not since I waited feverishly for 'Monte-Cristo' to appear have I been so excited by a story. And Mrs. Thurston has given me what Dumas did not—a perpetually increasing wonder as to how the adventure is to end."

Already in England and in America the book is being made into a play, and France and Germany have begun translating it.

The Truants

This story has that human quality touched with a spirit of latter-day chivalry which made Mr. A. E. W. Mason's "The Four Feathers" so marked a success. The characters are human in their weaknesses and interesting to follow through a plot of startling developments. Military honor and a wife's reputation are balanced in the scales.

The Luxury of Children

Is the best Christmas book for the money that will be offered this year. Typographically it is beautiful, pictorially it is charming. The reading in it includes the observations and reflections of a parent during a period of five years. We think the reviewers will tell you that it is profitable reading. E. S. Martin wrote the text. Sarah Stilwell made the pictures.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Franklin Square, New York

A Five-Volume Encyclopedia FREE if accompanied by a five years' subscription ($5) to THE COSMOPOLITAN.

For $2.50 WE SEND THE COSMOPOLITAN and FOR ONE YEAR

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA

Over Three Thousand Pages

FIVE HANDSOME VOLUMES

Full Cloth Bound
Gold Lettering
Distinctly Printed in Plain Type
A Necessity for Every Office
And Every Home

The One Comprehensive Encyclopedia in such form as to be kept on a desk ready for constant reference.

No Business Man and No Home Should Be Without These Five Volumes. SOLD TO EVERY NEW OR OLD SUBSCRIBER TO THE COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE for $2.50, including one year's subscription to either THE COSMOPOLITAN or THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME. For $3.00 you can have the Encyclopedia and both THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME and THE COSMOPOLITAN for one year.

THE FIVE VOLUMES OF THE ENCYCLOPEDIA ARE SENT BY EXPRESS. THE CHARGES CAN BE PAID BY THE RECEIVER. IF YOU WISH THEM BY MAIL, SEND 50 CENTS FOR POSTAGE.

ADDRESS: THE COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE,
IRVINGTON, NEW YORK

TWO BOOKS FOR THE SCHOOL

The Elements of Wealth Against International Law Commonwealth

By GEO. B. DAVIS

Brigadier-General and Judge Advocate-General, U. S. A.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION

A work sufficiently elementary in character to be within the reach of students, yet comprehensive and of wide scope. It gives essential information in regard to the law governing the relations of nations, duties of diplomatic representatives, rights of citizens, alliances, etc.

$2.50

By HENRY DEMAREST LLOYD

This is the most complete history in existence of the great combination of brains and capital which still remains the type and model of all trusts or monopolies. Mr. Lloyd has traced the growth of this institution from its origin to its vast proportions now, when it controls the trade of a continent, and is perhaps the most influential and most dreaded financial power in America.

Cloth, $2.50. Popular Edition, $1.00

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

The Mould of a Man's Fortune."

Especially is this true now, when he can, by means of Endowment Life Insurance, lay the Foundation of a Fortune by moderate yearly, half-yearly, or quarterly Instalments. You should join the thousands who are doing it through

THE PRUDENTIAL

Insurance Co. of America.

JOHN F. DRYDEN,
President.

Home Office:
NEWARK, N.J.

Send this Coupon for Information

Without committing myself to any action, I shall be glad to receive free, particulars and rates of Endowment Policies.

For $..... Age.....

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation..... Dept. I -

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

CHRISTMAS

1904

PRICE 50 CENTS

He won't be happy till he gets it!

PEARS
SOAP

"Pears' Otto of Rose Toilet is the perfection of Toilet Soap."

JACOB AND RACHEL AT THE WELL.

And while he yet spake with them, Rachel came with her father's sheep; for she kept them.—Genesis XXIX, v. 8.

Copyright, 1901, by Harper & Brothers.

Reprinted in Harper's Weekly, December 16, 1901.

JACOB AND RACHEL AT THE WELL

And while he yet spake with them, Rachel came with her father's sheep; for she kept them. — Genesis XXIX, v. 9.

Copyright, 1896, by Harper & Brothers

Reprinted in Harper's Weekly, December 16, 1896.

THE STORY OF BETHLEHEM

Copyright, 1905, by Harper & Brothers

Supplement to Harper's Weekly, December 10, 1905

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLIII

New York, Saturday, December 10, 1904

No. 4911

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved. Entered at the New York Post-office as second class matter.

The King's Temple

By James Edmund Dimming

Paintings by Howard Pyle

N A delicious evening in the summer-time Raskyn and Miss Cleveland came from a bridge-bound gravel walk and stammered on the Tompath. At their feet the weed-encrusted rocks gave up a sally fragrance. Beyond there lay a fair expanse of channel, and farther out the round sides of the Pincupines showed black against the bay. Before them, high above the tree-tops, Green Mountain's shadow hung across the night; behind, a veil-like mist, come down along the land to dress the faeries of the moonlight, was lit by the glow of lamps from the reading-room, where gleam-shirted whist-players and fresh midshipmen from the fleet scented their tobacco with the pipe of many a Yeatsman. There was music in a big red house above the towers. Miss Cleveland sagaciously observed silence. Raskyn relighted successive cigarettes.

"This is better than the dancing," he said at last. "Indeed," said she, responding brightly to his signal, "nothing is better than the dancing on a night like this." "That depends quite on one's company," declared he, but might have saved himself the trouble.

"Possibly," replied Miss Cleveland, without an instant's wait,—and stepped there.

Raskyn knew that old move well. Evasive philosophy was his up to Cerebrus; he said, after a dignified interval:

"We like this sort of thing,—I mean are impressed by the beauty of it, because of its everlasting quality. Humanity is always partly paralyzed by the suggestion of Eternity, and while moonbeams and cold water aren't quite so eternal, they are quite convincing enough when compared with the brevity of our own little lives."

"Experiencing only," suggested Miss Cleveland, "for much of us as have lived before."

There was not a trace of sarcasm, and Raskyn's guard fell down.

"Lived before?" he roared. "Do you believe?"

"I believe nothing," said Miss Cleveland. "I feel much. Feeling is believing, but to live is to feel. The more you live the deeper your faith. If you live well. So I feel."

"Having lived well?" suggested Raskyn, but she only smiled, and went on determinedly—

"That pre-existence isn't such a myth after all."

"Not by moonlight, probably." Raskyn's tone was merciless.

"Not—not at all!" Miss Cleveland said, desirately.

"You believe—I mean you feel that?" asked Raskyn, much more soberly. "Can you feel, for instance, that there are on the earth to-day embodied spirits who were men and women when old Phœnicia flourished by trading with the world?"

"Why not?" said she. "Yes, it got on such a beach as this that Ahah the Phœnician Pilot buried his magic Sward before he died!"

Raskyn halted in amazement.

"How did you—who told you he buried it,—that he—?"

Miss Cleveland made a little, commanding gesture as for silence, and looked away to the sea and up the silver pathway toward the sky, for half a minute.

"I do not know how I know," said she. "I did not know when I said it that it was true. Only I felt that there was something—something—has it occurred to you that you have been in a place like this before—long ago?"

"That we have?"

"That you have." There was a smile or two.

"That you—?"

"Tell me something," Miss Cleveland interrupted, with becoming vehemence—"you know about it all, I'm sure. Tell me what it was about Elissa,—after the gate was shut and she was alone with Timon, and about Bertha and the Sward and Ahah. I'm in a sort of trance. These names keep coming up before my mind. At first they were strange; now they are familiar, like the names of friends. I feel there is something more,—I can't quite get it. What about—her eyes shone very brightly and her voice was different—what about Elissa,—how?"

Raskyn snapped his cigarette into the sea.

Now it was in the third month of the year, at night, when Ahah the Pilot, walking upon the Tyrtion decks with two attendants, was met by an armed man, running.

"Art thou Ahah the Pilot?" cried the courier, softly.

"I am he thou named." Ahah answered. "What ayeest thou?"

And the courier said:

"Thy bath had forgotten, Ahah, how a space ago in the gardens of Irahim the merchant thou didst meet the lovers of Elissa, Irahim's daughter, in a deadly combat, and killed six of them with the great and magic Sward thou hast brought with the lady Bertha, the fair mistress, from far Britain, beyond Tartarus."

"Say," said Ahah, gently, "Thy bath had forgotten that."

The Sward is a great sword, and no man of us knoweth the secret by which it can be drawn from its strange scabbard,—but I know, and the gods of the lady Bertha and our great god Baal, they are with me where I go, for they have blessed the Sward."

"But Elissa is now angered," said the courier,—not for her lovers, for she can win the more, but that thou hast scorned her love and taken another and a stranger to thy house. So that she hates the Ahah, and the Lady Bertha with the yellow hair whom thou didst bring with thee from the long westward voyage, and her father Irahim doth also hate thee for the fame thy prowess with the Sward and thy courage on the seas hath brought thee here in Tyre,—for the shame thou hast brought upon his daughter, and for the blood of his six young hirelings thou didst shed on his estate. They hate thee with a jealous hatred, and would bring thee ill; for Ibrahim the merchant hath demanded that the King deliver thee and Bertha, the Northman's daughter, into his hands for violence done within his gardens; failing which he will withhold his tax from the King's treasury, and will come and take thee for himself by force; for he hath many men."

The messenger remained three paces distant in dense darkness, his face unseen. The two attendants drew their swords and held them ready. But Abah strode quickly forward.

"Who art thou?" he said.

"I am Timon of Athens, an officer in the King's army, and whose life thou didst spare for my brother's sake in the gardens of Ilseham in the merchant, for I sought to kill thee when thou didst scorn Elissa: and in gratitude I had thee out to save thee."

"And it is the truth?"

"It is the truth, but not the whole. Already the men of Ibrahim surround thy house in the Street of Steps, and hold its gates,—but have not yet got within, for they await an answer from the King."

"And that is the truth?"

¹⁰ It is the whole of the truth.

Alab thought a queer, and said: "Timon of Athens, I have not knowna thee well. By thy looks thou art a brave man, but I would know if thou art also good. For courage without virtue cannot go where I wouldst send thee now."

"I am a soldier and a man, who hath learned well of a hard master and hath loved him for it. Since thy sword cutteth me in the garden and thou dost spare my life for honor's sake, I have vowed to my great gods and to my soul that I would one day do such service unto thee that thou shouldst call me friend and brother. So I give thee the truth, and I put my sword and such skill as the wars have taught, and my life, into thy hands,—for honor's sake."

“And thou wilt honor my lady and my house,” and it is the truth.”

"In the heart of our mother, it is the truth!"

"These two men be to me Egyptians, of ten given me by their King as a reward. They will die at my word, or for my aid. One of them I will give thee. Follow him like a dog on the scent of prer, and ask him naught, for he will not answer thee. He will lead thee by a secret way into my house and present thee to my lady with a message I shall give to him. And he will remain with thee until I come, to do thy bidding. My lady hath right others like unto him by her in case of need. With thou go, and defend my house and my love and the Second until I have seen the King.

"By the heart of my mother," swore Timon of Athens. "I will defend them with my life."

So Ahah spoke to one of the two Egyptians, and he stepped forward, a giant, black as the night was. And in a language Tomon did not know the Pilot said to him:

and said thus: "I will go to my home and to my lady, and say unto her: 'Thou art in danger. This man T'ou-wei is thy friend. Take down the sword and give it him, and when the last hour of bidding shineth the gate hath come, disclose the secret and let him draw the blade: for he will need its power against the men of Ibrahim, who would possess us.' I go to the King, but I will come again to thee in short time. Wherever, I charge thee, hide not the secret of the sword while hope is left within thee."

And as they parted, Timon knelt and touched his head on Alab's hands, and said:

"Am I thy friend and brother, Pilot?"

"Let the night and the day give thee thy answer," returned hab. "I will be with thee at the morning."

And wrapping his cloak about him, and with the great Egyptian striding just before, he made his way by the lower streets up the city's gentle slope to the palace of the King, who loved him for the same his vanguard gave to the Phoenicians.

the palace of King Illeam is set up on a rock in the centre of the city, surrounded by his gardens and, about them, by a high wall with watchtowers on it. And the watchtowers keep guard that no man come up from the streets and enter, and that no ships or boats come in from the sea, and enter the city. And the walls of the palace of King Illeam are built on two sides of his island town: and in all ways from the palace walls the city's flanks run down to the sea on the one side, and on the other to the street. And the sea is divided near in halves by a wide canal running straight through the low part of the town and connecting the two parts; so that if an enemy shuts up or breaks down one part, the ships of the King Illeam may go to the canal from the sea, and the street of the King Illeam may be crossed from the sea, the ships to the canal, and cross it on a bridge of stone.

But Ahash's way was by the lesser streets; and by and by he came to the walls of the King's gardens, and to the watchers there he spoke one short, strange word, so that presently a bolt was withdrawn and a low gate raised, and Ahash went within, and the Eusebius with him, and came to the palace. And it was near dawn.

But the King, being burdened with much care, was in his hall, in the Hall of Merchants, where every day he met the princes of the country's trade; and one of these was Ibrahim, Elissa's father.

"O King," said Ahab, "since a lad I have feared nothing but thy frown,—and my lady, she is well."

"Then thou, too, art well, my Pilot," said the King, for he loved Ahab as a brother. "But they desire thy life."

"Then wilt thou give them it," said Ahab. And the King thought none space. He was a lesser man in stature than the Pilot, but his light of kings was on his brow and his posture as a god. He had the hair of his crown black and red, and in his thick locks on the top of it was fastened a small crown of gold, and under the crown was a rope of silver which bound the hair around the King's head. His robe was a wondrous purple, very long. It was caught at the shoulders with wondrous ornaments, and the sleeves were of the same purple, and the hem of the golden threads and grass, and with patches of rich red silk, became a bag. And his feet were sandalled in gold, with gold cloth for the strings of them, and on his fingers were many rings, and some were jewelled. So that the King's colors were gold and purple, and silver, and green, and red, and blue, and white. His white, made of pure, soft stones, smooth-chiselled by Sidonian artificers, and set one upon another cleverly. And the roof was held by pillars of the white stone, and between two of them was set the King's chair, and above the floor were carpets stained in blue and purple and green and red and white. And on this day was breaking when Huram spoke again to Ahab.

"Ahah," he said, and sent away all the armed men about him, that none might hear;—then answered that I love thee will let it be hard to old thee. Thou knowest, too, that though I am the King, I do live upon my merchants. It is they who support the state, and make the laws whilst they sit within the Hall, and administer justice. Times have come when I do send my men out for trade and for the sea; and that my army is not of our own blood, but hired fighting-men from many lands. They do not love the state and me, but covet money for their fighting; so that the great merchants can away them almost at their will; and thus him who askest for thy life, is the greatest of our merchants. I have said all that I have mind to say, and I give thee leave to take thee to thy house and to thy lady. What sayest thou, Ahah?"

And Abah only bowed in dignity and said:

"As thou wilt, O King. If thou canst give me no armed men I will go to my house in the Street of Steps alone, for I would be with my lady, and would possess my Sword."

"Nay, Allah," said the King, "the men of Ibrahim, his sailors and his traders and his watchmen and soldiers who court his favor, and the lovers of his daughter, Elissa the black-haired, they await thee in the streets and will kill thee. For the day is come and it is light."

"Yet will I go, O King," said Ahub, "for I will see my lady and will hold my sword."

And King Hiram knew his Pilot's heart, that it was very good; so he said to him, "Wait with me a space," and to the slaves there near him, "Go fetch me the King's Jewel from my chamber."

And the slaves went and fetched him the King's Jewel, and Hiram said to Abide:

Here, Abah, is all I have to give thee, and I give it out of my great love, that with its power I may save thy life and thy lady, and thy house and thy Sword. It is the King's Jewel, which, I knowest, my brother Solomon gave to me when I did beat him at the game of tables, and all my people know it well. Hang it on thy breast, and thou shalt be forth for King Solomon's house, and both pledged him and his forth for thee, pledge him with it such power and his glory unto his house, as if in his very person, and whose death harm unto him who weareth it, he be at the uttermost parts of the world: him will King Solomon follow with his vengeance, through water and through fire or upon the tops of the mountains, in the dark of the forest, or in the open day, if thou be hurt, he will be hurt, and if thou be slain, he will be slain. So give it to thee, Abah: set thou in thy house, in peace with this upon thy breast."

And Ahab took the King's Jewel, and let the Egyptian hang it on his neck by its yellow chain. Its upper part was a disk of bull's hide, tanned and varnished, and on it was inscribed a prophecy:

BEHOLD I AM WITH THEE AND WILL KEEP THEE IN ALL PLACES WHITHER
THOU GOEST: FOR I WILL NOT LEAVE THEE.

And from the bejeweled disk there hung a ring of solid gold, and in the gold with an ivory band was set a gem, which shone like a star; and Solomon had it from his father David, who received it from the men of Edom; and sure it had hung in the temple of the sacred town of Gebel, for it was very beautiful. And it was the King's Jewel, which Solomon sent to King Hiram, the Canaanite sage. Hiram, smothered his riddle.

As the king's attendants, his palace guards, and his eunuchs followed him, he bided the King's hand and went from the Hall of the Merchants into the garden, and presently came out upon the summit of the city and looked down along the streets where lay the men of Isharrah. He saw the men in all around him. At the top of the hill is Hiram's palace, with steep cliffs behind it, toward the mainland, while, before, the city slopes far downward to the sea; the palace, the King's gardens are on the eastern side, protected by a sea-wall with a narrow mouth in it, and the mouth is always guarded, and the guards look watch for all ships that come, and send their names and numbers to the King. The King's palace is on the west side; it is another harbor made by a high sea-wall; though no wharves are there, but houses like the banks—and gardens. For the eastern harbor is for peace, and the western for a harbor of war. The ships are joined to the eastern from the north, and brought through the straits of the city from north to port. Ahah's house is on the western side and farther down, toward where the shoulder of the hand begins to curve to the east again, as Ibrahim's retainer, and then went out where Tamm waited him.

"HERE IS ALL I HAVE TO GIVE THEE—IT IS THE KING'S JEWEL"

Upon this scene the Pilot could look down as he stood at the summit of the city on the terrace of King Hiram's palace. The day was breathing, and strong shafts of golden light had pierced the lowering haze, and fallen on the towers. The tops of houses showed blood red now, the dense groves of the clustering olive-trees, and between those the sides of grayish stone crumpled with the heavier hues. A little mist rose from the centre of the city, showing where the great canal went through from side to side. Little sails, a breath of air came in and stirred the olive-orchards gently. The bosom of the sea threw off its robe of dusk and lifted its day-coat of pearl and green and blue. The mist lay on its curtain and the sunlight fell upon the city, which was very beautiful.

The glitter kissed the roofs, and the olive-trees and the soft gray stones, and lit King Hiram's palace and his temples with a wondrous brilliancy, and warmed the cheeks of Akab, standing at the head of the Street of Steps. But Akab prayed to Baal for aid. For the sun which filled the world with that hazy burning glory of the spears and the shields of an armed horde which stood before the house of Akab; and Akab knew his time had come. And he prayed: "O Baal, strengthen me, and restore me to my love and to my Sorrow, for the deeds I have done in thy name, and for what I shall do."

So he drew his robe about him, with the King's Jewel showing on his breast, and strode along the Street of Steps to face the men of Ibrahim.

"Stop, there! Who art thou?"

"Thou knowest me. I am Akab the Pilot, and I will enter to my house."

So they raised up a great cry, the guards and the sailors and the sherif and the men of Egypt Ibrahim had hired for his trusting, and would have set on Akab without waiting, when one, a leader among them, cried loudly and said:

"See, the sign of Solomon!" And then to Akab, "Whither goest thou, Pilot?"

And Akab made no answer, but walked among them with his black head very straight and his arms beneath his purple robe. And when they saw his eyes and that he truly wore the Jewel, some dared halt him, so that the crowd divided in the centre and let him to his gates. And the gates were swung and he entered through them. And Timon of Akko, all clad in his mail and wearing his short, thick Greek blade, held the bolts, and slid them shut again.

"Is she safe with thee?" asked Akab.

"Safe as thou art, Pilot," answered Timon.

"And the Sorrow?"

"Safe too," said Timon, "and no man knoweth yet its secret; for though we were best at midnight thy lady would not tell it. So we sought them of until they let thee in."

"And now," cried Akab, "let me—"

A fearful shouting stopped him. There was beating on the gates and the din of arms, then silence; and a thin, high voice:

"Ye fools!" he cried, "to let him in. It shall cost ye heavy gold, I tell thee. What is the King's Jewel to Ibrahim the merchant? Both Ibrahim fear Solomon, or—say King? I tell thee, no man dares speak in Tyre if I give word against him. And thou hast let this Pilot pass thee with a trouble on him! Now, then, I say, there is no virtue in it. And I will stir him, and I will give it to pieces with his bones. Not on and break his gates and lead him and his lady and this traitor Timon whom I brought to Tyre in my service—lead them out to be divided here among us, then!"

And they forced against the gates to break them down,—when the gates swung open, and the way was clear from the gateway up the wide stone steps between the olive-trees to Akab's door: excepting this, that at the doors stood Timon the Akkadian, very tall and fine, with no helmet, but only his small, round shield and his little sword with two broad edges, and with him were the ten Egyptians, with their own swords and clad in a black armor their king had given Akab, of his secret stores.

And in the doorway stood Akab, there alone. He had no weapon, but the King's Jewel blazed upon his breast. And he said:

"Ibrahim, I ask a thing for such a price as I may take leave of my lady. Then, if thou wilt stay thy men, I will open my gates again, and thou mayest come and take me."

And Ibrahim, grinning, gave consent. So they closed the gates. And Akab went into his house and Bertha brought him not the Jewel, and no man was near them.

"Bertha," said Akab, and took her in his arms, and for a long time said no more, but held her closely, and her cheek lay straight to his. And then he said:

"Dear heart, thou knowest I am a daughter of stout-hearted people,—not of those Syrian traders, nor of the Britons from whose hands thou dost gain me, and the Sorrow they gave to him who would me; but of the Vikings of the icy seas, whose beacons light the rocks of the gloomy northern coasts, and in whose hardy hands more spirit of mischief abides the spirit of all the world. More I cannot tell thee now, my pilot, even to thou who didst love me and win me, the single sail plucked from a great ship's mast, all bound with brother to this Sorrow of ours. But my gods are with me always for I live here for a purpose and they will not see me harmed. One day thou shalt know. But go thou to the fighting. I know the heart, that thou dost love me well, and in return I love thee myself, as part of me. None knows the cost of the fight, but I give thee the Sorrow again, and I give thee my love. Go now, and let my heart hold thy heart up if you the battle needs it."

And Akab said nothing; but he kissed her hair and her mouth, and held her once more, closely, and then went out where Tamm waited him.

"Timon," he said, "I will hold the gate till Ibrahim is dead. But if I fall, save thou my lady and my honor, as best Baal give thee!"

"On the heart of my mother," said Timon, and went back to guard the doorway with the slaves.

But Akab took the Sorrow and three open the gates and stood there. And he held the Sorrow in his two hands, as if his little hand were on the lever that led to the impulse of it, and drew the blade out. But the scabbard he put down.

"Now, Ibrahim," he said, "thou mayest come and take me, for the price is paid."

The silence fell upon them all: upon the men-at-arms of Ibrahim the merchant, the sailor Greeks and the sons of Egypt, and the husband Camarites he hired to serve him. But in the midst of it a man stepped forth and looked on Akab. He was a little, shrunken man, with running eyes. His arms were long as his legs, and his head was deep in his two broad shoulders. He wore a black robe, rather short, and no ornament upon it whatever, nor did the dressing of his hair and beard much indicate his power. But he was exceeding angry, so that he trembled with it.

"Ibrahim," said Akab, smiling, "thou art early."

"Silence, thou whelp!" cried Ibrahim, with a furious shout, "Best make thy prayers, for I shall kill thee soon."

And Akab smiled again, and he leaned upon the Sorrow, and said:

"Thou hast, Ibrahim. Thou dardest not dishonor the King's Jewel so, I think."

The merchant cried aloud again, a dangerous laugh. "Thou fool," he said, "I care no more for the Jewel than for thy life. Will Ibrahim, the merchant prince of Tyre, go down in shame before a glittering stone with a King's name on it? Both Ibrahim fear King Hiram? Let any ask the King, and know. Both Ibrahim fear King Solomon? He feareth nothing, Pilot, but the loss of money and of broken vessels. Thou shalt die with thy own sign and name of Baal upon thy bosom, now I tell thee. For thou hast done me harm within my house. So will I tell thee, and tramp that trinket in the dust of Tyre and send it broken back to Solomon, and damn his soul to nothing, in the bargain. And for thy house, and for thy—"

But he said no more, for with a single bound the Pilot was upon him, and smote him in the very eyes with a bare hand; so that the merchant fell to the ground, crying out in rage:

"Not on him, all, and take the house and kill all in it—"

So they did not on.

Akab sprang quickly to his post and stood within the two sides of the gate, the Sorrow all ready. The merchant's cry came slowly, and the sailors and sailors drew back, and some were drawn, and running underneath their shields.

For many years they told the story of that battle in the Street of Steps, and it is recorded in books which can be studied to this day. They say that Akab in a mass, but as the great blade rose, the leaders down the crowd drew back and wondered at the corpses writhing in their blood. But Ibrahim, from behind, would urge them on, and so they charged again, in twos and threes, upon the gate. Some fell, some fled, others stood to it and, holding their little leather shields above their heads, dashed in upon the Pilot. Street by he stood, and gave no sign to Timon. Blood ran over him. His bare arms were hot with it, and there were gashes on his legs; but no part of his body had been touched, and his great head looked down upon his enemies proudly, as with mighty strokes he dealt the Sorrow and sent it through, and through again. And then the last of it got Akab by the heart, and he killed them not in his own defense, but for the love of seeing them die before him.

And presently he began singing a wild song of the sea, which in a hour he had heard the older pilots sing when the storm was blackest and the rocks were underneath the keels: so that it is said his voice rang in every street of that great city, and the men of Hiram dared not meet the fury of his strength.

Old Ibrahim shrieked in rage and shame,—for he must pay for the hirelings he had lost by this day.

"Get knives and charge him with spears and slay with shields!"

So they brought knives, about a dozen ashen shafts with metal points, all sharp, and ten strong blacks were called up from the rear to meet the charge upon the gate.

And when Akab saw this he sang no more, but stretched his arms to lend them strength, and prayed and blessed the handle of the Sorrow, and touched its blade upon the King's Jewel, hanging all bloody on his breast.

Akab cried Timon, "let me stand with thee, for they will kill thee surely with their spears."

"Keep my lady and my house, as thou hast sworn," said Akab, only, and Timon held his peace and stood with the slayers ready to fight when the Pilot fell.

And the ten black spearmen were gathered under their little back of shields, when the eyes of Timon, searching the palace walls for some chance sign of aid, caught the flutter of a signal hanging in the wall, and knew it well, for he had served Akab Hiram as courier at the port of Tyre. He threw off his sword and ran down the stairs to where the Pilot stood and post him, and took the gates and shut them quickly, and said the great bar of cedar wood which kept them close.

And when Akab would have held him he answered him and said:

"The couriers to the King have let in a royal galley at the outer port, and the colors of King Solomon are waving on the palace"

"I KNOW THY HEART, THAT THOU DOST LOVE ME WELL" walls. As Hiram is thy friend he will not see thee die with such a chance."

"But Alah, full of fighting, did not understand.
"A royal galley,—at the outer port!" he asked, most wonderingly.

And Timon pointed to the thing on Ahah's breast.

"The King's jewel," he said, "bringseth safety and support to him who wears it."

But the men of Ibrahim were at the gates. Their eyes grew as they saw what Timon did. And Ibrahim, seeing Ahah's fears, was in great haste, and directed that timber be brought to batter in the gates, and sent some to scale the walls and hurl spears down upon the defenders of the house.

"Send down the slaves," said Timon, "and cut the fingers of these fellows as they climb up," and the slaves came down and did so, while Timon and the Pilot watched the palace walls, reaching high above the city on the hill.

The signals flattered in the morning breeze, and now and then a soldier was seen running on the walls and raising other signs in some one at the harbor gate.

"What doth it mean?" asked Ahah.

"A royal galley hath come in," said Timon, "and I see the colors of King Solomon. That is all. It is out only—"

A shouting stopped him, and a rush of many feet, and there was a dreadful crash as the gate gave in before the timber ram. Two other blows would end it.

No Ahah took up the sword and went back up the stairway to the doors of his house, resolved to make a last stand there, and hope for what the gods might send to him for aid. But when he would have spoken unto Timon, the Athenian was not there, though his sword still lay by the broken gate.

"Thimn," said Ahah to a slave, "whither didst the Athenian leave me?"

"He the wall, master," replied the Egyptian. "He ran swiftly to the eastern corner and leaped over to the street. It was believed you sent him out for aid."

And Ahah's heart was sore, that Timon should have left him to his fate; but he gathered his sword and went thence into the courtyard of his house, and would have held the door alone but that Bertha would not consent, and came and stood by him as he leaned on the sword, and put her head upon his shoulders. And so the hours stood, awaiting with their heavily.

Over now the men was thrust against the gate, which afterward hung by small bits at the corners, ready to fall down. Then Ibrahim drew off his men and formed them in three lines, the battlement between two files of swordmen; and some, at the head, her spear.

"When the gates give way," he commanded them, "thou wilt drop the ram and pour in and overwhelm this Pilot and his house. Kill him if thou wilt, but save his mistress and the slaves, and do no violence to his house: upon which thou shalt be rewarded richly."

No they formed in three lines, the ram between the swordmen. The rammen put wooden bars beneath the timber and lifted it so, four men in a bar, two on either side, twenty in all. Ibrahim gave a shrill cry, and they moved forward, slowly at first, then faster, all in step, until they were running straight for the gateway of the house of Ahah.

But as the timber crashed through the shattered gates and opened a way straight up the stairway to the spot where Bertha and the Pilot stood together with the sword, the very leaves of the olive-trees were shaken by a mighty blast from a great horn, not far off. The men of Ibrahim halted, and then turned, for another blast, more terrible than the first, swept up the city's slopes and echoed from the gray walls of the palace and came rolling back again upon the wondering town whither from its sleep.

Then Ibrahim looked down the Street of Steps and saw a wonderful sight,—and all his men looked with him.

For at the bottom of the street, where the broad canal cuts Tiro into two parts, a gally rested, with armed men leaping out from it upon the white stone curbs, and close behind were others, and in the sunlight through the trees the points of many weapons burned their flashes into the eyes of the wondering army. And then the soldiers formed in one wide column like a solid wall of men, and came marching up the Street of Steps with a singing and clanging the wide world knew and feared, those days,—the mailed, restlessness of Solomon. The early sun bore straight upon their lines, gleaming upon their leather bucklers, their wooden shields faced with polished brass, their bronze helmets with the rural plumes of white horse-daisies, their breastplates of brass fastened to their scarlet shirts with calendered leather straps. Their metal leg-armour glinted as they marched. Each man carried a short sword and a spear, and ahead of them was a giant of a man, turned middle age, who carried no spear or shield, nor any sword, but an axe with a gold handle, of very wonderful make. And by his side was Timon the Athenian.

Ahah heard the clamor of the marching men, and ran down to the gateway to inquire of it, and Bertha with him. And not one of Ibrahim's men was near, but Ibrahim all alone and very fearful. And Ibrahim ran to Ahah as to kneel and beg for refuge, but he heard the gate be leaped on Bertha with a dagger and struck straight out for her heart. But Ahah's hand was quicker, and he caught the merchant's arm and broke it at the wrist,—and thus the soldiers were upon them.

The captain closed out forward. He was as big as Ahah, and dressed in the brilliance of his monarch's court.

"Art thou Ahah the Pilot?"

"I am he," said Ahah.

"I am Ezra, son of Habbakuk," he said, right proudly, "a courier for King Solomon and bound for my life to his service. Coming hence by night in galley on a secret mission to King Hiram, I discover the King's Jewel in great danger. Wherefore, Ahah, according to the oath with which the King hath given the Jewel, I come to succeed and to save thee, to kill thy enemies, and to punish all who have done ill unto thee or to thy house. Command me, therefore, for whilst thou dost possess the Jewel I am but thy servant, like the King."

"Ezra," said Ahah, "I thank thee for thy success, and I ask that of all my enemies only this be punished,—Ibrahim the merchant."

"Let us go with him to King Hiram," said Ezra, "that thou mayst plead for his death and the destruction of his estate in that proper presence."

But Ahah would not, and sent for the sword, and said,

"Let every man here turn away his face."

And the captain of the guard commanded it.

Then Ahah took the sword and went to where Ibrahim lay groaning with his broken arm, and said,

"Ibrahim, not for myself do I seek this vengeance, but because thou didst aim to kill my love, most foully."

And Ahah killed Ibrahim as he lay there, by cutting off his head.

"Go now to King Hiram," said Ahah, to the captain, "and take with thee this Jewel. Say to him that I am in an excellent spirit and that my wrongs shall be mended by this, that the great estates of Ibrahim, all his lands and his stores and his slaves and his jewels and his daughter's life and his house, altogether, shall be given by the King to Timon of Athens, my dearly beloved friend and brother here this day; but that the ships of Ibrahim be mine."

So the captain took the message and marched away, and it was done.

And Timon and the Pilot clasped their hands, and together went into the house of Ahah and found there Bertha polishing the sword. And she looked on them and smiled a smile which illumined all that place. And she came to Timon and brushed his forehead with her hand, and kissed him, but to Ahah she said, "Dear lord!" and fell within his arms.

And Timon left them so; but as he went away the Pilot said to him:

"Timon, my brother and my friend, thou wilt return to us here soon. But for the day we will remain," and his black eyes laughed a little, "for we are in an excellent spirit."

But a courier came and said, "Oh Ahah, Hiram, King of Tyre, doth send thee news that Eliza, daughter of Ibrahim, whom thou slayest, is stilled dead by her own hand in the garden of her father."

And the courier went away and closed the gate, for no man there made answer to his message.

"Eliza!" Rankin repeated after her, not quite vaguely. "Why need we ask? She died most miserably and alone. Not one of all her lovers loved her when her wealth was gone. It was well she did, I think; for after her there was none in Phœnicia to dispute the beauty and the place of the dearest woman in the ancient world."

"The sweetest world!" Miss Cleveland said, most casually. Rankin turned to her with a pregnant gesture. The sunlight had set fire to the masses of her yellow hair and made a soft, sweet radiance hang about her face. A hundred wonders sang along his vision in the moment he stood gazing, a portrait of Time all centering on her face. He saw her in the wide, free dress of the Viking, the closer robes of old Phœnicia, the fills and ruffs of Queen Elizabeth,—a wonderful dream in the heart of his own old soul.

"Bertha," he whispered, "Bertha—"

Miss Cleveland looked away to where a place of lights moved in along the channel. They could hear the soft plunge of a pusher's twin engines, and some strains of music broken disjointed on the mild sea breeze:

... life slips its tether,
When good fellows get together;
With a strain on the table
And a good song ringing clear.
For—life slips—

"No," she said, quite zephyr. "Bertha lived in old Phœnicia. This—a prettier—of a billing liberty raised up her voice into a gladsome ring,—this is Bar Harbor, and it is the summer-time!"

"....NOT FOR MYSELF DO I SEEK THIS VENGEANCE"

THE QUEST

BY MARK TWAIN

LAKESIDE was a pleasant little town of five or six thousand inhabitants, and a rather pretty one, too, as towns go in the Far West. It had church-congregations for 35,000, which is the way of the Far West and the South, where everybody is religious, and where each of the Protestant sects is represented and has a plant of its own. Rank was unknown in Lakeside—uncondemned, anyway; everybody knew everybody and his dog, and a sociable friendliness was the prevailing atmosphere.

Saladin Foster was bookkeeper in the principal store, and the only high-salaried man of his profession in Lakeside. He was thirty-five years old, now; he had served that store for fourteen years; he had begun in his marriage-week at four hundred dollars a year, and had climbed steadily up, a hundred dollars a year for four years; from that time forth his wage had remained eight hundred—a handsome figure indeed, and everybody conceded that he was worth it.

His wife, Elvira, was a capable helpmeet, although—like himself—a dreamer of dreams and a private dabber in romance. The first thing she did, after her marriage—child as she was, aged only nineteen—was to buy an acre of ground on the edge of the town, and pay down the cash for it—twenty-five dollars, all her fortune. Saladin had less, by fifteen. She instituted a vegetable garden there, got it farmed on shares by the nearest neighbor, and made it pay her a hundred per cent. a year. Out of Saladin's first year's wage she put thirty dollars in the savings-bank, sixty out of his second, a hundred out of his third, a hundred and fifty out of his fourth. His wage went to eight hundred a year, then, and meantime two children had arrived and increased the expenses, but she banked two hundred a year from the salary, nevertheless, therewith. When she had been married seven years she built and furnished a pretty and comfortable two-thousand-dollar house in the midst of her garden-acre, paid half of the money down, and moved her family in. Seven years later she was out of debt and had several hundred dollars net earning her living.

Earning it by the rise in landed estate; for she had long ago bought another acre or two and sold the most of it at a profit to pleasant people who were willing to build, and would be good neighbors and furnish a great comradeship for herself and her growing family. She had an independent income from wife investments of about a hundred dollars a year; her children were growing in years and grace; and she was a pleased and happy woman. Happy in her husband, happy in her children, and the husband and the children were happy in her. It is at this point that this history begins.

The youngest girl, Clytemnestra—called Clytie for short—was eleven; her sister, Gwendolen—called Gwen for short—was thirteen; rare girls, and comely. The names betray the latent romanticism in the parental blood, the parents' names indicate that the tings were an inheritance. It was an affectionate family, hence all four of its members had pet names. Saladin's was a varmint and unsexing one—Sally; and so was Elvira's—Alek. All day long Sally was a good and diligent bookkeeper and salesman; all day long Alek was a good and faithful mother and housewife and thoughtful and calculating business woman; but in the evening room at night they put the plodding world away and lived in another and a fairer, reading romances to each other, dream, dream, conrading with kings and princes and stately lords and ladies in the flesh and stir and splendor of noble palaces and grim and ancient castles.

II

Now came great news! Stunning news, joyous news, in fact. It came from a neighboring State, where the family's only surviving relative lived. It was Sally's relative—a sort of vague and indefinite uncle or second or third cousin by the name of Tilbury Foster, normally a bachelor, reputed well-off and correspondingly sane and crusty. Sally had tried to make up to him once, by letter, in a bygone time, and had not made that mistake again.

Tilbury now wrote to Sally, saying he should shortly die, and should leave him thirty thousand dollars, cash; not for love, but because money had given him most of his troubles and exasperations, and he wished to please it where there was good hope that it would continue its malignant work. The bequest would be found in his will, and would be paid over. Provided, that Sally should be able to prove to the executors that he had taken an active of the gift by spoken word or by letter, and had made no inquiries concerning the non-banquet's progress toward the revolving treasure, and had not attended the funeral.

As soon as Alek had partially recovered from the transient emotions created by the letter, he went to the relative's habitat and subscribed for the local paper.

Man and wife entered into a solemn compact, now, to meet sometime the great sum to any one while the relative lived, but some ignorant persons carry the fact to the death-bed and distort it and make it appear that they were disinterestedly thankful for the bequest, and just the same as confessing it and patting it right in the face of the prohibition.

For the rest of the day Sally made havoc and confusion with his books, and Alek could not keep her mind on her affairs, nor even take up a flower-pot or book or a stick of wood without forgetting what she had intended to do with it. For both were dreaming.

"Thirty thousand dollars!" All day long the music of those inspiring words sang through those people's heads.

From his marriage-day forth, Alek's grip had been upon the purse, and Sally had without known what it was to be privileged to squander a dime on her necessities.

"Thirty thousand dollars!" the song went on and on. A vast sum, an unthinkable sum!

All day long Alek was ab-

Monica after monsoon, ever higher, broader, finer sobered in planning how to invest it, Sally in planning how to spend it.

There was no remorse-reading that night. The children took themselves away early, for the parents were silent, distraught, and strangely unentertaining. The good-night kisses might as well have been impressed upon vacancy, for all the response they got; the parents were not aware of the kisses, and the children had been gone an hour before their absence was noticed. Two parents had been busy during that hour—note-making; in the way of plans. It was Sally who broke the stillness at last. He said, with exultation—

"Ah, it'll be grand, Aleck! Out of the first thousand we'll have a horse and a buggy for summer, and a cutter and a skin laprobe for winter."

Aleck responded, with decision and composure—

"Out of the capital? Nothing of the kind. Not if it was a million!"

Sally was deeply disappointed; the glow went out of his face.

"Oh, Aleck!" he said, reproachfully. "We've always worked so hard and been so scrimped; and now that we are rich, it does seem—"

He did not finish, for he saw her eyes soften; his supplication had touched her. She said, with gentle persuasiveness—

"We must not spend the capital, dear, it would not be wise. Out of the income from it—"

"That will answer, that will answer, Aleck! How dear and good you are! There will be a noble income, and if we can spend that—"

"Not all of it, dear, not all of it, but you can spend a part of it. That is, a reasonable part. But the whole of the capital—every penny of it—must be put right to work, and kept at it. You see the reasonableness of that, don't you?"

"Why, yes, of course. But we'll have to wait so long. Six months before the first interest falls due."

"Yes—six months longer."

"Longer, Aleck! Why? Don't they pay half-yearly?"

"That kind of an investment—yes; but I shan't invest in that way."

"What way then?"

"For big returns."

"Big. That's good. Go on, Aleck. What is it?"

"Good. The new mine, I'm sure. I mean to put in ten thousand. Ground deep. When we organize, we'll get three shares for one."

"By George but it sounds good, Aleck! Then the shares will be worth—how much? And when?"

"About a year. They'll pay ten per cent. half-yearly, and be worth thirty thousand. I know all about it; the advertisement is in the Cincinnati paper here."

"Land, thirty thousand for ten—in a year! Let's join in the whole capital and pull out ninety! I'll write and subscribe right now—to surprise it may be too late."

He was flying to the writing-desk, but Aleck stopped him and put him back in his chair. He said—

"Don't lose your head so. We mustn't subscribe till we've got the money; don't you know that?"

Sally's excitement went down a degree or two, but he was not wholly appeased.

"Why, Aleck, we'll have it, you know—and as soon, too. He's probably out of his troubles before this, it's a hundred to nothing

Sally was . . . robbing the store

"But why should you want to talk in that dreadful way? How would you like to have people talk so about you, and you not cold yet?"

"Not likely to be, for one while. I reckon, if my last act was giving away money for the sake of doing somebody a harm with it. But never mind about Tibbary, Aleck, let's talk about something worldly. It does seem to me that that mine is the place for the whole thirty. What's the objection?"

"All the eggs in one basket—that's the objection."

"All right, if you say so. What about the other twenty? What do you mean to do with that?"

"There is no hurry; I am going to look around before I do anything with it."

"All right, if your mind's made up," sighed Sally. He was deep in thought, a while, then he said—

"There'll be twenty thousand profit coming from the ten a year from now. We can spend that, can't we, Aleck?"

"No, dear," she said, "it won't sell high till we've had the first semiannual dividend. You can spend part of that."

"Shucks, only that—and a whole year to wait! Confound it, I—"

"Oh, do be patient! It might even be declared in three months—it's quite within the possibilities."

"Oh, jolly! oh, thanks!" and Sally jumped up and kissed his wife in gratitude. "It'll be three thousand—three whole thousand! how much of it can we spend, Aleck! Make it liberal—do, dear, that's a good fellow."

Aleck was pleased; so pleased that she yielded to the pressure and conceded a sum which her judgment told her was a foolish extravagance—a thousand dollars. Sally kissed her half a dozen times and even in that way could not express all his joy and thankfulness. This new access of gratitude and affection carried Aleck quite beyond the bounds of prudence, and before he could restrain himself she had made her darling another grant—a couple of thousand out of the fifty or sixty which she meant to clear with in a year out of the twenty which still remained of the bequest. The happy tears sprang to Sally's eyes, and he said—

"Oh, I want to hug you!" And he did it. Then he got his notes and sat down and began to check off, for first purchase, the bargains which he considered wisest to secure. "Horse—buggy—cutter—laprobe—patent leathers—dog—plug hat—church pew—ten—under—new teeth—say, Aleck!"

"Well?"

"Ciphering away, aren't you? That's right. Have you got the twenty thousand invested yet?"

"No, there's no hurry about that; I must look around first, and think."

"But you are ciphering; what's it about?"

"Why, I have to find work for the thirty thousand that comes out of the coal, haven't I?"

"Scott, what a head! I never thought of that. How are you getting along? Where have you arrived?"

"Not very far—two years or three. I've turned it over twice; once in oil and once in wheat."

"Why, Aleck, it's splendid! How does it aggregate?"

They were sailing the summer seas in their dream-boat he's selecting his brimstone-shovel this very minute. Now, I think—"

Aleck shuddered, and said—

"How can you, Sally! Don't talk in that way, it is perfectly scandalous."

"Oh, well, make it a habit, if you like, I don't care for his outfit, I was only just talking. Can't you let a person talk?"

"I think—well, to be on the safe side, about a hundred and eighty thousand clear, though it will probably be more."

"My! isn't it wonderful? My gracious, look has come our way at last, after all the hard sledding. Aleck!"

"I'm going to cash in a whole three hundred on the mission—that each night here means one for mission!"

"You couldn't do a nobler thing, dear; and it's just like your generous nature, you unselfish boy."

The praise made Sally poignantly happy, but he was fair and just enough to say it was rightfully due to Aleck rather than to himself, since but for her he should never have had the money.

Then they went up to bed, and in their delirium of bliss they forgot and left the candle burning in the parlor. They did not remember until they were undressed; then Nelly was for letting it burn; he said they could afford it, if it was a thousand. But Aleck went down and put it out.

A good job, too: for on her way back she hit on a scheme that would turn the hundred and eighty thousand into half a million before it had had time to get cold.

The little newspaper which Aleck had subscribed for was a Thursday sheet; it would make the trip of his hundred miles from Tully's village and arrive on Saturday. Tully's letter had started on Friday, more than a day too late for the beneficiaries to die and get into that week's issue, but in plenty of time to make connections for the next outlet.

Thus the Fosters had to wait almost a complete week to find out whether anything of a satisfactory nature had happened to him or not. It was a long, long week, and the strain was a heavy one. The pair could hardly have borne it if their minds had not had the relief of wholesome diversion. We have seen that they had that. The woman was piling up fortunes right along, the man was spending them—spending all his wife would give him in any case.

At last the Saturday came, and the Weekly Express arrived. Mrs. Everly Bennett was present. She was the Presbyterian parson's wife, and was working the Fusters for a church. Talk now died a sudden death—in the Foster side. Mrs. Bennett presently discovered that her hosts were not hearing a word she was saying; so she got up, wondering and indignant, and went away. The moment she was out of the house, Aleck eagerly tore the wrapper from the paper, and her eyes and Nelly's swept the columns for the death notices. Disappointment! Tilbury was not anywhere mentioned. Aleck was a Christian from the cradle, and duty and the force of habit required her to go through the motions. She pulled herself together and said, with a pious two-per-cent, trade

"Let us be loudly thankful that he has been spared; and—"

* "Down his treacherous hide, I wash—"

"Silly! For shame!"

"I don't care!" retorted the angry man. "It's the way you feel and if you weren't so immorally pious you'd be honest and say so."

Abeck said, with wounded dignity:

"I do not see how you can say such unkind and unjust things. There is no such thing as immoral piety."

Sully felt a pang, but tried to conceal it under a shuffling attempt to save his case by changing the form of it—as if changing the form while retaining the juice would deceive the expert he was

"I didn't mean so bad as that, Aleck: I didn't really mean immoral piety, I only meant—meant—well, conventional piety, you know; re—shop piety; that—the—why, you know what I mean. Aleck—like—well, where you put up the plated article and pass it for solid, you know, without intending anything improper, but just out of trade habit, ancient policy, petrified custom, loyalty to—to—hang it, I can't find the right words, but you know what I mean, Aleck, and that there isn't any harm in it. I'll try again."

"You have said quite enough," said Alex, coldly; "let the subject be dropped."

"I'm willing," fervently responded Sally, wiping the sweat from his forehead and looking the thankfulness he had no words for. Then, musingly, he apologized to himself. "I certainly held three—I know it—but I drew and didn't fill. That's where I'm an often weak in the game. If I had stood pat—but I didn't. I never do. I don't know enough."

Confessedly defeated, he was properly tame now and seldom Alek forgave him with her eyes.

The grand interest, the supreme interest, came suddenly to the front again; nothing could keep it in the background many minutes on a stretch. The couple took up the puzzle of the murder of Tilly's death notice. They discussed it every whenever, more or less, and agreed at last that there was no other way than to conclude that the only really sane explanation of the shorter of the notice must be—and without doubt was—that Tilly was not dead. There was something sad about it, something eerie a little under, maybe, but there it was, and had to be put up with. They were glad to get back to their own life, and to their own disposition; now inscrutable than usual, he thought; one of the most unnecessarily inscrutable he could call to mind, in fact—and said so, with some feeling; but if he was hoping to draw Alida away from her grief, he failed. She would not let him do that. He held his tongue, merely to explain to her that she was likely never

The pair must wait for next week's paper—Tilghy had evidently postponed. That was their thought and their decision. So they put the subject away, and went about their affairs again with as good heart as they could.

Now, if they had but known it, they had been wronging Tibbels all the time. Tibbels had kept faith, kept it to the letter; he was dead, he had died to schedule. He was dead more than four days now and used to it; calmly dead, perfectly dead, as dead as any other new person in the cemetery; dead in abundant time to get into that other's disposition too, and only shut out by an accident: an accident which could not happen to a metropolitan journal, but which happened easily to a poor little village rag like the Register. On this occasion, just as the editorial page was being locked up, a great cargo of street-sweeper water-lugs arrived from Hostetter's Ladies' and Gents' Ice-Cream Parlor, and the stickler of rather chilly reputation Tibbels's translation got crowded out to make room for the editor's frolic, gratitude.

On its way to the standing gallery Tilly's notice got pinned. Otherwise it would have gone into some future edition of the weekly Standard or not wasted "live" matter, and in their galleries "live" matter is important, unless a no accident intervenes. But a thing that got pinned is dead, and for such there is no resurrection; so the chance of seeing print is gone forever and ever. And so, let Tilly like it or not, let him raise his grave to his full, no matter—no mention of his death would ever see the light in the Week Standard.

12

Five weeks drifted tediously along. The Sageamore arrived regularly on the Saturdays, but never once contained a "Damn his liver, he's immortal!"

Alrek gave him a very severe rebuke, and added, with icy solemnity:

"How would you feel if you were suddenly cut off just after such an awful remark had escaped out of you?"

Without sufficient reflection Sally responded:
 "I'd feel I was lucky I hadn't got caught with it in me."
 This, but about 100 years ago, would not be a very good

Pride had forced him to say something, and as he could not think of any rational thing to say he flung that out. Then he stole a base—as he called it—that is, slipped from the pressure, to keep from settling head-on in his wife's discussion-mortal.

Six months came and went. The Suppressor was still silent about Tillyr's. Meanwhile, Nally had several times thrown out a feeling that it was a bad idea. She said she was afraid that Alek had ignored the hints. Nally now resolved to break up with him and risk a frontal attack. So he squarely proposed to disfigure himself and go to Tillyr's village, and surreptitiously find out as to the prospects. Alek put her fact on the dangerous project with energy and decision. She said:

"What can you be thinking of? You do keep my hands full! You have to be watched all the time, like a little child, to keep you from walking into the fire. You'll stay right where you are!"

"Why, Aleck, I could do it and not be found out—I'm certain of it."

"Sally Foster, don't you know you would have to inquire around?"

"Oh, listen to the man! Some day you're got to prove in the excruciators that you never inquired. What then?"

Page Number

He told Acr all . . . and begged for Acr forgiveness

He had forgotten that detail. He didn't reply: there wasn't anything to say, Aleck added.

"Now then, drop that notion out of your mind, and don't ever meddle with it again. Tibbory set that trap for you. Don't you know it's a trap?" He is on the watch, and fully expecting you to blunder into it. Well, he is going to be disappointed—at least while I am on deck. Sally?"

"Well?"

"As long as you live, if it's a hundred years, don't you ever make an inquiry. Promise!"

"All right," with a sigh and reluctantly.

Then Aleck softened and said:

"Don't be impatient. We are prospering; we can wait; there is no hurry. This small decided income dispenses all the time; and as to futures, I have not made a mistake yet—they are piling up by the thousands and the tens of thousands. There is not another family in the State with such prospects as ours. Already we are beginning to roll in eventual wealth. You know that, don't you?"

"Yes, Aleck, it's certainly so."

"Then be grateful for what God is doing for me, and stop worrying. You do not believe we could have achieved these prodigious results without His special help and guidance, do you?"

"Absolutely. 'No, I suppose not.' Then, with feeling and admiration, 'And yet, when it comes to judiciousness in watering a stock or putting up a hand to skin Wall Street I don't give it to you need any outside assistance help, if I do I wish I—'

"Oh, do shut up! I know you do not mean any harm or any irreverence, poor boy, but you can't seem to open your mouth without letting out things to make a person shudder. You keep me in constant dread. For you and for all of us, there I had no fear of the thunder, but now when I hear it I—"

Her voice broke and she began to cry, and could not finish. The sight of this smote Sally to the heart, and he took her in his arms and patted her and comforted her and promised better conduct, and upbraided himself and remorsefully phoned forgiveness. And he was in earnest, and sorry for what he had done and ready for any sacrifice that could make up for it.

And so, in privacy he thought long and deeply over the matter, resolving to do what should seem best. It was easier to promise reforms; indeed he had already promised it. But would that do any real good, any permanent good? No, it would be but temporary—he knew his weakness, and confessed it to himself with sorrow—he could not keep the promise. Something sorer and better must be devised; and he set himself to it. At rest of previous money which he had long been saving up, shifting by shifting, he put a lightning rod on the house.

At a subsequent time he relaxed.

What miracles, what can do, and how quickly and how easily habits are acquired—both trifling habits and habits which profoundly change us. If by accident we wake at two in the morning a couple of nights in succession, we have need to be uneasy, for another repetition can turn the accident into a habit; and a month's delaying with sickness—but we all know these commonplace facts.

The castle-building habit, the day-dreaming habit—how it grows that a luxury it becomes, how we fly to its enchantments at every idle moment, how we revert in them, drop our souls in them, intoxicate ourselves with their beguiling futilities—oh, yes, and how soon and how easily our dream-life and our material life become so intermingled and so fused together that we can't quite tell which is which, any more.

By and by Aleck subscribed for a Chicago daily and for the Wall Street Posters. With an eye single to finance he studied these as diligently all the week as he studied her Public Sundays. Sally was lost in admiration, in awe with what swift and sure strides her genius and judgment developed and expanded, in the forecasting and handling of the securities of both the material and spiritual markets. He was proud of her nerve and daring in exploiting worldly stocks, and just as proud of her conservative caution in working her spiritual deals. He noted that she never lost, but her head in either case; that with a splendid courage she often went short on worldly futures, but bravely drew the line there—she was always long on the others. Her policy was quite sane and simple, as she explained it to him: what she put into earthly futures was for speculation, what she put into spiritual futures was for investment; she was willing to go into the one on a margin, and take chances, but in the case of the other, "margin her no margins,"—she wanted to cash in a hundred cents per dollar's worth, and have the stock transferred on the books.

It took but a very few months to educate Aleck's imagination and Sally's. Each day's training added something to the spread and effectiveness of the two machines. As a consequence, Aleck made imaginary money much faster than at first she had dreamed of making it, and Sally's competence in operating the lever of it kept pace with the strain put upon it, right along. In the beginning Aleck had given the real speculation a touchstone in which to materialize, and had been loath to grant that this term might possibly be "margin" in nine months. But that was the feeble work, the nursery-work, of a financial fairy that had led no teaching, no experience, no practice. These aids soon came, then that nine months vanished, and the imaginary ten thousand dollar investment came marching home with three hundred per cent profit on its back.

It was a great day for the pair of Fosters. They were speechless for joy. Also speechless for another reason: after much watching of the market, Aleck had lately, with fear and trembling, made her first step in "margin" in the remaining twenty thousand of the legacy in this risk. In her mind's eye she had seen it climb, point by point—always with a chance that the market would break—until at last her anxieties were too great for further endurance—she being new to the margin-business and unhardened, as yet—and she gave her imaginary broker an imaginary order by imaginary telegraph to sell. She said forty thousand dollars profit was enough. The sale was made on the very day that the confidence had returned with its rich freight. As I have said, the couple were speechless. They sat, dazed and bloodst, that night, trying to realize the immense fact, the overwhelming fact, that they were actually worth a hundred thousand dollars in clean imaginary cash. Yet so it was.

It was the last time that ever Aleck was afraid of a margin; at least afraid enough to let it break her sleep and pale her cheek to the extent that this first experience in that line had done.

Indeed it was a memorable night. Gradually the realization that they were rich sank deeper and deeper into the souls of the pair, then they began to place the money. If we could have looked out through the eyes of these dreamers we should have seen their tiny little wooden house disappear, and a two-story brick with a east-west dormer in front of it take its place; or should have seen a three-glazed gas-chamber grow down from the parlor ceiling; we should have seen the heavily tiled carpet turn into blue-sels, a dollar and a half a yard; we should have seen the phibian fireplace vanish away and a preferred big base-burner with jingling windows take position and spread war around. And we should have seen other things, too, among them the hazy, the lap of the stove pipe hat, and so on.

From that time forth, although the daughters and the neighbors saw only the same old wooden house there, it was a two-story brick to Aleck and Sally; and not a night went by that Aleck did not worry about the imaginary gas-bills, and get for all comfort Sally's reckless retreat. "What if it we can afford it."

Before the couple went to bed, that first night that they were rich, they had decided that they must celebrate. They must give a party—that was their plan. But how to explain it—to the daughters and the neighbors? They could not expose the fact that they were rich. Sally was willing to say nothing of it; but Aleck kept her head and would not allow it. She said that although the money was as good as in, it would be well to wait until it was actually in, in that policy she took her stand, and would not budge. The great secret must be kept, she said, except from the daughters and everybody else.

The pair were puzzled. They must celebrate, they were determined to celebrate, but since the secret must be kept, what could they celebrate? No birthdays were due for three months. Tibbory wasn't available, evidently he was going to live forever, what the nation could they celebrate? That was Sally's way of putting it; and he was getting impatient. Ten, and a bar-scel, but he had said it already by sheer inspiration, as it

The rising young dealer

One of the past masters

One of the future masters

One of the Congressmen

The Governor's son

The rising young lawyer

Mathematical Possibilities

seemed to him—and all their troubles were gone in a moment, they would celebrate the Discovery of America. A splendid ideal!

Aleck was almost too proud of Sally for words—she said she never would have thought of it. But Sally, although he was bursting with delight in the compliment and with wonder at himself, tried not to let on, and said it wasn't really anything, anybody could have done it. Whereat Aleck, with a prideful toss of her happy head, said—

"Oh, certainly! Anybody could—oh, anybody! Hossanah Dinkins, for instance! Or maybe Adolbert Pussant—oh, dear—well, I'd like to see them try it that's all. There's one, if they could think of the discovery of a forty-acre island it's more than I believe they could; and as for a whole continent, why, Sally Foster, you know perfectly well it would strain the livers and lights out of them, also, they couldn't!"

The dear woman, she knew he had talent; and if affection made her overestimate the size of it a little, surely it was a sweet and gentle crime, and forgivable for its source's sake.

Y

The celebration went off well. The friends were all present, both the young and the old. Among the young were Phoebe and Grace Pussant and their brother Adolbert, who was a rising young journeyman limner, also Hossanah Dinkins, Jr., journeyman plasterer, just out of his apprenticeship. For many months Adolbert and Hossanah had been showing interest in Hossanah and Clytemnestra Foster, and the parents of the girls had noticed this with private satisfaction. But they suddenly realized now that that feeling had not been mutual; they recognized that the changed financial conditions had raised up a wall between their daughters and the young mechanics. The daughters could now look higher—and most, they must. They need carry nothing below the grade of lawyer or merchant's paper; no woman would take care of this; there must be no imbalances.

However, these thoughts and projects of theirs were private, and did not show on the surface, and therefore threw no shadow upon the celebration. What showed upon the surface was a serene and lofty contentment and a dignity of aspect and gravity of deportment which compelled the admiration and likewise the wonder of the company. All noticed it, all commented upon it, but none was able to divine the secret of it. It was a marvel and a mystery. Three several persons remarked, without suspecting what clever sleuths they were making:

"It's as if they'd come into property."

That was just it, indeed.

Most mothers would have taken hold of the matrimonial matter to the old proverbial way: they would have given the girls a talking to, of a solemn sort and unattractive—before calculated to defeat its own purpose, by producing tears and secret rebellion; and the said mothers would have further damaged the business by repeating the young mechanics to discontinue their attentions. But this mother had a different idea. She was practical. She said nothing to any of the young people concerned, nor to any one else except Sally. He listened to her and understood; understood and admired. He said:

"I set the liberty of finding fault with the samples on view, thus luring business and contracting trade without occasion, you merely offer a higher class of goods for the money, and leave nature to take her course. It's wisdom, Aleck, solid wisdom, and sound as a nut. What's your fish? Have you nominated him yet?"

No, she hadn't. They must look the market over—which they did. To start with, they considered and dismissed Bradish, rising young lawyer, and Fulton, rising young dentist. Sally must invite them to dinner. But not right away; there was no hurry, Aleck said. Keep an eye on the pair, and wait; nothing would be lost by putting slowly in so important a matter.

It turned out that this was wisdom, too; for inside of three weeks Aleck made a wonderful strike which netted her imaginary hundred thousand to three hundred thousand of the same quality. She and Sally were in the clouds that evening. For the first time they introduced champagne to dinner. Not real champagne, but plenty real enough for the amount of imagination expended on it. It was Sally that did it, and Aleck weakly submitted. At bottom both were troubled and ashamed, for he was a high up Son of Temperance, and at internals was an agent which no dog could keep up and retain his reason and his opinion; and she was a W. C. T. U. with all that implies of boiler-iron virtue and unimpeachable behavior. But there it was, the pride of riches was beginning its disintegrating work. They had lived in poverty, once more, a sad truth which had been proven many times before in the world; that whereas principle is a great and noble protection against showy and degrading vanities and vices, poverty is worth six of it. More than four hundred thousand dollars to the good! They took up the matrimonial matter again. Neither the dentist nor the lawyer was mentioned; there was no occasion; they were out of the running. Disqualified! They discussed the son of the policeman and the son of the village doctor, and after that, as it is the precious case, they concluded to wait and think, and go cautiously and sure.

Look came their way again. Aleck, ever watchful, saw a most and risky chance, and took a daring flyer. A time of trembling, of doubt, of awful uneasiness followed, for non-success meant absolute ruin and nothing short of it. Then came the result, and Aleck, faint with joy, could hardly control her voice when she said:

"The suspense is over, Sally—and we are worth a cold million!"

"Sally wept for gratitude, and said:

"Oh, Elektra, jewel of women, darling of my heart, we are free at last, we roll in wealth, we need never scribble again. It's a case for Veuve Clicquot! but he got out a pint of spruce-berry and made scurrier, he saying, 'Hump the expense,' and she rebuking him gently with reproachful but humid and happy eyes.

They sheltered the pork-packer's son and the bricklayer's son, and set down to consider the Governor's son and the son of the Congressman.

V

It were a weariness to follow in detail the leaps and bounds the Foster fortunes took from this time forth. It was marvellous, it was dizzying, it was dazzling. Everything Aleck touched turned to fairy gold, and leaping itself upward toward the firmament. Millions upon millions poured in, and still the mighty stream flowed thundering along, still its vast volume increased. Five millions—ten millions—twenty—thirty—was there never to be an end!

Two years except by a splendid delirium, the intemperate Fosters scarcely noticing the flight of time. They were now worth three hundred million dollars; they were in every board of directors of every production combine in the country; and still, as time drifted along, the millions went on piling up, five at a time, ten at a time, so fast as they could tally them off, almost. The three hundred doubled itself—then doubled again—and yet again—and yet once more!

Twenty-four hundred million!

The business was getting a little confused. It was necessary to take an account of Aleck, and straighten it out. The Fosters knew it, they felt it, they realized that it was imperative; but they also knew that to do it properly and perfectly the task must be carried out in fits and starts, without a break when once it was begun. A long-term job; and where could they find ten leisure hours in a bunch? Sally was selling pins and sugar and calico all day and every day; Aleck was cooking and washing dishes and sweeping and making beds all day and every day, with none to help, for the daughters were being raised up for high society. The mother knew the case was to get the ten hours, and only one. Both were ashamed to name it; each waited for the other to do it. Finally Sally said—

"Somebody's got to give in. It's up to me. Consider that I've named it—never mind pronouncing it out loud."

Aleck colored, but was grateful. Without further remark, they fell. Fell and—broke the Sabbath. For that was their only free ten-hour stretch. It was but another step in the downward path. Others would follow. Next wealth has temptations which intently and surely undermine the moral structure of persons not habituated to its possession.

They pulled down the shades and broke the Sabbath. With hard and patient labor they overhauled their holdings, and listed these. And a long-drawn procession of formidable names it was! Starting with the Railway System, Standard Life Insurance Co., Ocean Cables, Diluted Telegraph, and all the rest, and winding up with Klondike, De Beers, Tammany Grant, and Shill, there in the Post-office Department.

Twenty-four hundred millions, and all safely planted in Good Things, gilt-edged and becoming.

Be happy, become happy. A year. Aleck fetched a long purr of soft delight, and said—

"Is it enough?"

"It is, Aleck."

"What shall we do?"

"Stand pat."

"Retire from business?"

"That's it."

"I am agreed. The good work is finished; we will take a long rest and enjoy the money."

"Good! Aleck?"

"Yes, dear."

"How much of the income are we spending?"

"The whole of it."

It seemed to her husband that some chaotic delirium had fallen from his lips. He did not say a word; he was happy beyond the power of speech.

Aleck put the cat in the wash

After that, they broke the Sabbaths right along, as fast as they turned up. It is the first wrong step that count. Every Sunday they put in the whole day, after morning service, on inventions—inventions of ways to spend the money. They got to continue this delicious dissipation till past midnight; and at every moment Aleck lavished millions upon great charities and religious enterprises, and Sally lavished like sums upon matters to which (at first) he gave definite names. Only at first. Later the names gradually lost shape of outline, and eventually faded into "andries" (thus becoming entirely—but, safely—undescriptive). For Sally was crumbling. The placing of three millions added seriously and most uncomfortably to the family expenses—in tallow candles. For a while Aleck was worried. Then, after a little, she ceased to worry. For the occasion of it was gone. She was pained, she was grieved, she was ashamed; but she said nothing, and so became an accessory. Sally was taking candles; he was robbing the store. It is ever thus. Next month, to the person unacquainted with it, is a bane; it cuts into the web and bone of his morals. When the Fosters were poor, they could have been trusted with untold candles. But now they—but let us not dwell upon it. From candles to apples is but a step: Sally got to taking apples; this soap, then maple sugar; then rained goods; then crockery. How easy it is to go from bad to worse, when once we have started upon a downward course!

Meantime, other efforts had been misdirecting the course of the Fosters' splendid financial march. The fictitious brick dwelling had given place to a larger and grander one with a checker-board outward road; in time this one disappeared and gave place to a still grander one—and so on and so on. Mansion after mansion, made of air, rose, higher, broader, finer, and each in its turn vanished away, to give place to the next. On these great days, our dreamers were in fancy housed, in a distant region, in a sumptuous vast palace which looked out from a leafy summit upon a noble prospect of vale and river and receding hills steeped in tinted mist—and all private, all the property of the dreamers; a palace swarming with liveried servants, and populated with guests of fame and power, hailing from all the world's capitals, foreign and domestic.

This palace was far, far away toward the rising sun, immeasurably remote, astronomically remote, in Newport, Rhode Island, Italy Land, of High Society, ineffable Domain of the American Aristocracy. As a rule, they spent a part of every Sabbath—after morning service—in this sumptuous home, the rest of it they spent in Europe, or in dawdling around in their private yacht. Six days of splendid and splendid Fosters' life at home on the ragged edge of Lakeside meant, the seventh in Fairyland—such had become their programme and their habit.

In their strictly restricted Fast-life they remained as of old—splendid, diligent, careful, practical, economical. They stuck loyally to the little New Church, and labored faithfully in its interests and stood by its high and tough doctrine with all their mental and spiritual energies. But in their Dream-life they obeyed the invitations of their fancies, whatever they might be, and hence they were subject to rapid change. Aleck's fancies were not very capricious, and not frequent, but Sally's scattered a good deal. Aleck, in her dream-life, went over to the Episcopal camp, on account of its large official titles; next she became High-church on account of the candles and shawls; and next she naturally glided to Rome, where there were candles and more candles. But these excursions were as nothing to Sally's. His dream-life was a glowing and continuous and persistent excitement, and he kept every part of it fresh and sparkling by frequent changes, the religious part along with the rest. He worked his religions hard, and changed these with his shift.

The liberal spendings of the Fosters upon their fancies began early in their prosperity, and grew in predictably step by step with their advancing fortunes. As time they became truly enormous. Aleck built a university or two per Sunday; also a hospital or two; also a Boston hotel or so; also a batch of churches; now and then a cathedral; and once, with untold and ill-fated playfulness, Sally said, "It was a cold day when she didn't ship a cargo of millions to pry under cardinals' Chinamen to trade off twenty-four carat Confucianism for counterfeit Christianity."

This rude and unfeeling language hurt Aleck to the heart, and she was free from the pressure crying. That spectacle went to his own heart, and in his pain and shame he would have given worlds to have those unkind words hark. But he had no syllable of repentance—and that cut him. Not one suggestion that he look at his own record—and she could have made, oh so many, and such blistering ones! Her generous silence brought a swift revenge, for it turned his thoughts upon himself, it summoned before him a spectral procession, a moving vision of his life as he had been leading it those past few years of limitless prosperity, and as he sat there reviewing it his cheeks burned and his soul was steeped in humiliation. Aleck, at her life—how fair it was, and leading ever upward; and look at his own—how frivolous, how charged with mean vanities, how selfish, how empty, how ignoble! And its trend—never upward, but downward, ever downward!

He instituted comparisons between her record and his own. He had found fault with her—she was modest, safe! And so could be say for himself! When she built her first church what was he doing? Gathering other blasé multimillionaires into a Poker Club; defiling his own palace with it; losing hundreds of thousands to it at every sitting, and slyly vain of the admiring nodding of it made for him. When she was building Sunday universities, what was he doing? Polluting himself with a gay and dissipated secret life in the company of other fast bloods, multimillionaires in money and purpers in character. When she was building her first founding academy, what was he doing? Alas! When she was projecting her noble Society for the Purifying of the Sex, what was he doing? Ah, what, indeed! When she and the W. C. T. U. and the Woman with the Hatnet, meeting with resolute mass, were sweeping the land, what was he doing? The land, what was he doing? He took three times a day. When she, builder of a hundred cathedrals, was being gratefully welcomed and blessed in papal Rome and decorated with the Golden Rose which she had so honorably earned, what was he doing? Bricking the bank at Monte Carlo.

He stopped. He could go no farther; he could not bear the rest. He rose up, with a great resolution upon his lips; this secret life should be revealed, and confessed; no longer would he live it clandestinely; he would go and tell her all.

And that is what he did. He told her. Sally sat and wept upon her bosom; wept, and weaned, and begged for her forgiveness. It was a profound shock, and she staggered under the blow, but it was her own, the core of her heart, the blessing of her eyes, her all in all, she could deny him nothing, and she forgave. She knew that he could never again be quite so true to her as he had been before; yet all morally defamed and degraded as he was, was he not her own, her very own, the idol of her deathless worship? She said she was his self, his slave, and she opened her yearning heart and look him in.

VII

One Sunday afternoon some time after this they were sailing the summer sea in their dream yacht, and reclining in lazy luxury under the awning of the after-deck. There was silence, for each was busy with his own thoughts. These seasons of silence had incessantly been growing more and more frequent of late; the old nervousness and cordiality were so fading. Sally's terrible recollection had done its work; Aleck had tried hard to drive the memory of it out of her mind, but it would not go, and the shame and bitterness of it were poisoning her gracious dream-life. She could see now (on Sundays) that her husband was becoming a hoarse and repulsive thing. She could not close her eyes to a meeting in these days she no longer looked at him, Sundays, when she could help it.

But she—was she herself without blinks? Alas, she knew she was not. She was keeping a most fervent wish she was acting dishonestly toward him, and many a pang it was costing her. She was breaking the compact, and converting it from him. Under strong temptation she had gone into business again; she had risked their whole fortune in a purchase of all the railway systems and coal and steel companies of the world on a margin, and she was now trembling, every Sabbath hour, lest through some chance word of hers he find it out. In her misery and remorse for this treachery she could not keep her heart from going out to him in pity; she was filled with compassion to see him lying there, drunk and content, and never suspecting. Never suspecting—trusting her with a perfect and pathetic trust, and she looking over him by a thread a possible calamity of so disappointing as—

"O—Aleck!"

The interruption words brought her suddenly to herself. She was grateful to have that persecuting subject from her thoughts, and she was also with much of the old time tenderness in her tone:

"Yes, dear."

"Do you know, Aleck, I think we are making a mistake—that is, you are. I mean about the marriage bond." He sat up, fat and froggy and bearded, like a bearded Buddha, and he earnest. "Consider! It's more than five years. You've continued the same policy from the start; with every rise, always holding on for five points higher. Always when I think we are going to have some wedding, you see a bigger thing ahead, and I undergo another disappointment. I think you are too hard to please. Some day we'll get left. I've been turned down the dentist and the lawyer. That was all right—it was sound. Next, we turned down the banker's son and the pork-butcher's son—right again, and sound. Next, we turned down the Congressman's son and the Governor's—right as a tripe, I confess it. Next, the Senator's son and the son of the Vice-President of the United States—perfectly right, there's no permanency

His Royal Highness, Sigismund, Margrave of Brandenburg.
Discovered by the Kaiser's Minister, Herr Graf von Dönhof, of Königsberg.

The Fosters sat petrified for two minutes about those little distinctions. Then you went for the axis terrace; and I thought we had struck oil at last—yes. We would make a plunge at the Fosters' household, and pull in some seven-league, wearable, holy, indelible, million with the antiquity of a hundred and fifty years, disinfected of the ancestral sales of salt coal and pellets all of a century ago, and unscrubbed by a day's work either, and there? why, then the marriage, of course! But no, along comes a pair of real aristocrats from Europe and straightaway you throw over the ball-broods. It was awfully discouraging, Alek! Since then, what a preoccupation! You turned down the baronet for a pair of barons; you turned down the barons for a pair of viscounts; the viscounts for a pair of earls, the earls for a pair of marquises, the marquises for a house of dukes. Now, Alek, rock up!—you've played the limit. You've got a job lot of four dukes under the hammer: of four antiques, all sound in mind and limb and pedigree, all bankrupt and in debt up to the ears. They come high, but we can afford it. Come, Alek, don't delay any longer, don't keep up the suspense—take the whole lot out, and leave the girls to choose!"

Alek had been smiling blandly and contentedly all through this arrangement of her marriage-pottery; a pleasant light, as of triumph with perhaps a nice surprise peeping out through it, rose in her eyes, and she said, as calmly as she could—

"Sally, what would you say to—marrying?"

Prodigious! Poor man, it knocked him silly, and he fell over the garden-strake and barked his shin on the cat heads. He was dizzy for a moment, then he gathered himself up and limped over and sat down by his wife and beamed his old-time admiration and affection upon her in words, out of his bloody eyes.

"My George!" he said, fervently, "Alek, you are great—the greatest woman in the whole parish! I can't ever learn the whole size of you. I can't ever learn the immeasurable depth of you. Here I've been considering myself qualified to criticize your game, 22 Why, if I had stopped to think, I'd have known you had a lone hand up your sleeve. Now, dear heart, I'm all red hot impatience—tell me about it!"

The flattered and happy woman put her lips to his ear and whispered a patently false. It made him catch his breath, it lit his face with exultation.

"Land!" he said, "it's a stunning catch! He's got a gambling-bill, and a graveyard, and a bishop, and a cathedral—all his very own. And all gilt-edged five-hundred-per cent. stock, every detail of it; the finest little property in Europe. And that graveyard—it's the selectest in the world: none but suicides admitted; you, sir, and the free-list unsuicided, too, all the time. There isn't a cobbler hand in the parish, but there's enough: eight hundred acres in the graveyard and forty-two outside. It's a sovereignty—that's the main thing; land's nothing. There's plenty land, Sahara's dragged with it."

Alek panted; she was profoundly happy. She said—

"Think of it, Sally—it is a family that has never married outside the Royal and Imperial Houses of Europe; our grandchildren will sit upon thrones!"

"True as you live, Alek—and bear scepters, too; and handle these as naturally and unobtrusively as I handle a yardstick. It's a grand catch, Alek. He's unrivaled, is he? Can't get away! You didn't take him on a bargain?"

"No. Trust me for that. He's not a liability, he's an asset. So is the other one."

"Who is it, Alek?"

"His Royal Highness Sigismund-Niegrfeld-Laurafeld Dinkelspiel-Schwanzenberg Blatwurst, Hereditary Grand Duke of Katzen-Jammer."

"Not! You can't mean it!"

"It's as true as I'm sitting here, I give you my word," she answered.

His cup was full, and he hugged her to his heart with rapture, saying—

"How wonderful it all seems, and how beautiful! It's one of the oldest and noblest of the three hundred and sixty-four ancient German principalities, and one of the few that was allowed to retain its royal estate when Blomarch got done trimming them. I know that fact, I've been there. It's got a ropewalk and a candle-factory, and an army. Standing army. Infantry and cavalry. Three soldiers and a horse. Alek, it's been a long wait, and full of heartbreak and hope deferred, but God knows I am happy now. Happy and grateful to you, my own, who have done it all. When is it to be?"

"Next Sunday."

"Good. And we'll want to do these weddings up in the very regal style that's going. It's properly due to the royal quality of the parties of the first part. Now as I understand it, there is only one kind of marriage that is sacred to royalty, exclusive to royalty: it's the morganatic."

"What do they call it that for, Sally?"

"I don't know; but anyway it's royal, and royal only."

"Then we will insist upon it. Mine—I will compel it. It is morganatic marriage or none."

"That settles it," said Sally, rubbing his hands with delight.

"And it will be the very first in America. Alek, it will make Newport sick!"

Then they fell silent, and drifted away upon their dream-wings to the far regions of the earth to invite all the crowned heads and their families and provide gratis transportation for them.

VIII

During three days the couple walked upon air, with their heads in the clouds. They were but vaguely conscious of their surroundings, they saw all things dimly, as through a veil, they were steeped in dreams, often they did not hear when they were spoken to, they often did not understand when they heard; they answered confusedly or at random; Sally said molasses by weight, sugar by the yard, and furnished soap when asked for candles, and Alek put the cat in the wash and fed milk to the soiled linen. Every body was stunned and amazed, and went about muttering, "What was the matter with the Fosters?"

Three days. Then came events! Things had taken a happy turn, and her forty-eight hours Aleck's imaginary career had been booming. Up—up—still up! Cool-point was passed. Still up—and up—and up! Five points above cost—then ten—fifteen—twenty! Twenty points cold profit on the vast venture, now, and Aleck's imaginary brokers were shouting frantically by imaginary long-distance. "Sell! sell! for Heaven's sake sell!"

She broke the splendid news to Sally, and he, too, said "Sell! sell—oh, don't make a blunder, now, you own the earth!—sell, sell!" But she set her iron will and looked it unshakable, and said she would hold on for five points more if she died for it.

It was a fatal resolve. The very next day came the historic crash, the record crash, the devastating crash, when the bottom fell out of Wall Street, and the whole body of gilt-edged stocks dropped twenty-five points in five hours, and the millionaires were seen begging his bread in the Bourse. Aleck sternly held her grip and "put up" as long as she could, but at last there came a call which she was powerless to resist, and her imaginary brokers sold her out. Then, and not till then, the man in her was vanquished, and the woman in her resumed sway. She put her arms about her husband's neck and wept, saying—

"I am to blame, do not forgive me, I cannot bear it. We are paupers! Paupers, and I am so miserable. The wedding will never come off; all that is past; we could not even buy the denials, now."

A bitter reproach was on Sally's tongue: "I begged you to sell, but you—" He did not say it; he had not the heart to add a hurt to that broken and repentant spirit. A nobler thought came to him and he said—

"Bear up, my Aleck, all is not lost! You really never invested a penny of my uncle's bequest, but only its unmaterialized future; what we have lost was only the increment harvested from that future by your incomparable financial judgment and sagacity. Cheer up, banish those grudge; we still have the thirty thousand untouched; and with the experience which you have acquired, think what you will be able to do with it in a couple of years! The marriage is not off, they are only postponed."

These were blessed words. Aleck saw how true they were, and their influence was electric; her tears ceased to flow, and her great spirit rose to its full stature again. With flashing eye and grateful heart, and with hand uplifted in pledge and prophecy, she said—

"Now and here I proclaim—"

But she was interrupted by a visitor. It was the editor and proprietor of the Spectator. He had happened into Lakeside to pay a day-call upon an obscure grandnephew of his who was scoring the end of her pilgrimage, and with the idea of combating business with grief he had looked up the Fosters, who had been so absorbed in other things for the past four years that they had neglected to pay up their subscription. Six dollars due. No visitor could have been more welcome. He would know all about Uncle Tibbary and what his chances might be getting to be, courtwards. They could of course ask no questions, for that would squelch the bequest, but they could nibble around on the edge of the subject and hope for results. The scheme did not work. The obtuse editor did not know he was being nibbled at; but at last, chance accomplished what art had failed in. In illustration of something under discussion which required the help of metaphor, the editor said—

"Land, it's as tough as Tibbary Foster!—as we say."

It was sudden, and it made the Fosters jump. The editor noticed it, and said, apologetically—

"No harm intended, I assure you. It's just a saying; just a joke, you know—nothing in it. Relation of years!"

Sally crowded his burning eagerness down, and answered with all the indifference he could assume—

"I—well, not that I know of, but we've heard of him." The editor was thankful, and resumed his composure. Sally added, "Is he—Is he—well?"

"Is he well? Why, bless you he's in good these five years!"

The Fosters were trembling with grief, though it felt like joy. Sally said, non-committally and testatively:

"Ah, such a life, and none one escape—not even the rich are spared."

The editor laughed.

"If you are including Tibbary," said he, "it don't apply. He hadn't a cent; the town had to bury him."

The Fosters sat petrified for two minutes; petrified and cold. Then, white-faced and weath-ered, Sally asked:

"Is it true? Do you know it to be true?"

"Is it true? I should say! I was one of the executors. He hadn't anything to leave but a wheelbarrow, and he left that to me. It hadn't any wheel, and wasn't any good. Still, it was something, and so, to square up, I scribbled off a sort of a little obituarial and off for him, but it got crowded out."

The Fosters were not listening—their cup was full, it could contain no more. They sat with bowed heads, dead to all things but the ache in their hearts.

An hour later. Still they sat there, bowed, motionless, silent, the visitor long ago gone, they unaware.

Then they stirred, and lifted their heads wearily, and gazed at each other wistfully, dreamily, dazed; then presently began to tattle to each other in a wondering and childish way. At intervals they lapsed into silence, leaving a sentence unfinished, seemingly either unaware of it or losing their way. Sometimes, when they woke out of these silences, they had a dim and transient consciousness that something had happened to their minds; then with a dumb and yearning solicitude they would softly caress each other's hands in mutual compassion and support, as if they would say: "I am near you, I will not forsake you, we will bear it together; somewhere there is release and forgetfulness, somewhere there is a grave and peace; be patient, it will not be long."

They lived yet two years, in mental night, always brooding, steeped in vague regrets and melancholy dreams, never speaking; their release came to both on the same day.

Toward the end the darkness lifted from Sally's rained mind for a moment, and he said:

"Vast wealth, acquired by sudden and unwholesome means, is a snare. It did us no good, transient were its feverish pleasures; yet for its sake we threw away our sweet and simple and happy life—let others take warning by us."

He lay silent a while, with closed eyes; then as the chill of death crept upward toward his heart, and consciousness was fading from his brain, he muttered:

"Money had brought him misery, and he took his revenge upon us, who had done him no harm. He had his desire; with base and cunning calculation he left us but thirty thousand, knowing we would try to increase it, and ruin our life and break our hearts. Without added expense he could have left us far above double of increase, far above the temptation to speculate, and a kinder soul would have done it; but in him was no generous spirit, no pity, no—"

The Children at Christmas

By Louise Morgan Sill

THE Babe, for whom the servient star
Traversed the silent sky
To guide the Wise Men from afar,
Is now enthroned on high.

Yet still at every Christmas-tide

Anew the sign is given,

And children are the stars that guide

Our straying steps to Heaven.

Him an' Me

Being a story of the "Adriondacks" told by me in the words of him who had borne with buck-fever and bad marksmanship until, having been long out of meat and patience, he put his confidence in me and we sallied forth

By Irving Bacheller

WED greased our tongues with bacon 'til they'd shy at food an' fork
An' the trails o' thought were slippery an' slopin' towards New York;
An' our gizzards shook an' trembled an' were most uncommon hot
An' the oaths were slippin' easy from the tongue o' Philo Scott.

Then skyward rose a flapjack an' a hefty oath he swore
An' he spoke of all his sufferin' which he couldn't stan' no more;
An' the flapjack got to jumpin' like a rabbit on the run
As he gave his compliments to them who couldn't p'int a gun.

He told how deer would let 'em come an' stan' an' rest an' shoot
An' how bold an' how insultin' they would eye the tenderfoot;
How he—Fide Scott—was hankerin' fer suthin' fit to eat
"———" says he. "Le's you an' me go out an'
find some meat."

We paddled off a-whisperin' beneath the long birch limbs
An' we snooked along as silent as a sucker when he swims;
I could hear him slow his paddle as eroun' the turns
he bores;
I could hear his neck a-creakin' while his eye run up the shore.

An' soon we come acrost a buck as big an' bold as sin
An' Philo took t' swallerin' to keep his feelin' in;
An' every time he swattered, as he slowly swung eroun',
I could hear his Adam's apple go a-squeakin' up an'
down.

He sot an' worked his paddle jest as skillful as he could
An' we went on slow an' careless, like a chunk o'
floatin' wood;
An' I kind o' shook an' shivered an' the pesky o' canoe
It seemed to feel as I did, for it shook an' shivered too.

I sot there, full o' deviltry, a-p'intin' with' the gun,
An' we come up clost and closter, but the deer he didn't run;
An' Philo shet his teeth so hard he split his briarroot
As he held his breath a-waitin' an' expectin' me to shoot.

I could kind o' feel him hanker, I could kind o' hear him think,
An' we'd come so nigh the animal we didn't dast to wink,
But I kep' on a-p'intin' of the rifle at the deer
Jest as if I was expectin' fer to stick it in his ear.

An' Philo tetcht the gunnel selt an' shook it with his knee;
I kind o' felt him nudgin' an' a-wishin' he was me,
But I kep' on a-p'intin' with a foolish kind o' grin, Enjoyin' all the wickedness that he was holdin' in.

An' of a sudden I could feel a tremble in his leet;
I knew that he was gettin' mad an' fillin' up with heat.

An' his blood it kind o' simmered, but he couldn't say a damn—
He'd the feelin's of a panther an' the quiet of a lamb.

But I only sot a-p'intin' at the shoulder of the deer
An' we nooked along as ca-areful an' we kep' a-drawin' near;
An' Philo—so deceivin'—as if frozen into rock,
Was all het up with sinfulness from headgear unto sock.

An' his foot come creepin' for'ards an' he tetcht me with his boot
An' he whispered low an' anxious, an' says he, "Why don't ye shoot?"
An' the buck he see the time had come fer him an' us to part
An' he flung the spray as Philo pulled the trigger of his heart.

He had panthers in his bosom, he had horns upon his mind;

An' the panthers spit an' raaled an' their fur ris up behind;
An' he gored me with his languidge an' he clawed me with his eye
"Til I wish that, when I done him dirt, I hadn't been so nigh.

He scairt the fish beneath us an' the birds upon the shore

An' he spoke of all his sufferin' which he couldn't stan' no more;

Then he sot an' thought an' muttered as he pushed a mile er so

Like a man that's lost an' weary on the mountain of his woe.

An' he eyed me over cur'ous an' with pity on his face

An' he seemed to be a sortin' words to make 'em fit the case.

"Of all the harmless critters that I ever met," says he,
"There ain't not none more harmlesser—my God!—than what you be."

An' he added, kind o' sorrowful, an' hove a mighty sigh:
"I'd be 'shamed t' meet another deer an' look him in the eye.

God knows a man that p'int's so never orter hev no grub,

What game are you expectin' fer t' slaughter with a club?"

An' I answered with a riddle: "It has head an' eyes an' feet

An' is black an' white an' harmless, but a fearful thing to meet;

It's a long, an' pesky animal as any in the county Can't ye guess?—I've ketcht a pome an' I'll give ye hall the bounty."

My eyes lit upon a small placard posted at the side of the front door

The Agent of the U.S.B.

by JOHN KENDRICK BANGS

I was a most personifying young man, and at first I thought perhaps he was the traveling agent of a book concern with an attractive bargain to lay before me. I do not buy many books, but as a student of mankind I am much interested in book agents, and always receive these individuals, irrespective of sex, with all the cordiality at my command. The members of my family for many generations have every one of them interested themselves in some branch of the animal kingdom. Ants were a passion with my Uncle George, my great-uncle came here for many years the leading authority on encroaches in the town of her residence in western Massachusetts and I am myself just now the president of the Anthropological Society of my native town, having been elected to that high office by a narrow margin last autumn as the candidate of the Thurnman wing of that exclusive organization, whose standard bearer I have been ever since. I observed well-defined traces of the monkey in the pranks of my children. But of all the branches of investigation offering these clues to the attention of the curious, nothing so the whole human organism has so interested me as book agents, and to study them and their habits has given me much pleasure. So when this card was brought me,

RICHARD MORTIMER STILES
General Agent
F. S. R. I.
New York City

mounting at once that he represented the United States Book Company, and had come to offer me "The First Pocket Edition of the World's Best Fiction, or, JAWNY Classics Bifflod from a One," or something of similar value, without at all wishing to purchase his wares, I received him.

"Show him into the library, Mary," I said to the maid—an old tick that, for nothing so discourages a book agent's ambition to sell as to find a huge room to his prospective visitor's house well stocked with literature of our own and other times. "Tell him that I will be down in a minute."

This message the maid faithfully repeated, I have no doubt, for in a moment or two she brought back a most astounding reply.

"The gentleman says he prefers to sit in the dining room," she said. "So I showed him in there instead, sir."

"Oh, indeed," said I. "Well, I hope you looked up the silver."

"It is all in the basket, sir," she answered, evasively. For all I knew, the basket might have been placed out on the lawn, or on the floor directly underneath the visitor's nose, but somehow or other I cannot bring myself to ask embarrassing questions of servants, and so contented myself with Mary's apparent confidence that, as far as the silver was concerned, all was well. Nevertheless, I cut down the small margin of time I had allowed myself before going to greet him, and hastened below. He was examining the placard were on the buffet as I entered, and to judge from the look of annoyance on his brow, something had occurred to displease him.

"It's only white metal," he observed, glancing over his shoulder at me, as I stood in the doorway crying him with surprise. "How do you second for that?"

I was so astonished by the cool impudence of the fellow's manner that I did not even think of protesting.

"Why," I stammered, apparently admitting instantly his right to the information sought, "I—ah—we—er—we can't afford solid silver for every day use—j—gosh."

"But we have information that your silver service is solid—your are Mr. Witherspoon Robinson, are you not?" he demanded.

"I am," said I, meekly.

"Of 295 Bellevue Avenue, Philadelphia?" he continued, after referring to a little Russia leather memorandum book he carried in his vest pocket.

"That's my address," said I, my wonderment increasing momentarily.

"Well, it's darn queer," he observed, scratching his head and eyeing his note-book steadfastly. "In this memorandum from Norah Mulvaney—your last waitress—and one of our agents—"

"I remember Norah," said I, with some enthusiasm. "She was the best butler in my ever had."

"Excuse me—what was that word?" he asked, pricking up his ears.

"Butler," said I. "It's a little word of my own, signifying a bother of the feminine gender."

He smiled so appreciatively that I was again thrown off my guard, and choked back the demands for an explanation of his singular conduct that were rising up within me.

"On our books she is just a plain waitress," said he, blushing, "and, as a rule, she is one of the most reliable on our staff. I never knew her to go wrong before, but she reports that you possess a solid silver service. King priety, purchased at Biffay's in 1893, and having an intrinsic bullion value of $750. How about that? I feel here nothing but a tawdry lot of every-day white-metal stuff, that isn't worth carrying away except for spite. How the deuce do you account for the discrepancy?"

"You don't suppose for a minute that I'd leave a silver service like that lying around loose, do you?" I demanded.

"Ah—then you have it? Somewhere?" he probed.

"Yes," said I. "It's hidden under the roof up in the south attic. You perhaps are not aware, Mr. Stiles, I added, with some condescension of manner, "that in spite of very excellent police protection, we who live in isolated sections of a suburban town must take extra precautions against burglars."

"I suppose so," said he, repeating the pleasant smile that had so won me a moment or two before.

"And for that reason you have stowed the silver service away upstairs under the roof in the south attic, where it will be comparatively safe."

"South attic," I corrected. "The north attic is plastered, but the south is not, and there is a place just big enough to hold the chest containing our most valued silver between the chimney and the eaves of the bend in the roof, which you will observe as you go out reflects the severity of the roofline of the front of my house."

"A very safe place, I should judge. Do you keep anything else there?"

"Oh yes," said I. "I fancy altogether we have about $2500 worth of silver in that chest—counting our extra heavy spoons, forks, and knives that we use only on state occasions. But—ah—I continued, about to demand an explanation of my visitor's extraordinary behavior.

"One moment, please, Mr. Robinson," he interrupted, sternly.

"Before we begin to discuss the proposition I have to make to you, I wish to go very carefully over the situation. We must deal

Ants were a passion with my Uncle George squarely with each other, and my information may be full or limited—I can't say which without further inquiry, and you happen to be the only person whose statements may be regarded as reasonably exact. Our agents sometimes make serious mistakes, and while Miss Mulvaney, upon whose report we have based our operations up to this point, is in general most accurate, her failure to make my note whatsoever of no important in detail to us as that cubby-hole in the attic places her whole statement under suspicion."

"Naturally," said I. "But I am surprised to find that Nora was not accurate. She was a girl who took an unusual interest in all matters pertaining to our welfare, and of her own volition offered to make an inventory of everything we have in the house,—not exactly the kind of work you'd expect of a waitress, you know,—and by Jove, she had it done, barring the contents of the safe. The precious little book she had written appeared on the outside like an edition de luxe of Byrdin, there were no signs that it was a list of household goods, and I never discovered them that, as far as I could discover, had not been put down. She was a treasure, that girl, and while I don't blame her for wanting to get married, we were mighty sorry to lose her. Why is it that when you happen to get a first-class maid in every particular, she is so apt to be fired up for life, bang your check-book along and marry her?"

"She married, did she?" asked Mr. Stiles, with a recumbent of that everlasting smile.

"Yes," said I. "Unfortunately for us. About two weeks after she'd finished the inventory she gave us notice, with tears in her eyes. I think she was almost as sorry to go as we were to have her leave."

"Oh well, I suppose that perfection which she manifested in her work with you was shown with equal force to the lucky dog who won her," suggested Mr. Stiles.

"To show you how we felt about her," said I, enthusiastically, "the day she left, by Jingo! I called her into the library and handed her a check for a hundred dollars to buy a wedding-present with."

"Very good of you," said Stiles. "I wish you'd employ me as a butler," he added, with a laugh. "I'd get married right off, although I already have one very dear little wife at home. But about that private safe, Mr. Robinson,—you say it is ingeniously hidden behind a set of Milton. That interests me very much."

"I have a number of valuable papers in my own home at Orange, New Jersey, and I've been anxiously seeking a method whereby their concealment should be made absolute," said he. "Your scheme seems peculiarly well suited to my requirements."

I led the way into the library with a prideful step. I have always rather felicitated myself upon my liberality and while ways rather than those which I have chosen upon my tightness, and while, of course, the idea of false back-backs to conceal doorways or cupboards in libraries is not at all new, the adaptation of the scheme to my needs for a burglar-proof safe was, I ventured fondly to hope, all my own.

"Yes," said he, walking over to the point to which I had called his attention.

"Well, by simply pressing the P on the word Poems on Volume Five thus," I observed, suiting the action to the word, "the whole set swings back on hinges fastened to the front cover of Volume One, and,

presto!—you have the safe. Inside
we keep our family jewels, and

I don't care to leave at the office, and am received too late to put away in the safe-deposit vaults, which close at four o'clock. I've got sixteen steel bonds
 in there now, and a lot of trinkets of

It's extremely ingenious," said he, "toying with the spring." But why burden

My great-Aunt Jane was for many years the leading authority on procedure.

"Because nobody ever takes Dryden off the shelf these days," I explained. "And no nobody discovers the subterfuge. If it were Thackeray or Dickens or Marie Corelli, somebody might want to take out a volume, you see, and then they'd find out the set wasn't real and begin to suspect something."

"I am surprised that Norah should have overlooked anything so important," said Stiles, suddenly, with an angry frown and shake of his head. "Didn't she have a chance of 100 years?"

"Yes," said I. "But no one knows about the safe but my wife and myself. Not even the children. She couldn't be expected to put that down."

"Humph!" he sneered. "I am not so sure that that little gift of a hundred dollars has not made her unfaithful to her trust."

This aspersion upon the character of our faithful Sarah angered me in turn, and I spoke rather sharply.

"I don't see what business it is of yours, Mr. Stiles," I observed, coldly. "She was our servant, not yours."

And with this, much to my astonishment, he pulled from his pocket a carbon copy of the precise document our wonderful but-

"Why!" I half cried, half breathed. "Where did you get that?"

"With the exception of the contents of that safe, Mr. Robinson," he inquired, "am I to understand that you recognize in this a complete set of the articles of value and otherwise in this dwelling?"

"It is an exact copy of the original which I hold," said I.

"But, see here, how in thunder do you happen—"

"Have you verified the inventory?" he demanded.

ed, paying no heed to my desire to question him.

"Casually only. I've run over it only once or twice.

but, as I told you before, my impression is that nothing but the safe

ing but the safe has escaped her eye," I answered.
"Just before we

"But before we go any further, I'd like to know—"

"Then we can accept it as a basis for discussion," said Miller.

calmly ignoring my remark, and settling himself at

"As I figure this out," he went on,

"the contents of this house are worth in the

¹⁰ Insured for ten

"But not all of it is easily moved,"

Mon. June 5th

"It's hidden under the roof up in the south attic"

he continued, "There's the piano and the larger paintings on the wall—those would require a year and the service of several pretty heavy men if we wanted to get 'em out."

"Oh—I'm going to move, no 17" I put in, with a touch of sarcasm in my tone.

"I estimate that of actual portable property," observed my visitor, "that could be got out of the house easily and without disturbing the inmates, you have about $7500 worth, not counting the contents of that safe, upon which, judging from what you tell me, it is fair to place an average day-to-day value of $7500 more. In other words, to put it plainly, Mr. Robinson, to an immediately active expert in burglary, you represent a possible $15,000 investment."

"Oh—indeed," I gasped.

"Rather larger than I had supposed," he continued. "We have you down at your insurance estimate of $10,000."

"Oh!" said I, setting back in my chair and smiling. "I see, Mr. Stiles. At last I get at the meaning of your visit. You want me to take out a policy of insurance against burglary. Do you know, I was beginning to suspect—"

"I don't want anything of the sort," said he, abruptly. "There's no money in that for me, Mr. Robinson. The per centages of my insurance agent negotiate too small a sum on a year's run to tempt me and my friends. Which brings us to the point. I represent the United States Burglary Company."

"Great Scott!" I cried. "Another trust?"

"You can call it a trust if you wish to," said he, with a cynical laugh. "There are lots of hard things about us as individuals, without disturbing our humanity. What should we care how we are characterized as a corporation?"

"For me, Mr. Stiles," I remarked. "I assure you that I have no wish to be important. As a matter of fact, the colossal enterprise of your institution interests me largely. I begin to catch a glimpse of what you are after. What is your proposition precisely?"

"I have been sent here on behalf of the company I represent to offer you immunity from thieves for one year for $5000," he replied, the importunate Stiles.

"Very good of you, I am sure," said I, gratefully. "And suppose I refuse?"

"That is your right, of course," said he, calmly. "But it is an answer that will put us to a great deal of trouble and you to an unnecessary loss. We would rather compromise with you on a basis of $500. You see, a number of your possessions would be difficult to dispose of without attention, although in the end we should be able to work them all off through our regular channels of distribution. It is an awkward process, making up a silver service so cumbersome as South states yards, and for a number of your rare books we should need a very small market."

The paintings we should have to export to London or Paris in order to be safely rid of them, and that is also expensive operation. Moreover, as I calculate it, it will require the services of at least five men and three visits to get all this there is here, possibly four, which, as you see, multiplies our risk. In the end we should manage it, but the chances are that some of our expert operators would be caught, and we should, equally of course, then lose their services for periods varying from six to ten years. All this we are anxious to avoid."

"And where do I come in?" I demanded. "Look to me as if I should lose either way."

"That is your misfortune," said he. "It is the penalty which always attaches to having something to lose. But are you not better off losing $500 instead of being out from $10,000 to $15,000? As I see it, Mr. Robinson, we are guaranteeing you at least $9500 for a year, and possibly $14,500. That can't be squared at."

"You couldn't take less?" I asked. "Five hundred dollars is a good deal of money these days."

"I don't think so," said he,

"but if you will allow me to see your telephone for a minute, I shall be very glad to ring up headquarters and ask the superintendent of this division."

"Certainly," I replied.

"There it is in the hall."

Stiles walked calmly to the phone and rang.

"Thirty-six-four—two—0—seven, Bronx," said he, and then he waited two or three minutes, and absolute silence reigned, shortly to be followed, however, by—

"Hello!—is this the U. S. B. C.?—Yes, Stiles. Is Mr. Robinson there? . . . Ask him to step to the phone a minute."

Reardon, yes. . . . That you, Mr. Reardon? . . . Well, this is Stiles. I'm on that Robinson job— . . . What? . . . Robinson, R-U-B-I-S-H-O-N-Phillipsburg. . . . He seems a little startled, but is willing to talk. Thinks five is too much. Can we share in a trifle? . . . What? . . . Well, it's fairly good stuff, but not very more, and I think we'd be three or four years working some of it off. . . . Yes, he has a small safe. . . . What? . . . So that again. . . . Four hundred dollars C. O. D.—that'll do it. All right. Thank you. . . . What? . . . Oh!— . . . Pretty well, thank you, but he's teething, and you know how hard it is to keep 'em well during the second summer. . . . All right. Good-by. . . . Ring off, Central."

Hanging up the receiver, Stiles returned.

"The superintendent of the Westchester division, in view of all the circumstances, Mr. Robinson," he said, as he sat down beside me, "will allow you a hundred dollars discount. Four hundred dollars, U. S. B. C. will be satisfactory to us."

"That's quite a saving," said I. "But how about the C. O. D. business? I haven't four hundred dollars in the house. Besides, what in thunder do you deliver?"

"The company's receipt," replied Stiles, promptly. "As for the cash, of course a check on your bank here in town will serve. You're good for it. You have not present in the Seventeenth National Bank of Philadelphia, exclusive of outstanding checks, a balance of $1250.43. I found that out yesterday before coming here, by writing a note in your name to the cashier, and getting an answer by messenger."

"Gracious! but you have no system," I cried.

"We have to have," he answered. "It's an intricate business." "Well, Stiles," said I, putting myself together, and rying his head on one side, "I have a mind to have you arrested for blackmail, but I shan't. You are too interesting an individual. I have decided instead to have you searched first, lest you shall already have acquired some of my property, and then thrown out by my mind man to practise your malicious tricks upon other less wary persons than myself."

"He, he, ha!" laughed Stiles. "Firmen out, eh? That's mighty good, but the system still works, Mr. Robinson. Your hired man, Mike, is on one job just as Newark was on another. Nothing to say by summing him. Why, honestly, Robinson, if Mike were to come in here now, between us we should overpower you and rifle that pretty little piece of a safe over there before you could turn around. I think, really, considering those sixteen steel bonds you say you have locked up there, you'd better let me have a check for $400 and settle things amicably."

"I sank back in my chair overpowered. True! I was in a grave predicament. Everybody was away except Mary, the housemaid; and Mike, like the treasured Newark, was just a broken reed to my leaning—any, worse, a possible instrument of aggressive attack in the hands of this incorporation of the sons of All Italy. I was, indeed, in perilous condition, I thought, when, suddenly, the solution of all my difficulties flashed across my mind. Strange that I had not thought of it before. Comply with his demands, of course. Give him the check, and then stop payment on it by phone. Simultaneously, I laughed in scorn at the ease with which I should circumvent him."

"All right, Mr. Stiles," said I, with an outward show of reluctance. "I'm leaving. You win, your arguments are convincing. To whose order shall I make the check payable, the United States Burglary Company?"

"No," said he. "To me personally. Richard Mortimer Stiles, agent. It is the rule of the company."

"Very good," I observed, and immediately sat down at my desk and drew the check as requested. When it was signed I rose and handed it to him with all the courtesy at my command.

"Thank you," said Stiles, making out a receipt upon a blank form which he carried in his pocket. "Now are more favor, Mr. Robinson. I

Like you we notice, with tears in her eyes will endorse this, and I want you to endorse my signature—the bank may require an identification—indeed, you might write a little note of the latter order to the paying-teller. It is a formality that may save me a little trouble.”

“Why, of course; anything to oblige you and your most considerate company,” I assented, delighted at the very simplicity of my scheme for landing the fellow in the net of justice, he meanwhile being so entirely unsuspecting. “I’ll give you letters of introduction to all our first families, too, if you wish. I’ll write a testimonial for your company to print if you say the word. Something like: ‘Gentlemen,—Two years ago I was introduced by the agent of the U. S. B. C. to use the turglers furnished by your company, and have found them so satisfactory that since that time I have used no others. I heartily recommend the U. S. B. C. system of robbery to all who may need service of that kind. It is the best in the market!’ Eh, Stiles? How would that do?”

“First rate if you advertised,” said he. “But we don’t. We find the personal appeal is so much more effective. Don’t you see, I’ve got $400 out of you in twenty-five minutes, although entirely unknown, and coming to you unaccompanied. What’s the use of advertising when you can do business like that?”

“None,” I remarked, as I finished the note of identification to the paying-teller, and said it with my own signet-ring, which I knew the man at the bank would recognize. “Advertising would be a slower waste of money. And now, Stiles, have a cigar, won’t you?” I added, offering him a weed.

“No, thank you,” said he. “When I was a boy I promised my mother I would never smoke, and while she is long since deceased, I have never broken my word. You are very good, Mr. Robinson, and I thank you for your courtesy. I wish all our customers were like you.”

With that we shook hands, and Mr. Richard Mortimer Stiles passed out of the house. I watched him through the window, noted that he passed and tinkered a few moments with the front door, and followed him with my eye as he walked across the fields to the trolley road, where he boarded the first car to come along.

“Poor devil!” said I. “Such effrontery and cleverness deserve a better fate, but I can’t afford to pay $100 for sentiment, so here goes.”

I walked in leisurely fashion to the telephone, turned the crank, and waited a moment. There was no answer. I gave the crank another twist, and again waited an appreciable length of time, but with no better result.

“Great Lord!” I ejaculated. “At the very time I want quick service—”

And then my eye rested upon the wires, and what I saw there sent my heart bounding to the very depths of my boots. That infernal agent of the U. S. B. C. had cut the wires, and the nearest other point of telephonic communication was at Tommy Henderson’s house, ten minutes’ rapid walking from my door. As I figured the situation, Stiles, on the most favorable calculation to myself, had two minutes’ margin in which to catch that infernal clock, but still there was a chance that I might anticipate him, and I struggled hard to avail myself of it. Putting on my hat, I rushed merrily out of the house and up the road to Henderson’s place. To say that I made record time is putting it mildly but truthfully. Hardly six minutes had elapsed from the time I left the house until I reached Henderson’s. His front door was wide open, and with no ceremony whatever I ran to the phone. But, alas! fortune was not on my side. Miss Sarah Henderson held the wire exchanging gossip with her friend Miss Janette Perkins, and by the time I had explained my errand and secured possession of the phone that wretched Stiles should have reached the bank. Nevertheless, I made a try for it, and, much to my joy, secured an instant connection, whereupon the following colloquy ensued:

“Hello!” I said. “This the Seventeenth National?”

“What’s this?”

“Is this the Seventeenth National Bank?”

“Yes.”

“Well, this is Mr. Robinson.”

“Mr. Who?”

“Robinson. For heaven’s sake, man, don’t delay.”

“Mr. Thompson?”

“Not—confound you!—Robinson.”

“What’s the first letter?”

“R—R—R—O—B—N—S—N—N.”

“R—Robinson. What can we do for you this morning, Mr. Robinson?”

“I want payment stopped on check 31286, which will be presented to you—”

“Please repeat that, Mr. Robinson. The trolley-car is just passing, and it makes such a beastly buzzing sound—”

“I want you to stop payment on check No. 31286—”

“Just wait a minute, Mr. Robinson, while I get a piece of paper to write that—”

“For heaven’s sake,” I roared, “remember it without the paper—there isn’t a minute to spare!”

But it was useless. The man had gone, and I was held up a full two minutes.

“Now what is that number?” came the voice, pleasantly, over the wire.

“31286,” I shouted. “Drawn to—”

“312 what?—eh— Excuse me a minute, Mr. Robinson. There’s a gentleman here wishes to talk to you a moment. He says he’s in a great hurry.”

“Deuce take the gentleman,” I began. “I don’t want—”

And then, before I had half a chance to protest, a nother voice came over that blistering wire.

“Hello!” it said. “Is that you, Robinson?”

“Yes,—but please wait—” I began.

“Well, this is Stiles, old man. I wanted to thank you again for your courtesy before leaving town. They’ve cashed the check all right. Your letter gives the instructions did the business. Thought you’d like to know, fixed by.”

And with that the second hung up the automatic receiver, and the connection was off!

I wandered sadly back to my house, raging inwardly, and utterly broken in conceit with myself.

“Four hundred dollars, and for what?” I moaned, as I came to my own dwelling; and then, as if in answer to my question, my eyes lit upon a small placard posted at the side of the front door, on which was printed in an oval, surrounding an ornamental design, five outstretched hands plunging into a chest of jewels:

HANDS OFF!
THIS HOUSE IS UNDER THE PROTECTION
OF
THE UNITED STATES BURGLARY COMPANY
CARRINGTON REARDON, Manager

In my rage I tore the thing from the door and stamped it to shreds beneath my feet.

“I won’t have your protection. I don’t want it,” I roared, and it was the truth, for my keenest desire now was to have my house burglarized. In the attainment of this ambition is bound up my future happiness, for it is my only chance for revenge, since, unless some member of the thieving fraternity comes my way, I shall never have the opportunity to fill him up with a select assortment of 32 calibre bullets, which I have always in readiness for the hour of his approach.

Unfortunately in this aspect of the case, Stiles has kept his promise, for never a midnight marauder has entered my dwelling since that evil day—unless it be that our cook, or Mike’s successor, has embarked upon that profession that shattered ideal of our domestic life. Miss Sarah Mulvaney, the advance agent of Mr. Richard Mortimer Stiles.

The Tree of Fennel

by ROBERT W. CHAMBERS

I sat silent, tracing with my pencil series after series of futile combinations with the eumetiforms, but ever the first tura of the ancient key creaked in my ears.

"King of Kings—
King of Kings—"

until the tribal ratiocination were on my nerves.

Geraldine leaned back abruptly, closing her book. "I'm tired and nervous," she said. "You may wear out your eyes and temper if you choose—and you're doing the latter, for I'm as restless as a rat. Besides, I'm lonely, and I'm going back to the East—if you'll come too."

I laughed, understanding what she meant by the "East."

"Will you come with me?" she insisted.

"Yes," I said, "whenever you are ready."

She sprang to her feet, scattering the illuminated pages over the floor, and stood an instant facing me, tall, dark-eyed, smiling, brushing back the lustrous hair from her cheeks.

"Where is Jim?" she asked—although we both knew.

"In the laboratory," I replied, mechanically.

Still busy with her hair, she regarded me dreamily out of those dark, sweet eyes of hers.

"It would be wonderful," she mused, "if Jim should find an antidote to death; but I wish it were necessary to kill so many little helpless creatures. Did you hear that pitiful sound in those yesterday?" Was it something he was killing?

"I don't know," I said. And after a silence, "What are you going to do?"

She shook her head vaguely and leaned against the window, looking out into the rain.

"Shall we go back to our inscriptions?" I suggested.

She shook her head again. After a while she turned away from the window, stifling a dainty yawn, and stretched out, languidly straightening up to the full height of her young body.

"I feel stupor," she said. "I'm tired of cryptograms and the pages of dusty books. I'm tired of the rain, too. The longest of April is in use. I'm homesick for lands I never knew. So come back to the East with me, Dick."

She held out her hand to me with a confident little smile; and knowing what she meant, I acquiesced in her caprice, and conducted her solemnly to the piano, leaving her before it.

She stood there for a space, musing, her lovely head bent; then, still standing, she struck a sequence of chords—chords pulsing with color, and through them flashed strange little trills like threads of time.

"This is an Elixir carpet I am dreaming of," she murmured, as the music swelled, glowing as tints and hues glow in the old dyes of the East.

Wave on wave of color seemed to spread from the keys under her fingers; she looked back of me over her shoulder with a warning nod.

"I shall begin to weave very soon. Khroumoun however may appear and frighten me for a moment,—but I shall finish. Listen! I am at the loom."

Seating herself, she developed out of the flowing, amber harmony a melodious minor theme, suddenly checked by a distant rattle like the rattler of a rattlesnake on painted alderum;—then she picked up the thread of the melody again, dropped it, breathless for a moment's quivering silence, resumed it, twisting it into delicate arabesques, threading it across the dull, rich harmonies, at first slowly, then faster, faster, swift as the flying figures of a nomad maid tying frosted silver in a Ghazal's knot. The whirling trumps was the cadence of the loom: soft fluting notes flew like carded wool; thicker, duller, softer grew the fabric, dense, silky, heavily lustrous.

Suddenly she snuffed the thread off short, the whole fabric falling with a muffled shock.

"Why did you do that?" I demanded, wrathfully.

"The rug is woven: the weaver is dead," she said.

"Oh, go on, Geraldine," I insisted; "don't stop half way in a thing like that. It's the East—it's the real East, I tell you. How you do it—you who have never seen the East—braven only know."

"U Allah Aslam," she murmured; "it's in me." Then she looked back at me, laughing. "Centuries ago you and I heard that music along the Arax,—or I sang it among the Tcherless roses for you, perhaps,—perhaps in the gardens of Trebizond."

"That might explain it," I said, gravely. "Lately she had found pleasure in a story that she and I had lived together in the East, centuries since, and that we were now to return forever."

"TIME, and the funeral of Time, alas!—and the old Year's passing bell! Windows from city and there, deep notes sounding from the fogged decks; and under my window a voice and a song;—ah! that young voice in the street below calling us through the falling snow!"

If it be true that Time makes all things well, I do not know—and a thousand years in this sight is but as yesterday when it is passed, and as a watch in the night—as a thousand years! And this also is true, the flames of love make but the furnace of Abaddon.

We were in the gallery as usual, Geraldine and I—the gallery where the carpets of the East were hung along the shadowy walls. For lately it was my pleasure to migrate rare rugs, and it was my passion to furnish expert opinions upon the age and origin of Oriental carpets, and to read and interpret the histories of forgotten empires and the mysteries of long forgotten gods from the colors and intricate thousand laboratories tint in silk or wool to the warp of some dead culture's historic tapestry.

Here in the long skylight hung my own rugs against the arabesque-intricated ivory panels—Turkish, Shiraz, Selma, and Sarak,—a smother blaze of color shot with fire—rare, some priceless—Turkish kahki, softly silky as a golden lion's hide, Persian Selma, shimmering with rose and violet lights, feverily brilliant rugs from Samarkand, softly flowered, scattering deep in every floral thicket traceries of the ancient Mongol conqueror.—Persians glowing like jeweled suns set with the Herati and the lotus—symbols of Egypt or of China, as you please to interpret the oldest pattern in the world.

Far in the gallery's noble tinted glow the red of Babylon dominated, radiating fiery vistas to smothering harmony through which, like a vast supple sea in upals, glimmered the apricot red Persian blue.

There was one other rug, an Eighth, the famous so-called "Babini," or "carpet of Belshazzar," but it hung alone in its imperial magnificence behind the locked doors of a marble tomb, which it seemed to fill with a soft hush of its own, radiating from the mystic "Tree of Heaven" woven in its center.

We were, as I say, in this gallery; Geraldine poring over an illuminated volume on cuneiform inscriptions, I, with pad and pencil, idle shouting and reshuffling the Kite key in the ancient cipher, which always left me stranded where I had begun with the stately repetition:

"King of Kings—
King of Kings—
King of Kings—"

As for Westover, my cousin, he was, as usual, in the laboratory fusing with his voracious extracts—on occupation which, to my dismay, he had taken up within the year, working, as he explained, on the theory that every planet has its antidote. Yet it seemed to me that he was more anxious to invent some new and subtle toxic than to derive the remedy.

From where I sat I could not see him, but the crystalline tinkle of his glass retorts and bottles distracted my attention from the pencilled calculations. Without moving my head, I glanced across the room at Geraldine. She looked up immediately, raising her level eyebrows in mute inquiry as though I had moved or spoken; then, realizing that I had not, she bent above the book once more, the warm color stealing to her cheeks.

Within the year a wonderful intimacy had grown up between us—we never understood it, never acknowledged it, and at times it disconcerted us.

"You and I," she mused, touching the keys lightly,—"and Jim, of course," she added.

"Of course," I said. She dropped her head, striking chord on chord with nervous precision; and hauging in the wake of every ringing harmony a frail melody floated like the Chinese cloud-band in a Kirmas tapestry.

"What's that air?" I asked, fascinated.

"I don't know; it sounds pagan, doesn't it?—like the wicked beauty of Babylon. Do you hear how it beats on and on like the rhythm of naked feet—little delicate naked feet ablaze with grace—the feet of Hierodine perhaps—thud—thud—thud—don't you hear them, Dick? And now listen to those silky, flowery trills! They're Asiatic; ancient Cathay is awaking—cane-bells in the hazy of the Golden Euphrat! Hark!—now you hear trumpets, don't you? Well, of course that must be the Mongols marching with the Prince of the Vanguard, Hark! How savagely the brutal Afghan thrum breaks in with its fierce tramping and the staccato cry of Tokio drums! It's frightening me out of the East. I think we had better come home, Dick," she added, adieulously running into the latest popular street-soup.

"You're a futile mixture of feather-brain and genius!"

But where was the genius hidden under that laughing and exquisite mask confronting me? Suddenly the delicate mask became grave.

"Let me laugh when I see, Dick," she said. "It is not often I laugh."

I was silent.

"Of course you may be horrid if you choose," she observed, with a shrug, running a brilliantly white series of trills from end to end of the keyboard. "But it's no use scolding, for I won't study, I won't compose, I won't try to do anything, and I won't be serious. I'm shallow, I'm frivolous, I've the soul of a Treblinka dancing girl, and I like it. Now what are you going to do?"

"I'm going out," I said, ungraciously.

"Oh—alone?"

"Not if you'll come. It's stopped raining. Will you come? Oh, get your hat, Geraldine, and stop that torment of idiotic trills!"

"If Jim doesn't mind, I think I'll go and sit in the laboratory with him," she observed, carelessly.

I looked at her without comment.

"I have a curious idea," she continued, "that he might like to have me around today while he is working."

I stared at her, but there was no bitterness in her tranquil smile as she leaned forward, resting her elbows on the polished rosewood case.

"So I won't go with you, Dick," she said, slowly.

One of those intervals of restless silence, which within the year we had learned to dread, menaced us now. Mute, motionless, I watched the soft color deepening in her face, then, impatient, raised myself and walked over to the laboratory. Westover looked up as I pushed aside the screen.

"Will you drive with us?" I asked. "The sun's out."

He declined, peering at me through his glass mask.

"Come on, Jim," I urged. "You've isolated enough prison for one day. Take off your mask and wash your hands and drive us out to High Bridge. I'll telephone to the stable if you say the word, and they'll look up the new four. Is it a go?"

"No," he said, coldly, and turned on his heel, lifting a test-tube to the light.

He was more taciturn and a trifle uglier than usual. I watched him for a moment warming the test-tube over a burner, then without further parody replaced the screen, closed the double glass doors, and walked back to Geraldine.

"Doesn't Jim care to come?" she asked.

I said that her husband appeared to be absorbed in his work.

"Very well," she said, with airy composure; "I'm along, Dick,—and if you see a bunch of jockeys growing on Fifth Avenue, you may pick them for me—or for that pretty girl you met at Lakeside—"

"I'll send you a bunch as big as a bushel."

"A bushel of flowers is as compromising as a declaration," she said. "Send them to her."

"There's only one way to settle it," I said; "I'll send them to the loveliest girl in the world—shall I?"

She assented, laughing unconvincingly.

"I think I'll pay Jim a little call," she said, rising from the piano and walking slowly toward the laboratory.

A few moments later as I passed down the broad stairway I heard Westover's penetrating voice: "Let that glass tube alone, Geraldine! Why the devil can't you keep your hands off things when you come in here?"

I lingered for a while in the hallway, thinking that she might change her mind and come down, for she had left the laboratory in her husband, and I heard her moving about in her own apartment. She did not come, and after a little while I left the house, a sense of apprehension depressing me.

The asphalt of Fifth Avenue was still wet with the first warm rain of April, but the sea glittered on window and pavement and flashed along the polished panels of carriages crowding the avenue from curb to curb. A breath of spring had set the sparrows chattering and chinking; the songsters of the throat, the bright gowns, the fresh faces of young girls, and the endless legacies of glass re-

She dropped her head, striking chord on chord with nervous precision fecting it all were pleasant to me—as a man sensitive to impressions.

And so in the pale sunshine I sauntered on through the thicket, now idling curiously by some shop window whether a display of jewels or curios attracted me, now strolling on again content with the soft color in sky and sunlight.

I found a border where shop windows were filled with thickets of fragrant, fragile spring flowers; and every little scented blossom that I touched, choosing the freshest, added to the voiceless cadence of a name repeated,—and, "Geraldine! Geraldine!" they nodded, so contentedly, so sweetly, that what was I to do but send them to her?

And so I sauntered on again, threading the thicket, half minded to turn back, yet ever tempted on by idleness, until above me the twin spires of the cathedral glimmered, all silvered in the shimmering blue.

Halting, undecided, I presently became aware of an old man, his withered hands crossed before him, standing quite patiently under the cathedral terrace. Before him on the sidewalk rested a basket draped with a brilliant rug or two and heaped with tawdry rubbish—scarlet levers, slippers of spangled leather, tasseled charges of gilt, flimsy striped fabrics—all the worthless trumpery known as "Oriental" to the good people of the West.

I was stopped to look; no one thought. As I passed him his dimmed gaze met mine; all the misfeatures of the very poor, all the mystery of the mystery, very old, was in his eyes. Moved by impulse, perhaps, I spoke to him in a low voice, using the Turkish language.

A dull animation came into his misty eyes.

"Allah! Ekler," he muttered, in a trembling voice; "it is sweet to hear your words, my son."

"Musliman," I said, "who are you who recite the Tekbir here under the spires of a Roman church?"

"It is here I am bearing witness to the glory of God here under the minarets of my cathedral," he asked, faintly.

"Spiral and minaret are one to him," I said. "Who are you, Musliman?"

"My name is Khassan," he said; "my nation Eghur; my lost is the Isig Kuli, Balan-Agha my clan. I am an Eghur Turk, a Khodzja, and I am able to write the Turkish language in Arabic and in Eghur-Mongol characters."

"Reverend father," I said, full of astonishment and pity, "how should a Khodzja of the Balan-Agha come to this? Even the Tekbir horseman halls of the son."

"It is written," he said, softly, "that we belong to God and we return to him."

Troubled, I stood there on the sidewalk, oblivious of the knot of idlers around us, curious to hear two men so different conversing in a common tongue.

I wished to give him something, yet did not venture to handle him without pretense of buying.

"There is my ring," I said, "on which is written my name and where I live. Bring me these rugs to-night, at six. I wish to buy."

"You do not desire them," he said, shaking his head. "You know the East; you understand these rugs; you know they are worthless, and washed, singed, rubbed with pumice, smoked,—every idle Armenian practice used; you know the doves are an illusion; that they are loosely tied, hastily and dimly woven by Armenian dogs and sons of dogs. You mean kindness; you have done me enough by speaking to me."

He passed his trembling hand over his ragged beard.

"You who know carpets and love them," he quavered; "listen attentively. I have a ship in show—not here—but I could bring it."

"Bring it," I said, gently.

He fumbled in the pocket of his tattered coat and presently brought to light a scrap of paper on which was scrawled some Persian characters.

"It is such a carpet as I have never seen," he said; "there is nothing in our history or our traditions to teach us the meaning of this carpet—nothing save that it is an Eghur rug inscribed in Persian and Balan-Agha script. I have traced the characters in a single sentence. Read, my son."

And I read, translating freely:

"Ten thousand thousand stars shine down on Babylon. The desert well reflects but one."

"I will bring the carpet," he said, after a silence. "I do not know its value; it has no beauty any longer; only the ghost of ancient splendor remains in the thin knots clinging to warp and weft. And it is old, my son, older than tradition. Upon it there is not one sign or mark save the mystery of its meaning."

He peered at me with his old, and now, earnestly.

"I will bring it," he said. "Go with Ali, thou fair comrade of Hassan."

May the Blessed Companions intervene for you, I said.

And so we parted, gravely and with circumstance. I to stroll homeward, troubled, musing curiously upon this carpet of which a nomad Musliman could make nothing. The Persian verse from the cartouche interested me too, the refrain lingering persistently in my memory:

"Ten thousand thousand stars shine down on Babylon. The desert well reflects but one."

Never before, save on the imperial carpet known as Behzad's Rug, had I encountered any inscription mentioning Babylon. So, at the first glance, the nomad's rug should have some value. But speculation was futile—surely I ought to have learned that if unnumbered disappointments could teach me anything.

Thinking of these things, I paced along the noble avenue, rethinking my steps to the big dusky house standing alone, and old trees to guard its entrance—like the mansion of the great city of infancy—the last old dwelling left marooned amid the arid waste of commerce. Here my cousin and his wife lived with me as winter; I with them at their Lehigh home in summer.

A brougham or two at the curb before the house warned me of clients waiting or of visitors for Geraldine,—buddies the latter, for it was now past five.

Under the circumstances I went in to second Geraldine—Mr. Westover never troubled himself to be civil to her friends.

There were people there, and ten,—and a pretty wondrous set come from Geraldine.

The violet-tinted April dusk brought candle-light; people went away and others came; then, one by one, they left, and we were alone, Geraldine and I—and the new moon shining through the free curtains. For a long time we talked together, aimlessly, of this and that which mattered nothing to anybody. A maid entered to draw the curtains. When she left, Geraldine laughed and picked up a cluster of yellow jonquils.

"Your courage failed you, after all," she said; "the loveliest woman in the world mood go without my flowers to-night."

"She has them," I retorted.

"Do you mean me, Dick?" she said, under her breath.

"Did you doubt it?"

"She loves her head," Silence, ever waiting to ensnare us, crept like a shadow in between us. And I would not have it.

"And old man is to bring a rug to-night," I said, abruptly.

Geraldine stirred in her armchair, repeating in a low voice:

"Ten thousand thousand stars shine down on Babylon; The desert well reflects but one. Alhaddon none."

But tonight in my chair I listened, incredulous of my own ears. "Where on earth did you hear that?" I demanded.

"I read it on Behzad's Rug in embroidery with the Kufic key," she answered, watching me.

"You—all alone—interpreted that?" I asked, astounded.

"Yes. It is the embroidery inscription in the gold cartouche."

Profound astonishment left me speechless. She lay back in her chair with a little laugh of pure excitement.

"After you went out," she said, "I was horribly lonely, and I thought of you, and then I thought about the work you loved—the cartouche—and—ah!—I did not seem to need to be in the laboratory—I thought to myself, 'Suppose—suppose by luck I could unravel the inscription on the gold cartouche! Dick would be the happiest man in the world. And then—your—your flowers came, and I sat for a while alone with them. Then, on impulse, I turned to and took the Kufic key, and all the while I was with you and I had tried together, and I slipped upstairs to the marble room and knelt down before Behzad's Rug. Oh, Dick! the Tree of Heaven seemed to quiver in every jeweled branch and leaf—it was only the draught from the closing door that moved the rug, but the mystic tree swung there as the folds of the carpet moved, and I seemed to feel the mystery of the Prophet's Paradise stealing into me, penetrating me like the incense of foldable wine,—and I—I felt very Eastern and very pagan, knowing that."

"It was strange, too; the intricate Kufic key seemed to be falling into place of its own impulse, symbol after symbol, promising a linked symmetry of sense, until almost before I was conscious of the miracle, it had been wrought there in the marble room; and my eyes were opened; and I, kneeling before the Tree of Heaven, read quite clearly what is written in the gold cartouche on the great carpet of Behzad's Rug. Dick! I prayed so hard that I might read it. And I have read it—how now?"

In the eloquence of her emotion she had risen, holding out both hands to me; I caught them, cranking them to my lips.

Outraged pulsing silence grew between us; my fingers relaxed and her hands fell from my lips. The stillness, intense, absolute, became a tension, a growing restlessness pressuring us apart.

Slowly, unconsciously, I had one step, one step against the silk-wind wall, which I reached for, groping, straining myself.

Never before had we been so wretched, so thrilled; never before had we been so reckless of the peril. Over us a great store had fallen, and we had evaded it—on women and delicate men, on working us, drawing us together limb to limb, body to body, soul to soul, there on the kindling edges of destruction.

Presently I became aware that the world outside the curtained windows was moving still—had perhaps never halted on its way to wait upon our fate. And, crossing the room, I raised the shade and saw the new moon, low in the sky, kneeling amid the watching stars.

Yellow rays from a street lamp illumined the old trees' foliage, edging with pale gold the tracery of new-brown leaves, tufting each stem and twig, exquisite, delicately formal as the leafy labyrinth of the Tree of Heaven spreading above the flowery field of Behzad's Rug.

Khassan the nomad had come and gone, and his rug hung in the marble room, pale as the tinted shadow cast by the great carpet of Behzad's Rug.

The nomad's rug was close but very ancient, and so worn, so "It was I who wore that carpet—I, maid of the Isig-Kul" little cater to the very warp, that the Khordoh was all but obliterated in the antithesis. But outside of that, between the outside land and the art, or central line, there were traces of ancient glory and dimmed outlines of design; and I saw the twelve carouches interlaid alternately in Persian and in eunuchiform characters. There, too, were the worn remains of floral thickets hounded of least and hard, intricate allegories, chronicles in color and symbol, every leaf, every blossom, every creature fraught with mystic meaning; and there also, still faintly to be made out, the shadowy foliage of the Tree of Heaven.

"How much did you pay for that ghost of a rug?" demanded Westover, who had followed me up stairs after dressing for dinner. When I told him he shrugged his shoulders, but made no comment. A moment later Geraldine entered, and his small eyes, no longer hazy, became fixed and dull.

"They say in the East," I remarked, "that when all color is gone from an Eighth rug a host soul takes it for its abode. Eighth women are supposed to hate souls occasionally, and to lose them now and then."

"There are plenty of lost souls in town," observed Westover; "no doubt you'll have your choice of tenants, for your carpet—or," he added, staring at space, "if you like I'll provide you."

I did not understand his remark, but it left a vaguely sinister impression. Geraldine, standing between us, her white fingers linked behind her, looked up at me very gravely.

"Do you know," she said, "that I am convinced that I wore that rug some centuries ago?"

"I have no doubt of it," I replied, smiling.

"Do you doubt it, Jim?" she asked, gayly.

He did not reply.

"As a matter of fact," I said, "it was always believed that a young girl who dared to weave the Tree of Heaven into an Eighth carpet died when her task was ended,—her entire physical and spiritual vitality entering into the sacred tree and infusing it with mystic splendor."

"Oh, I doubt no you say," observed Geraldine, gravely. "I don't see that you infused much physical or spiritual splendor into that rug," observed Westover.

"I must die again, you know, Jim, and bring its vanished beauty back," she said, gayly. "Shall I, Dick?—and leave you a priceless carpet as my bequest and monument?"

Westover turned on his heel, edging with his collar. Recently his neck had grown fat behind the ears.

A few moments later dinner was announced.

We dined late that dinner, I remember, Jim drank heartily—a habit which both Geraldine and I had long since left unnoticed, she drinking from the sullen relief that in follow even a playful protest, in understanding the after helplessness of interference. His mind, already shaken, would not shy shatter, and the dreadful price he paid.

As he ate there something waivered in port, in his altered features and swollen hands I seemed to divine something malicious and patient and powerful,—that indescribable physical neurone one feels in the inert brooding eye of the mentally and spiritually crippled.

When Geraldine rose he stood up unobtrusively. After she had gone he lighted a cigar and turned his blood-shot eyes on me.

"Is that wine expensive?" he demanded, pointing to Geraldine's half-empty glass.

"Rather," I said.

He picked up the glass, examined it, sniffing at the contents.

"It's poor claret," he said. "Taste it. It's pure poison, I tell you."

"I'm sorry," I said, indifferently.

Again he sniffed it. "Fragrant," he sneered, and threw it into the fireplace behind him. Then he got on his feet, heavily, mattering to himself and stumbled off through the drawing room.

For a while I sat there amid the shaded candles, staring at space. But I could not read the future pictured there amid the empty chairs and the flowers, already drooping in each crystal vase.

When at length I roused myself and went up stairs, passing her apartment I heard her singing to herself, and I wondered that she could.

I paused on the gallery stairway to listen; and she could not have heard my footsteps on the thick deep carpeting, yet she came to the door and opened it, looking up at me where I stood.

"You are going to the marble room. May I come and help you?" she asked, sweetly. And as I was silent, she said again: "Let me be happy, won't you, Dick? Let me be where you are."

"Have I ever avoided you, Geraldine?"

I descended the steps, she laid her hand lightly on my arm, and together we mounted the stairway toward the gallery.

"I was singing a Halleluiah when you passed," she said, "partly because I was lonely, and partly"—she hesitated, looking around at me—"partly because I've come to the conclusion, Dick, that I was once at Belshazzar's feast in Calimiera;—for there's a great deal of wickedness in me;—you'd never believe it, would you?"

She smiled at me so innocently, so adorably, that I laughed outright.

"I've heard that the maids of Babylon-Ki had a boxing acquaintance with the devil," I said. "Even an Eighth girl nodded pleasantly to Erikh now and then,—according to the chronicles of the Terkins."

"Oh, they surely did," she said. And, "Thank you, Dick," she added, as we reached the gallery: "When I am an old woman you must help me up the steep place."

"It is you who help me," I said, lightly.

She stood, resting her arm on the table while I gathered up the mass of papers containing our eunuchian combinations and the Kufic key.

"All that is useless," she said, suddenly. Her manner and smile had altered.

I looked up in surprise, and at the same instant she pushed the papers from beneath my hands.

"The memory of things forgotten centuries ago has returned to me," she said, feverishly. "I am a pagan again. It was but who first taught my hands to weave and my fingers to tie the Schuham knot. I wore that carpet; what I have worn there I can read. Why do you laugh? Will you believe me if I translate the mystery of each inscription as easily as I read the gold cartouche? Come; we shall never need these papers again."

What new engine was that? She was smiling, almost foolishly, and I thought that there was something in her over-flashed face and in the starlike brilliancy of her eyes not quite normal. At the same moment the electric lights in the laboratory went out. Westover was evidently in there. I waited, expecting him to appear, but he did not. Again I reached for the papers, but Geraldine snatched them with a quick sweep of her hand.

"Won't you believe me? Won't you let me try?" she repeated, almost impatiently.

With a quick movement she leapt forward past me and shot off the lights in the gallery where we stood. Another second, and the lights in the marble room broke out fiercely; and there, full in the dazzling glory, I saw the great carpet of Belshazzar hanging, and beside it the Eighth rug—a pallid shadow on the wall.

Geraldine, hands clasped to her scarlet mouth, dark eyes fixed, moved forward slowly, pale, faint, flushing on her smooth bare arms and shoulders, her head a delicate silhouette against the glare.

I followed, pausing at her side, and we stood silently before the miracle, the great folds glittering staring in some unlit current; and I saw the upper branches of the Tree of Heaven away, and a thousand leaves, all glistering, quiver and shew.

"One can almost hear the rustling of the leaves," I whispered. "I hear more than that," she murmured. "I hear my soul bidding me go by."

She smiled dreamily, turning to the faded Eighth carpet, and stepping back one pace, dropped her left arm, clasping my hand in hers.

"It was I who wore that carpet—I, maid of the long-Kul;—and it was you, beloved of Hassan, who inspired it."

"What are you saying, Geraldine?" I began, drowsily; "where did you ever hear my name linked with the name of Hassan?"

Her palm was burning hot, her eyes too, bright. The fever of ecstacy possessed her, and her imagination was running riot.

There was a silence, through which a distant sound penetrated—the faint ring of glass somewhere in the laboratory. Westover was tying on his crystal mask.

She heard it, too, and she turned, looking no fall in the eyes. "Dick," she said, "he has slain my body. My soul is bidding me go by."

"It is my own that he is dragging to destruction, not yours," I muttered.

But she only clasped my hand tighter, the fixed smile stamped on her lips.

"Listen," she whispered, raising her arm. "This is what is written in the rose cartouche on the Eighth carpet that I made:

'Roses of Babylon; lakes of roses in Abaddon.'

Love and its awful penalty. Dick—and the warning I wore, encoded in cryptogram! Listen again. The cartouche below was once torn—lo! I wrote it—!)

*'All Paradise the road;
Warp and weft for souls no lost.'*

"Mine, Dick, mine!—lost in loving as I loved, centuries ago. I have no soul; I have never had any since I lost it then. It is there, haunting the phantom of an Eighth carpet. Do you not understand? There is my faded monument and refuge—that magic-woven sanctum—that hiding-place from hell!"

Her little feverish fingers tightened convulsively in mine; the veins danced in her cheeks. Suddenly she crumpled our clasped hands to her heart, and I felt it beating madly.

"Geraldine," I stammered, "what is all this ghastly nonsense? Are you ill?"

"Listen! Listen!" she whispered; "the next cartouche was this—the last Persian knot! I know; why should I not know? I who wore it centuries ago? And thus it reads, O then when I loved to my destruction,—thou whom I loved:

'Time and the Great'

Shall meet me twice,—once East, once West.'

"Ah, prophetic! was I by Istar's favor—seeing I died by love. Do you not understand, Dick? Time and the Great—the time is Death—the time we all must entertain one day,—and I twice,—once in the East, once here in the West—here now!"

"Geraldine, are you mad?" I whispered; "look at me!—turn and look at me. I say!"

But she shivered in my arms, whispering that she was reasoning her soul and mine. A distant sound broke from the laboratory, and we listened.

"Hush, beloved," she said, breathlessly; "the last cartouche is black! And this is written there:

'Soul, Intus-centred, Reveries—thy—Paradise—'

Her voice died out; a terrible pallor struck her face; she swayed where she stood, the smile frozen on her bloodless lips.

As I caught her to me, her head fell straight back and her body sank a dead weight in my arms. Then a dreadful thing occurred, the faded arabesque tapestry glowed out like a live ember, kindling from end to end, brighter, fiercer, flaming into living fire; and the phantom Tree of Heaven, flashing, superbly jewelled, burst into magnificent fluorescence.

Blinded, almost stupefied, I staggered back, but the straining eye died in my throat as a voice is strangled in dreadful dream. Again I strove to cry out. The rug, glowing like a living ember, slowly faded before my eyes. Suddenly the last spark went out in a shower of whitening ashes.

Again I strove to cry out. "Dim! Dim!" but my lips stiffened with horror as I listened. For he was somewhere there in the darkness, laughing.

"It was in her wine," he chuckled;—"and I saw her kiss the glass, and look at you!—and you, there, staring at nothing! Hark at it now!"

And again: "Do you think I have never watched her!—and you? Now she is here, and we'll race for her in even terms once more."

Silence: a low, insane laugh, and by a report and the crash of glass as he fell, shattering his mad face upon the floor.

After a long while I spoke, listening listlessly. Then I took up my burden.

And there was no sound save the salt stinging of her bitten lips as I bore her through the darkness; my cold lips pressed to hers.

"Late Christmas Afternoon"

By Wilbur D. Nesbit

THE glad, glad bells of morning, the laughter at the dawn

The lustre of the children's eyes is fine to look upon—

But, O, the best of Christmas—the best day of them all—

Is when the lary firelight makes pictures on the wall,

And I may sit in silence and give myself the boon

Of going back to boyhood, late Christmas afternoon.

Here I shall fall to musing of pictures in the grate—

There, eager for my summons the host of boy-days wait,

And in and out a-marching I'll see them come and go

With hands waved high in welcome—the boys I used to know;

And there, if I am patient, 'twill be for me to see

As one seen in a mirror, the boy I used to be!

Out of the swaying shadows will rise the long ago,

The sleighbells' tinkle-tinkle, the soft kiss of the snow,

The white sea of the meadow, where pranking winds will lift

The long sweep of the billow loomed up in drift on drift,

And crisp across the valley will come a bell-sweet tune

To set me nodding, nodding, late Christmas afternoon.

Late afternoon on Christmas! The twilight soothing in

And me with these my visions of glad days that have been!

For I shall dream and wander down unforgotten ways

My eager arms enfolding all of my yesterdays.

Without, the mellow echoes of blended chime and hymn

Within, the bygone voices in murmurs fair and dim.

O, mine the gift of fancy, and mine this magic chair,

And mine the dim procession of Christmases that were!

I ask no richer token of love on Christmas Day

Than this which comes unbidden, than this which will not stay—

This wealth of recollections that vanish over soon.

The dreamland of the shadows, late Christmas afternoon.

Children as an Incentive

by E. S. MARTIN

I don't get all that we want in this world, but of those who get much of anything, very few get it unless they have wanted it with an effective desire. To want something good and hard, and persistently, is almost an indispensable first step towards getting it. I think that most of us are rather lazy wanters. The average mind is not naturally riveted on attainment.

The average man in all walks of life is prone to work along rather easily, living by the day and reaping the reward of his industry as it comes. If he goes without what he would like to have rather than take the trouble to get it, we think nothing worse of him than that he is lazy. But if he has children it is different. We are strict with him about his children's wants. If he lets them lack desirable and attainable things because it is too much trouble for him to get them we think he is a pretty poor father and not much of a man. The natural, ordinary man needs the spur of necessity or strong obligation. The need of making a living for himself is doubtless enough to start him in work. For the very week's sake, if he likes it, if for nothing more, he will doubtless go a great deal farther than mere comfortable subsistence compels. For art's sake some men, like Sargent the painter, even to go the whole length of their powers and work out the very best there is in them. For duty's sake or in the service of religion, or of the state, very many good men have done the like. But the natural man profits by family cares. His driving wheels take harder hold on the rails if he is wanted. Love will tempt him on with a stronger and steadier pull than ambition or mere rapacity.

And he will be a gainer, too, in the important end of getting happiness out of life, for in there, on the whole, my sport going that entertains as well and engrosses as ardently, so many people, as the great and honorable tradition of supporting a family. No game ranks high as a sport that has not some risks in it. There are breathless chances a plenty in this one. You may not do it, and that is mighty embarrassing if you have the family to support. You may do it, but not to your taste. That is not so bad, for there is always the expectation of mending your performance. Is there not some will in your brain that is capable of greater activity, some inertia of your will that can be overcome, some additional nimbleness of wit or fingers that can be attained? The risks shall come out if there are any risks, and then—Then? Oh, then the children shall have more "advantages." What the advantages are doesn't greatly matter so long as they seem advantageous to the children. They may be anything from more cream at breakfast to a summer in Europe. They may be new shoes or better clothes, or better schooling, or music lessons, or dancing lessons, or horseback exercise, or a bigger house, or a better street. "Advantages" are relative and depend upon what our contemporaries who live within sight of us are doing for their children. There is no maximum of what solicitous parents want to do, but in most families the understanding about the minimum that is requisite is pretty definite. And I suspect that with us Americans that minimum tends to be rather too high. There isn't really such a vast choice in schools; but so far as there is a choice we want our children to have the best. Expensive clothes are no particular advantage to a child, but dear, dear, how we love to have our children "look nice"! Social opportunities are often sources that waste time and turn heads and make heads, but they have their value, and, wisely or not, perhaps take thought and labor themselves that their children may be "in it." We work for our children, plan for them, spend money on them, lay life insurance for their protection, and some of us even save money for them. This last tribute is the most affecting of all. Making money is pleasant, even though it is sometimes laborious. Spending it on our children is a delightful form of self-indulgence. Buying life insurance is something we do to promote our own peace of mind. We praise ourselves more or less for all these exercises, but without much reason, for they all gratify us. But saving for our children's start in life, actual earned money that we have in hand and might spend on them, is evidence of serious self-denial. Profound must be the depths of the affection that will induce a man to save money for others to spend, unless, indeed, his income gets so big that he can satisfy all his reasonable wants and have some left over. Spending money is so pleasant an indulgence! To forgo buying children pleasures which you are here to share, for the sake of pleasures or comforts that they may enjoy after you are gone, is an astonishing flight of altruism. Yet parents not infrequently attain it. It is noticed by various observers that since the fires of hell came to be considered theoretical, men have pretty much lost the fear of death, and are substituting for it the fear of leaving their families inadequately provided for. Even thrift is not too difficult a virtue for an ordinary, affectionate parent to attain!

Advantages . . . new shoes, better clothes, or . . . music lessons

And of course children are a mighty incentive to other virtues besides industry and thrift. They have enormous influence on the parental conduct. "As for me," said a guest at a ladies' lunch party, "I cannot play bridge for money; I have a son." "So with me," rejoined another. "With Charles growing up, I could not do it." Mothers and children may say, "After us the deluge," and behave as though very high water was overdue. That will not do for parents. They have a stake in the future. They are infinitely concerned in maintaining standards of conduct, and constrained to do their share in keeping society virtuous enough to furnish a safe environment for the rising generation. They must ever be mindful, and only that there will be mouths in the world after they are gone, the filling of which concerns them, but that a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches; and if a choice must be made between honor and money, an honorable name and the standards of behavior that make it honorable are a better and safer legacy for their children than many dollars, however well placed. We care more for true respectability than we realize. All of us who are not fools would rather see our girls marry good men who are not rich than rich men who are not good. For our boys we resist only the kind of success that is inconsistent with integrity, and the fact that we have boys makes us by so much the more solicitous to keep our own feet out of paths into which we would not choose to have their feet follow. Indulgence that is fairly safe for Fifty are avoided because they are not safe for Twenty-one, and because Twenty-one keeps an eye on Fifty and is disposed to conclude that what Fifty permits himself to do is about right.

It has been said that the commonest reason why so many men's minds stop developing is that when they get out of school—or perhaps out of college—they have to concentrate most of their attention on making a living. To incur responsibility for the maintenance of children is a measure not infinitely adapted to divert them from that employment, but as the children grow up and pass in their turn through the various stages of education, they are very commonly a steady and useful mental stimulant to their parents. They bring the old knowledge back into the house, and are knowledge with it. Their minds, not yet geared to work-day problems, run on matters more polite and more intellectual. I find that Clementine's incursions into grammar and history dig up to great advantage the table-talk of our family, and her disputes with Etienne over what words are good and what are not, and what happened, and when, and why, give the paternal mind very timely and valuable fillips. I am told that my neighbor, Lawyer Clinton, had never studied Latin until his boys began to read, but he felt that he had to keep it up, and by the time they got to Cæsar, he was in Cæsar too, reading the story of the campaign in Gaul for his amusement in the evening, after his day's work at law. The last I heard he was getting out an edition of Horace. Many a father has rubbed up his rusty Latin, or even Greek, in the stimulating company of a growing child. Mothers have followed their boys, back by back, through school and college. The new knowledge of the rising generation, which sets us strongly towards science, and the new philosophies and histories, are brought inside the door of the parent whose children are concerned with them, and it is a dull parent whose interests are not broadened and quickened by the experience.

Then, too, there are the conclusions which grown-up people have thought thoughts have reached in their day and put away in their minds. There they rest undisturbed for years, it may be. But when the children come in turn to a scrutiny of the virtues, again the old processes of reasoning begin their work in the parental mind, and the old conclusions, varied perhaps by riper experience, find new expression in the career of youth. What we know we recall, what we know we impart, what we don't know we are constrained to learn if we can, because new questions are brought to us by questioners whom it concerns us to answer.

It has been the fashion to carp at the modern American father as a poor, overworked creature, whose office it is to bring home money for his wife and children to spend. He is derided for his weakness and condoned with as the victim of his own devotion. There is plenty of nonsense about all that. For these are many ways of having fun on this earth that are more satisfying than working for one's own. If only the father's labors are truly profitable to his children, and they grow up as he would have them, there is no failure of investment or misapplication of work. To be sure, his time and thought may be overmuch devoted to money-making, for it is a wise and skillful parent that can make much money do his children good, or can even prevent them from being harmed by it. The external case, and too much of that does not make for advantage.

They are a great luxury, but I have heard parents, who themselves valued that luxury, lament that their children seemed to do nothing for themselves. For people whose time is precious and their strength taxed, to be relieved of all possible drudgery is evident economy. To relieve children of drudgery to a sufficient extent to give them time for the other work that is laid out for them, is a profitable interposition. But some daily drudgery is good for every one, and very good for children. When Clementine, bent to put down her story in the evening piece, calls Susa to light the lamp for her; when Etienne drops her hat and crut in a chair and learns then for Mathilda to hang up, neither of them gets any parental encouragement. Ordering servants may be good training for some grown-ups, and develop their executive ability, but for children a more important lesson is to learn what work means, and what order means, and they should learn it betimes and by actual practice.

Those American fathers that we hear of, who are numbered in business and leave their children to wander about the world, make a mistake, but not the mistake of being too dextrous. Their mistake is that they neglect their children, giving their whole attention to things of less importance. And another mistake that is easily fallen into by men who are used to being owners of many things, and masters of many employees, is to think that because they spend money freely for their children and supply them with many unnecessary things, they own them too, and have a right to shape their lives according to their own desires and whims. Money, laid by makes for freedom of choice, but the great possessions of a parent may easily tend to restrict the reasonable liberty of the child. If the tail is big enough, it may wag the dog; if a fortune is great enough it may dominate not only its possessor, but his heirs.

How we love to have our children "look nice!"

The man who has children and wants money is in a position that is favorable to wholesome exertion. We can all sympathize with his desires. I don't know that sympathy can be quite so safely bestowed on the man who has got together much money and wants children. Of course he wants them, to inherit his property so that he can die with more satisfaction. It is an entirely natural desire. I hope he may have them, but children don't do so much real good to the man whose work is done as to the man who is still at his work. And the philosopher may reasonably argue that the child who is born ... Followed their hope, look by look, through school and college valuable living representatives of his labors on earth. To do that is to achieve one kind of immortality; if not the best, the kind, at least, that we are best qualified to understand.

to a parent who is anxiously concerned to make him a useful and successful worker, is born to a better opportunity than if he were hailed at birth as the welcome receptacle of gains already acquired.

Greatly important and greatly remunerative is this business of raising and training children, and being trained in turn by them. It comes very near being the best worth while thing there is. Only the duty of serving that larger family that we call the public, or the larger public that constitutes mankind, can rival it in weight of obligation and in richness of reward. It is, of course, matter for regret, when the pressure of domestic responsibilities and the duty of providing for his children keeps out of the public service a first-rate man whose services the public needs. But that does not often happen. When the public's need is acute enough, and the public knows its mind clearly enough about the man it wants, it gets its man, and his children must wait, if necessary, till the public has got through with him. But as far as personal enjoyment and profit goes, the average man cannot spend his strength, or what it yields, to better purpose than for his children, nor can he do better by society than by leaving behind him worthy and

Published by

HIS STAR

by Elizabeth Ruggles

How say ye 'we have seen His Star?'
Could thy great wisdom justify Such rare selection? In that far
Mysterious region of the sky,
Where countless gleaming orbs did shed
Their glory upon Earth, didst mark
But One, transcending all, which led Thee to Him? Did the Eternal Spark

Flash into being at His birth;
And doth it follow then, that we
Who bear His image, bring to Earth
The ray of one bright star, to be
Our individual birthright; So,
Be the magnitude great or small
We may, with glad assurance know
'Tis even thus a part of all

The wondrous Scheme? Oh thought divine:
That Love should e'er conceive a plan
So perfect, thus to intertwine
The destinies of God and man!
And thou of old, whose faith sublime
Urged thee, unflinching, to the spot
Where Mary and the Babe divine
Were sheltered in that lowly cot,

Thou hast revealed a blessed hope
Unto the yearning souls of men
Who in the darkness strive and grope
Toward that Star-ray of Bethlehem.
Then let the bells of Christmastide
Ring out in honor of His birth,
Flinging the message far and wide:
"His Star is Risen! Peace on Earth!"

THE MARSHAL'S CAPTURE

BY HAMLIN CARLAND

AREW'S hotel on Line creek was built in dark remote not merely by the adjoining counties of Iowa and Minnesota, but by other and far more distant districts to whose efforts it was believed to be a harbor for thieves, especially for those on horseback.

Furthermore, it was credited with being a place of illicit trade in whiskey and a local centre of drunkenness and violence.

The house itself had an evil aspect. It was built of stone with small windows, which resembled a fortress, and the bar room lay precariously across the State line, so that when raided by the detectives of Iowa the proprietor was able to defy them from the shelter of Minnesota—and this in itself was considered a delicious joke by the better class of settlers who were just beginning to enter the country; for this tale relates to the years immediately following the civil war.

Larsen, the landlord, was a big man, prodigiously hairy and black and gray, with hot, alert, feline eyes. His hand resembled the paw of a black bear, and his voice, when angry, rose from a sullen growl to a brazen roar. He had built his house while yet the Sioux were still his neighbors, and a few years later as the white-topped soldiers began to stream past on their way to the prairie, he had put out a sign as tavern-keeper, and under that head carried on whatever dark business he found profitable.

His table fare soon became famous throughout the region, and was due to the skill of his wife, a gentle-spirited, refined woman, who told somebody's story in your till she died, bearing a daughter, the child of her first husband—who took charge of the house till the old ruffian married again. Thereafter Maggie's position was made subordinate to her stepmother and life for her was very hard.

II

One day in late July of '88 a dandy, tired young man, carrying a carpetbag on a stick, turned in at Larsen's for dinner. Maggie noticed him particularly as he entered the dining-room, for his was a fresh-colored, bronzed face, and his eyes were blue and frank, and his voice especially pleasing. He talked with the men at the table very freely, informing her, as well as the women, that he had come to help in the harvest field.

The young stranger was interested in her—she caught his admiring eyes several times, but took no offense thereat, so frank and openly was his glance—but a little later as he rose to leave the room he glanced round him with a look of interest and distress that startled her, and his face became sadder and sterner by ten times. This look lasted but an instant, for when he turned to her his teeth shone again.

"That was a good dinner. I hope you'll always wait on me," he said, and she smiled answered: "I'm glad you liked it."

As he walked out she looked after him, admiring the splendid shoulders, from which his brown neck rose like the up-pitched hole of an oak-tree. He was not tall, but his frame was almost as massive as that of her stepfather, while his step was light and graceful as that of a boy.

She found herself both glad and sorry that he had come to stay. He was too honest and too kind to mix with the lawless ruffians of her stepfather's crew, and after her work in the dining room was done she went up-stairs, still thinking of him. Led by a desire which she could not define she went to the room in which he was to sleep. As she looked in at the half-opened door her heart contracted with horror, for there on the floor in childish play intent, sat Boddie, her stepmother's two-year-old son, gazing at a glittering pair of handcuffs. Before him the young stranger's bag lay open and unfastened.

With a swift rush the girl caught the trilline iron from the child and whipped them into the bottom of the bag, closing and clasping the lock. Boddie, thus rudely interrupted, began to cry.

"What are you doing with that young 'un?" shrieked Mrs. Larsen from below.

"Nothing," replied Maggie, in terror, "he hurt himself."

"You've been punning' him or something. You let me catch you at it and I'll teach you a thing or two."

Her threats always ended thus weakly—whining slanders that she was never quite allowed to lay down to the proud girl.

Maggie flushed hot with sudden shame. A new relation—something tender and intimate had sprung suddenly up between the handsome young workman and herself. He, too, was an officer, and she had saved him from defeat, if not from death, and what was more significant, she had led for him!

These realizations gave her a feeling of exaltation quite new and strange as she waited for his return to supper, and she stared him with an interest no other man had ever inspired in her. Something in his attitude at the table gave her confidence in him—he was so erect and graceful, so different from the others who slunked on their elbows. His eyes were alert, his hands steady. "He is very strong," she thought. "He can take care of himself if he knows. . . I must tell him."

This note, this confidence on her part, could not but show itself in little attentions, and yet the stranger remained of the same frank and boyish expression. Lammigan, the gaunt boy, had warned to him—she could see that, and yet she was perfectly sure he would search that value during the night—and she believed to think what the result of that inspection might be.

In order that the stranger might linger she hovered about, asking to refill his coffee-cup, and after the others left the table she pressed close to him and as he bent to remove his plate whispered hoarsely, breathlessly—

"Be careful—there are watchers," then turning, walked rapidly away, her heart beating so fast she could hear it thumping. When again he returned he was calmly finishing his coffee, but his eyes had again lost their languid gleam and his face was redoubled and stern.

Again she bent to him out in taking his cup. "They will search you before to-night. Hide the iron."

This time a distinct shiver ran over her, and a flush—a deep scented flush of blood—rose over her face. His pride was touched and the girl could almost follow his thought as he tried to reason his way to the manner of her discovery of his purpose.

He rose at last, and going to his coat closet filled his pipe and passed slowly out and up the stairs. She looked as she waited, hearing his step as he moved about overhead. A few minutes later he came down, and with his hands in the pockets of his short coat looked in upon her, a smile of relief on his face.

"Well, I could see something for you," he called, cheerily—and she understood.

"I don't need any help," she replied—then added: "Go about

The Grand Prize

has been awarded

The Prudential

at

The St. Louis Exposition.

This is the Highest Honor

ever conferred upon a Life Insurance Company of this or any other country at any International Exposition!

THE PRUDENTIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF AMERICA.

Home Office,
Newark, N.J.

JOHN F. DRYDEN, President.

Write for Information of Policies. Dept. T.

your business." The young officer silently laughed and turned away.

Maggie was a soul beleaguered. That she kept herself undefiled and of brave heart argued well for her parentage—and this thought the young officer uttered during one of their brief meetings at the well, which had become their occasional momentary trysting place.

"Your mother must have been a nice woman—how did she come to marry old Paul Larve?" he asked.

"Oh, I don't know. Father was killed the first year of the war—and we were very poor—and then Paul Larve was the kind of man he is now. It broke my mother's heart when she found out—" She paused, abruptly.

"Go on," he commanded, eagerly, almost sternly. "What did she find out?" She turned away, and he asked, without reason, "Never mind, that's my little job. I am convinced that something more than horse-stealing is going on here. Last night I heard men coming and going, but I can't move without rousing Lantiano—he sleeps like a cat—one eye open. But I'll win out!" His professional pride was speaking now. "One of the boys is about ready to confide in me."

The girl caught up her water pail. "They are watching me!" The officer did not turn his head. "Suppose they are," he answered, carelessly. "They will only think I am making love to you."

Her face flushed, and tears of anger blinded her eyes.

"Go away!" she breathlessly, indignantly commanded. "I hate you now!"

He seized her by the arm and took the pail of water from her. "Walk by my side," he softly commanded. "I don't say that to offend you—I tried to speak without feeling. It is just what all think I am doing. You can't help it, and isn't it our safeguard?"

"If they knew it was not contempt—this word which makes you angry—that would they think I was doing? What would become of you if Paul thought we met to discuss his affairs? Come now, be reasonable. You must not fail me now, we're partners in this thing."

"Whatever happens, I can't leave you here," he said at their next interview, which he barely hinted upon her by waiting for her at the well. It was growing dark, but the girl told something new and thrilling in his face as he went on. "I came up here with just one idea in my mind, which was to ask you to get out, but I can't do that now. Whatever I do after this will seem to come from some pit you've given to me, and they'll make you suffer for it. I can't leave you here unprotected, that's set that. You don't know much about me, perhaps not enough to trust me—but you must believe my words. Will you do it?"

She was profoundly moved by the urgent appeal and less decision of his words and by some subtle union in his tone. His fine features swept away all her silly pride and she fully answered him.

"Tell me what you want me to do."

"First let me tell you what I am: I'm not a thief. I'm the deputy. I control the lawlessness of this district, but I don't want you to do as I tell you because I'm an officer of the government, but because I— I like you. You do you understand?"

The girl's face was toward the sunset, but the red that came to it was not from the sky. Then she grew pale as pale her cheeks was like a shield of silver. He waited, but she uttered no word, only a little gasping sigh of surprise—and relief and joy.

One hand went to her breast, where her heart seemed to be beating in her throat. He put his first palm upon this hand, and with its touch all her doubts, her sense of weakness, vanished. She lifted her face to him, with an action so fervent, so girlish, so appealing in its longing that he caught her in a swift embrace.

111

The next morning Maggie crept from her bed weary with the emotion which had broken her rest. The big cock was suddenly still, its scowling low onto in her slapping. Nervous voice and sighing now and then like one in deep grief, and they both entered the kitchen with listless steps. Breakfast was late, even for Sunday morning, and the minutes shrilly assailed them both, and in and all Larve stamped in to storm at them. Maggie, at the end of her misadventure, at last laid down her tray and ran out of the room, shaking with sob.

Then the young stranger rose from the table, and said, "You let that girl alone, old man. If you worry her any more I'll see your jaw in."

Old Paul turned, his long-pondering suspicion and resentment breaking out in a red flame of wrath. "You shut your mouth," he roared. "You've been a whole lot too gay with me," and he rushed at the bold youth.

What happened first Maggie did not see, but when she returned to the scene her lover was in the act of leaving the big, hairy man over his hip. Larve crashed to the floor with a force that shook the house, and for a full minute lay stunned and breathless, while his household stared in profound awe. The incredible had happened! The old man was thrown, and even Lantiano was wearily delighted.

At last Larve painfully rose to a sitting posture and stared at his conqueror with wild, blood-shot eyes, in mouth gaping. His voice, when he spoke, was mild, and the effect of his words almost ludicrous.

"You couldn't have done that ten years ago, young fellow," he repeated, earnestly.

The other laughed. "Well, I can do it now. Paul, and you don't want to forget it. I won't have you abuse that girl any more! Here he turned to the others—" And I serve notice on the rest of you that whoever insults her insults me." They shrank from the gleam of his eyes, and only Lantiano had the madness to shake his head.

"You're all right, young fellow," said he; "you deserve the girl."

When they were alone together the young officer said to Maggie, "I had a notion to arrest the old man on the spot, but that would have spoiled my whole plan. I certainly was hot. Now put on your best dress. I'm going to hitch up a horse and take you out for a drive, and then we'll see what next."

Larve offered no objection as the yellow fellow drove to the house with his horse and buggy—he seemed still daunted by the violence of his fall—but Maggie was tremulous with terror as she came out in answer to her lover's call; her new of the old usage robbed her of all sense of freedom, of pleasure in the outing.

They had hardly turned into the road before the young officer said: "Maggie, I am going to arrest old Paul and Nina and search the house, and you must help me."

The girl shuddered his arms in appeal. "Don't do that, please don't! Wait till you get help!"

"I can't wait. I had intended to send you to Root Rapids for help, but I'm afraid they'll suspect your errand and hide out. Paul is rattled by that thump I gave him, and I could take him easy." He pulled his horse to a stand at a path leading to the creek. "Hold the reins a moment, I'm coming, and hepped from the carriage and disappeared down the bank.

The girl was not a coquette—she was, indeed, quite otherwise—but in that moment she determined to lure him from his desperate plan. The thought of his danger be-mused her.

He came back holding a pistol in his hand, a smile of satisfaction on his face. "They were all right," he said, "a little rusty, but I've put in fresh loads, and now look at himself again. If only I had some one to put the handcuffs on for me." She knew by this that he had recovered his handcuffs. As he took his seat beside her he said: "There isn't a man in this whole bunch I can trust; they all thieve. You must help me." Her shoulder seemed to amuse him. If you're going to be a marshal's helper you ought to get used to such business. It's really very simple. All you need to do is to snap these writs on the old gentles while I hold him with my gun."

"Oh, I can't do that!" she exclaimed.

"He'd have to cut me first," he grimly replied. Then his voice softened. "Now see here, my girl, neither of us can spend another night in that den, and I must make my capture. I'm afraid to let this chance slip. There are to be no secrets between us."

"Oh, I can't do that!" she exclaimed.

"He'd have to cut me first," he grimly replied. Then his voice softened. "Now see here, my girl, neither of us can spend another night in that den, and I must make my capture. I'm afraid to let this chance slip. There are to be no secrets between us."

"Oh, I can't do that!" she exclaimed.

"He'd have to cut me first," he grimly replied. Then his voice softened. "Now see here, my girl, neither of us can spend another night in that den, and I must make my capture. I'm afraid to let this chance slip. There are to be no secrets between us."

"Oh, I can't do that!" she exclaimed.

"He'd have to cut me first," he grimly replied. Then his voice softened. "Now see here, my girl, neither of us can spend another night in that den, and I must make my capture. I'm afraid to let this chance slip. There are to be no secrets between us."

"They will only think I am making love to you"

Illustration by Howard Chandler Christy. Copyright, 1904, by Eastman Kodak Co., New York.

A Christmas Morning

KODAK

Where there's a child, there should the Kodak be. As a means of keeping green the Christmas memories, or as a gift, it's a holiday delight.

Kodaks from $5.00 to $97.00. Brownie Cameras (They work like Kodaks) $1, $2, $5. Kodak Developing Machines, $2 to $10.00.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.,

Rochester, N. Y.

Catalogue free at the dealers or by mail.

Every season emphasizes the advantages of an early selection of

HOLIDAY GIFTS

The GORHAM Co., Silverware, beg to say that they have received a number of important new designs in Sterling Silver, notably in their exclusive, hand-wrought MARTELE and ATHENIC, none of which can be had in duplicate. THEIR regular stock of the choicest designs in general FAMILY SILVER offers the widest opportunity for the selection of gifts of all kinds.

THE GORHAM CO.
Silverware and Goldware
Broadway at 19th
Street, New York

RESULTS are what tell

The Chicago Daily News
J. W. MORGAN ADVERTISING AGENCY,
200 N. W. 10th Street, Chicago.
New York, November 10th, 1904.
AMERICAN SUNDAY MAGAZINES,
211 West Superior St.
DEAR SIR:—Please let the enclosed be inserted on any convenient day, and signed "McKesson & Robbins."
We are so pleased with the results of it that we are getting other advertisements and don't want to change. Sincerely,
Yours very truly,
J. W. MORGAN ADVERTISING AGENCY,
Per J. W. Morgan

THE ASSOCIATED SUNDAY MAGAZINES

A Part of EACH SUNDAY'S ISSUE of

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
THE ST. LOUIS REPUBLICAN
THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER
THE PITTSBURGH POST
THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE
THE BOSTON POST

For Advertising Rates address

HENRY DRISLER, Advertising Manager
31 Union Square - - - New York
940 Marquette Building, Chicago

Rambler Sunray One 1905 Model
2 cylinders is actual horse power 1770
Other models 1700 1200-1600-2100-2500

Back of our trade mark is 1904. No one can buy that But its benefits, the experience and reputation of a generation now embodied in our product, may be had at a price not approached by any maker of vehicles of equal power and reliability. Send for our illustrated catalogue. The Rambler Magazine and Little History
Thomas B. Jeffery & Company
Main Office and Factory, Kenosha, Wisconsin Branches, Boston, Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, St. Paul, Washington, D.C., and many other cities. New York Agents, 100 West 34th Street.
Representations in all leading cities.

A Seasonable Moral

By W. D. Howells

THE woman sang her ballad to the sky
Of the keen Christmas night, flinging on high
The notes that fluttered to my window-pane
Like birds, and beat against the glass in vain
Until I opened, and from out the gloom
Let them flock into my snug, firelit room.

There was no more of meaning in the words
That came than in the jargon of birds.
But in the voice, and in the plaintive air
There was an intimation of despair
From killing sorrow, and the appealing cry
Of sorest need, which no man might deny
And cover from himself his own disgrace.
So, thoughtfully, as one does in such a case,
From among several coins in hand I chose
That of the smallest worth, and wrapped it close
In paper, so that it might not be lost,
Striking the frozen ground below, and tossed
My gift down from the window at the feet
Of the poor singer in the wintry street.

But she, as if she neither saw nor heard,
Rapt in her song, sang on, and never stirred,
While one, that opportunist strolled around
The corner nearest her, both heard and saw,
Stooped, and put out a predatory claw,
And clutched the paper; felt and recognized
The coin within (that somehow suddenly sized
My own soul up to me, in an odd way),
And then deliberately, but without stay

For all my frantic shouts and signs, kept on
To the next corner, turned it, and was gone.

What should I do? Let the poor singer go Unhelped because of this misdeed? Not so!
Such a conclusion even I could not brook.
A coin of the same worth again I took,
Wrapped it again in paper, and again
Tossed it down to the singer—not in vain.
This time! She saw it coming through the air
And heard it fall upon the ground, and there,
While she still sang, courtseyed her thanks to me,
Until I turned away and left her free.

And I was well content, and glad at heart
For having doubly done a noble part?
I was not sure. Had it been heaven's intent
That I should twice give the sum I had meant
To give but once? Perchance, unknown to me
Both women were in equal misery,
Though not of equal merit. Then, had I won
A twofold blessing by what I had done?

These things are mysteries, but my story's moral Seems one with which no one can justly quarrel:
If there is suffering that you would relieve,
Give twice the sum at once you meant to give;
And do not wait for wrong to come your way
And force your unwilling hand, for though it may Again, it may not, and, for your own sake,
The chance is such as you ought not to take.

A Casual Encounter

By Thomas A. Janvier

WHEN the car went off with a jerk, and I sat down suddenly, and the lady plunged into my lap," said the Judge, "I was startled—she was a luscious lady, and came along with a good deal of force—but within the street running of the mind I cannot say that I was surprised. You see—

"Pardon me, Judge," said the Bishop, "I must interrupt you to remind the purity of your distinction. In the case of the words which you have employed with such judicious discrimination —as in the case of my other—singular—creeping from unlike roots in unrelated languages yet in a local way expressing our native concepts—ignorance joined with carelessness has tended to a loose usage fruitful of confusion. Our only means of streamlining the outflow of this linguistic corruption is to speak, as you have spoken, with a finely differentiating precision. Especially is your use of 'startle' to describe your encounter with the lady at once accurate and felicitously elegant. The Anglo-Saxon love of that word—"

"Oh bother Anglo-Saxon love," cut in the Colonel. "Of course, Bishop, what you're saying is instructive and improving and all that sort of thing—but what we're after now is to find out what happened when the lady came crashing down on the Judge that way. I guess we're all here in that fit, one time or another, and we'd like to know what the Judge did about it. What did you do about it, Judge, anyhow?"

"I was about to observe," the Judge replied a little testily,
"that the precipitation of the lady into my lap—"
"Carefully, Judge! Carefully! Remember that precipiti is the crude form of precipitate, and that the precise meaning of precipitate—"

"The little story that I had intended to tell is not of the slightest consequence, Bishop; your etymological discourse is as well timed as it is interesting. I am only too happy to give you the floor." And the Judge leaned back in his chair and looked reigned.

"My dear Judge, you must pardon me. I beg that you will proceed." The Bishop spoke these simple words with a warm kindliness, and as he uttered them his benevolent face was lighted by a winningly cordial smile.

Mollified by the frank apology, the Judge resumed: "I was about to explain the modifying conditions under which the lady's descent upon me was made. You see, when she entered the car, followed by her escort, all the seats were filled and a few men were standing hanging on to straps. After waiting a moment, in give several younger men an opportunity—that they registered—in offer her a seat, I arose and offered her mine."

"There is no more marked sign of our degenerating civilization," observed the Bishop warmly, "than the barbarous rudeness of the young men of the present day toward the gentler sex.
I am even disposed to trace to this source the deplorable increase in our midst of every sort of crime. Corruption of manners on undeniably is the first step toward corruption of morals. The young men who begin by boldly retaining his seat in a street-car while deliberately injured women stand clinging painfully to straps very well may end— But I am interrupting you, Judge. Pardon."

"During my moment of delay," the Judge continued, "the lady had passed a step or two beyond me toward the head of the car; and at the instant that my tender was made—before I had risen to an erect position, and while I still was unattached to a strap—the car went off with the jerk to which I have already referred. In these circumstances, the result of the sudden start was to jolt me back into my seat again—and also to bring the lady down into my lap in the manner that I have described."

"Well, if that's all there is to it," said the Doctor, "I don't see that it's much out of the common. You are folks sitting all over me either every day in jerky run cars. Didn't anything more happen?"

"A good deal more happened," the Judge answered, "and I think that all of it was out of the common. The first of unusual features of the affair was of a negative character. As I have said, I was not surprised when the lady came down—such little mishaps, as the Doctor has observed, are of every-day occurrence—but I was very decidedly surprised when she did not manifest any disposition to get up."

"And you had a right to," said the Colonel. "I never knew a case like that. I've had 'em on my lap lots of times—and they've always hopped off as if they'd struck springs!"

dearie. Nobody'll hurt you while I've got you. You're safe here!"

"Really," said the Bishop thoughtfully, "public opinion should be aroused, and should remain aroused, until the carelessness among motorists—of present almost universal—be corrected. As you will observe, the whole of the series of various incidents that the Judge has set before us so vividly hinges upon the sudden starting of the car. Had the motorman been trained properly in the first instance, and had been inclined to exercise the caution that such training would have given him, the car would have gone on down smoothly and easily and nothing unusual or painful—as in the case of the person whose nose was stricken—would have occurred. Another, and perhaps a more edifying, view of the matter is to be had by a consideration of the great evils which may ensue when a small error is permitted. The angry passions excited by the motorist's negligent performance of his simple duties—"

"First Scott, Bishop! Where'll you get to next! Here's the Judge telling the best street-car story I've heard yet, and you're busy trying to solve it out with a lecture on philosophy and go on by chipping in another lecture about bad motorists in ladies, and then you let out at me about my little exordiums, and we've got to the hottest part of it—two men hammering away at each other for all they're worth in the middle of the car, and the Judge coddled up in the lap of a woman he'd never laid eyes on refereeing 'em—you start to stop the procession while you preach a sermon on how gripitis ought to take off stakes! And like enough you're set something up your share about the moral influences exerted by both tails and sunshines! For Sam Hill's sake, Bishop, give us a rest!"

"If I have erred in venturing to make what I have supposed were appropriate interpretations in the Judge's entertaining narrative," said the Bishop, with a perceptibly pained note in his voice, "of course I regret my error. Personally, I think that my several interpreted expositions have been justified by my elocution. The same words, and the selected moments, may be rendered as equally as he appropriate to the utterance of what I conceive to have been judicious, and even edifying, remarks upon the Judge's text. However, as the ground upon which I have endeavored to set my obviously unwillingly admitted views seems to me to be as equally as useless as it certainly was well meant. I beg, Judge, that you will proceed."

"I shall not proceed," the Judge replied with decision. "If I did, I should but have to contend further with irrelevant interruptions accurately timed to arrive at the most important moments. I prefer to stop short."

"Oh, come now, Judge," said the Colonel soothingly, "don't take it that way. The Bishop, you know, don't really mean any harm."

"Of course he doesn't," added the Doctor. "And if he did, it wouldn't be fair to the Colonel and me to stop. You're giving us a corker, Judge! Go right on, old man. What did you do next?"

"But the Judge was not to be placated. "It is sufficient to add," he answered coolly, "that I extracted myself from the lady's grasp, arose from her lap, and left the car."

"Anything that you would like to see about the precision of the equivoque, Bishop, or the relative infelicity of the last and the Westminster Catechism, will be quite in order now."

Christmas in Colonial Times

By René Bache

THE Christmas Turkey at Mount Vernon was a wild bird, and, after a puny duck, when Mrs. Washington, in the early days before the Revolution—her husband was then only an earnest citizen of Virginia—killed up her doves and stood to enter it.

In those days it was considered a matter of course that a lady should know how to carve, though this was the case with the mistress of Mount Vernon; she might not speak correctly. The accomplishment, like the asking of jigs and riddles, was appropriate for a housewife.

Christmas at Mount Vernon in those times was an exceedingly jolly and festive season. Washington was the richest man in Virginia, and the generosity of his household was in many respects more luxurious than could be found in the houses of his well-to-do neighbors. For example, the guests at this Christmas dinner were provided with silver forks—a rare luxury at that period, when gentlemen contentedly ate with their knives, because it was one of the question to lift peace and other such oddities to the mouth with the three steel rods commonly in use.

It is a shock to learn that the Father of his Country ate with his knife, yet such was undeniably the fact. That same historian, Peter Parker, tells a story (probably apocryphal) of an occasion when someone tried to kill the immortal George by putting poison on his plate. Showing his knife beneath a loaf of bread, and raising it over his lips, he looked across the table at his enemy, and said, "Shall I cut of these?" Still holding the knife suspended, he again transfixed the loaf with his gaze, and repeated the question. So utterance was the would-be poisoner by Washington's seeming assurance that he fed from the table, and the poisonous peace remained unquenched.

At that epoch, in Virginia, the men who worked on the table in most of the country houses were plantation girls. At Mount Vernon, however, the household servants were attired in a handsome and even striking livery of scarlet, white, and gold, and the butler was a dream of gorgeousness. The men for such two guests was the minimum number. Not only were there servants to be supplied, but a constant succession of bottles containing wines of choice vintages for the consumption of the male guests.

Ladies in those days drank next to nothing at all. To take more than a sip of wine, for either milk or molasses, would have been regarded as the height of impropriety. But for the men—all through this Christmas dinner the bottles were kept going around. Mr. Bryan Fairfax, of Alexandria, would say to Mr. G. W. Lewis, across the table and a glass of wine with you! With pleasure, cousin Bryan! The latter would reply, as he bowed and drank. Then Mr. Fairfax would go through the same performance with every man at the table—and so it went throughout the repast.

The tables were set at the dinner were nearly all of them products of the Mount Vernon estate. From a gastronomic point of view, no region in the world was richer than that section of old Virginia. There were caw-caw ducks to be had on the river in front of the mill; turkeys and geese were plentiful, and the proprietor of the auction raised his own beef, pork, and mutton. The only vegetables were sweet potatoes, white potatoes, and beans.

From a latter-day standpoint the repast was conducted in a peculiar fashion. All the dishes, including three kinds of meats and several of game, were put on the table at once. While Mrs. Washington carved the turkey, the gentlemen who happened to be opposite the mutton, the venison, etc., were expected to lend expert assistance in the dissection of those comestibles. The puddings were eaten before the withdrawal of the cloth, the removal of which left bare a shiny expanse of mahogany, upon which the fruit, nuts, and dainties were set forth in festive array.

When the cloth had been withdrawn, the host would lift his glass, filled with choice Madeira, and drink the health of his guests. Five minutes of general conversation would follow, perhaps, and then Mrs. Washington would rise, giving the signal for the departure of the ladies. Everybody would get up; the would-be mutton-eaters, the gentlemen, and the ladies; the latter would stand probably in response. With the retirement of the women the real drinking would begin, and might be kept up almost indefinitely, though for his part, Washington never went beyond a moderate supply of wine, and his usual custom to leave the table within a few minutes after his wife had gone.

Trusts, in those days, were never drunk until after the ladies had left the table, and no lady's health was ever pledged in this fashion while she was present. But when the men found their vests alone, it was the proper thing for a young gentleman to get upon his feet—which, it is to be hoped, were still young—and to say, "I give you Betty Loring, the most beautiful girl in Westmoreland County!" Oh, perhaps it might be Susan Lee, of Hapsham, North. Such a toast was customarily drunk standing—with all the honors, as the phrase was.

Indeed, Christmas was a great day of festivity in the Virginia of that epoch. Breakfast was at eight or nine o'clock, unless it had been decided to go a hunting in the morning—in which case the meal was eaten in candle-light. If there was a fey-ant—a spirit of which Washington was very fond—the host wore a brilliant red waistcoat trimmed with gold lace, and the ladies who rode were beautiful in scarlet habits, the such ornaments Mrs. Washington would go out in her "charade and lace," keeping as close to the hint as the roads would permit. Not until 1782 were the Mount Vernon kennels abolished and the dogs sold.

Those were days when menials were ample, but were not anticipated. Enting, when undertaken, was no mere frolic, but serious business. This Christmas dinner was at 3.30 p.m.; there had been no lunch, and there was no supper to come. After dinner there were games—blind man's bluff, hunt the slipper, and the like—with much romping and more or less kissing. A spring of molasses was kept up in a convenient place, and if a girl happened to be kissed under it by a young man she did not limit or call for help. In fact, it might be suspected that she did not seriously object.

Never, and nowhere, in this world were there more capable and expert makers of love than the young men and women of the Virginia of that epoch. Not only were they better fellows than they were, if they loved fiercely, they proved their sincerity by marrying early; and, when one of them was so unfortunate as to lose his wife, he would inevitably marry again. Marriage was considered just a step toward the end of life, and the few officers of the gentle folk were freely enlisted even to the very ants. Black Tom knew that Mrs. James was "going after" Miss Sallie Lee, and would talk the matter over with his young master. And it was the same with the girls. It was not until 1782 that it may easily be imagined that on a festive occasion such as this Christmas celebration a good deal of incidental law-making, some of it serious enough, was accomplished. But the master of the house, though he himself had been sufficiently ardent in his youth, was now a man with a wife and a family.

Though Mr. Washington took no part in the romps that followed the dinner, he heartily enjoyed the fun. Occasionally he indulged in a game of cards, but probably on this Christmas evening he indulged in some such amusement, in company with the other people, while the young folks scampered and romped. He played for money, but the stakes were small.

There were two young people at Mount Vernon in those days—the son and daughter of Mrs. Washington by her first husband. It is easy to imagine the part they took in the romps on Christmas day. John and Martha, their names were, but every day knew them as Jacky and Patsy. Patsy died in 1773, when just budding into womanhood, while her brother married young, and had four children, two of whom, George and Nellie Custis, were adopted by Mr. Washington. To George he left the famous Arlington estate, opposite the city of Washington, which afterwards fell to his inheritance to the wife of General Robert E. Lee.

On Christmas eve there was a dance, to which all the neighbors for many miles around were, as a matter of course, invited. The party began before 8 p.m., and was over by ten o'clock. Young ladies' beauty in those times was not spoiled by late hours. For music there was a single fiddle, played by an old slave on the place; but the clothing she ordinarily wore was of domestic manufacture, being worn at Mount Vernon, where no less than sixteen negro women were kept constantly at work in what was called the "spinning house." This industrial annex of the establishment remains to this day, and visitors of Mount Vernon are taken by the guides to see the very room in which the spinning wheels were operated.

All the young ladies wore his necked dresses, making a brave display of pretty shoulders, and the men wore in knee-breeches and silk stockings. Mrs. Washington's gown, cut Y-shaped and fitted to the neck, was of French silk; but the clothing she ordinarily wore was of domestic manufacture, being worn at Mount Vernon, where no less than sixteen negro women were kept constantly at work in what was called the "spinning house." This industrial annex of the establishment remains to this day, and visitors of Mount Vernon are taken by the guides to see the very room in which the spinning wheels were operated.

Of course, there was high festival not only for the master and his guests, but also for "my people," as Washington was accustomed to call the negroes of his estate. He would never have thought of speaking of them as slaves. There were at that period about 100 negroes on the place, and at the Yule-tide season they enjoyed exceptional privileges, fixed things for their consumption were distributed with no niggard hand by the mistress of the house, a treat much appreciated, being a drink known as "mellinger," composed of fermented honey, spices, and water. Another beverage brewed by Mrs. Washington was a sort of punch heavily sweetened with honey.

Those were days when a capable housewife was supposed to know how to compound a variety of beverages. Beer was brewed at Mount Vernon under Mrs. Washington's own supervision, and cider as well, the latter being a drink of which her husband was very fond. He always had it on the table at dinner, and would take it freely in place of the wines which were more to the taste of his guests.

By ten o'clock in the evening the festivities of Christmas day at Mount Vernon was over. Even had the fashion of the time been otherwise, Mrs. Washington would scarcely have tolerated late hours. She always insisted on putting her husband to bed early, and he meekly obeyed. Whether it be true or not, no some chroniclers have asserted, that Mr. Washington was fatigued, it is certain that he considered it judicious to submit to most things to his wife's wishes.

The frame for this picture of a Christmas at Mount Vernon before the Revolution is ready made; for, thanks to the efforts of patriotic women, the old custom stands today almost exactly as it was when Washington lived there. There is much of the old furniture, and even a great deal of the old china and glassware. The house is a veritable fragment of American history, and, though more than a century and a quarter has gone by since the merry Yule-tide festival here described, the imagination readily recognizes the old place as it is. The throng of guests, eating, drinking, dancing, and making love, and hears the joyous laughter of the romping young folks, while through the crowd moves the stately figure of the host, offering his hand to the prettiest girl in the room, proceeds to lead her through the graceful and decorous steps of a minuet.

CRYSTAL Domino SUGAR

CRYSTAL
Domino
SUGAR
EXTRA WHITE

A Triumph in Sugar
Making!

Sold only in 5 lb. sealed boxes!

Crystalline in form, crystal is quickly becoming an essential in every home made confection. It is sweet, it is white, it is pure, and it is the result of an expert crystallization. It will be better pleased when you have used it in your tea, coffee, etc.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

Remember that packages are stamped with "DOMINO" MARK. "DOMINO" STONES and the trademark for brand of name "HART WATERS & FLEMING, New York, INSET UPON HAVING THE GENUINE.

Read Blaikie's HOW TO GET STRONG and How to Stay So

$1.00 net (postage extra)

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

THE EQUITABLE

HENRY B. HYDE
PRESIDENT

J. W. ALEXANDER
PRESIDENT

J. B. HYDE
VICE PRESIDENT

A CHRISTMAS GIFT

of a Government Bond for $10,000.
would please your wife, wouldn't it?
It would please you, too, to be able to give it — but perhaps you can't.

You can, however — if you are in good health — make an investment that will give your wife — in the event of your death — an absolutely safe Gold Bond bearing 5% interest. Or the Bond will become your property in fifteen or twenty years if you live.

Splendid opportunities for men of character to act as representatives.
Write to GAGE E. TARBELL, 2nd Vice President.

For full information fill out this coupon at once

The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, 120 Broadway, New York Dept. 35
Please send me information regarding your new issue of Gold Bonds.

Name (please print) _____

Address _____

Drawn by Margaret Edwards

THE OLD FOLKS AT HOME

The Rhine

AND Moselle Wines of

HINCKEL AND WINCKLER

FRANKFURT A/MAIN

(Established 1744)

Which you must have enjoyed in the German Wine Restaurant at St. Louis—where they were served exclusively—have been awarded

THE GRAND PRIZE

(Highest Possible Award)

at the St. Louis Exposition, 1904.

You may now serve to your guests as choice a wine in as perfect condition as they ever enjoyed on the banks of the storied Rhine.

A catalogue of these fine vintages will be forwarded on request.

C. H. ARNOLD & CO.

Sole Agents

27 South William Street, New York

CREME YVETTE

THE QUEEN OF CORDIALS

CREME YVETTE "CORDIAL"

Makes a most delicious flavor for sorbet

It has been used this season on some of the principal banquet menus at

The Waldorf-Astoria

Can be served in a great variety of ways when you desire some thing delicate and new.

Try it in your after dinner coffee or frappe, you will be delighted.

For Sale in all leading Grocers

THE SHEFFIELD CO., N. Y.

Manufacturers, 410, Agents, 27 Warren Street, New York

Size Doesn't Count If You Know

JIU-JITSU

THE JAPANESE NATIONAL SYSTEM OF

PHYSICAL TRAINING AND SELF-DEFENSE

JIU-JITSU is a system of exercises that develops strength and endurance. The Japanese, though small of stature, possess almost superhuman strength. In the allied march through China in 1900 they repeatedly overcame the soldiers of every other nation. They attributed their strength and powers of endurance to the perfect technique of JIU-JITSU.

JIU-JITSU embodies the great principles of attaining perfect health and perfect physical development. It is a means of self-defense, the man or woman varied in JIU-JITSU can protect themselves against persons in their side and strength.

JIU-JITSU SUCCESSFULLY TAUGHT BY MAIL

For over 2,000 years the principles of Jiu Jitsu have been religiously guarded. By an Imperial edict the teaching of the system was forbidden outside of Japan. The knowledge, however, existing between Japan and the United States has been instrumental in releasing Jiu Jitsu from its death-bound secrecy, and all the secrets of the Japanese National System of Physical Culture and Self-Defense are now being revealed to the American people for the first time by the YABE SCHOOL OF JIU JITSU, at Rochester, N. Y. Mr. Y. K. Yabe, formerly of the Ten Shin Ken School of Jiu Jitsu, has formed a correspondence course which contains a full instruction in Jiu Jitsu. It is identical with the course taught in the leading school of Japan.

FIRST LESSON SENT FREE

An intensely interesting book which explains the principles of Jiu Jitsu has just been written by Mr. Yabe. As long as the edition lasts, this book, together with the first lesson in the art will be sent free to interested persons. The lesson is fully illustrated with full-page half-tone engravings, and shows on the most effective methods known to Jiu Jitsu for disarming a dangerous antagonist. If you desire to learn more about the closely guarded secrets of this marvelous science, you should write today for this free book and specimen lesson. They will be sent you by return mail, postpaid. Address

THE YABE SCHOOL OF JIU-JITSU

338 Realty Bldg., Rochester, N. Y.

THE "COME ALONG"

ONE OF THE 40 METHODS KNOWN TO JIU JITSU FOR PARALYZING THE ARM USED BY JAPANESE POLICEMEN IN ARRESTING OBSTINATE PERSONS

THE BINDWEED

By NELLIE K. BLISSETT

The splendid romance of a young girl of the people who rose to be queen. Founded on the real facts in the late Serbian royal tragedy, now made public for the first time by one who knows. The human interest is intense and the wonderful story is marvelously well told.

$1.50. All Booksellers.

Who is Foxcroft Davis?

The December Smart Set contains a complete novel on Washington life.

CLAVERING AND HIS DAUGHTER

by this writer, which is setting social and political circles agog at the nation's capital and over the entire country. The story of a remarkable man and a still more remarkable woman. The human interest is unexcelled, the execution masterly and the knowledge of Washington life startlingly intimate.

THE YELLOW FAY

By EDGAR SALTUS

"The Yellow Fay" is a novel of drama and tragedy in the aristocratic circles of New York and Newport. A plot of absorbing interest, pictures of people of fashion that are almost photographic in their realism, and a style the most brilliant and lucidly epigrammatic that has yet come from the pen of Mr. Saltus. Published complete in that famed quarterly magazine,

TALES FROM "TOWN TOPICS"

All Book or Periodical Dealers, or sent postpaid on receipt of 50c. by TOWN TOPICS, 452 Fifth Avenue, NEW YORK

Of' Sandy Cloze

By Kathryn Jarboe

IT was all a joke. Or, rather, if the joker had not done his part there would have been no story at all, for the pathos of it is eternal and therefore commonplace; and the sentiment is commonplace, too, because it is as old and as new as the Christ story that came into the world so long ago, that is reborn each year on Christmas day. The setting, too, is old and commonplace, for where is the spirit of Christmas more needed than among the little children whom Christ loved, among the little children of the very poor.

The city, as you know it, is one of the vast herding grounds of the world. It stands like a gorgeous jewel in a tawdry, tarnished setting; stretched through its centre are the dwellings of the rich, and, on all sides, round about it, are the tenements of the poor—and they huddle closer to the homes of the mighty than the hags that hold the jewel. To the east and to the west the tenements lie, but the east knows a little of the west and the west cares lit for the east, for along the streets that zone the jeweled centre there is no chance for the squalid traffic of the poor.

Bills lived on the East Side, in a tiny room high in a dirty tenement. He was not alone. In many ways it seemed as though it would have been far better for him if he had been alone. For the mother who lay on the tumbled bed in the corner was being dragged slowly out of his life by the creeping, crawling fingers of the white plague that haunts these tenements by day and by night. And Nanny, the little sister? Well, Bills knew that if it were not for Nanny he could go out into the world and try to earn money to pay for the things that the doctor said would save his mother's life. Some of the things he could buy if he had only a little money, but some of them he did not believe were in the world. He had never seen them; he had never felt them; and Bills was sceptical about things that he had never seen and never felt.

And yet, crowded in the corner where the light from the air shaft fell, Bills was writing a letter to some one that he had never seen, to some one whose very existence he doubted. But if there was any chance that the things he had heard were true, he knew that he must take advantage of this.

He had been planning the letter for a long time, but he had only just found a piece of paper for it, and he had begun the pencil with which he was writing from Tony at the corner. Tony had told him that he could have the pencil for just half an hour, and his stiff little gray fingers were struggling to print the letters on the paper that grew warmer and grimmer under his touch. It was not a very long letter for Bills had been told that he would only have to write his name and address and the list of things that he wanted. So he had commenced his letter with the number and name of his street and his own name in a great scraggly line that filled half the page. Nothing was his, but very long; some medicine, some soap and some wine a doll for Nanny, a higher pillow and a blanket and some green fields and country air—these were the things that Bills had never heard of, and even Santa Claus could hardly have known from the spelling just what they were—and, perhaps, a knife. That was all.

He folded the paper twice, and on the outside wrote "Of' Sandy Cloze." Then he hesitated. He asked his mother where Santa Claus lived, but the woman's voice was choked by a sudden cough. Bills waited, but the light was going fast.

"I guess they'll know if I put just 'some-erens' on it," he said, and added that for an address.

Then he crept to the corner with the pencil for Tony and dropped his letter into the mail-box.

II.

In a West Side hotel, a hotel that had been the deck house of a canal boat, a hotel that still retained the stale, unsavoury air after its long sojourn on the river's bank, lived Of' Cloze's, the miser. All day long and all night long he sat in his hotel; in his mind, visions of gold following one after another. One was a golden haired woman whose eyes were as blue as the forget-me-nots of his native land. That was always short, and after it were the golden curls of a four-year-old baby. Then came visions of gold that rattled and clinked in bags, for all the money that came in to Of' Cloze's was changed to the gold of that native land. The baby's yellow curls were growing more and more golden. There was a vision, too, before which Of' Cloze's shrank, over which his police teeth chattered. And this vision was of a night when a golden-haired girl bent over a falde on which were piles of yellow gold. She had come upon him unawares when he glanced over his treasure, and he had raised his chair high in the air and crashed it down upon the golden hair. For twenty years he had not seen the golden-haired girl, for twenty years he had not known whether he had killed his child or not, for he had guarded his treasure up and did with it from his home. But four times a day he left his hotel when he heard the postman's shrill whistle on the street that edged the river. Was there a letter for him? Of course no letters ever came, and he always returned to his rags and to his visions.

III.

It was almost Christmas, and the clerks at the post-office were taking a moment's rest, an instant to breathe, forgetting, just for a second, that they were merely machines.

"Some old game," muttered one, stretching his numbed arms.

"Boxes all filled up with kids' letters to Santa Claus!"

A dozen childish inquiries to the old saint were greeted with jest and laughter. One was addressed to Greenland, another to Iceland, one to the north pole, another to the moon. On one was a note to Uncle Sam asking him to find the Christmas saint, and then came Bills' letter addressed to "Of' Sandy Cloze, Some-erens."

"Say, I guess it won't be robbing the mails for me to take that letter," chuckled a voice. "I got a customer that'll put

The Call of the Wild

18 DIFFERENT CRUISES AND SPECIAL SERVICES

TO ITALY 2 fast trips de luxe by S. S. DEUTSCHLAND from New York, January 7 and February 7.

TO THE ORIENT A 56 days' cruise by S. S. MOLTKE from New York, January 30, 1905. Cost, $300 upward.

TO THE WEST INDIES Cruises by S. S. PRINCESS VICTORIA LUKE; also to the Mediterranean during January, February, March, April. Cost, $125 upward.

TO MEDITERRANEAN AND ADRIATIC COAST POINTS

Short and inexpensive cruises by S. S. METTOR, starting from Genoa and Venice. Cost, $50 upward. Excellent connections made by Company's Atlantic service.

TO JAMAICA etc. ATLAS LINE SERVICE. Sailings every Saturday. $30 one way, $75 round trip, including stationer accommodation and meals. 23 days' cruise. $125 per adult.

Send for Illustrated Booklets before deciding Winter plans.

HAMBURG-AMERICAN LINE

NEW YORK PHILADELPHIA CHICAGO BOSTON ST. LOUIS

Agencies in all principal cities

SEABOARD Florida Limited

First arrivals have the CHOICE OF ROOMS in the hotels at ST. AUGUSTINE.

SEABOARD FLORIDA LIMITED

Solid Pullman train, with dining and observation cars, takes its patrons over the shortest route between

NEW YORK
and
ST. AUGUSTINE
and gets there first.

For illustrated booklets giving full information of the leading

WINTER RESORTS OF THE SOUTH

apply to ticket agents of connecting lines, or Seaboard Air Line Railway.

One of the handsomest calendars for 1905 at the National Historical Calendar, four pages in full color, without advertisement. Suitable for holiday gift or mailing. Send to any railroad on receipt of 25 cents.

CHARLES B. RYAN, General Passenger Agent, PORTSMOUTH, VA.

Every Good Operator deserves a Remington Typewriter

Because the Remington helps the operator to do GOOD WORK

REMINGTON TYPEWRITER COMPANY
327 Broadway, New York
BRANCH HOUSES EVERYWHERE

LAKEWOOD for GOLF

REACHED ONLY BY

NEW JERSEY CENTRAL

FINEST LINKS BEST HOTELS EXCLUSIVE PATRONAGE

BOOKLET ON APPLICATION TO
C. M. BURT, GENERAL PASSENGER AGENT 143 LIBERTY STREET
NEW YORK CITY.

The Premier Honor

The world-wide reputation of

Hunter Baltimore Rye

as the highest standard for purity, quality and flavor has been justly and appropriately sustained at the St. Louis Exposition by the award of the

GRAND PRIZE

after a most careful consideration of the relative merits of all other brandy exhibited. May the thousands who will appreciate its value all the more for household uses and for the cheering comfort of Home's Hospitality enjoy a

Merry Christmas

W.M. LANAHAN & SON, Baltimore, Md.

fit. He's sandy enough, and he's called Off' Cleve, and he's been asking for a letter ever since I've been on the street. It'll be a kind of a joke to give him this and see what he does."

No it was Uncle Sam, through one of his minions, who perpetrated the joke.

IV.

It was the day before Christmas, late in the afternoon, so late that the city gleamed with the jewelled lights that shone through bulgily-scratched windows out into the darkness of the streets. Winter had decked the city in her whitest robes, and had hung it with glittering gems that held and reflected the lights that lined the streets, in the long straight avenue, two steady streams of perfume of violets, but whose blossoms traveled for just that little half hour in the smoky Christmas air.

In the western curb of the avenue stood an old man with white hair and gleaming eyes and straggling sandy locks, dressed, so ragged, so forlorn he was that one of the jewelled occupants of a passing sleigh turned shuddering from a glimpse of him. But Christmas which was not for the poor that is good will to all men, but for the poor that is forgetfulness of all men's sorrows.

A dozen times the old man quavered for want. A dozen times he staggered back confused by the gliding sleighs, the prancing horses, the silver music, and the gleaming lights. At last a friendly hand was slipped into his, a friendly voice said:

"Say, old man, come off' Cleve's. I'll buy you over his shop when I see you and go when I see you."

It was only a wordy as tattered as he was, but, yielding himself to the friendly coming, he crossed in safety.

V.

In the tiny room, high in the dirty tenement, Bibo was waiting, doubtfully, suspiciously. He had just been out to ask when old Santa Claus was so likely to come and bring the things. Now he knew that he ought have to wait until midnight or even later than that. He had crumbled Nanny in sleep with a slice of Santa Claus and the doll he might bring, and he still held her in his arms to keep her warm, to keep him self warm. In the bed the mother shuddered and coughed and dared. The only light in the room came through the open door from the drug hall, and its faint rays flickered across the faded yellow hair on the pillow, on the golden-haired child in Bibo's arms.

There was a fumbling, stumbling step on the stairs, but it was too early for Santa Claus, so Bibo gave the sound no thought. On each landing there was a little pause. In Bibo's landing it was longer than it had been before. Then a shadow fell across the face Bibo's heart stood still. Was it Santa Claus after all? The boy turned and looked at the man and then the steady heart of the street. This stranger was no saint. He was only a man, poorer, more ragged even, than the other tenants in the house.

But now the man who had stood so long on the threshold of the little room entered slowly.

"Nan!" It was a weak old voice, quavering and hoarse, but the sick woman bent a slow tired rise. She lifted her weak arms, but she spoke only one word, "Father!"

"I knew it was you," old Cleve's shapely, his arms clasped about his daughter, "I knew it must be you."

Bibo had not moved. He still waited the sleeping child in his arms. He still waited for the Santa Claus who would come at midnight, perhaps, and who would bring the soup and the wine and the medicine, the doll and the knife. His dream was too bright to be tarnished by this shabby old man. And then, on his brain were smacked the words that drove the dream away, that told him that his letter had never reached the Christmas saint.

And it had your old nickname, Bibo, at the top, and then it spoke of Nanny, and I was so sure, oh so sure that it was you. And—the old man's voice quivered and flickered like a wind-blown flame—"and, Nanny, girl, I've got the gold; you remember the gold? The money's all for you, don't it will make you well. Surely, it can make you well."

It was here that the sick woman stretched her hand toward Bibo. She pointed his eye, to bring the baby nearer. She told him to lay it in the old man's arms.

The sleeping child stirred, then was suddenly and opened her eyes, that were so blue as the forget-me-nots in the old man's backyard house. She looked in wonder at the old face bending over her; she laid one hand carelessly on the old lips, and murmured, happily and dreamily:

"Sandy Claus! Bibo's Sandy Claus!"

VI.

There were no more days in the lonely hour of the West. There were only a few more days in the grimy tenement on the East Side. Then the new life began. The old man was never again alone, but only a few of his golden visions shared with him. There was a golden-haired woman, who grew stronger and stronger, and another was a golden-haired baby with forget-me-not eyes. The visions of the gold that died, of the gold in bags, were gone; the gold itself was gone. It had been spread out over green fields; it had been transformed into country air, and sometimes it whispered to him, saying "father," sometimes "grandfather," and sometimes, when little Nanny spoke, it said "Sandy Claus." For Nanny could only believe that the old man who had come on Christmas eve was no one else save Bibo's Sandy Claus.

The Return

By Ellen Duval

"PROFESSOR LEMMINGTUN, I particularly want you to know my niece Mary—my second one—as her father calls her. You remember Herbert?"

Mary Peritts in some surprise, looked at the gentleman who was bowing to her, and as she put her hand into his said, earnestly, "The Professor Lemmingtun?"

Whereupon her Aunt Evelyn smilingly exclaimed, "Back to home!"

"I am an old friend of your aunt's," said the professor—a short, powerful man, who easily looked his full forty-five or fifty years.

"Are you?" And Mary regarded him with quizzical interest.

"Well, may I not be?" asked the gentleman, lightly.

"But I never heard Aunt Evelyn speak of you," said Mary, frankly.

Miss Peritts colored slightly as Lemmingtun's eyes turned toward her.

"There must be many who had the privilege of your aunt's acquaintance of whom she would have no occasion to speak. It is enough that she remembered. But have you a dance left to give me, or am I too late?"

"Do you dance?"

"Ask your aunt, I did—once."

"But do you really want to?"

"Miss Mary, in order to probe for motives is to invite the first breath of rage."

He warned. Take the picture of the picture you. I want to give pleasure, and I want that every creature move from left to right, most move to right."

From behind, yet her anxious gaze continued to sweep wearily round the room. There as her look came back to the pro-

THE LIQUEUR
OF POLITE
SOCIETYTHE
LIQUEUR
OF POLITE SOCIETY

LIQUEUR PÈRES CHARTREUX

—GREEN AND YELLOW—

THIS FAMOUS ORDEIN, NOW MADE AT TARRAGONA, SPAIN, WAS FOR CENTURIES DISTILLED BY THE CARMELES, MONKS (FATHERS) CHARTREUX AT THE MONASTERY OF LA GRANDE CHARTREUSE, FRANCE, AND HAS BEEN THROUGHOUT THE WORLD AS A FAVORITE. THE LABEL AND BOTTLE DESIGN IS NOW BEING REPRODUCED BY THE GENUINE ARTICLE WILL BE IDENTICAL WITH THE ORIGINAL. THE MONASTERY OF CHARTREUX IS NOW IN THE POSSESSION OF THE MONASTERY OF CHARTREUX. THE MONASTERY OF CHARTREUX IS NOW IN THE POSSESSION OF THE MONASTERY OF CHARTREUX.

SOLE IMPORTERS: B. L. LILLARD & CO., NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK, N. Y.

PERRIER JOUET CHAMPAGNE

possesses all the qualities demanded by a champagne. Vigor, freshness, delicacy and purity.
"Special Reserve"—Dry and frothy.
"Best"—Without a trace of sweetness.
NEW YORK AND BOSTON: B. L. LILLARD & CO., SOLE IMPORTERS FOR THE UNITED STATES,
117 N. 4th St., New York.

FOR MEN OF BRAINS
Cortez CIGARS
—MADE AT KEY WEST—

BOND & LILLARD
WHISKEY
IS THE BEST

lessor, she said, "Wait till the music begins, please; and then if—if no one comes to claim this dance, shall you mind sitting it out with Aunt Evelyn and me?"

Miss Evelyn's eyes and those of the professor met.

"History repeats itself," said he, gently. "I shall be delighted. You had rather sit outside than in, of course? We will get seats outside that window so that you may look into the room; and Miss Evelyn and I will face the sea."

He looked keenly at the small, beautiful girl before him; but she was not aware of his notice.

At the first crash of music the professor led the way, and the two ladies followed him to the porch outside.

"Is this your first visit to Isply?" asked Mary, mechanically, as they took their seats.

"No; I was here more than twenty years ago, I know Isply well."

"I thought the place was comparatively new," returned the girl.

"It is a reclamation," said the professor.

"Years ago Isply was the discovery and open secret of certain people of moderate means, many interests, and busy lives. Then fashion and fortune found the spot and made it fashionable, costly, and stupid. Then fortune and fashion, happily, faded and drifted on to newer, nobler, easier playgrounds; and Isply is now being reclaimed by its early discoverers, or their representatives—like yourself, for instance."

Mary's hands lay rather listless in her lap or else worked nervously with her fan; but her straining gaze never left the brilliant room. "And were you one of Isply's early discoverers, as you have been of other things?"

"No; the first time I came I followed a lady; the second time, I followed a woman."

"That sounds like romance." The girl's tone had a certain scorn in it.

"I should call it history," was the quiet answer. "What is the difference between romance and history?" continued the professor, turning to Miss Evelyn.

"One you must believe; the other you may."

"Ah, but which?"

"I'm almost afraid to remember. Ah, Mary."

"I don't believe in romance," said the girl, moodily.

"Neither did I—once," answered the professor.

Mary gave him a flashing look with lifted brows. "And do you now?"

"Why not? I've had a quarter of a century to learn the lesson."

"What is romance?" asked the girl, half reluctantly and after a pause.

"A vision, or revelation," said Miss Evelyn, softly.

"Which if you follow and are obedient to, you are, as far as mortals may, happy ever after; but which if you disobey and turn away from, you are bound to taste one of the bitterest of all draughts—regret."

Though the professor's face could not be seen, his tone was significant.

Mary gave a deep sigh. Then she wrenched her look away from the bright ball-room and fixed it resolutely on the shadowy professor.

"Tell me all about that first Isply, please."

"Oh, it was just like this—the wooded shores, the rocks, the 'trampling waves,'

"Is it—Will you—Is it really my dance?" followed Mary's

ALL that has been accomplished during the past year towards making the automobile more perfect is exemplified in the COLUMBIAS for 1904. Leading models include our 40-horsepower gasoline car with side-entrance limousine, Victoria, Landaulet or Limousine body, our new 16-horsepower side-door Light Gasoline Coupelet (class winner in the Eagle Rock hill-climbing contests November 24th); our new Light Electric Victoria, the handsomest and most efficient vehicle in its class ever made; and our standard electric Runabouts, Surreys, Town Carriages of the coach class and electric Commercial Vehicles.

We issue three Catalogues describing respectively Columbia Gasoline Cars, Columbia Electric Carriages and Columbia Electric Delivery Wagons and Trucks. Columbia Automobiles are made exclusively by

ELECTRIC VEHICLE COMPANY, HARTFORD, CONN.
 NEW YORK: 134, 36, 138 West 35th St.
 BOSTON: 74 Southwark St.
 CHICAGO: 1415 Michigan Ave.

THE WAYSIDE SERIES

This is a series of artistic little books made after designs by Mr. Will Bradley, the well-known designer and artist. The volumes are square 16mo in size and especially pleasing in typography and make-up.

RIP VAN WINKLE. Old-style volume, with frontispiece. $.75
 LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW. Uniform with "Rip Van Winkle."
 RURIATAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM. With Oriental ornaments and binding. 1.00
 BOOK OF RUTH AND ESTHER. With especially designed initials, etc. 1.00
 BRADLEY—His BOOK. Bound volumes of the unique, artistic periodical. Net 5.00
 GILBERT'S BAR BARLAD. With over 100 drawings by the author. 1.75

KINGDAIRY'S PERSEUS. A beautiful, well-printed child's book. $.75
 HARTHORN'S PARADISE OF CHILDREN. Uniform with "Perseus." 1.00
 PRINCE ASHRO AND PARI BANGU (from "Arabian Nights"). Uniform with "Perseus." 1.00
 THE WISDOM OF COMPOSERS. A Right upon Chinese religion and life. 1.00
 FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS. A choice anthology. 1.75
 Edition de Luxe. 10.00

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y.

the waves against the rocks, so that the three seemed to be shut in by the concrete rings of sound.

The professor rounded himself. "If you will wait a few moments for me, Matrons Mary, you and Miss Evelyn, I should like to look up Pierce Varbury," he said, finally. "Do you know him?" cried Mary. "Excellent well. He's so stupid as they make 'em—almost as stupid as I."

"Professor Lemmington, he's one of the most brilliant, promise—"

"Better wait and tell him so. Flattery from those we love doesn't hurt," said the professor, easily.

"Flattery! It's royal truth!"

"Well, royal truth from those who love no is a subtle encouragement."

"Where do you think he is now?" asked Mary, desperately.

"Getting his traps ready for the 11.10 stage."

Miss Evelyn uttered a note of dismay. At that moment from the deeper darkness beyond came a figure, and then a voice saying, stiffly:

"Good evening, Miss Evelyn. How do you do, Miss Poynter? Professor, I saw your name on the register just now as I was paying my bill, and I couldn't go away without saying you."

"Would never have forgiven you if you had, and should have had all the trouble of going after you," said the professor, as he shook hands and drew the stern-looking young man into the light. "You're the most brilliant, promising fellow living, and also the most—absent-minded! You're not going to-night, Varbury, but some other night when we all go. And this is your date. I've been keeping it for you."

"My date—keep—Yum—"

Varbit.

"You know Miss Mary promised you a dinner, or did she owe you one?"

Varbit was speechless. "I've been giving Miss Mary the air of wisdom expressed from ten thousand years' experience, or twenty-five—it matters little—created in my strength. I didn't get it from Harvard, either. But as it's late, and thus the last date, and you're not in evening dress, you'd better take my place and sit at our table. Meanwhile Miss Evelyn and I will see that your traps are taken of the stage."

"How did you know they were there?" asked Varbit, recovering.

"Because Varbit's members else for them to be, and because romance, like history, repeats itself. I was a young, impatient—genius, Miss Mary—once myself, Varbit."

"Is it—"

"Is it—"

"The professor and Miss Evelyn had risen and were meeting off."

"I'll it now, Miss Mary—mine by proxy," said the professor, gently, "the one I've come back to claim."

"Then to Miss Evelyn he added, "Would that there had been some one to keep mine for me, Evelyn, so long ago."

"You've been kept by time and me," said Miss Evelyn, softly.

"And the shadows of the three swallowed them up."

Just Kerosene

The small town of Y— down on the Maine coast contains many quaint and interesting characters. The following incident occurred not long ago.

Mr. Brown was standing at the corner waiting for the electric car. It was a dark rainy night, and as the streets of Y— are unlighted many of the residents carry lanterns. So he was not surprised to see Miss Shaw approach with a small hand-lantern, and together they boarded the car.

They sat down beside a friend, who at once remarked: "Good evening Miss Shaw; I see you carry a lantern."

"Yes," replied Miss Shaw. "Father carried one all his life, and I suppose I always shall."

"That's heredity, isn't it?" laughingly asked the friend.

"Oh no!" promptly exclaimed Miss Shaw. "Only common kerosene."

The Flower

By Sarah P. McLean Greene

As old charwoman's hand,—
From which, for many a day,
The rusty coins had slipped
Unrugged, unloved, away,—
Held the stem of a single flower
As though here were a treasure furl'd!
And a wealth unmeasured,
To guard from a hostile world.

The flower was a sweet blush-rose,
Wet with the dew of morn;
The hand was wrinkled and old,
Spent in a strife forlorn.
But the flower bent to the hand
Its kisses moist and sweet,
And the old hand bore the flower
Safe through the poisonous street.

The hand was swift with toil;
The flower could know no stain,
The hand was seamed and scarred;
The flower could know no pain.
And the hand strained close the flower,
That rinsed back in ecstasy
The bliss of its crimson lips.
These were lovers strange to see!

They had a dream to themselves—
The one same dream had they—
Of the far-away days that part
In glory at close of day,
Where the muck of heart goes in,
And the faith of the dew-dew flower
Was the faith of the seared old hand,
That toiled—and waited the hour!

The Patriot Hymn

From "The Building of the Organ"

By Nathan Haskell Dole

Ore, Country, fair and grand,
Our glorious Fatherland,
Superb, star-crowned—
By Freedom's heroes fanned,
Firm in the mountain hand,
That guard on every hand
Thy sacred ground!

The children come to-day
A wreath of love to lay
Before thy feet,
In festival array,
With joyful hearts and gay,
Our homage pure we pay;
With song we meet!

In War's hard Wilderness,
With bitter storm and stress,
We're farried long,
Now Peace thy sons shall bless!
As on and up they press,
Freedom and Rightness
Shall make them strong!

Strong in the cause of Right
To aid the weak with might Born of the Truth;
Strong as the hosts of Light
Arrayed against the Night,
To put all wrong to flight
With zeal of Youth!

We are thy Sword and Shield!
To thee our all we yield
At thy Command,
But when War's wounds are healed,
In workshop and in field,
Our love is best revealed,
Dear Native Land!

GRAND PRIZE AWARDED TO
The Globe-Wernicke Co.
CINCINNATI, O.

See 871 in 12th Floor Direct Directory Street Code

Securing:
This Declaration

Official Award Ribbon
To Read:
The Globe-Wernicke Co.
For the Exhibition of 1892

Louisiana Purchase Exposition

Exhibition of 1892
St. Louis, Mo.

Tune of Awards

For the Exhibition of 1892
St. Louis, Mo.

CHICAGO 224-228 WABASH. BOSTON 91-93 FEDERAL.
NEW YORK 360-362 BROADWAY. LONDON 7 BUN HILL ROW.
CANADIAN FACTORY, STRATFORD, ONT.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
CINCINNATI

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
DOUBLY HONORED
AWARDED BOTH
GRAND PRIZE
GOLD MEDAL ON

Elastic Bookcases

Office Filing Cabinets

Card Index Equipment

Office Specialties

ADDRESS
DEPARTMENT E
FOR Catalog and List of Agents
List 100 Bookcases
Call 100 Filing Cabinets
Call 100 Card Index Supplies

I STAND FOR

No. 4711

THE No. 4711 EAU DE COLOGNE is an exquisite and refreshing perfume. Indispensable in the home and stock room.

ASK FOR "FORTY-SEVEN-ELEVEN"
Herr. Mithras, Cologne or a Ger.
Mithras & Co. Ltd. 100 Broadway, N.Y.
Read the list on sample bottle.

THE MAIDS OF PARADISE

Robert W. Chambers possesses, more than any other American novelist, the feeling and quality of romance. The present tale carries the reader into the heart of the Franco-Prussian war. The Boston Herald writes that "Mr. Chambers is a superb master of his art as a story-teller of romantic fiction." Another Boston paper calls this romance "a wide-awake book, with plenty of dash and crash in it and many tender passages." Indeed, this charming story is, to quote the Philadelphia North American, "the foremost of modern romances."

Illustrated by Castaigne. $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, N. Y.

turned home one evening with a rabbit in his pocket. Instead of putting him across her knee and working into his eighth commandment, she had said nothing, but that it seemed to be a fairly useful sort of rabbit, and had sent him out into the garden to pick onions. If she had done her duty by him then he would not have been in his present most unsatisfactory position, and she would still have had her nose. The fathers and mothers in the audience applauded, but the children, seating addition to precedent, looked glum. Maybe it is something of this kind the heroine is hinting at. Perhaps the problem has nothing to do with the heroine herself, but with the heroine's parents: what is the best way of bringing up a daughter who shows the slightest sign of developing a tendency towards a past? Can it be done by kindness? And, if not, how much?

Occasionally the parents attempt to solve the problem, so far as they are concerned, by dying young, shortly after the heroine's birth. No doubt they argue to themselves this is their only chance of avoiding future blame. But they do not get out of it so easily. "Ah, if I had only had a mother—or even a father!" cries the heroine. One feels how much it was of them to slip away as they did.

The fact remains, however, that they are dead, the deities thereof for dying, but beyond that it is difficult to hold them personally responsible for the heroine's subsequent misdeeds. The argument takes to itself new shape. Is it Fate that is to blame? The lady herself would seem to favor this suggestion. It has always been her Fate, she explains, to bring suffering and misery on those she loves. At first, according to her own account, she rebelled against her cruel Fate, possibly instigated (thereby) by the people that she loved. But of late she has come to accept this strange destiny of hers with touching resignation. It grieves her, when she thinks of it, that she is unable to induce those she loves with her own patient spirit. They seem to be a fateful little band.

Considered as a scapegoat, Fate, as compared with the father, has this advantage: it is always about; it cannot slip away and die before the real trouble begins; it cannot even plead a scientific head: it is there all the time. With only one exception it is for almost everything. The vexing thing about it is that it does not seem to retaliate being blamed. The victim make Fate feel small and mean. It affords no relief to our narrowed feelings to cry out indignantly to Fate: "Look here what you have done. Look at this sweet and well-proportioned lady, compelled to travel first class, and accompanied by an amount of luggage that must be a perpetual nightmare to her maid, from one fashionable European resort to another; existing on little more than a well-secured income of, apparently, five thousand a year, most of which has to go in to clothes; beloved by only the best people in the play; talked about by everybody incessantly to the exclusion of everybody else; all the neighbors interested in her and in nobody else except; all the women envying her; all the men fawning over one another after her—looks, in spite of all her worries, not a day older than twenty-three; and has discovered a dressmaker never yet known to have been an hour behind her promise!" And all your fault, young, Fate. Will nothing move you to shame?"

It brings no satisfaction with it, speaking out one's mind to Fate. We want to see him before us, the thing of flesh and blood that has brought all this upon her. Was it the early husband, or rather, the gentleman she thought was a husband? As a matter of fact he was a husband. Only he did not happen to be hers. That naturally reassured her. "Then who is my husband?" she seems to have said to herself. "I had a husband. I remember it distinctly. Difficult to know them apart from one another," says the lady with the past. "The way they dress them all alike nowadays. I suppose it does not really matter. They are much the same as one another when you get them home. Doesn't do to be too fancy."

She is a careless woman. She is always mistaking that early husband. And she has an unfortunate knack of finding him at the wrong moment. Perhaps that is the prob-

An Ideal
Holiday Gift

For the Home, the Club, the Bachelor's Den

Acker, Merrall & Condit Company's CELLARETTE

Delivered by freight. ALL CHARGES PREPAID, money railroad station in the United States, on receipt of the price,
$15.00

The above handsome CELLARETTE, with lock and key, contains twelve full-size bottles of wines and liquors especially bottled for and imported by us, as follows:

- | | |
|--|---|
| 1 BOTTLE CLARET
Chateau, Longmeade
W. & A. Gilbey 1 BOTTLE SAUTERNE
St. Cruz, Old in Bottle
W. & A. Gilbey's Bottling 1 BOTTLE BURGUNDY
Fouquet, Old in Bottle
W. & A. Gilbey's Bottling 1 BOTTLE INVALID PORT
A Fine Vintage Wine
Bottled by W. & A. Gilbey 1 BOTTLE SHERRY
3 Years old, Pale and Dry
Bottled by W. & A. Gilbey | 2 BOTTLES SCOTCH WHISKY
Strathmill Gold Top, The King's Whisky
W. & A. Gilbey
Absolutely Pure, Highly Recommended 2 BOTTLES RYE WHISKY
W. & A. C. CO. "Private Stock" (750)
The Finest Whisky, Selected Scotch 1 BOTTLE "PLYMOUTH GIN" Finest Gin Imported
Bottled by W. & A. Gilbey 1 BOTTLE COGNAC BRANDY
"An Old and Delicious Brandy" 1 BOTTLE "LIQUEUR" Cherry Whisky
The Most Perfect Liqueur |
|--|---|

Remit price, $15, by draft on New York, Post Office, Express Order, or Registered Mail, made payable to

Acker, Merrall & Condit Company, Dept. K, New York

CELLARETTE ON SALE AT ALL OUR BRANCHES

For Liebig
This Signature in Blue Guarantees
LIEBIG COMPANY'S
EXTRACT OF BEEF

Ask for LIEBIG COMPANY'S,
Not simply "LIEBIG'S"
"JUST AS GOODS" ARE WORTHLESS

Give the children
Whitman's
Chocolates
and Confections

Wholesome, Pure, delicious Sold where there are all the local grocers, confectioners & druggists

Made in England
and sold in Philadelphia
and
New York

THE ONLY SALESROOMS IN GREATER NEW YORK FOR
THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER PIANOS
PIANOS

ARE LOCATED IN THE SOHMER BUILDING
FIFTH AVENUE CORNER 224 STREET
THE "SOHMER" HEADS THE LISTS OF THE HIGHEST GRADE PIANOS

The True Henry Clay

By JOSEPH M. ROGERS

Mr. Rogers has made a lifetime study of Clay and his environment. He had access to all the private Clay papers now in the possession of the Clay family, who gave to him as well every assistance in the preparation of his work.

24 Illustrations, most of them from photographs made for the book. 12mo. Decorated cloth, $3.00 net; half morocco, $5.00 net. Postage 14 cents extra.

Diseases of Society

By G. FRANK LYDSTON, M.D.

The most direct, forceful, and outspoken study of social conditions in this country which has yet been put into print. Dr. Lydston considers not only the police criminal, the anarchist, and the sexual pervert, but also that vast number of offenders against the moral and physical laws whom the courts cannot reach. He deals with the oppressor of wealth, the rights and wrongs of organized capital and labor, the negro question and the crimes which have grown out of it, and with the offences of society at large.

Illustrated. 8vo. Cloth, $3.00 net. Postage 27 cents extra.

Modern Industrial Progress

By C. H. COCHRANE

Tells of the making of skyscrapers, of armor-plate, of the great guns, of the discovery and application of the principles of wireless telegraphy, etc.; in fact, it covers the whole field of industrial progress.

Over 400 Illustrations. 12mo. Cloth, $3.00 net. Postage extra.

Business

By L. DE V. MATTHEWMAN

"The book is full of suggestions to everybody who wants to do business in a businesslike way."—Chicago Tribune

Illustrated with 100 fine drawings and many smaller sketches by Tom Fleming. 3mo. Decorated cloth, $1.00 net. Postage 7 cents.

Baccarat

By FRANK DANBY

Author of "Pigs in Clover"

"The finished style and unforgettable story, the living characters and compact tale of the new book show it to be a work on which care and true have been expended. These dramatic thin but novel, it possesses in common with a story of deep and terrible human interest."—Chicago Tribune

See Illustrations to color. $1.50

Morganatic

By MAX NORDAU

Author of "Degeneration"

A story which teems with plot and counter-plot, love and intrigue. It touches upon life in court circles, intrigues and dramas at length the figures of a prince, a beautiful opera singer, and a poor and resolute American.

Cloth, $1.50

Olive Latham

A Russian Story

By E. L. VOYNICH, Author of "Jack Reymond" and "The Godly"

"A most remarkable study of life and character," says the Philadelphia Press.

Cloth, $1.50

The Challoners

By E. F. BENSON, Author of "Dodo"

"The Challoners" is the best thing he has done."—Chicago Record Herald.

Cloth, $1.50

New Samaria

By S. WEIR MITCHELL

"This little book contains two of the best short stories that Dr. Mitchell has ever written."—New York Outlook.

Illustrated. $1.25

Send for our free Holiday Book

PUBLISHERS J. B. LIPPINCOTT CO., PHILADELPHIA

Cats by the Way

By SARAH E. TRUEBLOOD

"Miss Trueblood has trained the gratitude of all cat lovers by her charming presentation of feline virtues, and her amiable confidence at feline vices."—Pittsburgh Courier

Illustrated. Same. Decorated cloth, $1.25 net. Postage, $1.25

Chronicles of Don Q

By K. and H. RICHARD

One of the best and most stirring stories of romantic adventure written in many a day. "Don Q" is a suave and easily handled, exclusive in life is fearless, and the chaos under the velvet feet with quickness flies.

Illustrated. Cloth, $1.50

Poketown People

By ELLA MIDDLETON TYBOUT

No one has succeeded so well in bringing out the humor of negro life in the form of interesting stories.

With Illustrations to color by Frank Verbeck and Joseph K. Moore. $1.50 less: What is a lady to do with a husband for whom she has no further use? It she gives him away he is sure to run like the clever dog that is sent in a hoop to the other end of the kingdom, and five days afterwards is found gnawing on the disaster. It is the lovers him in the middle of South Africa, and the rest of the luggage and all the debts, she must find it a certainty that on her return from honeymoon he will be the first to give her.

Her surprise at meeting his again is a little unreasonable. She seems to be under the impression that because she has forgotten him, he is for all practical purposes dead. "Why I forget all about him," she seems to be arguing to herself, "seven years ago at least. According to the laws of nature there ought to be nothing left of him but his still alive, and he knows it tells him he is a beast for leaving up at his sister's party, and sends to him for one last favor: that he will go away where neither she or anybody else of any importance will ever see him or hear of him again. That is all she asks of him. If he makes a point of it she will—though her costume is ill adapted to the evening—go down upon her knees to ask it of him.

He brutally retorts that he doesn't know where to "get." The lady travels round a good deal, and seems to be in most places. She accepts weekend invitations to the houses of his nearest relatives. She has married his first cousin, and is now getting up a house with the help of his present wife. How he is to avoid her he does not quite see. Perhaps, by the by, that is really the question: where is the early husband to disappear to? Even if every time he sees her coming he goes to duck under the table somebody would be sure to order it and make remarks. Ought he to take himself out one dark night, tie a brick round his neck, and throw himself into a pond? The most he is willing to do is to order even over to him; and the lady herself is too generous to do more than just let it at.

Maybe it is society that is to blame. There comes a luminous moment when it is suddenly revealed to the heroine of the problem play that it is society that is at the bottom of this thing. She has felt all along there was something the matter. Why has she never thought of it before? Here all these years has she been going about blaming her poor old father; her mother for dying too soon, the remarkable circumstances attending her girlhood, that dear old stupid husband she thought so bad; and all the while the really culpable party has been existing unperceived near her very nose. She clears away the furniture a bit, and tells society exactly what she thinks of it—she is always good at that telling people what she thinks of them. Other people's faults do not escape her, not for long. If society would only get out for a moment, and take stock of itself with her eyes, something might be done. If society, now that the thing has pointed out to it, has still any lingering desire to let it look at her. This, that she is, society has made her! Let society have a walk round her, and then go home and reflect.

It little a load from an, being the blame on society. There were periods in the play when we hardly knew what to think. The wretched father, the dead mother, the husband, that was difficult to grasp the fact that they alone were to blame, the fact there was something to be said for it then.

Caly thoughts would come out and that perhaps the heroine herself was not altogether irreproachable—that possibly there would have been less problem, if she had a little less about her character, a little less to do nothing all day long and be perfectly happy, she had pulled herself together, told herself that the world was not built exclusively for her, and ordered down to the existence of an ordinary decent woman.

Looking at the thing all round, that is perhaps the best solution of the problem. It is society that is to blame. We had better keep to that.

From The Four-Track News

ly, repaired the mouldering floor, and from that time they were no longer troubled—their one ghost was laid! Stern justice always compelled my aunt to admit to the sequel of the only night when she had "sapped on horrors," but I am certain it was a great service to her feelings.

I wonder how many of my readers have ever visited those old Medicean castles near Blois in France. Not all the sunshine of one of the loveliest February days I ever knew could dispel the gloom of "Chenouevaux," where lived Catherine de Medici and her famous astronomer, and if one wants legends and haunted rooms let one only go there for a day to find the most perfect "properties" a ghost ever required. Shortly before we were there the house had been full of guests—a private theatrical party—and so crowded was it the courier, a smiling young woman, told us that the haunted suite of rooms had to be given up to the service of the guests. Who, I wondered with an inward shiver, had been found red-blooded enough to sleep there? The rooms consisted of Catherine's bed and dressing room with a gallery overlooking the chapel, and a secret passage in the wall of her bedroom leads to the astronomer's gloomy apartment. The luxury of the room was chiefly in its size and loftiness; the bed was richly hung and of curious design; over it was a washing-stand with the quaint service on it, while the prie-dieu and dressing-table were rich and of the same gloomy tones as the hangings of the bed.

Catherine's prayer-book was there—cardinal trifles which seemed to bring her before us as a woman of every-day needs and occupations, not as the gloomy cruel creature of history—and here she is said at times to stalk abroad. How terrible must be those wanderings! In and out the shone-flagged corridor, into the chapel gallery, sometimes out down the long-reaching corridors that lead to the sumptuous rooms below. If any place were ever fitted for a ghost, assuredly it is that gloomy suite of rooms with their horribly suggestive air of recent occupation. Fancy being requested after a full to sleep there, and then conjure up what particular form the appearances might take across the great silent room while you laid in the horrible bed! The suggestiveness of the place so fascinated one of our party that riding back to Blois under a summerlike sky of stars and dew he insisted on relating the story of a homeless guest put into the room on St. Bartholomew's eve. The story is really too ghastly to give in detail; but briefly the visitor beheld the door of the chapel gallery open, and Catherine's figure appeared standing still and regarding fixedly and with dread written all over her face the

R. K. MUNKITTRICK

The poetry editor of Junia, in his New Year's number.

SAYS:

"THE TWENTIETH CENTURY LIMITED has a track of its own that stretches on at his feet and calls for him. From the old money flow, and the man who shows his hand to fit on the TWENTIETH CENTURY LIMITED makes enough by the operation to buy money not only to buy but to burn. The TWENTIETH CENTURY LIMITED is an air ship on tracks. In fact, it is all wings, and, as time moves, the tracker plunges between New York and Chicago as if it were a bird. In riding this man that he can fly back without fear as with such and a very addition of each and every wheel. Any man of ordinary discrimination would prefer the TWENTIETH CENTURY LIMITED to the American Express, known as an air-ship, for the reason that, like the European Express, it is not a track but a trackless airship, and it is simply a gliding hammock swinging between New York and Chicago."

Copyright, 1903, by R. K. Munkittrick. Published by the New York Central.

How a

Thousand Dollars
Made a Million

An Illustrated Booklet

on sale at 25c. per copy

Sent Absolutely Free to Anybody addressing

W. G. Vanderbilt,
No. 110 WILLIAM ST.,
New York City.

The Jumping Frog

By MARK TWAIN

This story first brought Mark Twain into prominence as a humorist. It had instant recognition as a notable piece of humorous fiction, and has remained a general favorite amid all the author's later work. The story of the "Jumping Frog" is now published as a book, with translation from the French and new addition by the author written in November of 1903.

Humorously Illustrated with Twelve Full-page Drawings by Strothman

Crown 8vo, Ornamented Cloth, $1.00

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

ever, unquestioned, and the wall being filled in, the staircase was restored, and no more was ever heard of the ghost, though to this day it is spoken of as a haunted house, the neighbors, I suppose, not liking to lose so valuable a local tradition.

His Prayer

Mrs. GERTRUDE ATHERTON, the authoress, tells of the tribulations of a friend in New York, who is the mother of a particularly mischievous boy of some seven years.

"One evening recently," says Mrs. Atherton, "when the mother was getting the boy ready for bed after what she termed 'a day of unmitigated outrageousness' on the part of her hopeful, she said to him:

"Now when you say your prayers to-night, Richard, remember to ask God to make you a better boy. You have certainly been bad to-day."

Accordingly, the youngster began his petitions to the Almighty in the usual form, before closing with the customary "Amen," he added:

"And please, God, make me a better boy."

Then he paused a moment, and, to the utter consternation of the long-suffering mother, he concluded his prayer with unabated gravity:

"Nevertheless, not my will, oh, Lord, but Thine be done."

At the Bar

ALBERT P. MASSEY, attorney, tells of a stuttering man named Niscom who was arraigned before a police magistrate.

"What is your name?" asked the magistrate.

"N-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s," began the prisoner, and then stopped.

"What's that?" demanded the magistrate.

"N-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s," hissed the stutterer.

"His name's Niscom," interrupted the policeman who had made the arrest. "He stutters."

"So it seems," said the magistrate.

"What's he charged with?"

"I don't know, your Honor," said the policeman. "It seems to be soda-water."

A Villain

A NUMBER of professional men gathered at the Art Club in Philadelphia a few days ago were exchanging reminiscences of Edwin Forrest, the great tragedian. One of them told the story of Forrest's experience in the West, but also a tribute to the art of the actor.

The play was "Virginia," and Forrest was at his best. In the scene where he plays his daughter, the audience was almost stricken with awe, and not a sound was heard until the scene was concluded, after which the artist was greeted with overwhelming applause. In the following act, however, comes in the stage looking worn and distracted. The reaction has set in, he is frenzied over the loss of his daughter, and he walks up and down, crying out, "Virginia, Virginia, where is my child."

As old miser, who occupied a front row in the orchestra, and who had been terribly wrought up by the murder scene, could stand this no longer, and, arising in his place, shouted out in loud tones, freighted with insinuating indignation:

"Why, you old villain, you killed her in the market-house in the last act. You know it well enough. You are a hypocrite, as well as a villain."

The laughter and applause that greeted this unexpected turn in the performance made it necessary to bring down the curtain.

GOLD SEAL CHAMPAGNE
Special Dry-Brut
CORKED UP SUNSHINE
FROM AMERICA'S MOST FAMOUS VINYARDS
...the sparkling bead
and aroma possessed by no other Wine
J. B. WINE COMPANY
U.S.A. N.Y.
SOLD BY ALL LEADING GROCERS AND WINE MERCHANTS.

Bird Center Etiquette (a card game)

"A BIRD CENTER PARTY"

The Artistic and Social Hit of a Decade

Every Card from Original Drawings by the World's Greatest Cartoonist—McCutcheon.

Truly a Volcano of Excitement and Laughter

As a first-maker at informal parties every card is worth its weight in gold. Learned in a minute.

50c AT ALL DEALERS OR 50c POSTAGE PREPAID.
HOME GAME CO., Dearborn St., CHICAGO.

Also Makers of the Great Game BUNCO 50c at All Dealers or Prepaid

6 FINE SOUVENIR TEASPOONS $1.50

One of the most pleasing souvenirs of the World's Fair, St. Louis, is the set of Six Full Size Teaspoons, made specially to order for the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway by the Onoda Company. Each bowl contains engraving of a different World's Fair Building, and the handles are handsomely engraved. They are of best material, finely finished, unbreakable in rich and durable. The spoons are fully guaranteed, thoroughly serviceable for every day use, if desired, and will last for years. Do not fail to order a set. The spoons will please you.

For Christmas A set of these spoons makes an appropriate and a very pleasing Christmas gift, either for children or grown folks.

HOW TO ORDER: Write and we will send you, promptly, in return, a set of six spoons for $1.50 in the Onoda Company, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

For comfortable travel between Chicago and Cleveland, Buffalo, St. Louis, New York and Boston are the Lake Shore. It affords the most complete service. Route of the fast "Lackawanna Limited," "Pan-American Tourist" and "International" above named over this road write to J. SMITH, G. P. & T. A., Cleveland, Ohio.

Los Angeles—Four Days from New York or Boston—By New York Central.

To California

Golden State Limited

Daily CHICAGO, ST. LOUIS and KANSAS CITY
To LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA and SAN FRANCISCO

Begins December 25

Third season of the most luxuriously equipped train in the world. Everything to make you comfortable. Buffet, Dining, Observation and Pullman cars fresh from the builder.

Runs via El Paso and Southern Pacific through New Mexico. Most southerly course of any transcontinental route—line of easiest grades and lowest altitudes. Every mile is a mile away from winter.

Quick schedule. Leaves Chicago 8.00 p. m., St. Louis 9.30 p. m., Kansas City 10.40 a. m., arrives Los Angeles 2.45 p. m. third day after.

Sunny California is not far away. On Golden State Limited the distance is measured by hours, not miles. You can play golf, climb mountains, ride, or enjoy sea-bathing there all winter long. Hotels are excellent, living expenses are not high, the railroad rate is low and the trip is easy and restful. Go for health, for rest, for change of scene and new experiences, and the grand good time you are sure to have.

Reserve berths now. Information and beautifully illustrated booklet on request.

JNO. SEBASTIAN
Passenger Traffic Manager
Chicago

Three of a Kind

The Southwest Limited between Chicago and Kansas City—The Pioneer Limited between Chicago, St. Paul and Minneapolis—The Overland Limited between Chicago, Omaha and San Francisco—via the

Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway

On your next trip, why not go west by one of these famous trains and return by another? Choice of routes is permitted.

As this railway owns and operates its own sleeping, dining, library and other cars, it offers to travelers on these trains an excellence in service and equipment not obtainable elsewhere.

Information regarding rates, routes and train service furnished upon request.

F. A. MILLER,
General Passenger Agent,
CHICAGO.

W. S. HOWELL,
General Eastern Agent,
381 Broadway, NEW YORK.

For nearly a century this trade-mark has been famous In Havana and has always represented the finest quality of cigars ever made In Cuba

These cigars are the best cigars that are now made In Cuba.
 They have been sold almost exclusively in Spain and England on account of their extremely fine quality and straight shape.

They are now offered to American smokers and have been given these new grading names to identify them in size and price.

No better cigars can be made, as only the choicest tobacco, the ripest, most mature and sweetest leaf is used In making them.

The straight shape is the original and best shape, as it burns better, draws more evenly and gives you more tobacco to smoke than the pointed shape. "Smoke them slowly, as you would sip old wine."

The darker colors are the most to be desired, as they smoke sweeter and mellow. "A light wrapper does not make a mild cigar!"

These statements are responsibly made and can be verified—and all discriminating smokers of Havana cigars will be gratified to know that cigars of this highest quality, finest workmanship and choicest leaf can now be obtained from the leading dealers in the United States.

A. de VILLAR Y VILLAR, CALLE DE LA INDUSTRIA, No. 174

Havana, Cuba

HAVANA TOBACCO COMPANY, 111 Fifth Ave., New York

General Selling Agents for the United States

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER & BROTHERS

NEW YORK

THE CASTLE COMEDY BY THOMPSON BUCHANAN

An engaging story, woven along comedy lines, of the time of Napoleon. The wealth in it which the story is told, the dashing splendour of the life, and the charm of the dramatic combine with the beauty of the action to make it one well calculated as a Christmas gift.

With Illustrations in Color and Map. Decorations by Eliza Beth Shippen Green. Crown Edition, 64 pp., 10 illus., $1.00 net.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

THE LUXURY OF CHILDREN BY E. S. MARTIN

With a great charm and humor akin to that of Charles Lamb, Mr. Martin has written a series of essays which have to do with the many sweet, loving phases of child-life in the home. The book will delight all fathers and mothers. Its quiet good-humor and charming style make it a beautiful tribute to home life.

With Eight Illustrations in Color and Marginal Decorations in Tint by Sarah S. Stilwell. Square 8vo., 46 illus., $1.75 net.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Harper's Magazine

For 1905

"The influence which the Harper periodicals have exercised in every channel of improving thought and achievement can scarcely be measured. It has flowed continuously on, over vast areas, among millions of people, learned and unlearned, upon all of whom it has acted as an elevating, refining force."—Philadelphia Ledger.

§ In its special articles it will maintain its own high literary standard, avoiding such subjects as politics, crime, war news, expatriation, and everything of merely temporary newspaper interest.

§ It will print at least seven short stories in every number.

§ It will present authoritative articles, covering every important field of human activity, going to original sources for its studies. The greatest scientists will treat of new discoveries in science; great historians will write on history, and at first hand will come accounts of discovery, travel, archaeology, etc., nature, literature, language, etc.

§ It will avoid publishing more than one serial novel at a time.

§ It will have pictures in color in every number.

The Slave-Trade of To-Day

THE traffic in human beings—their sale into slavery—is still being carried on in Africa to-day. It has been stated that this trade is controlled at various African powers, and that organized companies secretly conducting it are backed by European capital.

In order to bring to light the truth concerning this slave-trade of to-day, Harper's Magazine has sent to Africa an expedition under one of the best-known of English travelers and war correspondents, a man of wide experience and a brilliant writer. He will make a thorough personal investigation of conditions, see for himself, and tell the truth. The revolution process such.

Henry James in America

Mr. James has just returned to this country after an absence of over twenty years. He has come to America to write, in his remarkable way, of American people and places for Harper's MAGAZINE.

W. D. Howells in England

While Mr. James is rediscovering this country, Mr. Howells will be investigating in England for the MAGAZINE, and will write of things English as he finds them to-day—of English places, life, manners, and people.

Travel and Discovery

THE articles of travel and discovery will come at first hand from travelers and explorers representing the MAGAZINE in every part of the world. Thomas A. Janvier will travel through Mexico for the MAGAZINE and write of people and places. Norman Dunson will write of some little-known types and places in out-of-the-way corners of the South. James R. Connelley will write of some of our great American harbors and rivers and of fishing under the midnight sun. The French expedition to the South Pole under Dr. Charcot is expected to return in the spring. The first account of its adventures will appear in Harper's MAGAZINE. Charles W. Furlong, the artist and writer, has just come back from a trip of unusual interest through Northern Africa. He will tell in articles illustrated by himself, of some discoveries of peculiar interest.

Booth Tarkington's Novel

FOLLOWING Mrs. Humphry Ward's "The Marriage of William Ash," there will be a new novel of American life by Booth Tarkington, author of "The Gentleman from Indiana," "Cherry," "Monsieur Beaucaire." Later will come great serial novels by Maurice Hewlett and Sir Gilbert Parker.

Mark Twain, W. D. Howells, Henry James

MARK TWAIN, who writes only for Harper's, is now engaged upon a group of important new stories for the MAGAZINE. In this connection it may be mentioned that by special arrangement several of the foremost living American authors, in addition to Mr. Clemens, will write only for Harper's during the coming year. Among them are William Dean Howells, Thomas A. Janvier, and Henry James.

Short Stories

HARPER'S MAGAZINE prints each month more short stories and more of finer literary texture than any other illustrated magazine in the world. There will be at least seven complete stories in each number of the MAGAZINE for 1905.

Pictures

PICTURES in color and tint will be a feature of each number. Many of the world's most distinguished artists, including Edwin Abbey, Howard Pyle, Elizabeth Shippen Green, and W. D. Stevens, will work exclusively for Harper's.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Illustration of a globe with a hand pointing to it, surrounded by various symbols of civilization and progress.

Vol. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, December 17, 1904

No. 2994

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

GENERAL-ADJUTANT A. M. STOESEL, THE RUSSIAN COMMANDER AT PORT ARTHUR

General Stoessel's defense of the Russian stronghold at Port Arthur from the continuous assaults on land and sea by the Japanese is one of the most remarkable military achievements of its kind in history

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2504

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 17, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 43 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

THE newspapers generally regard as significant President ROOSEVELT's total omission of reference to the tariff in his long message. Far more significant and to the point is the fact, as we are informed upon good authority, that the message as originally prepared and given to the press associations contained a statement to the effect that at a subsequent date the Chief Magistrate would communicate with Congress respecting changes in tariff schedules. The line was taken out in final revision. Why, we can only surmise. But the fact that it was written at all shows that the general impression that the President considers a revision of the tariff desirable and that he himself favors it is well founded. That being the case, we may confidently anticipate a vigorous special message at such a time as the President may deem suitable. He is no shirker of responsibilities, and when once his hand is placed upon the plough he never turns back. We regard as inevitable a struggle of no mean magnitude between the President and the representatives of special interests in Congress, and when it comes the country will be with the President. The outcome no man can foresee. The protected interests and their spokesmen, especially in the Senate, are strongly intrenched and have great power, but so have the President and the people. In one respect Mr. ROOSEVELT signally weakened his own authority by declaring that under no circumstances would he become a candidate for reelection. He would have done better, tactically speaking, to have held that possible popular candidacy over the heads of the Bourbon. As it is, they will almost certainly adopt a policy of hindrance and delay, hoping to be able to fight off attacks upon their pet citadel for four years, and then get a President less popular with the people and more amenable to the demands of the great gold Protection. But we shall see.

During the two weeks preceding the re-assembling of the Fifty-ninth Congress on December 5, a marked change was observable in the prospect of an early readjustment of the tariff. Before the leaders of the Republican party in the Senate and House of Representatives reached Washington, the tariff-revisionists asserted that Mr. ROOSEVELT had avowed himself a convert to their views, and was inclined to call an extra session of the Fifty-ninth Congress soon after March 4, 1905, for the purpose of adopting certain schedules to alleged modifications of industrial conditions. The truth seems to be that the President had an open mind upon the subject; that he was deeply impressed by the election of a Democratic Governor in Massachusetts; and that he was willing to listen attentively to what the advocates of tariff revision had to say; pointing out, however, that he should come to no definite conclusion until he had heard the other side. When it came to the turn of the "stand-patters" to present their side of the case, they made up in vigor for what they lacked in promptitude. Senator HALE, for his part, did not hesitate to declare himself firmly opposed to any tinkering whatever with the tariff, either at an extra session or at a regular session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, or at any time during the next Presidential term. He thought that if there had been any pivotal issue in the campaign just concluded, it was the issue of tariff revision, and he submitted that the people's mandate concerning it had been unequivocal and peremptory. A pronouncement substantially identical was made by Speaker CANNON, who is, we scarcely need to say, the most influential single person in the Federal government, next to the President himself.

Senators ALBRIGHT, ALLISON, PLATT of Connecticut, and SPOONER, who constitute the so-called "Big Four" of the Upper House, are said to be quite as adverse as their colleagues from Maine to any rearrangement of the existing custom duties at an extra session of Congress. They are too shrewd to set themselves openly against a popular demand for tariff revision, if such a thing exists, which they take leave to doubt, but they hold that a readjustment should in no case be made before the first regular session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, which begins early in December, 1905, and that even then it should be confined to a few schedules, and that the changes made therein should be such as to cause the least possible disturbance of business conditions. Which those schedules are may be predicted if we are correctly informed as to the conclusions reached by Secretary of the Treasury SISKIE after his consultation in New York on November 20 with the tariff experts on the Board of United States General Appraisers. We are told that if his plan is followed, the first schedule to be considered will be that covering hides and leather, and that the next will be the woollen schedule. The administration is convinced that Mr. DUFFEL was clerical mismanagement of Massachusetts owing largely to the dissatisfaction of the shoe-making and woollen industries of that Commonwealth with the tariff on their raw materials. It follows that if the Republican party is to regain control of that State, it must assent to an amendment of the DUFFEL tariff providing for the admission of hides free of duty, and for a signal reduction, if not abolition, of the tax on wool.

As Secretary SISKIE, however, conceals, apparently, with the Republican leaders, above named, in the House and Senate in objecting to the readjustment even of these two schedules at an extra session, it looks doubtful whether the readjustment will take place at all during the next Presidential term. When the regular session of the Fifty-ninth Congress begins, the "stand-patters" will have at their command an argument which they do not now possess. They will then be able to assert that if tariff revision is put off until the spring of 1906—and if it is not brought forward in the form of a bill before December, 1905, it is unlikely to be enacted much before March of the following year—it will exercise a disorganizing effect on the Republican rank and file in the elections for the House of Representatives two years hence. There is undoubtedly some ground for such a prediction. The McKinley tariff, which became a law in 1891, cost the Republicans a serious reverse at the Congressional election held in November of that year. There is no doubt that the precedent is calculated to alarm the ordinary politician, though it would not be difficult to show that the situations are by no means precisely analogous.

It seems to us that Mr. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, the leader of the Democratic minority in the House of Representatives, was on a wrong scent when in the speech which he made at Spartanburg, South Carolina, on December 2, he recommended a policy of passive resistance by the South in the event of the Republican party reducing representation in the Southern States and refusing to make a like reduction in the North, East, and West. It is, in our opinion, in spite of the bill introduced in the Senate on December 7 by Senator PLATT of New York, a man of straw at which Mr. WILLIAMS has aimed his gun. No doubt the platform framed by the Republican national convention at Chicago contained a clause advocating the enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution, which provides that, when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the electors or judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Leg-lature thereof, is denied to any of the male members of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State. As a matter of fact, however, scarcely anything was heard of this plank during the campaign, and we therefore deem Mr. WILLIAMS mistaken when, analyzing the reasons for the defeat of the Democratic party, he finds a potent cause of the phenomenon in the "popularity" of the proposal to curb the growing South by cutting down its representation in Congress and in the electoral colleges. Now, indeed, that official returns have been received from a large majority of the States, it is demonstrable that the Republican victory was one-fourth due to Mr. ROOSEVELT's personal popularity, while nearly three-fourths of it were owing to the refusal of Democrats to vote for their party candidate. The figures show that ROOSEVELT's gain over McKINLEY's vote in 1900 was only 481,000, while PARKER's vote fell short of BELLEVILLE's by about 1,378,000. Of the deserters from the Democratic camp some went to ROOSEVELT, but the majority manifestly voted for the Socialist or Populist candidates, or refrained from voting at all.

Another proof that the term "popular" cannot fairly be ascribed to any issue in the late campaign, except so far as Mr. ROOSEVELT's personality was an issue, is the indisputable fact that the people took very much less interest in the election this year than they did eight years ago. Had the interest been equal, the total vote cast for ROOSEVELT and PARKER ought—owing to the increase of population—to have been larger by more than two millions than the vote cast for McKINLEY and BELLEVILLE in 1900, which itself was two millions greater than the combined vote thrown for CLEVELAND, HUBBARD, and WEAVER only four years before. The surprising truth is that the combined vote for ROOSEVELT and PARKER is but 12,527,000, or nearly 800,000 less than the combined vote of McKINLEY and BELLEVILLE in 1900.

The wisdom of sending Secretary-of-War TAYLOR to the isthmus for the purpose of allaying the friction that had arisen between the Republic of Panama and the Canal Commission has been quickly demonstrated. With the approval of President ROOSEVELT, an executive order has been issued by Mr. TAYLOR, and accepted by President AVASTOS of Panama, whereby the isthmian republic secures fixed resources which were withheld by the commission. According to this pact, the text of which is before us, no imported merchandise is to enter the ports of Ancon or Cristobal, the terminals of the canal, except such as is in transit or is required for use in the canal zone. Excepted also are coal and crude mineral oil intended to be sold for fuel purposes, in the harbors named, to seagoing vessels. The executive order is not to become operative until the Republic of Panama shall have put into effect the gold standard, shall have reduced her tariff from fifteen per cent. of ad valorem to ten per cent. on all goods except wines, liquors, alcohol, and opium, and shall have lowered her consular fees and port charges to sixty per cent. of the rates now charged. Panama also agrees to reduce her rate of postage to two cents, and the zone authorities are to be permitted to purchase stamps from the republic at forty per cent. of their face value. It is further stipulated that no import duties or charges of any kind shall be imposed by the authorities of the canal zone upon merchandise coming from the Republic of Panama into the zone. It is well known that hitherto commodities entering the zone from Panama have been constrained to pay the duties levied by the Dixie tariff. This executive order is, of course, subject to the approval of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and it is possible that the abrogation of the Dixie duties in the canal zone will not be sanctioned.

There is a delightful anecdote about Congressman LITTAUER. He sees things as they are, and as they are supposed to be. Expounding the Senatorial situation in this State in a newspaper interview, he is quoted as saying:

Of course Governor ORRILL and his friends will control the Legislature. The people of the State desire that they do so.

Do they? Do the people of the State desire that Governor ORRILL and his friends shall control the Legislature? Nothing in the State Constitution warrants that deduction from the recent election, but Congressman LITTAUER is a practical man. Again, to a question about Governor ORRILL's reported statement that the Legislature would do as he wished since the Senatorship, Mr. LITTAUER is quoted as saying:

I do not know that he has made such a statement. But why should it not do so? Senator PLATT and Mr. ORRILL agreed on the election of Mr. DERRICK to the Senate, and why should they not agree again?

No reason suggests itself to his mind why the Legislature of New York should not do whatever its bosses agree to have done. The conception of a Legislature chosen for any other purpose than to record the decree of its masters in such a matter as electing a Senator has not penetrated his intelligence, doubtless for the reason that his experience of native politics does not include knowledge of a New York Legislature that had any independent volition in such a matter.

The simplicity of Mr. LITTAUER's mind, thus disclosed, helps to account for the trouble he got into about his glove contrabands. It was never quite apparent that he had any deliberate intention of beavinking the law by trading with the government while he was a member of Congress. It seems delicious enough that while conscious that the law was in his way, he took the practical man's view of it as a thing to take good legal advice about, and to get around in whatever decent, practical fashion was customary. When it appeared that, owing to unforeseen complications, his business dealings with the government seemed to have violated the statute in spite of his precautions, and he was obliged to plead the Statute of Limitations, we have no doubt he experienced all the emotions of surprise and grief which are sincerely proper to injured innocence. He is a delightful character, direct, candid, and simple. He sees things just as they are. Facts don't embarrass him in the least—except sometimes when they are totally unexpected—but he is likely to get into false positions from a lack of imagination which disqualifies him from forming conceptions of the theoretical aims of constitutions and of laws. Senator PLATT is more imaginative. He can realize, against any amount of experience, that State legislators are supposed actually to choose Senators, and that statutes are supposed to be obeyed, not evaded. There are some things the ORRILL crowd can learn from the venerable PLATT. He was trained in another school than they were, and there are some things in his philosophy that they do not seem able to comprehend.

One may be an admirable man of letters and a shrewd politician, yet a very poor lawyer, or, in fact, no lawyer at all. Secretary HAY has lately been reminded that literary may be distinguished sharply from legal attainments. From a historical point of view, there was ample justification for his order directing our diplomatic and consular representatives abroad to describe themselves officially as "American" ambassadors, ministers, envoys, etc. Language is a matter not of geographical verity, but of usage. According to custom, which makes linguistic law, it is as proper to apply the term "American" to inhabitants of the United States of America as it is to call the New World, not after COLUMBUS, the discoverer, but after AMERICA VESPUTI. From the dates of the first English settlements at Jamestown and Plymouth, throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries up to the treaty of peace (1783), whereby the independence of the thirteen British colonies was acknowledged by the mother country, the inhabitants of those colonies were invariably spoken of in England as "Americans," as distinguished from the subjects of France in the New World, who were called Acadians or Canadians or Louisianians; and from the subjects of Spain, who were spoken of collectively as Spanish-Americans. The usage was so deep-rooted and widespread in Great Britain that it survived our Revolutionary war, and Sir EDWARD CLARKE is one of the few living Englishmen who would dream of departing from an age-long custom on the pedantic ground that, as a matter of geographical and political fact, the republic, which terms itself in its Constitution the "United States of America," does not comprise the whole of the New World, or even the greater part of North America.

While, however, it would be perfectly proper for the British Foreign Office to order its agents, when writing or speaking to or of United States officials, to describe them as "American"—because there exists no British statute to the contrary—our own Secretary of State, had he been a lawyer, would have recognized that he did not possess the same authority. The offices of ambassador, minister, consul, etc., are created by acts of Congress, and the adjective by which they are designated in the statutes happens to be not "American," but "United States." It is therefore obvious that in signing treaties, or in executing legal instruments, or in signing receipts for salaries, our diplomatic and consular representatives must employ the term used in the statutes by virtue of which they are empowered to exercise specified functions and draw pay. In other words, it is not for the Secretary of State, who, constitutionally, is simply one of the Chief Magistrate's clerks, but for Congress, acting in its lawmaking capacity, to declare that, wherever, in Federal statutes, relating to our diplomatic and consular service, the adjective "United States" is used, the term "American" shall be substituted. Appreciating the soundness of this principle when it was called to his attention by certain New York lawyers, Secretary Hay has issued a supplementary Executive order to the effect that, when acting in a notarial capacity, consular officers shall describe themselves by their official titles, as fixed by the statutes of the United States, and of the respective States in which the instruments are to be used. That is to say, officially they are still "United States" consuls.

On the face of the papers, there appears to be no possibility of reconciling a decision of the New York Court of Appeals in a matter of the utmost interest to capital and labor with a judgment of the United States Supreme Court. The former tribunal has more than once pronounced unconstitutional the law of the Empire State prohibiting contractors who make contracts with that commonwealth, or with any of its cities or counties, from exacting more than eight hours' work a day from their employees. Three of the judges composing the court rested their decision on the ground that the law named violated the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution, which provides that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. An appeal has been taken from this decision to the United States Supreme Court, and it looks as if the appellants could not fail to be successful, in view of the decision rendered by the highest Federal tribunal in a case involving the validity of a Kansas eight-hour statute. The constitutionality of this statute was challenged on the ground just mentioned, that it violated the Fourteenth Amendment. The Kansas law, nevertheless, was adjudged constitutional by a majority of the court, only three justices dissenting. Justice HUNAY, who read the opinion in which the majority concurred, said that he could imagine no possible ground for disputing the power of the State to declare that no one undertaking work for it, or for one of its municipal agencies, should permit or require an employee on such work to labor in excess of eight hours of the day, and to inflict punishment upon contractors who should disregard such a regulation. Justice HUNAY went on to declare that it cannot be deemed a part of the liberty of any contractor that he be allowed to do public work in any mode he may choose to adopt without regard to the wishes of the State. He held, on the contrary, that it belongs to the State, as guardian and trustee for its people, to prescribe the conditions on which it will permit public work to be done. In a word, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking by the mouth of Justice HUNAY, laid down the principle that no one is entitled of absolute right, and as a part of his liberty, to perform labor for the State, and no contractor for public work can excuse a violation of his lawful agreement with the State by doing that which the statutes under which he proceeds distinctly forbid him to do.

Defending the Americans against criticism for using strange words, the London Chronicle says: "If he wants to say 'plurality' instead of 'majority,' why in the name of the Declaration of Independence should he not have his way?" Nobody said, but some better on elections should explain to the Chronicle that "plurality" and "majority" seldom mean the same thing in American elections, and that when an American says "plurality," he usually means what he says and no more.

General CHAFFER in his annual report laments that 523 soldiers deserted from our army last year. He could have no better reason for desertions than that the men found the service unlike what they expected, but he suggests with much delicacy that too many given officers may have something to do with their disappointment. He says:

While I failed to find anything in the administrative action of company officers to account for the large number of desertions, I believe it to be a fact that much inexperience, as now, in command of companies, affects the subject somewhat. Character, habits, aptitude differ widely among men upon entering the army, and it is the skill of the experienced officer, with his intelligent sympathy, his counsel and admonition, rather than rigid mechanical enforcement of the articles of war for mere faults, that best harmonizes their varying elements and secures contentment of young soldiers in companies and the service.

Efficient soldiers can be made out of likely recruits in a short time, but the process of hatching out competent and successful officers is much slower, even when the raw material is pretty good. It is rather flattering to the conditions that prevail in industrial life in this country that so many recruits dislike the military service. But they certainly ought to serve their time of enlistment whether they like it or not. General CHAFFER favors heavier penalties for desertion, and suggests that deserters shall be disfranchised.

Why don't our young men like better to be private soldiers in time of peace? Our army, as Secretary TART says, is the best-fed, best-paid, best-dressed, and best-sheltered in the world, yet one out of ten of our soldiers deserted last year. No doubt, as General CHAFFER suggests, experienced and considerate officers, if there were enough of them, could make army life more acceptable to the men, and reduce the number of desertions. But the real trouble is that military service in the ranks in time of peace is not attractive to many men who are sound in body and mind and competent to take care of themselves. The soldier's wages are low, his liberty is necessarily restricted, he is not his own master, and may not choose who his master shall be. The W. C. T. U. ladies intend him from such moderate solace as he might find in post-exchange beer. Our aspiring youths find that they can make more money and have more fun outside of the army than in it. The army asks for men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five years, of good character and temperate habits, able-bodied, free from disease, and able to speak, read, and write the English language. It offers to feed and clothe such men and pay them thirteen dollars a month for service in the United States, and fourteen dollars and sixty cents for service outside of the country. A competent and responsible man may become a non-commissioned officer and get considerably more pay, and the way is left open for colored men to win commissions if they can qualify themselves for so much promotion. But the average private soldier cannot get ahead in the world. He cannot marry a wife, raise a family, or make a home. From the chief of the reasonable considerations of existence he is debarred. If he can't take care of himself, the army may be an excellent place for him. If he is competent and responsible, he is likely to feel, as the rest of us do, that the army is a good place for some one else. The great number of desertions implies that many of the recruits are irresponsible. That is much to be regretted, but it is not surprising. As an institution for dealing with irresponsible men and helping them in order and making them earn their living, the army has great advantages. Perhaps our minds ought to dwell more on its usefulness in retaining the large proportion of recruits that it does retain, and less of its bad luck in losing so many by desertion.

Governor-elect DOWLEY of Massachusetts has proposed to General MILES to return to public life as adjutant-general of the Massachusetts militia and a member of his military staff, and General MILES has accepted. It is an interesting appointment. Nobody will dispute General MILES's competence to look after the Bay State militia and promote its efficiency, nor will anybody deny that a hardy and brave veteran in the uniform of a lieutenant-general will be a gorgeous embellishment to Governor DOWLEY's staff. General MILES is a vigorous man with plenty of work in him. His appointment, and his acceptance of it, are both good precedents. If Governor DOUGLAS appoints General WILLIAM A. KOME inspector-general on his staff, as he may, Massachusetts will acquire the services of another highly accomplished officer.

If the President assigns General MILES to duty on Governor DOUGLAS'S staff, General MILES will draw the full pay of his rank ($41,000), besides $5,000 from the State of Massachusetts. If the President does not assign him to this duty, General MILES may still join the staff and draw the State salary in addition to his pay ($8,250) as a retired officer. It is therefore worth $5,750 a year to General MILES to have the President make the assignment, as Governor DOUGLAS will request him to do. What will the President do? Make your bet, gentlemen! For our part, as taxpayers, we do not object to General MILES getting the extra $5,750. An income of $41,000 is not too much for him.

By a vote of four to three the Kentucky Court of Appeals has granted a new trial to CALVIN POWERS. It will be his fourth. Each trial resulted in conviction. The first two times he was sentenced to imprisonment for life; the third time the sentence was death. POWERS was shot on February 3, 1899, nearly five years ago. There has been time for the excitement that came of the murder to wear off. So it has, no doubt, but impressions have deepened into convictions, and every man available for jury duty in Kentucky is probably convinced, one way or the other, as to POWERS'S guilt.

At the hour when we write, we have not learned the fate of the petition for constitutional reforms addressed to the Czar by over a hundred delegates from the zemstvos, or provincial and district councils. A not improbable report is current that if the Russian sovereign decides to grant the petition wholly or in part, a ukase to that effect will be issued in the event of a severe Russian reverse, in order to buoy up the spirits of the people, or else after the announcement of a great victory or of the conclusion of a peace. If precedents may be trusted, ukases are much more likely to be made by way of consolation for defeat than in an hour of triumph. Precedents, however, may not be followed, if it be true, as is alleged on what seems good authority, that the new Minister of the Interior was authorized beforehand by NICHOLAS II. to convoke delegates from the zemstvos at St. Petersburg, and that most of the constitutional changes advocated in the petition had received in advance the approval of the Czar. As we have formerly pointed out, it seemed on the face of things improbable that such a step would have been taken by the minister without the knowledge and consent of his sovereign, for there is in Russia a law which makes the discussion of constitutional reforms a penal offense. According to the latest information, the petition has been handed by the Czar to the Imperial Council, with instructions to report upon the proposals submitted.

It is said that NICHOLAS II. has already indicated his determination to grant four of the requests. That is to say, he has made up his mind that hereafter there shall be perfect freedom of the press in Russia; that freedom of conscience shall be henceforth perfect—change of great moment to Jews, Catholics, and seceders from the orthodox national Church; that, for the impartial rendering of justice, judges shall be irremovable, as they are in England; and, lastly, that the Russian people shall have a voice in the lawmaking of the country. Whether they will be directly represented in a national Parliament, or whether that body will consist of delegates from the zemstvos, is not known. Upon one point, we are told, the Czar is firmly opposed to the constitutional system outlined in the petition. Under no circumstances will he sanction the control of the budget by the national assembly. In other words, he will withhold from it the power of the purse, without which a legislature has no means of enforcing its will upon a sovereign. Any kind of a Parliament, however, will be better than nothing; and if an elective national assembly were once firmly established in Russia, it would probably secure at no distant date the right of raising and spending revenues.

It seems to be settled that, after the termination of the present war in the Far East, there will be a second conference of the powers at The Hague for the purpose of reaching an international agreement concerning certain matters which the former conference left undetermined. The principal questions which will be subjects of discussion relate to the rights and duties of belligerents and neutrals in time of war. For obvious reasons, Russia deems the present time inappropriate for propounding new regulations. A similar position has been taken by the Berlin and Paris foreign offices. All three governments, however, recognize the necessity of defining contraband of war as soon as the pending contest between Russia and Japan has been brought to an end. Meanwhile, we note with satisfaction that our State Department's contention that coal should be treated, not as absolutely, but only as conditionally contraband, has been confirmed by the Special Commission which was appointed by the Czar to consider the appeal from the decision of a prize court at Vladivostok. Hereafter Russia will seize only such coal as is condemned to a blockade port, or to the military or naval authorities of a hostile state. That is at least a step in the right direction, and it is to be hoped that the next Hague conference will definitely include not only coal, but also food, in the class of conditionally contraband commodities. As we have often pointed out, it would not be easy to exaggerate the importance of such a definition to Great Britain, which is obliged to import a very large part of her food-supply, and to the United States, which are, and are likely long to remain, her principal purchaser.

Our brethren of the daily press feel bad about the turkey incident. They say the President's action in that is a grave mistake. Perhaps the incident has escaped the attention of some readers of the WEEKLY. The Boston Herald printed a story that the ROOSEVELT children had chased one of the fat Thanksgiving turkeys that were sent to the President, to its great discomfort, and had pulled out its tail feathers, while the Great Father looked on and laughed. The President, through Mr. LSEN, declared that the whole story was untrue and without any basis, and was one of many similar falsehoods the Herald had printed, and that "until further notice the departments will exclude the individuals responsible for this series of misstatements from all facilities for information." Nearly all the contemporaries are agreed that this action was wrong. The New York Times, the Brooklyn Eagle, and the Springfield Republican earnestly bemoan it, and we guess all the other dailies. No doubt the President was at fault. When WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE was confronted the other day by a woman with a horsewhip he sprang hastily to his office and locked the door. That was discretion. Two German soldiers, GERNER and VOHRST, were in a public saloon with two girls, when Sergeant HEAVE came in drunk and insulted the girls. The soldiers protested. The sergeant drew his sword, made a drunken lunge, and slightly wounded one of the girls. Then the soldiers closed with him and disarmed him. That was indiscretion. They had laid hands on their superior officer, and the court at Dusseldorf condemned them to five years' imprisonment at hard labor, disarmed from the army, and deprivation of their civil rights. The President's indiscretion has been of like character. He ought to have run away from the newspaper which lied about his children, as WHITE did from the angry woman, instead of which he raised his hand against the superior of every American citizen, plain or official, the press.

Rash man! The country had already sentenced him to four years at hard labor, and the newspapers are not averse yet to add to the sentence. Indeed, they assume the more in-sinuous-than-in-singer attitude and grive over his fault. "Malicious falsehoods," says the Springfield Republican, "harm no good man who is doing his public duty." No, but when they are told about his children they make him mad, and sometimes they do hurt the children. This little turkey lie was of small consequence, but what of the "long series of similar falsehoods, usually malicious and always deliberate," which preceded it, and which have appeared not only in the Boston Herald, but in hundreds of other papers? Some of these lies have been very injurious to members of the President's family.

They say the President has punished officially an annoyance that was personal. How else could he do it? It would have been a thousand times worse if he had punished it personally. As we have said, his indiscretion was in presuming to hit back at all at his superior. The Boston Herald knows as well as we do that a father has no effective defence in this country against newspapers that lie about his children, provided they do it with skill. Their own sense of decency and a regard for public opinion is all that restrains them. We would like to say that these restraints are adequate, but they are not so conclusively adequate but that four-fifths of the newspapers may profit once in a while by having some one pick up a large brick mid-way. "Look here; you ought not to print stories like that!"

The President's Message

On December 5, very early in the morning, President BUCKWORTH and Cashier SEVEN of the Citizens' National Bank of Oberlin, Ohio, were put under arrest for violating the United States banking laws by lending $250,000 to Mrs. CASSI L. CUNNINGHAM, of Cleveland. It seems they lent the money on security of two notes, one for $200,000, the other for $50,000. Who signed the notes, President BUCKWORTH was unwilling to divulge, but the bank closed its doors because it could not collect the money loaned on these. Mr. BUCKWORTH also loaned $100,000 of his own money on the same security. Coincidentally with the suspension of the Oberlin bank because of the loans of its venerable president to Mrs. CUNNINGHAM it transpired that banks in Cleveland and Elkhart, Ohio, were desirous of collecting about $75,000 that she owed them. It had previously come out that HENRIET B. NEWTON, a banker of Brookline, Massachusetts, had a claim against her for $100,000, advanced on two notes. These debts and others, most of them incurred on no other security than that of mysterious notes, stirred up a lively interest in Mrs. CUNNINGHAM, and, news being rather scarce, the papers devoted from two to six columns of their daily space to consideration of her case. She has been known in Cleveland for seven years as a rich woman who lived on Euclid Avenue, travelled a good deal, and spent a great deal of money. Where she got the money nobody knew, and nobody has cared until lately, but since her affairs have become complicated some of the Cleveland papers have undertaken to identify her with a certain Madame DE VONT, who was convicted of forging notes in Toledo and served four years in the penitentiary at Columbus, whence she emerged in 1893. Seven years ago, when Mrs. CUNNINGHAM married her present husband, Dr. L. S. CUNNINGHAM, she described herself as Mrs. CASSI HOSKINS, a widow, born in Canada. Mrs. CUNNINGHAM has said that she had securities of value in the hands of JAS. REYNOLDS, treasurer of the Waite Park Bank of Cleveland. Mr. REYNOLDS admits that he has something belonging to her, but does not say what or how much. Mrs. CUNNINGHAM herself, who has been staying at various hotels in New York, has said extremely little for publication, beyond denying that she is Madame DE VONT. Her husband is said to be in Europe.

On the afternoon of December 5, President BUCKWORTH, after being brought to Cleveland under arrest, admitted that the notes on which he had loaned money bore the name of ANNE CUNNINGHAM and the endorsement of himself and Cashier SEVEN. It is practically certain that another note, bearing the same names, is the security for the loan of $100,000 by Mr. NEWTON of Brookline. As Mr. CUNNINGHAM says that it is some years since he has put out any notes, and that he knows nothing of Mrs. CUNNINGHAM, the natural inference is that his signature on these notes is a forgery. Mrs. CUNNINGHAM seems to have been able to get money on these notes on the strength of representations that she had securities to a very large amount in the hands of her trustee in Cleveland. Herein lies the resemblance of her case, in so far as it has come to light, to the celebrated HERRICK case. For a number of years she has spent very large sums of money. The question whose money she has spent interests the public very much. The Federal authorities who have closed the Oberlin Bank propose to find out if they can, and no doubt they will. What seems possible on the face of such facts as have been ascertained so far is that Mrs. CUNNINGHAM has been living extravagantly for a long time on a credit maintained solely by her personal talents without the help of any actual wealth except such as belonged to other persons. On December 7, on complaint of the United States authorities, she was placed under arrest.

THE annual message sent to Congress by Mr. ROOSEVELT on December 6 will be recognized as the most remarkable document that for many years has emanated from an American Executive, whether we look at the intrinsic importance of the recommendations, or at the weight attached to them by the emphatic endorsement which the President's personality has just secured at the ballot-box.

The relative importance which the topics discussed by the President possess in his own mind may be inferred from the order in which he places them. We may say at once that the tariff is not even mentioned by name, although there is apparently a vague allusion to it, and to the expediency of periodic revision, in the introductory assertion that the people have expressed approval of the principles underlying the governmental policies, and their desire that these principles be upheld. "Although, of course, applied in a progressive spirit to meet changing conditions." After two initial paragraphs, both of which are short, and the second of which embodies a caution against extravagance, the President proceeds to consider at length the actual and prospective relation of the Federal government toward labor and capital. On the line of his references to this topic, it is plain that Mr. ROOSEVELT favors no conditions under which he would feel warranted in undertaking a personal intervention, such as he ventured upon in the case of the anthracite coal strike. He is careful to enumerate the circumstances, "altogether extreme," which would justify interference by the Federal authorities, whether in the way of safeguarding the rights of labor, or in the way of seeing that wrong is not done by unscrupulous persons, who shield themselves behind the name of labor. What are these circumstances? Mr. ROOSEVELT answers: If there is resistance to the Federal courts, interference with the mails or interstate commerce, or molestation of Federal property, or if the State authorities, in some crisis which they are unable to face, call for help, then the Federal government may interfere. It will be observed that the situation presented by the anthracite coal strike did not fall under this definition, for there was no resistance to Federal courts, no interference with the mails or interstate commerce, no molestation of Federal property, and no call for help from the Pennsylvania authorities. We are, therefore, justified in concluding that the experiment made by Mr. ROOSEVELT in that instance will never be repeated. In any situation strictly analogous to that presented by the anthracite coal strike, he will confine himself to applying the searchlight of publicity. It is in this way that he proposes to meet the collision between the coal mine in the Cripple Creek mining district. He tells Congress that he shall shortly lay before it a special message a full report of the investigation of the Bureau of Labor into the Colorado mining strike, a strike, he says, in which certain very evil forces, which are more or less at work everywhere under the conditions of modern industrialism, became startlingly prominent. We need not say that this report will be awaited with lively curiosity, as to whether the President will uphold or condemn the course pursued by Governor PEABODY.

Reverting to Mr. ROOSEVELT's treatment of the labor problem, we observe that, while fully recognizing the right of workmen to organize for the protection and betterment of their collective interests, he is careful to define the lengths to which the promotion of organization may lawfully go, and he pronounces distinctly and squarely in favor of the "open shop." It is evident that he regards organized labor with sympathy, and will may be do so, for there is no doubt that, except in Massachusetts, the labor-unions have lost most of their votes. He holds that wage-workers have a perfect right to organize, and by all peaceful and orderly means to endeavor to persuade their fellows to join with them in organizations. Neither does he dispute their right to refuse to work in company with men who decline to join their organizations. But he adds that, under no circumstances, have they the right to even violence upon those, whether capitalists or wage-workers, who refuse to support their organizations, or who side with those with whom they are at odds. As regards the "open shop," Mr. ROOSEVELT's pronouncement is, we repeat, unequivocal. There is no objection, he says, to employees of the government forming or belonging to unions; but he declares that the government can neither discriminate for, nor discriminate against, non-union men who are in its employment, or who seek to be employed under it. Addressing himself particularly to the letter-carriers, both municipal and rural, he cheerfully acknowledges their right to argue their claims for higher pay fairly and honestly before Congress, but he re-uhales them for banding together for the defeat of those Congressmen who refuse to give promises which they cannot in conscience make. The allusion to the defeat of Representative LOFT in a California district by the organized letter-carriers is obvious.

In the passages of the message relating to organized capital much that the President says is highly commendable, both in spirit and in expression, but two of his practical suggestions are open to grave objections, and we are not surprised that they produced a depressing effect in Wall Street, and that reduction showed that they are most unlikely to be embodied in laws by Congress. Mr.

ROOSEVELT speaks words of truth and sobriety when he says that, although the national government alone can deal adequately with great corporations, yet "to try to deal with them in an impotent, destructive, or demagogic spirit would, in all probability, mean that nothing whatever would be accomplished, and would certainly mean that, if anything were accomplished, it would be of a harmful nature." The President also shows himself alive to the indispensable fact that "great corporations are necessary, and only men of great and singular singular power can manage such corporations successfully, and such men must have great rewards." The sincerity of his respect for the high intellectual ability required in captains of industry is impressively demonstrated by the insertion in the message of a long quotation from a recent speech by the president of one of our great railroad systems. Reassuring, also, and indicative of intellectual breadth and penetration is the President's exposition of the method in which, according to his judgment, the large industrial powers conferred by recent legislation on the Bureau of Corporations ought to be used. That bureau, he says, will make presently a special report on the beef industry, in which he invites the earnest attention of Congress. In that report, however, and in every other report made while Mr. Roosevelt occupies the White House, certain just limitations will be imposed on the disclosure of the information officially secured. The President points out that, of necessity, the exhaustive investigation of special corporations must afford the casual observer knowledge of certain business facts, the publication of which might be an improper infringement of private rights. Congress ought not, therefore, to expect the publication of such data as would give to another corporation an unfair advantage, or would injure the legitimate business of a competitor and destroy the incentive for individual superiority and thrift.

We turn to the two specific recommendations which, not unreasonably, excite misgivings. Revelling the indisputable fact that the business of insurance is national, not local, in its application, and that it involves a multitude of transactions among the people of the different States, and between American companies and foreign governments, Mr. Roosevelt urges Congress carefully to consider whether the power of the Bureau of Corporations cannot constitutionally be extended to cover interstate transactions in insurance. The question is at once provoked, if the term "inter-state commerce," used in the Constitution, can be construed to cover the business of insurance, why should it not cover also the business of banking, which also involves, undoubtedly, a multitude of transactions among the people of the different States? How portentous, how terrible, would be the influence practically exercisable by the Bureau of Corporations if its powers of inspection and control should cover not only corporations employed in the interstate transportation of passengers and goods, but also those engaged in insurance and banking? The fact which such a bureau could play, under certain conditions and in certain hands, makes one shudder with apprehensions.

Prominent also with respect to corporate interests is the proposal that Congress should confer on the Interstate Commerce Commission what in practice would amount to the power of fixing the rates for transportation. It is well known that, as the interstate commerce law has been construed by the United States Supreme Court, the statute gives the commission power only to declare that a given railway rate is unreasonable, but not the power to compel a railroad company to accept any other rate. About a year ago Senator Quaynor of Wisconsin introduced in the Senate a bill which authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission not only to declare that existing railway rates and regulations were unreasonable, but also to require the railway companies affected to enforce certain rates and regulations prescribed by the commission. Some of the objections to this bill are obvious. In the first place, it does not provide for permitting a railway company to recover losses sustained by it through a lowering of its rates during the period intervening between the time when the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission should become effective and the time when the order of review designated by the bill should declare that the rates fixed by the railway companies were, as a matter of fact, not unreasonable. It is understood that Senator Quaynor has tried to meet this objection by an amendment the purpose of which is to secure speedy decisions by the court of review. The fundamental objection remains, namely, that the most vital function of railway corporations, to wit, the fixing of the rates in interstate transportation, would practically be transferred to Federal officials, who might or might not possess the general qualifications required for the transaction of such business, and who certainly could not be expected to have at heart the interests of the corporations concerned. The basic question raised by the President's virtual approval of this bill is whether, under any pretext, however specious, American citizens are to lose the right of conducting their own business.

There is no doubt that Mr. Roosevelt's deliberate exposition of the rights and duties imposed upon us by our assertion of the Monroe Doctrine will prove a disappointment to those who had wished to believe that the letter of his read at the Cuban dinner had been hastily penned, and did not express the author's real intentions. In that letter, it will be remembered, Mr. ROOSEVELT said that we might ourselves intervene, or countenance the intervention of a foreign power, in the affairs of a Latin-American republic, not only to enforce reparation for public or private "wrongs" in the technical sense of the word in question marks, but also to assure the payment of the principal and interest of the debt arising out of contract. In the afternoon, Mr. Roosevelt went much further than any preceding President had gone, and erected into a principle what Latin-Americans had hoped would be a discredited precedent—the precedent, namely, which was established by the blockading powers in the case of Venezuela. Almost the exact phrase which was employed in the Cuban letter, and which excited a good deal of alarm among far-sighted politicians in Latin-American capitals, is now stamped with formal approval by transaction in an annual message. If it nation, Mr. Roosevelt says, keeps order and pays its obligations, it need fear no interference from the United States. About the duty of every government to maintain order and to protect the persons and property of foreigners from violence there is nowhere any doubt. On the other hand, the gravest doubt exists as to whether the Monroe Doctrine can be so construed as to authorize a European creditor power to confiscate the whole or a part of the customs revenue of an American commonwealth for the purpose of securing the payment of debts arising out of contract. How is it possible to reconcile the confiscation of an income, upon which a government mainly relies for its support, with the Monroe Doctrine, which forbids us to permit a European power "in any way to control the destiny" of an American republic? It is true that Mr. ROOSEVELT's reference to this subject may point of the intervention of the United States, while he would not again permit the intervention by a foreign power of an American republic's customs revenue, which he tolerated in the case of Venezuela, he would take upon himself the function of collecting and appropriating the income of a sister commonwealth for the benefit of foreign creditors. Manifestly, the effect upon the debtor State would be practically identical. She would be reduced to the status of Egypt, the only difference being that her monarch and ruler would be not a European power, but the United States. The Monroe Doctrine does not specifically forbid us to control the destiny of a sister commonwealth by acting as debt-collector for its enemies; but, apparently, the assumption of such a function would be hard to harmonize with its spirit.

We would not take leave of the message without pointing out the radicality with which Mr. ROOSEVELT has, in two instances, and in the face of his political opponents, recommended the enactment of a law directed against bribery and corruption. Very general elections, which should provide for the publication, not only of the expenditures on the part of all candidates for nominations and elections, but also of all contributions received and disbursements made, by political committees. It is well known that a bill to this effect has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. CLEVELAND of New York. With regard to the Philippines, also, he professes to accept the aim of the anti-bribery law. He firmly believes, he says, that we can help the Filipinos to rise higher and higher in the scale of civilization and of capacity for self-government, and he earnestly hopes that, in the end, they will be able to stand, if not entirely alone, yet in some such relation to the United States as Cuba now stands. We do not quite see how Mr. ROOSEVELT can reconcile with this hope his encouragement of the investment of large amounts of American capital in Philippine railways and other credit interests. Where our money goes, our flag is likely to stay.

Progress of the War in the Far East

THERE are several indications that the war between Japan and Russia is approaching a crisis and it begins to look as if in their conduct of operations the Japanese have made a strategic blunder, the consequences of which may not be fatal, but will certainly prove costly. Aware of their enemy's intense preponderance in respect of military resources, it was obviously for their interest to avail themselves of the temporary superiority of fighting strength in Manchuria, which they possessed through their control of the sea, and after inflicting a severe defeat upon General KERMATOFF to drive him back to Harbin. If not beyond the Siberian frontier, where he could secure the tremendous reinforcements which, it was known, would be despatched. To that end it would have been expedient to defer the occupation of Korea, and, instead of wasting time in traversing that peninsula and in crossing the Yalu River, to have landed the three armies now under the command of Marshal OTOMO as quickly as possible after the declaration of war, on the Manchurian coast, from which an advance northward along the line of the Port Arthur railway could have been undertaken forthwith.

By following such a course nothing would eventually have been lost and much might have been gained. There was no necessity for wasting a number of soldiers, variously computed at from 30,000 to 50,000, on the capture of Port Arthur by assault. The Japanese will not be able to hold that fortress or the town of Newchwang, or to keep possession of Korea, if they should lose ascendancy at sea and their main army in Manchuria should be decisively beaten. It could not have been better, if the whole force which the Japanese had at their disposal had been pushed northward from the Manchurian seaboard seven months, or even five months, ago. As it was, a large body of troops was held back in Korea to avenge Japanese predominance in that peninsula, and the detachments sent at various times to cooperate in the siege of Port Arthur cannot have amounted in the aggregate to fewer than a hundred thousand men.

The result was that when the battle of Liaoyang at last took place, the force concentrated near that town by the Japanese commander-in-chief was smaller by about 150,000 men (including the troops detained in Korea) than it needed to have been, while, owing to the reinforcements hurried forward from European Russia, General KUROKI's army was at least that much larger than it would have been some months before. It is even doubtful whether, at the outbreak of the war, the Russian commander could have got together for field operations in Manchuria forty thousand soldiers, outside of those required to protect the railways and to garrison Port Arthur and Vladivostok.

It is plain enough how NAPOLEON or any other great strategist would have availed himself of the opportunity offered. There never was a war in which promptitude on the part of one of the combatants was so indispensable to his success. The Japanese began, we repeat, with a vast advantage in respect of the number of troops available for an immediate move against their true objective—Hankin. That advantage they frittered away, and, therefore, although the battle of Liaoyang was a reverse for the Russians, the latter lost relatively few prisoners, and retreated leisurely a short distance to a new and strong position in front of Mukden.

The second great fight—named by Marshal OXLEY after the Siao River, along which it occurred—was practically a draw, but the Siao that test of strength the reinforcements sent to KUROKI have been increased, and constitute a large total, while those received by the Japanese are believed scarcely to counter-balance the divisions needed to make good General Siao's losses before Port Arthur. Until the capture of that fortress shall have set free the greater part of General Siao's soldiers, every move will find General Siao in competition with his antagonist. In fact, if General Siao's army shall hold out for six weeks longer, as he will doubtless try to do, we shall not be surprised to see KUROKI assume the offensive, and drive the Japanese out of Liaoyang.

Moral Teaching

HUMAN progress seems to be by means of a sort of mental war. Overemphasis is played first on one side of the question, followed by overemphasis on the opposite, with a vague hope of an ultimate balancing somewhere in the middle. This is strikingly illustrated by the changes in modern ideas of training children. In the face of the ancient line-worn maxim of "spare the rod," we have now the theory that the child must be brought to obedience only by convincing his reason, by moral persuasion. It would be an elaborate and difficult matter to move an army by moral persuasion, and the dangers incurred by a little child who does not understand the command "stop" are many and serious. There is another point to be considered: we know only after we have experienced. It is impossible, without understanding a child with an unusual sense of responsibility, to explain to him the real end and aim of his own training. Even to give a people the command was, "If any man will do his will, he shall learn of the doctrine." We know what is meant by a virtue after we have perceived it in a far different way from that in which we know a virtue by hearing a glowing tribute paid to it.

For the intellectual progress we still have systematic, and to a certain extent compulsory, training. In moral training we are amazingly haphazard and casual, and in nothing else do we show so teaching a faith in the promise that all things work together for good. A Virginian of ancient lineage and his military record said, "I try to teach my boys only three things.—Don't lie, take care of the ladies, and remember the war." But the theory that a whole moral training can be contained in a phrase is mistaken. "Remember the war," cannot cherish a grudge, and it is possible to be truthful and chivalrous and at the same time selfish, covetous, and narrow-minded.

Certain virtues belong to certain ages; and as in the intellectual life we follow certain stages of growth, so in the moral life certain virtues belong to equalled periods. When the American child, as a whole, lacks, and it seems sometimes almost to deplore it, the charm of childhood, is shyness. Shyness, which in a grown person is a fault growing out of pride or self-consciousness, in a child bespeaks merely that natural reliance upon a mother and guiding judgment which is its normal stage of development. Self-assurance and power are the outgrowth of struggle in the open, and a child should bear the marks of shelter. To see a child meeting the world with complete self-assurance means that he should have been robbed of some of the natural stages of growth, and has missed the period of wonder and reverence. So FELIX AMER, in a book on the Moral Training of Children, says that the children of the public schools be made daily to stand in three positions.—first, with the arms crossed on the breast, looking up; second, with the arms crossed behind the back, looking down; and third, with the arms crossed on the breast, again looking at their schoolmate to the right. This is as practical as a symbol of the three forms of reverence the equal, the inferior, and the superior, the inferior, the equal. Certainly, by some means, children should have the wonder of the world and the laws it obeys and the sacredness of all human life instilled into them, and it can be adequately done only at an early period. Automatic obedience offered the superior life; the foundation of unconscious obedience to the conscience in later life; wonder at the beauty, the order, the harmony of the world; the foundation of love of nature, respect for her, pursuit of knowledge, and power of worship; reverence for all that is above us, all life beneath us, and our fellow men smooth away all the petty trouble and needless friction out of life. With care and method these three impulses to obey, to wonder, to reverence might be inculcated in a child in the first five years, and one might proceed thence to other virtues as one does from the alphabet and dejected words to reading.

Respect for property, kindness of intention, word and deed, and truth-telling belong to the next stage of growth. Before a child enters school it should be led to feel a distinction between what is its own and what is another's. A certain self-respect and pride comes to a child when it owns property, be it no more than a pencil, a picture, or a book. It has the same enlarging power over the child that wealth and responsibility have over the man. The self is not a mere detached ego, it is all a man is and has, his power, his relations to the outer life. "Dear Papa," said a little fellow just able to make the words, "I have a pearl-handled knife. Your dutiful and obedient son." "Up to the hilt of possession he had always signed himself 'Your good boy,' or 'Your loving boy,' but with the pearl-handled knife his virtues took on a more dignified character.

The respect for property, the distinction between our own and another's, should go closely bound with concepts of kindness, and no one can possibly be feeling should be instilled that we may use what is ours for the benefit of others. The motive for all of our things must never be purely selfish; in some simple way the idea must be conveyed that property is only good when it widens relations and increases chances of service. It is at this age to when the child is being taught his duty to others that the seed of truthfulness should be sown.

There is a rather prevalent idea that decent children are born truthful, but it is far from being a fact. There are various reasons for untruthfulness: one is fear, and there is no doubt that an unloved and a loved child will often protect himself by a lie. There is too the untruthfulness born of a love of approval, the poor, pious, little lie of the starved affections. But a child will not lie rarely persistently untruthful. Another and a wholly different form of untruthfulness is the imaginative. It is an exact and delicate task, with a little child, to encourage the imagination, the reason gift under heaven, to foster the little subjective intensities, and yet convince the child that it is not a fact he must be sovereign. There are roses, rose, perhaps, where the best method is to offer at the very beginning the outline of the literary instinct. To help him put down all the little hunches, dreams, and problems, and to guide the little hand to sign them, and then explain that this is not the reality of things, but a kind of a story. The child soon learns to discriminate between a thing he knows and a thing he imagines, and is not misled or created by independent winds. It is a good elementary basis for a child at ten or twelve to start his onward life with ingrained impulses of obedience, reverence, earnestness, kindness, and truth. It is at this age, and probably not any sooner, that one should make some admission of the frailty of human nature. Father, the burden of such knowledge is too heavy to be borne. Later, the child will take his own hopes too seriously if it is not in the first years established by recognition of his own weakness. We will the right with the more knowledge that we most respect fully, and with this lesson should receive admissions of self-complex to balance the humility. If the child is taught that he is prone to lie, he should at the same time be taught that he is capable of standing. KATY's maxim, "If I ought, I can," should be driven well home to him.

The benefit of a moral education is the same as that of an intellectual training. The wonder of things a man does right, automatically without really being conscious of it, the higher he can reach. The lower stages are learned by heart that he may concentrate all his energies on the higher last.

To give one's life to others one must first have a life worth giving, and that so few of us have this is not wholly owing to the depravity of human nature, but somewhat to the lack of systematic moral teaching.

The Meet

Through the Woods

The Kill

THE END OF THE FOX-HUNTING SEASON—PHOTOGRAPHS OF A MEET OF THE MEADOWBROOK HUNT CLUB

This year the fox-hunting season has been very active. There are two seasons—spring and fall—the fall season beginning in October and lasting into the winter, or until the ground becomes so hard that it is dangerous to ride across country. At the Meadowbrook Hunt Club during the fall months hunts have been held every week day, and on holidays and Saturdays two and sometimes three different packs of hounds have been hunted. In many of the meets from fifty to seventy-five riders have participated.

STREET SCENE IN TOKYO AT ANNOUNCEMENT OF JAPANESE SUCCESES AT PORT ARTHUR

From a sketch by Genshin Yeto, the Japanese artist

PHOTOGRAPH OF THE JAPANESE WAR BALLOONS USED TO RECONNOITRE THE RUSSIAN POSITIONS AT PORT ARTHUR

The two balloons shown in the photograph belong to the Third Division of the Japanese army now before Port Arthur, and have been used by General Nogi in determining the Russian position and defenses in the fortress. At the time the picture was taken the balloons were preparing to reconnoitre from a point about four miles north of Port Arthur.

From photograph made by James H. Smith at Port Arthur. Copyright, 1904, by Underwood & Underwood, N. Y.

An Important Political Event in Mexico

I.—The Inauguration of Ramon Corral, the Newly Elected Vice-President

By Austin C. Brady

THE most important political event in the history of Mexico in the past twenty years has taken place in the minds of people in the capital of the republic on the morning of December 1. Señor Don Ramon Corral, the man who visited the St. Louis Exposition as the personal representative of President Diaz, and who was entertained as the guest of the American government in San Francisco following the St. Louis visit, was inaugurated Vice-President of the Mexican republic. The ceremony turned a final answer in the question of Presidential succession in Mexico. It was preceded by the inauguration of General Porfirio Diaz as President for the seventh time. The Presidential term is six years, so it is also that of Vice-President. At the end of the six years, or before the expiration of that period in the event of Diaz's retirement or death, Corral will succeed to the Presidency of Mexico.

The Mexican Vice-President is a civilian. He saw his only military service during a revolution in the frontier State of Sonora, of which he is a native, and as the revolution was of short duration, he came out of the conflict with but little practical knowledge of warfare. He knows more about public lighting, street traction, and municipal drainage than he does about military tactics and modern armament, for he has studied the former subjects in the great cities of the United States and Europe, and up to this time he has not felt called upon to give the latter much attention. He believes that the greatest need of the Mexican people is education, and that the future of the country depends, to a large extent, on the building up of a substantial middle class. He holds that too many of the young men of Mexico are entering the priesthood and the legal profession, and in the hope of obtaining Mexican youths to devote their lives to useful arts and trades, he is promoting the establishment of a Mexican institute of technology that will rival similar institutions of other countries.

About three years ago, while Corral was serving as Governor of the Federal District, which corresponds to the District of Columbia, fire broke out in one of the markets of the City of Mexico, a market which included only small vendors, and which was patronized exclusively by the poorer classes. Corral was near the market at the time, and personally directed the police and firemen in the work of fighting the flames. He was not content to issue orders, however, but rushed into the burning building and repeatedly carried out supplies, which, in the majority of instances, represented the entire capital of their owners. His example was followed by others, with the result that the poor vendors of the little bazaar, by the fire, Corral's hands and face were scorched by the flames while he was engaged in the heroic work, and after the entire market subsided friends of the District Governor censured him for having exposed himself to danger under the circumstances. To these friends he replied, simply:

"It's the duty of officials to set examples as well as to issue orders."

Vice-President Corral is comparatively a new man in national affairs in Mexico. He was raised in the City of Mexico by President Diaz in 1900 and made Governor of the Federal District. In January, 1903, he entered the Diaz cabinet as Minister of the Interior. He was nominated for the newly created Vice-Presidency by the Nationalist party June 7, 1904, and his election was proclaimed in the following July. Prior to 1900 he was Governor of the State of Sonora and Deputy from that State to the National Congress. While serving in the latter capacity he demonstrated his belief in protection by advocating a serious desire to allow the free importation of American wheat and flour into the Pacific States of Mexico. If Corral lived in the United States he would be a good Republican on the strength of the protective-tariff plank. As President of Mexico he may be expected to foster Mexican industries in every way possible. Increases in Mexican tariff duties, which went into effect early in 1904, were the result of his idea regarding the protection of home industries.

The coming Vice-President of Mexico is a good English scholar, speaking, reading, and writing the English language. His other children are receiving educations in San Francisco schools, and the younger members of his family will be sent to American schools as soon as their ages permit of separation from their parents. In connection with the Corral family it may be stated that Diaz's chosen successor is thoroughly in accord with President Roosevelt on the question of "race suicide." He is the father of nine children.

While Vice-President Corral's knowledge of English has retarded other several years, the fact has not been generally known. It is recorded that a Kansas City engine manufacturer called upon him in the City of Mexico some time ago for the purpose of making a contract for supplying engines to electric-light plants owned by Corral in Sonora cities. The Kansas City man was accompanied by the manager of Mr. Corral's Sonora interests, and the latter acted as interpreter, the then Minister of the Interior talking in Spanish exclusively. Corral was driving a hard bargain, and the Kansas City manufacturer finally became angry. "By God, sir," he exclaimed to the interpreter, "you tell Mr. Corral that I won't knock off another cent."

Before the interpreter had time to translate over a portion of the emphatic ultimatum, Corral, speaking good English and with the seriousness of a judge pronouncing a death sentence, said:

"Those shall not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain. As soon as the Kansas City man recovered from his surprise, he apologized to his distinguished customer, and proceeded to close the contract in accordance with Corral's views.

Corral's entrance into public life was as an editor of two newspapers in Alamos, Sonora, his native town. During his official career he has displayed a kindly feeling for newspaper men, and is a believer in the value of the newspaper as an educator of the people. He sincerely admires the enterprise of the American newspaper, and realizes that the best service a Mexican newspaper is far behind the times. Steps looking to the improvement of the standard of the press of Mexico may be looked for under his administration of Mexican affairs.

Vice-President Corral will be fifty-one years of age the last day of next January.

II.—Porfirio Diaz, who was Inaugurated President for the Seventh Time

By Charles F. Lummis

SEVERAL years ago General Porfirio Diaz, then ex-President of what passed for the Mexican Republic, made a considerable tour of the United States with his young bride, the beautiful Carmen. Charming as all found this gracious girl of nineteen, educated in this country, there was no presumption then that she was to become the most utilized First Lady in all the records of the Americas, and one of the principal figures among the comets of history. But there is no question that this became true of "Carmelita." Among the fourteen millions of Mexico her pet name is deep in every heart.

"Porfirio," too—for all Mexico calls its President by his given name, not diplomatically, but familiarly and with the best of intentions as opposition. His party were "Porfiristas"—some, then hardly dreamed of in the stature he was to acquire, any more than the astonishing Mexico of his creating was foreseen. He was recognized, of course, as the foremost soldier Mexico had produced in her three and a half centuries of history. But there is no question that this became true of "Carmelita." Among the fourteen millions of Mexico her pet name is deep in every heart.

"Porfirio," too—for all Mexico calls its President by his given name, not diplomatically, but familiarly and with the best of intentions as opposition. His party were "Porfiristas"—some, then hardly dreamed of in the stature he was to acquire, any more than the astonishing Mexico of his creating was foreseen. He was recognized, of course, as the foremost soldier Mexico had produced in her three and a half centuries of history. But there is no question that this became true of "Carmelita." Among the fourteen millions of Mexico her pet name is deep in every heart.

But that was all. Nonetheless no man dreamed then of the miracle in store—how this little, compact, clear-eyed soldier was destined, before the close of the century, to prove himself the most brilliant Executive, with one exception, in the history of the New World, the statesman who has done more with the least material, and effected the most extraordinary transformation of a nation's spirit and circumstance, probably, ever wrought in any country in so short a time. He has lifted his battered and bankrupt nation from the dust and blood of the vulgar scuffle of revolution, and set her feet sure and swift upon the way of progress, and given her her own respect, and won her the world's.

Even, in 1881, the recognition of General Diaz in several principal cities of the United States was enough to make him sure of our welcome. To-day it would be incomparably more brilliant; for history has been working fast, these sixteen years, and every well-informed American knows now that Diaz is not only a great Mexican, but a great historic figure.

Porfirio Diaz was born in Oaxaca, the Mexican City, as the mothering President, September 15, 1830, within a few leagues of the birthplace of Benito Juarez, the only other Mexican President remotely to be compared with him. Juarez was pure Tezacoatl Indian. Diaz is Spanish (of Aztec descent), with just enough dash of aboriginal blood from his Mexican grandmother to count in the rare physical and mental tenacity which has won so much a

RAMON CORRAL, THE NEWLY ELECTED VICE-PRESIDENT OF MEXICO

Ramon Corral, who recently visited the World's Fair at St. Louis as the personal representative of President Diaz, was formally inaugurated Vice-President of the Mexican Republic at the City of Mexico on December 1. For a sketch of the life of Ramon Corral the reader is referred to the article by Mr. Austin Brady on the opposite page.

does not, indeed, lay the stress which an Englishman would naturally lay on the influence of Mr. Roosevelt's character and personality in capturing the imagination of foreigners. But he does elucidate with singular accuracy what one may call the public reasons that induced England to wish for a Rooseveltian victory. Mr. Roosevelt is an imperialist; so are Englishmen. Mr. Roosevelt has feared and accepted the fact that America must occupy and maintain a position in the international politics. The wilful blindness of the Democratic party to this fact appeared to Englishmen the gravest blot on their "platform." The cordial cooperation between Downing Street and Washington that exists to-day is fairly sure to be maintained and possibly strengthened under a Roosevelt administration. There was a risk that under a Parker administration it would be jeopardized. Not only English interests at the present war, but English interests in the future of China and in the whole Pacific question were felt to be involved, though not, of course, very deeply, in Mr. Roosevelt's election. The writer in the North American Review appears to take more seriously than did Englishmen the Democratic pledges to cut down the army estimates, contrary America's international activity and leaving the day of Philippine independence. We never thought, over here, that those pledges either could or would have been carried out. At the same time they showed an attitude towards the general question of imperialism with which England could not bring herself to sympathize. The same and strong line which Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hay have taken on all those issues appeals to Englishmen, almost without exception, as the right and the only policy for a self-respecting and high-spirited nation to pursue. Nor do they think this merely because it coincides with British interests. In fact, the only one they hold to not only as Englishmen, but also as the friends and well-wishers of America.

In the Continent Mr. Roosevelt's triumph was more dubiously received, though it is pleasant to add that not a word has been said against him as a man, and that you probably would not find in all Europe two opinions as to his character, his honesty, his courage, his virile aptitude for all the duties of his high office. Such dissatisfaction as could be detected in the comments of the European press was based solely on political considerations. The Berlin Post remarked that "President Roosevelt cannot as an American be a pronounced friend of Germany, but his attitude towards us is certainly not hostile." The Post, of course, is one of the inspired journals. The Acree Zeitung regarded the result of the election as a great victory for American imperialism, but enclosed itself with the reflection that though it "will in the first instance signify American cooperation with England, it will ultimately lead to a breach with England once the new course of America has been developed." In Austria, the country which first preached the necessity of a European combination against "the American peril," the Freidenkblatt, a semi-official journal, expressed the uneasiness and apprehension with which officialdom in Austria-Hungary at the beginning watched America's imperial career and her pronounced bid for the commercial supremacy of the world. A despatch from St. Petersburg two days after the election stated that Mr. Roosevelt's election was regarded in government circles with "deep disappointment" and that government influences were busily spreading the report (which must owe its origin to Mr. Bosley) that Mr. Roosevelt is really a Jew, and his true name is Rosendell, and that this "explains" his action in pressing for the removal of the obstacles which prevent American Jews from visiting Russia." All the French and Italian papers that I have seen agree in welcoming Mr. Roosevelt's victory on all personal grounds, while regretting his somewhat hasty and uncalculated action. Americans should have consulted themselves so strongly to an imperial policy. England is the only country that rejoices in Mr. Roosevelt's election both as a man and an imperialist.

Meanwhile, looking to the desirability of Mr. Roosevelt's majority, Englishmen ask, with the Spectator, "What will he do with it?" That he will do nothing with it, nobody expects. Unless Englishmen are wholly out of their reckoning, Mr. Roosevelt is not the man to rest on his laurels. The conviction over here is that the next four years are destined to be memorable in American politics, that Mr. Roosevelt is at best "amused," that he has a free hand, and will use it freely. People in this country regard the issue of the election as a mandate to Mr. Roosevelt to continue as he has begun. The Spectator, in attempting to forecast his policy, declares that "he will guide the American ship wisely and well, and instill into every branch of the government that high sense of public duty with which he is himself inspired."

He will lead in domestic, as in foreign, affairs that the government of the United States shall hold its head high. Under his guidance it will neither bow the neck nor the phylacter at home, nor allow its greatness abroad to dwindle and grow dim from creases, scars of being great." Time-stalling all his later terms of official legislative achievement, the Spectator believes that Mr. Roosevelt will employ his influence "to prevent the vast accumulations of capital which are so marked a feature of modern American life being used oppressively or unjustly," that he will use an exact and even balance between labor and capital; that he will continue to appoint negroes to office "where such appointments are reasonable and pertinent," and that "he will find some way to prevent lynching," that in foreign affairs he will show himself not so much a brigand as a politician, neither seeking foreign entanglements nor shunning them as an instance on America's behalf her own; that he will "finish the Panama Canal," detain from Denmark the West-Indian Islands, continue to press for the open door in China, build up a powerful navy, and give the Philippine administration which will be "soot an adherent to any paper theories or abstract sentiments in regard to popular government, but rather the government of the islands in the true interest of their inhabitants." It concludes by prophesying that the coming administration "will raise the standard of the larger half of the English-speaking race, and that for the whole of that race it will be a lesson and an example in sound and sane government." The Spectator, it will be seen, makes no mention of the tariff. There are those who believe that the great feature of Mr. Roosevelt's second administration will be his energetic coercion of the Republican party into a reduction of the Dingley schedules, and into yet more drastic proceedings against the trusts. Otherwise the Spectator's anticipations represent, as they usually do, the hopes and beliefs of all England.

Russia's New Minister of the Interior

By Charles Johnston

EVERY one who knows Prince Mirsky, Russia's new Minister of the Interior, speaks enthusiastically of the gentle and gracious simplicity of his character. He is one of those rarely attractive natures whom very few like at first sight, without at the beginning watching America's imperial career and her pronounced bid for the commercial supremacy of the world. A despatch from St. Petersburg two days after the election stated that Mr. Roosevelt's election was regarded in government circles with "deep disappointment" and that gov-times to like increasingly, as the fine qualities of his heart and mind show themselves.

Prince Mirsky is a man of fair military bearing, a type of "the soldier in civil costume" as we say in India. He is only forty-seven, and is thus still in the season of hope, in every way a contrast to the grim winter of his tyrannous predecessor, Von Plehve. About middle height, he is of fair complexion, and wears a pointed beard, cut in the style made fashionable by King Edward VII. He has rather noticeably thoughtful eyes, and his whole expression is one of gentleness and kindness, yet with much underlying strength. Perhaps the best recent testimony to his unspoiled nature comes from a subordinate employee whom he had known in early years, and who visited him shortly after his appointment as Minister of the Interior. "He is just as kind as he used to be!" exclaimed the employee, coming out of the minister's cabinet, with his round eyes of wonder. This spontaneous sympathy is the real active power in his dealings with the Russian press, with the zemstvos, with the unobedient Russian Jews, as it was the secret of his success while he was Governor-General of White Russia, on the frontier of Poland, with its many national and religious wounds, so easily irritated, yet so easily soothed. He seems endowed with a rarely happy disposition, in face of grave and serious. If he ran across a friend and was unable to solve them, in spite of the tremendous forces which will have to come returned to thwart and oppose him, he will stand forth as one of the greatest statesmen Russia has produced.

Let us consider the heredity and circumstances which helped to make Prince Mirsky the man he is today, the hope of a new era of Russian freedom. The first picture I have of him is as a brown-haired, hair-kneed boy, in Tiflis, very good-natured, and very fond of children. His father, Prince Dimitri Dmitriyevich-Mirsky, was one of the high officials of the tsarist court of the Caucasus, standing close to the Governor-General, Grand-duke Michael. The grand-duke, who is still a great and wise figure in Russian life, is only thirty-seven, and is the son of Nicholas I. His palace at Tiflis was the centre of a vigorous artistic and intellectual life, which carried on the literary traditions of the Caucasus, enriched by Pushkin and Lermontov. The life of these days of their exile. Prince Mirsky has married a Georgian princess, who gave her son the gentleness and grace of manner which flower so finely in some of the older tsarist rulers. Prince Peter Dimitriyevich Mirsky, the present minister, thus grew up in the midst of a many-colored throng of Georgian, Armenian, and Circassian, and picturesque Christians of a dozen different races and tongues. He passed his boyhood amid the oriental settings of Tiflis street scenes, in the midst of forest-clad hills and torrents, and with the giant snow ranges on the horizon. His eyes and mind were trained to the appreciation of that many-colored Asian life, so different from the monotonous array of northern Russia.

Prince Peter Dimitriyevich (that is, Peter, son of Dimitri) went from Tiflis to St. Petersburg to school, entering the aristocratic Corps of Pages, and afterwards studying for the army in the Academy of the General Staff. He got his commission and returned to the Caucasus just in time for the outbreak of the Russo-Turkish war of 1877, and his readiness to the Grand-duke Michael Nikolaevich (that is, son of Nicholas the First), who was commander-in-chief of the Russian army in the Caucasus, came at once into the thick of the fight. It must be remembered that, while Russia in Europe was separated from the Turkish Empire by the whole of Rumania, which the Russian troops swept nearly over, and through the Russian army in the Caucasus was found itself actually on the Turkish frontier, its only neighbor was northern Armenia, so that fighting began far earlier than in Europe, along the Donube.

Arslan and Kars were two of the strongest Turkish fortresses, perched up under the shadow of Mount Ararat, amid vast, swirling hills; and here, among crags and precipices and torrents, young Prince Peter Minsky got his first taste of war. Apparently it suited him, for we find him getting decorated for distinguished bravery in the bombardment of Kars, when he received the Cross of St. Anna, of the fourth degree. In the fighting of the second week of August, he received the cross of the same order, and of the third degree. Two months later he received the Cross of St. Vladimir, and shortly after this was appointed adjutant to Emperor Alexander II.

In 1881 Prince Minsky was transferred to the General Staff, and went south in Odessa, to take command of the military district on the Black Sea. He was subsequently on the staff of the South and Eastern Army Corps, and in 1886 was appointed Chief of the Staff of the Third Grenadier Division.

In 1893, being then thirty-eight years old, he was transferred to civil employ, and was appointed Governor of Penza, in the Ta-tar country, within the bend of the Volga. Two years later he went southward to Ekaterinburg as Governor of district in 1900, as he went to St. Petersburg as Assistant Minister of the Interior. In 1902 he was made Governor-General of White Russia (Vilna, Grodno, and Kovno), where he became immensely popular, and came into close contact with the Jewish question, and the hardships of the Ukraine with his own eyes. He was still busy studying his position in Vilna when his recent promotion came.

Shall Our Colleges become "Trusts?"

By Charles F. Thwing, LL.D.

President of Western Reserve University and Adelphi College

THE primary principle of the trust is the principle of efficiency. The purposes of increasing private and public wealth are either subsidiary features or incidental applications of the primary principle of efficiency. The principle of efficiency, applied to the higher education, as applied to other forms of service, means getting the utmost out of every condition of things from every force. It represents the largest product for the least expenditure. The result of the higher education, though it may neither be assessed, nor measured, nor weighed, is still to be regarded as a definite result. It represents the enlargement of knowledge and its intellectual intensity and better orientation. It stands for the appreciation of learning as embodied in human character. It suggests the transmutation of living into life, of knowledge into wisdom, of wisdom into doing, of doing into duty, of duty into faithfulness, of faithfulness into character, and of character into destiny. It stands for the education of the individual, and for his best training, and also for the best training of the largest number of individuals.

This principle of efficiency necessitates the fullest use of every dollar given in the education of the higher education, the most efficient use of equipment of every kind, the calling out of all resources of teaching staff and of student body. Together, it forbids the duplication of unnecessary institutions. It forbids the setting up of unnecessary educational or other machinery for grinding out the educational grid. It demands that the longest return be made for each expenditure, for this year, for all years, for this place and this condition, and for all places and conditions.

The application of this principle of proficiency would lead to a union of our educational institutions. For America as a whole, we have, in this country, are not far from seven hundred institutions which confer degrees. Of these about five hundred are either ecclesiastical or for men alone. About one hundred and sixty are for women only, and about fifty are scientific schools. Germany has forty-two universities and about one hundred and fifty gymnasia. Such a number of colleges in America represents indeed the eighth infirmity which the higher education exhibits, that it is not to be doubted that that infirmity is often so dissipated as to be largely ineffective. Most of these colleges, too, are small. About two-thirds of them have each less than one hundred students in their college departments. They are also poor in purse. Of the somewhat more than $100,000,000 invested in the income-bearing funds of these colleges, six-sevenths of them possess less than $200,000 in such funds. This poverty is significant, for it represents an incapacity for giving an adequate education. These colleges also are largely sectarian or denominational. This relation contains elements of strength and elements of weakness. On the whole, the denominational element in a college may prove to be of great good, provided the element be largely, and not narrowly, interpreted. The great number, the small attendance, the poverty, and the denominational character of our colleges represent a condition to which the principle of amalgamation is to be applied.

The application of this principle of efficiency to the union of institutions is to be made under at least three conditions. One of these conditions is absolute, and the other two are more or less flexible. The one condition which is absolute refers to the just use of trust funds. Such funds every college corporation holds. They are funds held in trust for certain purposes. These purposes may be either general or definite. These funds are to be used fully and exactly in accordance with the terms of their gift. No exception is to be suffered regarding any deviation of purpose. Here it may be to observe the conditions of a trust; nevertheless, the conditions are to be observed. It may be better to give up the trust than to try to keep the conditions. Let it be given up then. If the funds are to be released, the trust under which they are held must be dissolved. The dead hand, it is said, should not rule forever. But if one is to profit by what the hand when it was alive gave, one should still let that hand rule. The college should not suffer itself to accept of a gift and to spurn the gift.

The endow is now being made to unite what is probably the best technical school in the world with a university which fulfills its functions as well as any university in the world. In such a union the advantages of the trust funds of each institution is to be held inviolate. Of course, any belief that such funds should not be held inviolate is more than absurd. Harvard University represents trusts and trust funds, obligations accepted in the beginning of American life, and which it has observed for its nearly three hundred years. It is now coming into the possession of a large bequest made for the giving of technical training. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology represents an agency called into being about forty years ago, devoted to specific ends, made powerful by the increasing powers of the industrial and material conditions of the present. The college has a long history, and of which the buildings are separated by about three miles, are in any process of union or of alliance, to maintain the conditions of all gifts and trusts.

An affiliation has already been made for working purposes between the Case School of Applied Science and the Western Reserve University of Cleveland. In making such an affiliation, the technical school and the university in Cleveland are placed far more advantageously than are Harvard and the Institute of Technology. For the buildings of the two Cleveland institutions are grouped side by side upon practically one campus, their governing boards are in part composed of the same persons, they draw their students from the same field, and their students, becoming graduates, return to the same general community.

Advantages consist in the selection of a course of study of five years, of which the first three are spent in the college of liberal learning and the last two in the technical school.

It is superfluous to say that the institution in Cambridge and in Boston, and the institutions in Cleveland, in any affiliation, are to observe both the letter and the spirit of every trust.

A second condition involved in any union of institutions is that the historic life of each is to be perpetuated so far as possible. Life is life. The life of an institution is hardly to be taken from it. The life of a person. The college calls out life, loyalty, realism. It is historic; it has relations; it has hopes; it is progressive; it looks to the future. This individuality of life is to be respected.

And, further, because an institution has an historic life, the life belongs to the future quite as much as to the past. History is making every day. Every day's addition to history makes more deeply the first days of history. Preservation should never mean in preservation. The dead past should not raise the stillbirth of the future. Not only do new occasions teach new duties, but new duties create new occasions.

As the spirit for the amalgamation of many institutions is strong, so also are the forms of amalgamation diverse. The method is many many forms. The form relates to the union or affiliation of the colleges of a State in or about the State university. This affiliation might have special relation to the different denominational colleges of a State. It might represent the establishment of professorships by different churches in a State university. As long ago as 1822 Thomas Jefferson, in connection with the proposed foundation of the University of Virginia, in favor of the expediency of encouraging the different religious sects to establish each for itself a professorship of their own tenets, on the grounds of the university, and to give to the students the best of both worlds there, and have the free use of our libraries and every other recommendation we can give them: preserving, however, their independence of one another and of each other.

For almost one hundred years such affiliations have been either urged or have actually occurred. At the present time the Disciples of Christ are locating Bible colleges at State universities. The Church has colleges at halls at no less than seven State universities. Among them are Michigan, Kansas, Wisconsin, California, Oregon, Virginia, and Georgia. In Canada such affiliations have been more common, and more successful than in the United States. As a part of the universities of Toronto and Montreal, buildings have been built by several churches and have been endowed.

It is probable that the University of Toronto represents, and that the application of the trust principle. Four institutions are federated with this university: Victoria University (Methodist), Knox College (Presbyterian), Wyllie College (Protestant Episcopal), and St. Michael's College (Catholic). Through this method of denominational college comes into close association with the national university, a certain amount of the teaching of general subjects is given by the university. Certain specific courses are offered by the individual college. Students of all colleges meet on a common level, and yet the students of any college are brought into the same contact with the same instruction with each other. The University of Toronto, through this process of federation or of affiliation, is in essence repeating what Oxford and Cambridge stand for a certain independence of each individual college, and also a comprehensiveness of life and of relationship which makes for largest things. It is not without meaning that Mansfield College, of the Congregationalists, and Manchester College, of the Unitarians, are established at Oxford.

The amalgamation of certain institutions in the city of New York has at times been debated. For the present the debate has received a negative decision. I have in mind in particular the union of Columbia University and of New York University. Many reasons exist for their separation. These reasons are, in the opinion of the trustees of these two institutions, stronger. But it cannot be doubted that in the future, whether a remote or a near future, no one knows, the same question of union will again emerge. In such a proposed amalgamation it might be considered whether the College of the City of New York, the new buildings of which stand in a sense midway between the buildings of New York University and of Columbia, should not be included. Such proposed unions I present merely as suggestions, for I am not unaware how serious and numerous are the objections for the formation of any such federation.

There is, however, one peculiar and strong argument against the application of the trust principle to the institution of the higher learning. This argument rests upon the worth of the local influence of the individual college. For the worth of this influence is great. Wherever there is a college, at least moderately good, there is found a point of intellectual light, a center of ethical force which attracts and holds a local constituency. There are hundreds of men in every State, useful citizens, efficient, devoted to the highest interests, who would never have gone, who perhaps would never have thought of going to college, if not for this local influence from their home. Within an hour of last Friday I met in New York two gentlemen, one a graduate of Hamilton, and one a graduate of Rochester, efficient and useful, who could probably never have had an education had there not been a college at their very door. The four Scotch universities of St. Andrews, Aberdeen, Glasgow, Edinburgh, are within a few hours' ride of each other. But there are men, graduates of Aberdeen or of St. Andrews, who could never have found their way to Glasgow or Edinburgh for an education. There are men, men in Glasgow, who could not have afforded a separate maintenance at Edinburgh during their undergraduate days, and there are men able and eminent in Edinburgh, who also were so poor as boys that they could not, in their turn, have afforded a separate maintenance in Glasgow.

The value of this principle of the local influence of an institution of the higher learning is rather to be depreciated nor over-appreciated. It is to be assessed at its just value. It certainly has some value. Its value is to be related properly to the value of the other great principle of educational efficiency arising from the application of the method of the trust.

Perhaps no better field for the application of this double principle of efficient efficiency and of local influence could be found than in the making of the suggestion (which many men would consider utterly irrational) of the union of two such colleges as Williams and Amherst. In point of age about twenty-five years divides the two; in point of distance not many miles. They are both colleges. They are both country colleges. Their standards of scholarship are alike; their scholastic equipment is similar; their undergraduate life is filled with the same forces and directed to identical aims. The number of their undergraduates of five hundred each is not unequal. They appeal practically to the same constituency, laymen and ecclesiastical. Why should not these colleges be one? Each undergraduate, I know, would cry out against such a union. The historic past would be broken. The Haystack Monument would seem to be desecrated. The stars would refuse to keep their appointment with Professor Todd's observatory. But aside from such historic relations, the future would seem to demand that two such colleges should, in some form, be made one in work, if not one in place or in name. These colleges have a future as well as a past, rich and rare. The efficiency of their service in the future might be vastly increased by a certain union. The professors in each institution are overpaid. Some of them are over-worked. One president and one board of trustees can administer for one thousand students as well as for five hundred. A union might allow a division of labor of such kind which would vastly promote the excellence of work. The large human interest constitutes an argument for forgetting the value of academic tradition and for legislating for the future centuries. Yet one should not and cannot eliminate the worth of the immediately local influence of each college. Although the frequent and fast railroad-car has narrowed the opportunity of this influence, it has not by any means abolished it.

Recollections of Monticelli, the Painter

By Robert Peet Skinner

UPON the back of a large canvas, now belonging to the collection of Senator Clark of Montana, and representing the Knight of the Surrealist Figure arriving at the wedding-feast of Lamuchio the Rich, is pasted this paragraph, cut from the very respectable Journal des Débats, printed at Marseilles on the 29th of June, 1860:

One of the personalities the most curious and at the same time the most sympathetic of our city has disappeared. Who failed to know this personage of the velvet jacket and hoop iron gray beard, that one saw daily at the sun's decline descending the Allées de Métilles, passing with grace and measured step the Rue Nationale and Vauvrière, with a picture under his arm? From his meditative silence, from his air of one detached from exterior languishing, from his attitude of French costume, one might willingly have taken him for an ascetic.

This was a painter. After all, one should have been able, in spite of his qualities, to see in him a survivor of those artists whose history has been for a century of frill—some from destruction of a Fra Bartolomeo or of a Fra Angelico, lost in one epoch of extinction.

The painter was Adolphe Monticelli, the greatest colored of our time, some of whose work has recently been shown in New York at the comparative exhibit of American and foreign art.

The man died in a small room at No. 12 rue Senac. His furniture consisted of a bed, an easel, and two chairs. The gay Provencal sunshine, which once loved more ardently or pointed more truly than he, found screen through a single window. The moonlight could not paralyze the painter's indistinct desire to paint. When found, the palette had dropped, the arm had fallen inert, but the fingers still clutched the pencil, and splashes of color were upon sheet and counterpane. The man was dead; the artist had died five years before.

He sleeps neglected in an unmarked grave. His native city pays him no honor, its "musée" leaving at best one example of his art, a penny nothing such as he sold for ten francs or a good meal in the days of his decadence. Marseilles, the home of Pierre Puget, of Pierre de Cusances, of Lottin, and of Bizard, has permitted the collection of Monticelli's works made by one of his townsmen to be dispersed. The Louvre took him out at all. But though the prophet is without honor in his own country, the genius has come into its own.

We have nothing to regret in consequence of this local indifference. Since we have permitted the best of his works to be acquired by discerning American collectors, but to the world at large the tardy recognition of the divine spark has resulted in loss. The several thousand Monticellis have escaped the great public repositories of art, and for the most part they are scattered among many private galleries. Monticelli's work appears to have been understood by appreciative and enthusiastic individuals for a good many years before his name had obtained a fixed place, but not to the extent of seriously affecting their market value. Until ten years ago it was still possible to find about Marseilles pictures painted in his best manner for a few thousand francs. It is this comparatively low range of values which enabled

Adolphe Monticelli, from a Painting by Himself

M. Edmond André to undertake his labor of love in assembling many of his townsman's masterpieces, probably in the hope that they would eventually enrich the Musée de Versailles or perhaps the Louvre.

What was the secret of Monticelli, who, slavishly worshipped by a few, was ignored by the crowd, and who, indifferent to friend and foe alike, led on his color, saying simply: "I paint for thirty years from now"? It is a secret that defies words, photographic reproduction, and the sapper's art. Some say that he painted with his thumb; others that he put on the pigment with his palette knife; still others that the stem of his clay pipe or his thumb nail distributed those luminous masses. French Magliane declares that he only used a brush. André Guiraud, the commentator of the Provençal masters, wrote of him:

To realize a dream of art, to show, to render tangible an hallucination, is this not genius? Time itself bestows the needs of our language to translate the sentiments which this painting awakes. It would be necessary, after finding more expressive terms, more suggestive adjectives, and more imaginative comparisons, to invent a writing composed of differently colored lines, of monochrome, of glowing green, and of shifting tints, to render the psychological beauty of Monticelli's palette, his natural power, and the happy synthesis of his distinctive and excess of color.

Monticelli's parents were extremely disappointed that he did not succeed his father in the homogenous occupation of public weights. The family were of remote Italian origin, said to have descended from the Duke of Spadina. Monticelli was all Provençal—gay, generous, affectionate, and exquisite. He was born October 14, 1824, and showed as young an aptitude for designing as he did dislike for his father's calling. Despite the moral opposition of his parents, he was permitted to attend the Marselles Ecole des Beaux-Arts, where he labored diligently, earning whatever of impetuosity there might have been in his temperament. His direction was the eminent painter Léon Leclerc, and he graduated in 1840 with a first prize. This was his only official distinction. He participated in no struggle for the honors of his profession. He needed for the joy of painting, for a generation it was said. He had something of a vision which approached artifice in regard to public recognition. To Magliane, his colleague at Marselles, he said:

"I allow myself the luxury of living down my needs: a rich yellow and a velvet black give me my supreme joy."

The old Magliane asked him why he never exhibited at the Salon. He professed ignorance.

"Salon? what salon?"

"Oh, your son, Adolphe, don't pretend not to know that every year at Paris all the artists of the world are invited to this great artists' feast."

"The Salon. So they exhibit pictures, real pictures, then? How dead! I have seen cattle fairs! I have seen the fat cattle exhibited at the la, la!"

And with this enigmatic reply, the great head shook, modestly. Monticelli went twice to Paris. His first journey was made soon after the student days, and his enthusiastic sea-sickness nature was stirred before the pictures of Watteau, Rembrandt, Titian, Correggio, Veronese, and Delacroix. His "quest" tendency asserted itself early. Before Rembrandt, who moved him profoundly, he dwelt with Middle-Age superlatives. He sketches in a portrait of Rembrandt—it is in M. André's possession—but gets as further. He says theatrically: "Only Rembrandt can paint from Rembrandt."

Though affected less deeply by Watteau than by some others in most respects, the former avowed within him the dream of light and love which resulted in his compositions of an elegant society where aristocratic women and ardent lovers revolve in painting a poetic and highly imaginative Decameron. He left Paris, his singular mind in a whirl of excitement and confusion. Again in his beloved Midi, he frequently forgot art in a series of stanzas of ventures in the l'école, which separated him from work during whole months. Thus ten years rolled by. During those ten years, Monticelli lived, not always too wisely, and the great personality, unaffected by the presence of the work of the masters which he had seen in Paris, slowly awakened.

During these ten years the artist painted after his "private manner." Its value is usually retrospective. There are pairs comparable to Rembrandt, others requiring only Watteau's signature, portraits which Biscia might have done, flesh tints from Titian, and skies and atmospheres from Claude. The grade of the work is smooth and fine. Madame Chave of Marselles possesses in her "Paradise" a good example of this première manière in which the personality begins to show itself. In the space of a small panel, miniature faces of angels appear, and as one looks and looks again, still other faces appear and continue to appear, until the whole panel is alive with tiny figures. There is an suggestion of the incrustations which shall hereafter mark the work of Monticelli.

It is impossible to fix with definiteness the periods of his career. They naturally merged into each other. The "early manner," or second epoch, when he became undoubtedly great, is usually fixed between 1840 to 1876. He has now returned to Paris, and becomes the intimate of Truven, Corot, and Diaz. He is accused of plagiarizing Diaz, but to his admirers this is as though we should accuse Shakespeare of plagiarizing Pope. Monticelli's production became enormous, and his financial carelessness phenomenal. His pictures were more often than not unsigned.

He passed a shop one day and recognized something of his own which he had painted with for forty francs. The owner demanded four hundred. "It seems very dear," said Monticelli. "I have known artists to receive forty francs for pictures quite as good."

"Find me your artist who can paint as good," said the dealer. I have been looking for months for the man who made this

(Continued on page 1963)

Le Parc de Rosat-Coud—Fête Sous Bois—from the Painting by Adolphe Monticelli
From the Collection of Mr. E. & F. Frost

The Adventures of a Naturalist

By John E. Lager

A SHORT time ago I received one thousand orchids from the Philippines. Not one of them lived. The consignment represented the year's work of an experienced collector, assisted by more than one hundred natives; the expenses of the expedition were considerable, and the dangers encountered and the difficulties overcome in getting the plants to the sea-coast for shipment to this country sufficient to apal any man. In this connection I often think, now that my work as a collector is over, that had I known at the start of an expedition just what my experience would be, I should have abandoned the attempt in despair of coming through alive.

The Republic of Colombia, South America, is the richest orchid-land on this continent. On one of my expeditions I landed at Savanilla on the Colombian coast. I was well armed, had a supply of the lightest clothing, an abundance of quinine in overcoat fever in malarious districts, and also had, packed away in my boxes, a number of American-made hammocks, and a quantity of good stout rails. From Savanilla I went to the Magdalena River, a short trip of twenty miles or so. The mouth of the river is on a tributary to the Gulf of Mexico, a distance of 600 miles. The trip is made in an old-fashioned stern-wheel steamer, which bears a strong resemblance to the boats seen on the Mississippi. From the mouth of the river to Honda is a ten days' voyage on this steamer.

The best time to make a trip on the Magdalena—or, in truth, on any Central or South American stream—is during the rainy season, when you are assured of a plentiful supply of water. To me a most peculiar feature of the country was and is the old way in which the streams are divided. If I am not mistaken, it is the only region in South America where the rainy and dry spells alternate every three months.

Arriving at Honda, the head of the Magdalena navigation, I outfit with mules for the baggage and supplies, and horses for myself and the head men. We followed the bank of the river for 200 miles to a place called Neiva, and were then 300 miles from the coast. It was Sunday, or more day, when we rode into the little town. The streets were filled with crowds of country folk, Indians and natives, who combined business with religion, and after going to mass, went to the market-place to hatter their produce. I went straight to the market and had every native I met that I wanted orchid-buyers. I even had 200, some of them full-blooded Indians, who agreed to search for and bring in plants for so much per plant. The initial cost of the orchid—that is, the price paid a native for one plant—is trifling, ranging from ten cents to twenty-five cents; but that represents only a small part of its actual cost to the collector.

Having obtained my natives, it was necessary to teach them just what I wanted done. They were shown orchids in their natural state, and instructed how to take them from the trees, how to preserve them, and how to pack them. This, with other preliminaries, consumed some three weeks. We then moved up country, back of a branch of the head-waters of the Magdalena, and established a camp. I sent my men out in small parties, never permitting a man to go alone.

Because of the dangers of the forests, I myself made frequent trips of exploration, with one or two natives, into what I believed to be new territory, and marked the more productive places, going in later to collect the plants.

When a hunter finds an orchid there are three ways of getting it: he may cut down the tree to which it clings; he may lasso the branch or limb on which it hangs and draw it to him; or he may cut a sapling, lean it against the tree, and climb up and bring down the plant.

The orchid is not a parasite, strictly speaking, but is an air-plant. It is found on soft-wood trees, clinging by its roots in the bark, somewhat after the habit of the ivy. To detach it from the tree a machete is slipped between the roots of the orchid and the bark of the tree, and the plant is gradually worked loose. The plan generally adopted by the men in my party was to cut down the tree.

We did this as a precaution against snakes and scorpions, which abound in that country, and which are as likely to be found in trees as anywhere else. If a man climbs a tree for an orchid and is suddenly confronted by the head of an angry snake in the dense foliage, his chances of escape are very small indeed. Many of the little snakes of the tropics are as poisonous as our own deadly rattler. I had two men bitten in the foot on that expedition. Both died. One lingered for four hours in the greatest agony. Such fear have the natives of the bite of one variety of snake found in Colombia that they regard amputation, when possible, as the only means of saving life. While I was in the country an Indian was bitten in the hand by a snake. His companion immediately drew his machete and chopped it off at the wrist.

We had been out a few weeks and were doing fairly well with our collections, when one day two Indians came into camp with their finds. From one of them I got what appeared to be a splendid specimen. It was almost a bad negro and well preserved. I held it in my left hand, admiring it, when my eyes were attracted to a bright spot in the centre of the plant. For what

Indians bringing in Bags of Orchids for Sale

Raft with Cacao of Plants on the Magdalena River, Colombia

Water-carriers in a Colombian Boat Town seemed a long time I stood there gazing on that bright spot before it resolved itself into the head of a poisonous snake. I dropped the plant and ran. The reptile was shaken out on the hard dirt floor of the tent and darted to and fro, while my men leaped outside, where one of them put a forked stick, another a large bottle, and the two went back into the tent. The man with the stick deftly drove the snake into a corner and pinned it down with the fork of the stick directly behind its head. The other Indian then came forward and held the mouth of the bottle at the snake's head; pressure on the stick was gradually released, and the reptile crawled into the bottle.

Travelers and natives are in danger of snake-bites even when about on the streams. It not infrequently happens that snakes drop from the branches of trees on the occupants of canoes and—well, a poisonous reptile is not a pleasant companion at any time, much less in the cramped quarters of a native canoe.

A short time after the snake incident mentioned above I was awakened by the screams of a man who slept beside me in my tent. We struck a light and found the poor fellow had been bitten by a scorpion. He was a large, strong man, so he recovered. A peculiarity of the effects of the bite of a scorpion is that the tongue of the victim swells until he chokes.

Later in the season I found a new district—that is, new to orchid collectors—up in the mountains, or, rather, at the base of the mountains, in the foot hills. I explored it for a distance of 150 miles, then established a camp and sent out my men. We were unusually successful, collecting some 250 new plants which would make good crops for shipment. The orchids were magnificent specimens, making it all in all a fine collection as I have ever seen in a forest camp. Then my troubles began. I had no canyons with me, and of I had had it would have taken from six months to a year to cut and lash out timber for just once. I hadn't even strong bags, such as are usually used by the natives. These bags are called masallas and are worn after the fashion of a fishing-net, with a line string at the ends. There were the plants stacked up in the tents with absolutely no means at hand for packing them. I finally concluded to go back to the Magdalena River, a three days' journey on foot, and get a supply of cloth bags. I cut the bags into two sections, packed the plants between, and sewed up the ends. I took another trip down the river to Nuvia, and started negotiations for changueros, or native carriers, to carry the load to Nuvia thence to Honda. These changueros are large boats with that bad body, and are manned by thirty men each, who stand on the foot and pole along the banks of the stream.

Returning to camp, I loaded up my men and the canned plants, tents, baggage, and all to the upper river banks near a point where a small branch stream joins the main body of water. We pitched tents and packed our plants securely inside with the exception of fifty packages, which were stacked in the open.

Every day for a week I looked in vain for these changueros. In the mean time the river kept rising at a rapid rate. The evening I went out to take a last look at the river before turning in for the night, the water was then about a foot from the top of the bank. I didn't like the prospect, but there was nothing to be done, so I went to bed. In the middle of the night I was awakened by my boy.

"Patron, patron!" he called. "El agua está en el pólo."

I had retired with all my effects on and tying up fully dressed. The river had evidently overflowed its banks, as had also the tributaries on which we were camped. It was pitch dark, the candles having put out our fires. The night was calm, the water, the cries of the natives warning about the camp, and all in an intense darkness, was enough to try the nerves of the boldest.

Finally we made a fire, and by the light of the burning logs saw that twenty-five of the fifty packages which had been left out-of-doors had floated away, and that the water was rapidly nearing the tents. The overflow from the branch stream had made a half-circle in our rear, and flowing into the river below us, left us stranded on an island, which every minute threatened to be submerged, for the "high ground" to which we had retired was in reality but a few feet out of water. The flood continued to rise. We were preparing to climb trees to insure our safety, when the water began to subside.

Three days later I got sight of the changueros down stream, and high and dry between a rock and a clump of trees. Fortunately the boats had not been injured. We worked all night by torch-light and got the big canoes down. After that we had comparatively easy time getting our plants to Nuvia, thence to Honda and the seaport.

Later I took a trip to the Cordillera Central country. I had seven men with me and two burros to carry the baggage. It was simply an expedition of exploration. We established headquarters at the foot of the snowy peak El Tolima, in Colombia, going out from there on foot into the surrounding country. One morning the entire party started up the mountain-side. It was hard work, and after stumbling along for half a day, we sat down to rest, deciding to make a day's trip of what originally was intended merely as a few hours' tramp. Time slipped by. Almost before we realized the day was near an end, and it began to get dark. Night comes very quickly in the tropics. We had made no provision for spending a night away from camp, and it became necessary to hurry back. Casting about for a less tortuous route than the one we had come, I spied a cañon a little distance to one side and almost parallel with a direct line to our line of supplies.

I thought the floor of the cañon might be easier walking than the mountain-side, and resolved to investigate it. The other members of the party had sworn to dismount me, but I was indubitably adequate and persisted in my intentions. Looking over the edge of the big gully in the imperfect light, I made out a big stone projecting from the side on which I was, and about twenty feet below me. I sat down and slid to the stone, thinking that was I was; there I could easily discern the nature of the ground farther down. I struck the stone with sufficient force to dislodge it, and so rolled together, the stone and I, to the bottom of the cañon, a distance of some sixty feet. It was an uncomfortable ride or roll while it lasted, but aside from a few bruises of no great consequence, did me no injury.

The most beautiful region the orchid collector meets in his travels is along the Orinoco, the Rio Negro, and the Amazon in South America. The scenery at times passes beyond the beautiful, and becomes so grand as to be almost terrible. Everything is on such a great scale. The rivers are the largest in the world, variable as at high water, the vegetation luxuriant beyond comparison and the animal and fish life startlingly strange. Two we find the Atelapha schweideri, a magnificent orchid with white flowers which blooms about Easter time. But the dangers and vexations of a trip on the Orinoco, for instance, would hardly be believed. Mules and mules back from the coast in the district where the orchids are found the Indians are in the wild state and are fast to all white men. They lurk in the bushes along the banks of the river, and shoot poisoned arrows at you if you happen to venture within range of their blow-guns. The centre of the stream is the only safe place. During the rainy season the mosquitoes swarm on the Orinoco in clouds, and sleep is well to be impossible. Even the grass, when you venture ashore, is your enemy.

A Group of Full-blooded Indians in Colombia

Rebel Troops in Colombia

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

TEN years ago a young man was struggling for a foothold as a writer of advertisements for a large dry-goods house in Indianapolis. His prose shapodities were not alluring, and the management had about made up its mind to discontinue his services. The last straw that broke the manager's patience was a rhymed parody on Riley's "The South Wind and the Sun," which was turned to the glorification of an array of stylish straw hats in one of the front windows of the store. "Who wrote that stuff?" demanded the proprietor as the manager sought his approval of the morning's advertising poems.

"Er—Nesbit?" began the manager, deprecatingly. "I told him I didn't think it would do—I was afraid he would have to—"

"Tell him to go ahead and write some more of the same kind," broke in the proprietor. "That stuff's all right."

A few years later this same young man was revisiting his native town in Ohio, and incidentally called on the local liveyman to pass the time of day. When he had given a friend of the liveyman's, who had observed the greeting, stepped forward and asked: "Who was that fellow you spoke to just now?"

"That—why, that's Bill Nesbit, a young fellow who used to live here," was the reply. "He lives East some where now."

"What does he do?"

"He writes poetry for a newspaper."

"The deuce he does! Say, is that a fact?"

"Sure! And they pay him for it."

"Well, well," exclaimed the bewildered native with a sigh. "don't it beat all what some people will do for a live!"

It was true. The young man was no other than Mr. William D. Nesbit, whose recently published book of verse, The Trail to England, is fast carrying his name behind the borders of the Middle West, where it has already become a household word. That rhyming emendment of Riley's poem for which the straw hat was responsible, was Mr. Nesbit's first public effort at humorous verse, and out of a florid dry-goods house came forth this poet of the people. Only a poet could do justice to the event; only Mr. Nesbit himself could truly celebrate it! It was but an incident—a trifling incident some might say, not worth recalling; and so laugh over it—some more heartily than the poet himself. But smaller things have made a man turn the corner of a career, and I can conceive of Mr. Nesbit's everlasting gratitude to Riley and the straw hat. For his funny rhymes immediately caught the eye of the Indianapolis editors. From 1892 to 1898 he was on the staff of the Journal of that city, then he joined the Baltimore Evening Sun, where his wit and humor ripened and gained individuality, over the pseudonym of "Josh Wink." From Baltimore he went to Chicago, where he has distinguished himself in the columns of the Chicago Tribune by his daily poems under the heading "A Line or Two." During the past year Mr. Nesbit's work, in prose as well as in verse, has been appearing more and more frequently in the periodicals and magazines throughout the country, and with the publication of The Trail to England he has become a full-fledged author, and from the perceptive interest of a community has passed to the stage of universal suffrage. That his book has evoked immediate and widespread interest was to be expected. It remains to say just on what grounds this expectation was based.

As soon as a writer begins to win distinction and to demand notice, there is a tendency on the part of readers and reviewers to link his name with some other distinguished author, and to liken his work to other work in the same field. Thus we find in certain quarters that Mr. Nesbit is talked and written of as a successor to Riley, and in others as of kin to Eugene Field. The fact is that Mr. Nesbit makes the same wide, warm appeal to health and humor, and that his work contains the same elemental qualities that characterize the verse of these poets of the people. That he has a distinctive individuality, a note which is unmistakably his own. His verse has the direct, authentic charm of spontaneous utterance. The secret of his power lies in the sincerity and simplicity of his thought and language. It runs into all the delicious turns of the common life; nothing is too commonplace for his pen. Whatever his theme, he touches the human chord and makes it vibrate with music. He has deep feeling; he has strong conviction; he has faith in goodness; he has ideals; he has a wide sympathy and tenderness, and he has an original humor which is his saving gift. His humor is personal, tender and broad in all his writing. There is always a deep underlying seriousness in the graver humorist, and The Trail to England leaves us in no manner of doubt as to Mr. Nesbit's moral earnestness. Side by side with "The Old Well," "Dickory Nottin," "Johnny's P.A.," "Sh-h-h!" "Borrowin' the Baby," and like verses of delicious humor, there are grave, earnest, profound utterances on such themes as "The Log of Life," "To the Hills," "The God of the Unafraid," "The Clutch of Chance," "The Lesson of Tired," and "Unfinished Lessons." Mr. Nesbit has not come in his present book on the sound of the people without serious thought and purpose. It is his opinion that the taste for newspaper verse has undergone a change during the last decade. Instead of the noisy jingle and horse-play of irreverent parody that once filled the columns—in lighter verse—it is remarkably in evidence that the public now leans to a preference for the more serious rhymes.

And so Mr. Nesbit has been gradually weaned away from the natural desire of the funny man to write things that will make people laugh to a more laudable exercise of his humor, which makes people think and feel as well as laugh. That is the modest and finest use of humor—a use which does not affect the spontaneity of its art, but which invites the best in a man's mind to contribute to its most effective utterance.

In Mr. Nesbit's "Late Christmas Afternoon," which appeared in the last number of the WEEKLY, the poet made his lines glow with the warmth and cheer of the season. Here I should like to give some verses from "Her Christmas Prayer," a poem in a more poignant but no less human key.

My Mother, be good to him;
Be kind to him that day
'Twill be the only Christmas time
That he has been near.

I promised him a world of toys
If he would only stay
Sure, heaven's full of little boys
That you would know the smile of him
Among a thousand
His smile will make all else seem dim
When you call him "Auntie."

I promised him a splendid tree,
With candles all aglow,
At Mary Mother, you recall me
'Twas me that loved him so.
And surely, surely, you will see
My love on every tree
His eyes are lingering for me
As my eyes are for him.

My Mother, be good to him;
Be kind to him that day
'Twill be the only Christmas time
That he has been near.

William D. Nesbit
Author of "The Trail to England"

Miss Ethel Barrymore in a Scene from "Sunday" at the Hudson

Miss Barrymore's role in "Sunday," as by Thomas Han-wood. It is the story of an American girl who has been treated in the Far West with "our much abused" per gullibility and quandaries. She goes to London and there falls in love with a young Englishman, but numerous misunderstandings arise to keep the lovers apart. Then "Sunday" returns to her old home in America. The English lover soon follows, and they are finally happily married.

"The Sho-Gun," a Comic Opera, by George Ade, at Wallack's

George Ade's latest contribution to comic opera, "The Sho-Gun," which is now being presented at Wallack's, deals with the adventures of an American promoter on the imaginary island of Ke-Choo. The promoter, who is looking a head of chewing gum, arrives on the island during the temporary ab- sence of its ruler, the "Kio-Gun," and immediately proceeds to reorganize the government on the American plan. His efforts produce some amusing situations and complications, but with typical American ingenuity he manages to overcome all the difficulties, and in the end establishes himself as "Kio-Gun."

AT THE NEW YORK THEATRES

LILLIAN RUSSELL, WHO WILL APPEAR AS "LADY TEAZLE" AT THE CASINO, DECEMBER 26

Lillian Russell will appear on December 26 in the title role of "Lady Teazle," a new comic opera based upon Sheridan's "School for Scandal." The book and lyrics are by John Kendrick Bangs and Rudrick C. Penfield, and the music by A. Baldacchi Monac.

Correspondence

THE "GOD OF BATTLES" AGAIN

PORTLAND, OREGON, December 4, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—So many valiantly proved that there is no God of Battles. That in the away there is an army of a war god. Well, well. This is sad, and so that it provokes inquiry. All the nations on earth in the greatest of their earthly affairs calling police! police! and there is no police.

The universe is a very great human concern sunning scoundrels and no inventions of any avail.

Can this be possible, or is there a chance of a flaw in the argument, a hickling element in the away? Can the golden truth have dropped out somewhere?

God, like a good politician, stands by his friends, and his friends are those "who keep his commandments." One of the commandments in war is to have at the point of contact three battalions to your enemy's two, to have guns that shoot a little further, and men trained to use them. Obedience to this command has usually always produced immediate results. The prayer of wise soldiers being answered so frequently suggests an answering deity, but even unrepentance does not preclude divine aid. England, America, and Russia are inseparably religious nations continually invoking divine guidance, and in a standing way professing to be guided, and these nations are especial favorites of the God of Battles: he almost always sends them up against the little peoples that have much land; their language is awful, but does not discourage him; an irrepressible triple of encouraging argument must go circling about the throne when any one of those three nations puts on its war harness and attempts war; the blundering is an exquisitely idiotic; the swimming in the bloody current of war that they make is so like that of clumsy children; nevertheless, they arrive and have much power and glory.

Another great prayer of a nation is the cry of its need, and here Russia is strong. Think of a nation of one hundred and fifty millions, shut in from the open sea, denied the use of God's free waters, doomed to semibarbarism in a closed interior. Think of United States spelled in capitals, with our Atlantic coast held by France, Germany, and Spain; our Pacific coast by China and Japan; our Gulf coast by Turkey, Austria, and Italy; our only outlet say at Honolulu Bay, and imagine United States powerless.

A people an ill-starred nation pray, most pray to live in oil, and being so situated, like the victims of the Black Hole in Calcutta, are justified in cutting their way out through contiguous property without much regard to its technical ownership; or, the great United States, did it in our time.

Give the God of Battles time to manifest himself. There is a suggestion somewhere that in his sight a thousand years are as one day.

If Russia fails, if the plucky little Jap and the unshakeable Turk and their allies are successful in hurring Russia from the thousand miles of temperate coast-line that is Russia's due, if hundreds of millions of white people remain in semibarbarism doomed to perpetual social and political misrule, if war want of open doors and windows, then there will be reason to suspect that there really is no God of Battles. Until that time the Russian is justified in hurrying on his god by Russia and prayers how long, oh Lord, how long!

Yours truly,
AMSTERDAM CREAMER.

THE PASSING OF MISSOURI'S SENIOR SENATOR

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, November 28, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—If anything were needed to demoralize in the thoughtful mind the truth that the penalties of politics are greater than the rewards, that factor is probably supplied by the approaching retirement of General Francis Pickens Cockrell, whom Champ Clark has been pleased to call in affectionate admiration, "our senior and perpetual Senator." The prophetic portion of the Big Congressional characterisation has been fully swept by the unexpected election of a Republican Legislature in Missouri, which will elect from its own party a successor to the seared veteran of a hundred bloody conflicts.

The defeat of the most popular man in Missouri was unexpected. Scarcely one of the political leaders in Missouri gave the question serious thought. It has been thirty years since General Cockrell was first elected to the Senate from Missouri, and in that time no man has let his ambition run away with his judgment to the extent of causing him to announce his candidacy against the sitting member. Twenty-four years of that time Cockrell's colleague was George Thurman Vail, and during all of those years Missouri's primacy on the floor of the Senate was secure questionless.

Senator Cockrell's retirement comes about by reason of a combination of circumstances difficult to overcome. For a number of years about two-thirds of the legislative districts in Missouri have been so close that less than one hundred plurality could be secured by whichever party was the stronger in the district. This year the Democratic party managers had to confront an upsurge in the rural districts which was deadly and hardly curable. As a result nearly all of these districts went Republican. It was the direct consequence of the Parker telegram to the St. Louis convention. The people of Missouri were in very close touch with that convention; their daily metropolitan papers, published in the convention city, were very replete with accounts of the proceedings. In addition, every community through the State had its visitors at the convention. The overwhelming majority of the Missouri Democrats were and are followers of the brilliant Nebraska; they watched his fight in the Committee on Resolutions with bated breath. They realized that he had almost sacrificed his life in the long ordeal that finally resulted in the defeat of Hill's purpose to put a gold plank in the platform. They thought the Western Democrats were entitled to sufficient quarter from the "reorganizers" to be spared the humiliation of having to walk up and vote for the thing which they had so strongly combated. Having fought a good fight and having defeated Hill's purpose to put a gold plank in the platform, they only body empowered to draft a platform, they felt that the Parker telegram was a Hill trick, and a surreptitious method of stealing from them the fruits of their hard-earned victory before the committee.

These Democratic farmers didn't hold indignation meetings and howl to the paled moon. They didn't even say what they were going to do, but with forgetfulness of the legislative candidate, the Congressional members, and almost everything else but that gold plank and Walker's River, they doggedly stayed at home on election day. In some counties, where the local non-natives had provided vehicles to take the infirm, the sick, and the aged to the polls, numerous cases were noted where historic stanch Democrats refused to get out of the hogges and spring wagons to vote, having renewed on the road to the voting place their determination to withhold their ballots.

If all the votes were cast in Missouri, and cast along party lines, the Democratic plurality would be in the neighborhood of fifty thousand. In the electoral college only the head of the State ticket was elected, thus being Mr. F. W. Folk, the young Tennesseean who landed St. Louis hoodlums in the penitentiary and the people came to the conclusion that the man who made the best choice of Attorney General elected to office in the State might do equally well as Governor. However, the general Democratic apathy would have defeated him, along with the remainder of the ticket, had it not been for about twenty thousand Republicans, mostly in St. Louis and Kansas City, who scratched from their tickets the name of their own candidate for Governor to vote for the prospect of hoodlums.

The story of how Mr. Folk secured the nomination of his party after a terrific fight against the organization has been discussed in every publication between the oceans. It resulted in the Folk forces taking charge of the State campaign. Just after the election, Senator William Joel Stone was asked by a representative of a St. Louis paper as to what he thought was the cause of the defeat in his own district. He replied that one of the causes lay in the fact that "the old guard" didn't have charge of the campaign in the State—meaning the organization sometimes discourteously called "the ring." Congressman Vanderlip replied laconically, saying: "The Senator forgets that we suffered a similar defeat in 1892, while Stone was Governor. The State again was on guard, and at that time the Democratic Party did not take a United States Senator in anything for."

The most remarkable incident in connection with Senator Cockrell's retirement occurred when Vice President McKinley called with an eight-column banner hung across the first page, asking on Senator Stone to resign in order that Senator Cockrell might be elected to fill out Stone's unexpired term, and printing in connection with the unique demand signed promises from a number of the members of the Legislature agreeing to join with the minority in electing Cockrell to the vacancy. It is needless to say that most men in politics fail to look seriously on the matter.

I am, sir,

WALLACE BRADSHAW.

WANTS A SEQUEL

KNOXVILLE, TENN., November 22, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—I have just finished reading the discussion of correspondents of the New York Times Book Review of The Masquerade, and the most remarkable thing I saw was the absence of comment on the possibility of an Excess Androm sequel. It will be recalled that the announcement of the death of a illustrious man in the month of Loder—old old trick of newscasters who want to subsequently surprise the reader. The possibilities in the situation, therefore, may be by no means exhausted. Calcutta can be revived as I hope for the sake of a still unmet appetite he will be, can be won by Lillians and the other two at the same time, etc., etc. And Lillians, it must be remembered, once loved Loder. Let us hope for Lucy, etc. In short, the story isn't finished. And let us hope that it is—end, and yet that he, soon—will have a better job of it than when "the play actor" returned in Zenda, and then when his L'Esprit re-arranged Redoubt. For both of these heroes were much the worse for their season of desecration.

I am, sir,

HERMAN ELLIOTT.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW YORK, December 4, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir.—In all boundless littleness at the feet of the editor of one of the finest papers of our country, I ask you all letters in HARPER'S WEEKLY are signed "I am, sir"? Do all the correspondents sign themselves thus, or is it the individual taste of the editor? After reading several hundred of these letters I am, sir, yours truly, AGABARTON.

[All don't, but all ought to be.]

THE LATEST ADDITION TO OUR NAVY—LAUNCHING OF THE ARMORED CRUISER "TENNESSEE"
 The new armored cruiser "Tennessee" is being launched today. The ship is 11,500 tons displacement, and similar in construction to the new cruiser "Pensacola." They will, however, be under and faster than the "Pensacolas," and will carry 10-inch instead of 8-inch guns. The speed of the "Tennessee" will be 16.5 knots per hour.

Awarded
Grand Prize

St. Louis
Exposition

Cash Dividends

and Other Concessions

Amounting to Over

FIVE MILLION DOLLARS

Have Been Voluntarily Given to Holders of Old Policies by

The Prudential

A Company Which is Actually Paying Out
More Than its Obligations. The Best Guarantee of Liberal Treatment.

Write for Policy Rates Today for Yourself or Your Family. Dept. T.

THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA

JOHN F. DEYDEN, Pres.

Home Office: NEWARK, N.J.

MISS SOMBRERO

By

KARL EDWIN HARRIMAN

Ever since her arrival in Ann Arbor, after a tedious ride of three days from Wyoming, Miss Darrow had been spoken of as "Miss Southerner," owing to the fashion of hat she wore; still, that was no excuse for Baldwin's ill-mannered carelessness.

It could not have been quite so bad if both girls had not within the fortnight announced their candidacy for the presidency of their class. Under these circumstances Miss Raydon interpreted the aloof as a full-fledged jab at her opponent, while Miss Darrow considered it nothing more or less than an unparliamentary affront. The impressions each received were deepened by the fact that Baldwin had openly taken up the cause of Miss Raydon, and was working tooth and nail to secure her election.

"But I'll beat her! I'll beat her yet!" exclaimed Miss Darrow. "And what's more, I'll beat her both, or my name isn't Jim Thorpe."

She went over to the dining, and, sinking among the pillows, flung one arm around her roommate, Madge Lawton, and drew her head down upon her shoulder, as after my mother died—was laughing at the idea. "It has just come to me that I'll have to be elected," she said. "Here to be, to sure myself, at home!"

Madge drew back.

"To sure yourself at home?" she exclaimed. "What in the world do you mean by that?"

For a moment Miss Darrow hesitated, then leaning forward, she said: "If I tell you what I mean, will you promise never to breathe a word of it to anybody?"

"Yes, yes; go on!"

"Well, then, you know I grew up in the heart of the West. Why, Madge, father gave me a little revolver and taught me how to use it when I was six years old! And by the time I was twelve I could ride anything on the Great Divide, from a shorthorn to a bucking bronco."

"Well, one night I heard father and Aunt Sarah talking in the dining-room, and I listened. Father was saying I ought to be sent to college in a year or two, and Aunt Sarah—father's sister who came to live with us after my mother died—was laughing at the idea. She asked him what he thought I'd do in college, and then pictured me at a college dance. She told him I'd be the laughing-stock of the whole school—bored away out there. I never realized till then that what Aunt Sarah thought was right—partly. I was sure tumble than anything else, and, Madge, I wrote a great big note, then and there, that I'd show Aunt Sarah I could go to college, and once there, I'd do something—something great—right off."

"Yes; go on," Madge put in, breathlessly.

"Well, I finished off the exams, and—er—and—er—tact you—and—and, I guess that's all," Miss Darrow flung out her arms and smiled. She rose from the divan. "And, as you see," she added, slowly, "why I want to do something here, achieve something, just to prove to Dad that I can. That's why I'm out for the presidency of the class."

Miss Darrow coiled and took up the trim blue-steeled rifle that leaned against the bookcase. She raised it to her shoulder and sighted along the barrel. Then she lowered the mechanism at the lock carelessly.

"Dad wanted me to bring it," she said. "You know I used to be a dead-shot." She brand the weapon back against the shivers, and, reaching up, took down from the corner of a picture-frame a beaded necklace of efford buckskin. She set the picture back upon the mass of her black hair and turned, smiling.

In the dim Madge caught her two hands and made a way face.

"What did you wear that thing for?" she asked.

"Miss Darrow held the hat down at arm's-length in front of her. She pulled the crown in and out. She ran her finger around the beaded design.

"Dad asked me to, she said. 'That's why.'"

II

Mr. Jack Baldwin had been awake for some time. He stood at the alarm-clock on the mantel. The hands registered twenty minutes past six.

Presently there came a knock upon his door, followed by: "Mr. Baldwin?" Mr. Baldwin? He recognized the matron's voice.

"Yes," he responded, drowsily.

"It's a quarter past eight, Mr. Baldwin, and—"

"Lord! Thanks! Pour coffee! Right out!" And Mr. Jack Baldwin leaped from bed with more agility than he had ever shown in crossing the goal-line or making a touch-down.

He baited his coffee and ran from the house. At the southeast corner of the campus he slackened his speed. As he passed under the corner of the laboratory he brought up at a dead stop and stared. A great throng of howling, jerring, screeching students crowded and pushed on either at the base of the college flag-staff from the left's tip of which floated an immense white flag, with these symbols marked upon it in black: "L.H. '08."

Baldwin rushed headlong into the crowd. "Who did that?" he cried. No one paid the slightest attention to him. He gazed still, and at that instant, as though jerking him from its dream-point of vantage, the great banner spread itself upon the breeze and the letters stood out vividly. The crowd screamed its delight.

"Who did that?" cried Baldwin a second time.

A little freshman at his elbow offered the information that a posse of seniors had raised the flag in the dead of night, then cut the lanyards so some way to prevent its being hoisted down. The ends of the ropes dangled a hundred feet above the heads of the mob.

It was quite as well the president called upon Brady, instead of upon Baldwin to clear a certain point made that morning in one of the president's courses. The latter's mind, at the moment, was not fixed upon a consideration of doctrines and tenets, but rather upon a means whereby the senior flag might be hoisted down with the greatest dispatch to the class it represented. The notion was half over when the face of Mr. Jack Baldwin faded. At the clatter of the going he was out of his seat like a shot. At the library entrance he came upon Evans and Gilfill, juniors.

"Have you fellows seen the flag?" he asked.

"Yes, had not," Baldwin roughly outlined the state of affairs and guided them to a point of observation.

How the devil do you know they cut those ropes off of them?" Gilfill asked, wonderingly.

"Probably fopped 'em till they got 'em off the pulley, who, eluded 'em in the tackle, then jerked till they broke. See, they're only clothes-line," Baldwin pointed.

"Well, it's got to be some done," Evans offered, "but a fellow can't climb that pole."

"I should say not," Baldwin exclaimed. "That's just it. It can't be done that way. But I've figured it all out. Boys, as you get it down, we'll bring it, right here it is."

"It sounds all right," Evans said, simply, while Gilfill shook his head. "But you can't do it, Baldy, you can't do it."

Baldwin's ardent was not extinguished by this frank disagreement of his plan. He viewed the idea was a good one—could set his feet, at last, said if Evans and Gilfill wouldn't go into it with him, he'd set about carrying it out alone.

"You'll see," Baldwin shouted, shirking the sock at the staff, he crossed the street. On Washington Avenue he sought out the downtown.

There were certain parades to be made—certain articles of the greatest importance, if his plan were to be tried. He found them, instructed the clerk to wrap them in heavy paper and to tie them with stout cord. Coming back he met Miss Raydon. A spinster, stepping near them heard Miss Raydon say: "But, Mr. Baldwin, you mustn't forget the election comes on Monday." Baldwin's reply, made with great gusto: "I know that, Miss Raydon, but to-day is only Friday. That gives three days more to work. And you'd win if the election were to take place to-morrow!"

III

All morning the warning had sounded from above in a clear, "Buck at four o'clock!" It would be the first rush of the year, and therefore the greatest.

At half past two Baldwin appeared at the place of meeting and unsold a large parcel as Evans and Gilfill joined him.

Gilfill smiled. "Now, Baldy," he said, "you can't do it with those; on the level, you can't; there's really no use trying."

permitted a view of the crowd in front of the house. It had diminished by half.

"Couldn't I get out the back way?" Baldwin suggested.

"Wait! I'll see," Miss Darrow darted out of the room. Presently she returned. "There are more in the back yard," she said.

"But what will you handily think?"

"She isn't in the house, I'm here all alone. Mabbie—that's Miss Lawson, my roommate—she's out too."

"Well, if you—"

Miss Darrow cut him short. "Never mind talking about it any more," she said, sinking upon the divan. "Tell me just what it all means."

Baldwin explained the situation in a few words.

"The senior flag is run up, you see, and it's for the freshmen and juniors to get it down, that's all. Usually the ropes hang within reach, and the other side just stands guard. That's why there's always a risk. But this year the layabouts are cut off fifty feet up, and a risk is no good. That's why I tried to toss the flag where it is, with a Roman candle; do you see it?"

"He stopped suddenly," Baldwin cried. "What's that?" he whispered. He hung back the blinds and gazed out across the campus.

Away over on the other side appeared a solid phalanx of blues, the advancing body of freshmen and juniors, beating upon the throng of equal size that surged around the staff.

"See!" Baldwin cried. "Here they come! Look! Here they come!"

Miss Darrow stood at the screened window. Now and then she glanced at Baldwin. She noted how his fingers closed upon the sack, and how tense his face was.

"Does it mean as much?" she asked, quietly.

"Much!" he replied, excitedly, leaning upon her.

"Does it mean as much? It means your class and mine are disgraced if that flag doesn't come down. Do you call that much?"

A yell was heard outside. Baldwin turned back to the window. The two bodies had come together. The rush was on.

"Look! Look! Look!" Baldwin screamed. "See 'em; see 'em! Oh, they've driven 'em back! Pull up, you fellows; show what you're made of; pull up! There! There! They're together again! Look! It's great!"

At the cry, as the two phalanxes came together, Miss Darrow looked out the window a second time. Baldwin did not observe that she started suddenly and darted into the room. She turned, carrying a little square box. She watched up the rifle bearing against the look-alikes, and flying back to the window, pulled down the upper part.

At the sound Baldwin turned. "For Heaven's sake, what are you going to do?"

Holding the rifle muzzle down, like an old hunter, she slipped half a dozen cartridges into the magazine. She rested the barrel on the upper sack of the lowered window.

"You tell me your class and mine will be disgraced if that flag stays up," she said. "Well, you tried—and failed. It's my turn now—what I'm going to bring it down!"

"But the report!"

"With that noise out there, they won't hear it at all! Now for it!"

He watched over her shoulder. She took careful aim; at what, Baldwin did not know. She pressed the trigger. A report followed that for a moment deafened him. The flag still waved. She aimed again. Three shots were fired in rapid succession.

The great white flag seemed to drain up and quiver. This it dropped, floating at its full breadth upon the upturned lambs of the crowd below.

V

Cries of "Miss Darrow! Miss Darrow! Speech!" filled the ghoshy old chapel where for years all class elections had been held. Miss Darrow rose. She had very little to say. She sat down again, amid another state of chaos. She sat alone around the room. Miss Boynton had fled. She sat like eyes of Jack Baldwin, who stood near the corridor door. He smiled, gave her a hopeless shrug, that said the crowd pressed him from crumpling the room, and shook his own head by way of congratulation.

"Are you going to stay for the rest, Miss Darrow?" a voice at her elbow asked.

"Oh, Miss Noble is it you? No, I'm not going to-day. I'm going down town to telegraph. Do—mean home?"

"Do you mind my walking with you?" Miss Noble asked.

"Why, of course not. Come on."

As they turned into the diagonal walk leading to State Street, Miss Noble said: "I wanted to go down with you because I've something to say to you. I'm a junior, and it's what a junior always has to say—"

"What is it?" Miss Darrow asked, simply. "Is it very terrible?"

"Not if it comes out the way as soon as it is," was the reply. "It's this, Miss Darrow. We want you to pledge yourself to our society—Alpha Phi, you know. So many of the girls hate our class, and—and—well—we all like you very much." Miss Noble was addressing the other side of the street. From the tail of her eye Miss Darrow saw she was blushing.

"I always make a state of this job," Miss Noble went on. "but we want you to join us. Will you? That's all. It's not hard. Will you?"

It was a full minute before Miss Darrow replied. "Miss Noble," she said, finally, "it's awfully good of you to honor and all that, but—"

"I always make a state of this job," Miss Noble repeated heartily.

Miss Darrow smiled. "No, it isn't that." Miss Noble sighed her relief.

"It's my father," Miss Darrow went on. "You see, I'd hate to ask him—and—and—I don't know. Anyway, Miss Noble, I'd rather wear your pin than any other."

They had reached the little box-office of the telegraph station on Union Street, across Main.

"Before Miss Darrow could answer, Miss Noble suggested, "why not put in a word about my son?"

Miss Darrow pointed the pencil above the blank. "I suppose I could," she said, and then, finally, "I will."

The operator wrote half a dozen hieroglyphs at the top of the sheet.

"And the reply?" he suggested.

Before Miss Darrow could answer, Miss Noble exclaimed: "The Alpha Phi house, on Division Street. She'll be there—no appointment."

A little way farther along Miss Darrow said, quietly: "Miss Noble, I want you to tell me one thing. Has my election had anything to do with this invitation to join you?"

"Ah, told him I'd be the laughing-stock of the whole school!"

"THE STORY OF THE SCIENCES"

A HISTORY OF SCIENCE

BY

HENRY SMITH WILLIAMS, B.Sc., M.D., LL.D.

Author of "The Story of Nineteenth-Century Science," "The History of the Art of Writing," Editor of "The Historians' History of the World," etc., etc.

IN FIVE VOLUMES

Profusely Illustrated with Portraits of Famous Scientists, Diagrams, Facsimiles, and Pictures

A GREAT EDUCATIONAL WORK

If you are a scientist, teacher, student, professional man, or layman interested in the world's progress, you will be interested in A HISTORY OF SCIENCE for it is a record of this progress from the earliest discoveries of primitive man to such recently discovered facts in modern science as radio-activity and the new theories of light and electricity.

It is a complete history of the development of the natural sciences—Astronomy, Physics, Chemistry, Anatomy and Physiology, Medicine and Surgery, Meteorology, Paleontology, Zoology, Geology, Biology, Psychology, and the various important subdivisions of these sciences. There are also biographical sketches of most of the great discoverers, with picturesque incidents that have figured in so many of their discoveries. The method of presentation as given in A HISTORY OF SCIENCE has all the charm of romance and all the authority of history.

IT IS A WORK THE LAYMAN CAN UNDERSTAND
IT IS UNTECHNICAL, YET ACCURATE

IT FASCINATES THE GENERAL READER
WHILE COMMANDING THE RESPECT OF
THE MOST CRITICAL STUDENTS

IT IS THE ONLY WORK OF ITS KIND IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE
SEND FOR THE BOOKS AND JUDGE FOR YOURSELF

Henry Smith Williams

OUR OFFER

On receipt of One Dollar we will send you the entire set of five beautiful volumes. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $2.00 a month for nine months. On receipt of your request for these books we will enter your name as a subscriber for one year, without additional cost to you, to either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. In writing, state which periodical you want.

Harper
& Brothers,

New York:

Please send me, free of charge, your illustrated booklet describing A HISTORY OF SCIENCE work.

Name.....

Address.....

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

Schlitz

The One Pure Beer

Not all beer is pure beer—that's why we ask you to be careful.

The reason is cost. Schlitz beer costs the brewer double what common beer costs.

We must pay the price for good barley. We must go to Bohemia for hops. We must bore to rock for our water.

Cleanliness costs fortunes. We cool the beer in filtered air. We age it for months, so it cannot cause biliousness. We sterilize every bottle after it is sealed.

Do you suppose we would do all that if beer could be pure without it? Yet Schlitz beer costs you no more than beer brewed without these precautions. Ask for the brewery bottling.

The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER & BROTHERS

NEW YORK

HARPER'S MAGAZINE

For JANUARY

HISTORY

A brilliantly interesting chapter in the diplomatic history of our country—"The Doctrine of Expansion" and its development—containing much new material gathered from the archives of the State Department. Illustrated.

Professor John Bassett Moore, LL.D.

BIOGRAPHY

A delightful biographical sketch of a famous physician of Queen Anne's day in England—a man who bullied royalty and told plain truths to kings and queens—a remarkable figure in the life of his time, yet one now almost forgotten.

Edmund Gosse

LANGUAGE

Professor Lounsbury, of Yale, our leading authority on the English language, discusses some of the much-debated questions in spelling, going into the history of the spelling and misspelling of certain words. A most entertaining and informing article.

Professor Thomas R. Lounsbury

NATURE

Professor de Vries, of the University of Amsterdam, is perhaps the foremost student of plant life in the world. For years he has been making a study of plant evolution. The results of his research—his remarkable discovery concerning the origin of species—are printed for the first time by him in HARPER'S MAGAZINE for January.

Professor Hugo de Vries

SOCIOLOGY

Mrs. van Vort is well known as a student of sociological problems both here and abroad. Recently she has been making a study of the poor children of Paris—what is being done for their relief and uplifting. Her article will prove a revelation.

Mrs. John van Vort

TRAVEL

A travel article of an unusual sort—descriptive of a little-known valley in old Cornwall. In addition to being one of the most delightful prose writers of the day, Mr. Symons is one of the best of living English poets. He introduces a number of new and most delightfully characteristic poems into this article.

Arthur Symons

8 SHORT STORIES

BY WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS
MARY E. WILKINS
PHILIP V. MICHÈLS

BY MARY R. S. ANDREWS
WARWICK DEEPING
ETC., ETC.

PICTURES IN COLOR

BY HOWARD PYLE
T. K. HANNA

BY LUCIUS HITCHCOCK
ALBERT STERN
ETC., ETC.

Part II. Booth Tarkington's Novelette

Copyright, 1906, by Harper & Brothers

THE CASTLE COMEDY

BY THOMPSON BUCHANAN

An engaging story, written along comedy lines, of the time of Napoleon. The sprightly way in which the story is told, the dashing impudence of the hero, and the charm of the heroine combine with the beauty of the volume to make it unusually attractive as a Christmas gift.

With Illustrations in Color and Marginal Decorations by Elizabeth Shippen Green. Uncut Edges, Gilt Top, in Box, $2.00 net

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Copyright, 1906, by Harper & Brothers

THE LUXURY OF CHILDREN

BY E. S. MARTIN

With a genial charm and humor akin to that of Charles Lamb, Mr. Martin has written a series of essays which have to do with the many sweet, loving phases of child-life in the home. The book will delight all fathers and mothers. Its quiet good-humor and charming style make it a beautiful tribute to home life.

With Eight Illustrations in Color and Marginal Decorations in Tint by Sarah S. Stilwell. Square 8vo, in box, $1.75 net

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, December 24, 1904

No. 525

Copyright, 1904, by Harper & Brothers. All rights reserved.

EX-GOVERNOR WINTHROP MURRAY CRANE, NOW SENATOR FROM MASSACHUSETTS

Senator Crane was Governor of Massachusetts from 1900 to 1902, and has just taken the oath as Senator to fill the unexpired term caused by the death of Senator Hoar.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII

No. 2505

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 24, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy — $4 00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tanilla, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post Office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

THE President has decided that an extra session of the Fifty-ninth Congress shall be held next year. Whether such a session will take place early in the autumn for the purpose of tariff revision is as yet uncertain. Unless Congress is called together at that time, we may take for granted that no amendments of the tariff will be made during Mr. ROOSEVELT's second term. The President is convinced, we are told, that revision should be effected before the Fifty-ninth Congress meets for its first regular session, or else not at all. The tremendous majority by which the Democrats secured the House of Representatives in the November following the enactment of the McKinley tariff is derived by him conclusive proof that between tariff legislation and a general appeal to the ballot-box sufficient time should elapse to enable the people to learn from experience the effect of changes in customs duties. Some of the "stand-patters," wishing to disguise their opposition to a plan at one time regarded by the President with favor, have alleged that there is no real analogy between the fiscal and industrial situation likely to be presented in 1908 and that which existed in 1890, neither between the changes in a few schedules now proposed, and the sweeping, startling, confusing alterations made by Mr. McKinley. We doubt if the President was much impressed by the asserted distinction. He knows that the real friends of tariff revision want to act as quickly as possible, and that the argument against any change at all will be considerably stronger a year hence than it is now.

It was a creditable departure from precedent that Mr. ROOSEVELT made when he allowed the beneficiaries of Mr. McKinley's cabinet and diplomatic appointments to retain, if they desired, their posts during the term to which the former succeeded by accident. We need not recall that a different course was pursued by TRUMAN, FILMORE, JOHNSON, and ARTHUR. Now that Mr. ROOSEVELT has been elected President, it is, of course, proper that, on or before March 4, 1905, members of the cabinet, ambassadors, and ministers should tender their resignations, as they would do if Mr. ROOSEVELT were to be succeeded by a Democrat, or even by another Republican, in order that the Executive may provide himself with agents representing his personal choice. It does not follow, of course, that the resignations will all be accepted, but those who, at his request, retain their offices, or are promoted, will know that they are indebted solely to Mr. ROOSEVELT's esteem for their abilities and character. That Mr. JOHN HAY will remain Secretary of State we know on the highest authority—Mr. ROOSEVELT's own statement. There is also a widespread and seemingly well-founded impression that several other members of the cabinet will be invited to keep their places, but it is not believed that Secretary SULLIVAN is one of them. He may or may not have commiserated himself to the President by the emphasis with which, during the campaign, he advocated a "stand-pat" policy. That would have been a dangerous thing to do if, from the date of his speech of acceptance, July PARKER had striven earnestly to make the contest hinge on the tariff-revision issue. There is another and perfectly available reason for accepting Mr. SULLIVAN's resignation, namely, that there is not a State of sufficient importance to claim two seats in the President's council-room.

Of the ambassadors, it has been announced repeatedly, and not contradicted, that Mr. JOSEPH H. CHASE will be succeeded at the Court of St. James's by Mr. WILLIAM RICE. The lives of the best-known gentlemen and of the present Secretary of State have run curiously parallel. When HAY was assistant private secretary of ANASTAS LORAIN, WILLIAM RICE was the war correspondent of a Northern newspaper. After RICE became editor of the New York Tribune, he and HAY became editors. After HAY became ambassador to France, RICE became ambassador to the sovereign of the United Kingdom. It will be remembered that Mr. RICE has already been special ambassador to the Court of St. James's. That he will distinguish himself by after-dinner speaking as much as has Mr. CHASE is not to be expected, but there is no doubt about his qualifications in other respects. That Mr. CHARLES M. TOWNE will continue to be an ambassador is not believed. All of his appointments, first in Vienna, then to St. Petersburg, and ultimately to Berlin, are understood to have been procured by his friend Senator PENNELL, who, it is no secret, can scarcely be described as persona grata to the President. We presume that another Pennsylvanian, Mr. J. A. G. LEHMAN, of Pittsburg, who is backed by Senator KNOX, will be allowed to hold the post of minister at Constantinople for some years longer. Mr. BELLAMY STORER, of Ohio, formerly minister to Spain, and now ambassador at Vienna, is likely to remain in the diplomatic service, and so is Mr. GEORGE VOS L. METZ, now ambassador at Rome.

Now that Mr. BAYAN has shown his hand in the Outlook and the consequences of permitting him to resume the leadership of the Democratic party in 1908 can be foreseen, it becomes a matter of obvious moment to conservative Democrats that they shall retain control not only of the party's National Committee, but of its State committees in all doubtful Northern as well as in the Southern States. To that end it is obviously material that the leadership of the Democratic party in New York should be entrusted to a man known and respected for his political principles and personal character beyond the bounds of the Empire commonwealth. The choice of a new leader ought not to be long deferred, for it seems to be certain that Mr. DAVID B. HILL will carry on his announced intention of retiring from politics at the end of the year. Among the persons suggested for the succession to the leadership, which really, if not nominally, has long been held by HILL, may be mentioned Mr. CORN MEYER, who has long been a faithful follower of Mr. CLEVELAND, yet who at one time was a business partner of Mr. COCKER. As chairman of the new Democratic State Committee, Mr. MEYER is even now the ostensible leader of the party in the State of New York.

At least three of the up-State committees advocate the selection for the leadership of Mr. C. F. MURPHY, of Tammany Hall, or of some one designated by him, such as Mr. FRANK BRIDGES HARRISON, who, last November, was the Democratic candidate for Lieutenant-Governor. On the other hand, those who would like to see the party organized on lines peculiarly acceptable to Mr. CLEVELAND's friends, would prefer for State leader ex-Judge D-CURY HENRIK. No careful observer of the campaign made by JULIUS ROSENBERG for the Governorship—which no Democrat could have gained this year in the face of the ROOSEVELT vote—can doubt that he would have chosen Mr. ORRILL in 1902. He is much less well known out of the State, however, than is ex-Lieutenant-Governor WILLIAM F. SULLIVAN, and, therefore, less qualified to exercise the influence which should belong to New York in the national councils of the party. Those up-State committees who favor, as we have said, the selection of Mr. C. F. MURPHY for the post to be vacated by Mr. HILL, do so on the ground that the up-State Democracy should no longer be organized against Tammany for the purpose of countering State committees or State conventions, but that in the re-organization the Bronx line should be wiped out. There is a good deal to be said for the effacement of the geographical division which has so long existed within the New York Democracy, but it is unnecessary, and probably inexpedient, to take the leader of Tammany Hall for the purpose. Ex-Lieutenant-Governor SHELDON could act more effectively to the same end. We imagine, however, that, notwithstanding his retirement from politics, Mr. DAVID B. HILL will have something to say about the selection of his successor, inasmuch as he is believed to have picked out almost every member of the present State Committee. One thing may be accepted as assured, namely, that in no event will the Bryans control the State Committee of New York during the next four years.

The President's recommendation that a limited power to fix railroad rates shall be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission is receiving attention from members of Congress. Senator ELKINS, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, and author of the ELKINS bill to put a stop to rebates, says of the proposition the President has brought forward: "This whole question involves, in my opinion, the most important problem now confronting the American people." He has a plan for settling it,—the English plan, adapted after some years of cogitation, and which has worked well. As the result of six years' study he proposes an Interstate Commerce Court of nine members, one from each judicial district, men of practical experience and learning in railroad affairs, who should hold office for life and be liberally paid. To this court, which he would place on a par in dignity and standing with the Supreme Court of the United States, he would entrust to decide the rates not only of railroads, but of steamship companies. Such powers, he is convinced, should be entrusted not to a simple commission but to a duly formed tribunal. He does not expect legislation on this subject this winter, but he believes that when the time for legislation comes, the plan which he advocates will give general satisfaction.

Mr. THOMAS LAWSON's use of publicity is one of the interesting phenomena of the hour. The Times takes to itself some credit for declining to print his advertisements. It says it is not, and does not care to be, that kind of a newspaper. Not believing Lawson's charges, it does not care to aid in making them effective for the purposes for which they are designed. It notices that Mr. LAWSON has made a number of Wall Street. It thinks that if his performances are merely the tactics of a conscienceless trader who hammers down prices without warrant in fact or reason, the "big men" ought to expose his baseless assertions, but "if the market was indeed a house of cards," then a fair reaction from whatever cause may be helpful.

As for his wonderful advertisements, we suppose the papers that have printed them have not been actuated by immediate pecuniary advantage alone, but have considered that the advertisements had a certain moral right to publication, and that to refuse them would not in the end promote the public good. Moreover, the advertisements had considerable value as news, and the papers which place a particularly high value on news would think several times before declining them. We understand that the fascinating narrative of Mr. LAWSON's fiscal adventures, which now claims to reach some millions of readers every month through one of the most magnificent, was offered to most of the established high-class magazines for publication, but none of them would touch it with a pair of tongs. Naturally, no publication with a reputation to lose could be the vehicle through which the workings of the mind of the Boston financier should be exposed to the public. The proposition made to the newspapers was different, and most of them have felt differently about it. We do not censure them. We do not even know that they have done wrong. Yet the use of newspapers to secure such results as have followed Mr. LAWSON's advertisements is a phenomenon that invites reflection.

The suggestion that Mr. LAWSON has been stirred to ebullience of special activity by jealousy of the large place temporarily occupied in the public eye by Mrs. CASSE THOMAS CHADWICK is not entirely incredible. Mr. LAWSON's aspirations after notoriety are of a monopolistic quality, and there is no doubt that Mrs. CHADWICK was making a considerable figure in a field where he might be expected to resent intrusion. But who can tell how Mr. LAWSON's mind really works? Does he work it, or does it work him? Has he got it under control, or is it running away and dragging him after it? Our little world would really like to know, and if the commonwealth of Massachusetts should see its way to send a committee of alienists to wait on Mr. LAWSON and report upon his mental condition, the report would undoubtedly command the best place in the news columns of most of the papers.

The disposition, after the slump in stocks of December 8, to bracket Mr. LAWSON and President ROOSEVELT together as disturbers of the bull market's peace, but much of its plausibility after LAWSON's second flight of stock-market missiles had been followed by the losses of December 12.

Who has seen GATES, and has any taken his temperature? He used to be thought susceptible to a kind of microbe such as has lately been prevalent.

The CHADWICK affair has proved two things: first, that hard-headed bankers are soft in spots—a fact previously demonstrated by the HENNER affair; and that Mr. ANSON CURRIE is a man to conjure with financially as well as industrially. The latter fact should also have needed no demonstration, inasmuch as it is generally known that, in addition to other accumulations, he received for his investments in the iron and steel industry more than three hundred million dollars in five-per-cent, first-mortgage gold bonds of the United States Steel Corporation. There is only one man in the world whose signature or endorsement would carry greater weight, and that man, Mr. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, is much less widely known. The woman who calls herself Mrs. CASSE L. CHADWICK made up her mind to find out how far Mr. CURRIE's name would carry her, and proceeded to make a lavish use of it. The name was signed to a note payable, fifteen months after date, to C. L. CHADWICK, and dated May 20, 1902, for the sum of five million dollars; also to a trust agreement purporting to be a receipt for designated securities valued at more than thirteen million dollars; and to two notes for five hundred thousand dollars apiece; and to another note for two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. With the help of this magic signature, and the confidential disclosure of the interesting, if true, fact that she was Mr. CURRIE's illegitimate daughter, Mrs. CHADWICK seems to have succeeded in procuring about eight hundred thousand dollars from Pittsburgh bankers and business men, who were shrewd enough to pocket their losses; about as much more from banks in northern Ohio; and nearly two hundred thousand dollars in Boston. It is probable enough that a loan was promised in every case, and that the face value of the notes given by Mrs. CHADWICK was considerably larger than the sums actually received.

At bottom, however, it was the spell exercised by Mr. CURRIE's name that melted the most steely eye and unlocked the tightest fist. So extraordinary was the glamour exerted that banker after banker made large advances, without even verifying the securities alleged to represent some thirteen million dollars, and without ascertaining from Mr. CURRIE whether he had signed the trust agreement, or the three notes bearing his name. Manifestly, if there was any hypnotism in the affair, it is chargeable to his signature, and not to the woman who invoked it—a commonplace, unattractive person of doubtful sanity, and probably criminal antecedents, who seems to have taken for her model the far more ingenious and fascinating Madame HEMPEL. It will be remembered that the latter, who, by the bad coincidence which she attained in swindling, derived the name "La Grande Thérèse," obtained loans of a face value of about fourteen million dollars on a mythical inheritance, the securities constituting which were deposited in a safe that the French authorities were led by some legal manoeuvres, shrewdly conceived and ably executed, to seal up without previously opening it and examining the contents. We infer that Mrs. CHADWICK read of this trick with keen appreciation of its possibilities, for she proceeded to act in a similar way. After persuading a banker, one REYNOLDS, to seal up the trust deed for thirteen millions and the note for five millions without taking any steps to verify the signatures, she tied him up by a legal proceeding, so that, when he partially recovered from the burning influence of Mr. CARNEGIE's name, he was unable to satisfy his natural business curiosity by submitting the "securities" to that gentleman's inspection. We may add that, although one would suppose that the free and extremely lucrative use—so say nothing of the imputation on his private character—made of his name would be distasteful to Mr. CARNEGIE, he seems to take a philosophical, not to say jaundiced, view of the affair.

Although, as yet, there is no official confirmation of the report that the Russian Admiralty has decided to recall the Baltic fleet, it is probable enough that such a step will be taken before Admiral ROJESTVENSKY reaches waters in which he would be likely to encounter his Japanese opponent. As measures have been taken to fortify the Pescadores, islands near Formosa, the Tokio naval staff evidently takes for granted that the three divisions of the Baltic fleet will rendezvous at Saigon, the well-known French port in Indo-China, and will thence proceed in a body toward their destination, which, originally, was supposed to be the Yellow Sea and Port Arthur, but which now could only be Vladivostok. In view of the almost total destruction of the Russian war-ships which took refuge in Port Arthur, and of the fact that the cruisers which have made sorties from Vladivostok can no longer leave that port except one by one, through a narrow channel cut by ice-breakers, the Baltic fleet could hope for no material cooperation from any quarter, and probably recognizes its inability to cope unaided with Admiral Togo, owing to the inferiority of its personnel in discipline and efficiency. It looks, therefore, as if the fleet would go no farther than Saigon in any event, and, perhaps, may effect a junction of its three divisions at one of the French ports in Madagascar, thence to await an order to return. There is ground for suspecting that the despatch of the Baltic fleet was, from the outset, only a feint, intended to produce a calming effect on the Russian people, who were evincing indignation at the failure to relieve Port Arthur. It must have been plain to the Russian Admiralty that a junction of the Port Arthur squadron, even if it should still be in existence, with the Baltic fleet, would be practically impossible, owing to the fact that the seasoned naval force under Admiral Togo would lie between them, and be in a position to attack them in detail. We venture to predict that the only proof of naval prowess that will be given by the war-ships under ROJESTVENSKY's command will be the desirous one exhibited when in a panic they fired on British fishing-smacks in the North Sea.

It should at the same time be obvious that, from the moment when Russia makes up her mind not to dispute Japan's maritime ascendancy, there is no sense in continuing the war. Even if Russia by next summer could have placed three-quarters of a million of men in Manchuria, she could not feed them, for the resources of the country which is the theatre of hostilities are exhausted, and almost all of the food consumed daily by a huge army would have to be brought from a base distant thousands of miles. The carrying capacity of the single-track Siberian railroad—to equip it with a double track would take years, because the roadbed would have to be widened—is not adequate to the forwarding of food-supplies for even half a million men. It is also to be borne in mind that, owing to the shocking lack of sanitary precautions and of proper medical treatment in the Russian camp, the deaths and disabilities from disease during the winter may nearly counterbalance any reinforcements obtained by rail. In a word, the St. Petersburg government should, apparently, be prompted by every motive, except a natural desire to retrieve a tarnished military prestige, to make peace as quickly as possible on the best terms that can be got. We doubt whether Japan would ask anything beyond that evacuation of Manchuria which Russia promised the United States to make, together with a retrocession of the Liao-tung peninsula to China, and a recognition of Japan's protectorate over Corea. We scarcely believe that the Mikado's advisers would hargle over a pecuniary indemnity for the losses caused by the war. It would, however, be cheaper for Russia to pay two or three hundred million dollars for an immediate peace than to waste two or three times as much on a long, costly, and hopeless war.

In an interview with a World correspondent Dr. CONANT DOYLE expresses concern over the prevalence of crimes of violence in the United States. He says that "human life is held cheap in the States." That is true. He says "one man kills another and is not punished." That is too often true. He adds:

The law is loosely administered. I presume the trouble is that judges are not free as they are here; they are influenced by political motives; there is a pull either and thither and justice is not administered. Accurately in the establishment of a pure, independent judiciary throughout America there is the best possible scope for the energy of ROOSEVELT.

The energy of ROOSEVELT can have very little direct effect upon the enforcement of the penal laws, which is almost entirely in the hands of the States, counties, and cities. The President, it is true, in his recent message calls the attention of Congress to the long delays and great obstruction of justice in certain criminal cases before the Federal courts, and asks virtually for an amendment of that system of procedure in the Federal courts which makes it difficult to enforce the law against offenders who have money. Further than that he cannot well go except as he might call public attention, in ways which he well understands, to the prevalence of homicides. Moreover, our judiciary is both pure and independent. The great trouble is not that our judges are often influenced by political motives, or that "pull" often constrains them to a defective administration of justice. The average of ability among our judges is probably lower than among judges in England, but we do not think the standard of integrity or independence is lower. Murders go unpunished not because judges are corrupt, but because our laws that regulate criminal procedure give guilt too many chances to escape punishment. Juries are hard to get in important cases. They are loath to convict, and when they do convict, the criminal, if he can employ good lawyers, has too many chances to upset the verdict and get a new trial. Innocence is extremely well protected here, but guilt is pursued under difficulties. If Dr. DOYLE says we are too easy-going, and dislike too much to punish crime, and that convictions are too hard to get and too hard to keep, he will doubtless say true. There is certainly too much killing in this country, and one reason for it is that the administration of justice is lax. Our judges may not have the standing, or the average of ability, or the pay, that they ought to have, but in the matter of integrity it is a very rare thing for an American judge to be even under suspicion.

The London Spectator says our judges lack the standing and prestige that the English judges have, and that rich men dare not openly defy the law in England as they do in America. There is some truth in that. Success in money-making has overshadowed all other kinds of distinction in this country in the last forty years, and besides that, there is not the same reverence for official power and place in this country that there is in England. England is still an aristocracy, where inferiors instinctively look up to their superiors. Part of the prestige of the British judges is due to the habits of mind of the population they help to rule. Our democratic communities will hardly be induced to regard with the awe the judges who serve them, however worthy they may be of the highest respect. Our judges, as it is, unquestionably make themselves respected, but we think it is true that no American judge is not, relatively, as big a man as he was forty years ago. Men are heard to say: "I don't take much timber now to make a judge." An able lawyer does not give up practice and accept even the $7,200 salary which the State of New York pays to its Supreme Court justices without—usually—a considerable sacrifice of income. Considering the moderate incumbent that we offer our judges, we get very good men. The elective system works about as well in New York as the appointment system works in Massachusetts. If it should be the conclusion of men competent to judge—say of the Bar Associations of various States—that we need able judges than we are getting, and that we ought to bid for them by offering larger salaries, no doubt the expediency of that course would be seriously considered. But certainly the British impression that our judges are deficient in integrity is mistaken. The trouble—and there is a trouble—is with laws that favor too much the efforts of adroit lawyers to obstruct, delay, and defeat justice. Undoubtedly, though, the American sentiment is that it is better that a thousand guilty persons should escape than that one who is innocent should suffer. Our courts at least are fairly free from such miscarriages of justice as happened in the cases of Mrs. MAYBRIK and ADAM BIRK.

It does not seem right that that stalwart expounder of physical culture, the late WILLIAM BLAKE, should have died of apoplexy at the comparatively unripe age of sixty-one. His well-known treatise How to Get Strong (HARPER), published thirty years ago and still very much alive, was a pioneer in the field of physical-culture literature, a field now cultivated by an army of writers and advertising practitioners. To be sure, Mr. BLAKE put his mind rather more on strength than on longevity, but he aimed to make his disciples healthier, and longevity ought to be one of the natural fruits of healthfulness. He was famously strong as a Boston Latin School boy, stroked a winning Harvard crew in 1866, and went to England as trainer of the Harvard crew of 1866 that rowed Oxford. In the early years of his law practice he was a frequent lecturer on athletics, and it is doubtful if any proselyting athlete since his day has quite equalled him in influence. He was counsel for the heirs in the FAYENWEATHER will case, and fought their cause through ten years of litigation. A decision, supposed to be final, was lately rendered against his clients, and disappointment at this result of his protracted labors is thought to have had its effect in bringing on the stroke that killed him.

The most widely acceptable remarks that we have lately seen attributed to the Hon. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN were made on November 30, in Birmingham, at a dinner of students and graduates of the Queen's Faculty of Medicine. Sir FREDERICK TREVELYAN had spoken at length of the dangers of roting ices, smoking, and drinking. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, following, deposed as a record of practical experience that for at least fifty years of a life which had extended considerably beyond that period, he had eaten ices whenever he could get them, had smoked whenever he had nothing else to do, and generally when he had something to do, and had consumed in moderation such alcoholic fluids as he saw before him, and had found them to be beverages which in his case cheered but did not inebriate. Nevertheless, his digestion was good as ever and quite sufficient for his purposes. It is reassuring to know that in matters of meat, drink, and fumigation, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S habits are those of the average man. It makes the average man feel better about his habits. It is a great advantage not to have to take too much pains to keep alive. Most leaders of men have that advantage. They are apt to be fashioned out of strong materials that will stand more than ordinary wear and tear, and some chafing. Moreover, we believe the faculty will support us in the opinion that a fairly strenuous intellectual life is good for the health. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN is a hard worker. He keeps his strong personal machinery going at a pace rapid enough to dispose of any reasonable amount of ice-cream, alcohol, and tobacco smoke. The great workers are apt to be tough. It is partly because they are tough that they are great workers, but the rule works the other way too, and habits of hard work, wisely diversified by rest and exercise, make for hardiness.

Appropos of the recommendation of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice that a million dollars shall be appropriated annually for five years, to be expended in the purchase and equipment of rifle-ranges under the direction of the Secretary of War, a correspondent writes:

Have you noticed the proposal of the Assistant Secretary of War that the United States government should enter upon a great educational campaign to teach rifle-shooting?

Since there are millions of blacks growing up in the Southern States who cannot be taught to read and write for want of money, to spend public money on a system of rifle practice would seem to be a questionable policy.

If it were a question open to discussion whether it would pay better to spend the Federal moneys for rifle-ranges or on the education of Southern negroes, we should say spend it on the negroes. But our correspondent is doubtless aware that it is the province of the States to provide for the education of their citizens, and that the Federal Constitution does not specifically empower Congress to appropriate money to aid the States in that duty. It does empower Congress to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and we presume that that authorization would cover or could be made to cover the rifle-practice plan.

We are pained to have caused displeasure to a brother journal by speaking with insufficient gravity about the game of football, and incidentally about a recent game between Harvard and Yale. We said that the story (which appeared in the Sun) of how one MATTHEWS, a colored player on the Harvard side, butted one of the Yale gentlemen in the abdominal region and prostrated him, made better reading than most of the football stories. So it did; but here comes the Yale Alumni Weekly declaring that HARPER'S WEEKLY ought to "do something better than reproduce the worst of the stupid falsehoods that were told about that game," and adds:

The statement that ROCKWELL, the most prevailing and constant presence of the whole game, was carried from the field, is one of the minor inaccuracies on which this highly ethical journal rests its lofty sarcasm, and from which it parades its ignorance of and real indifference towards the whole subject.

Who is ROCKWELL? We can find no allusion to him in the paragraph complained of. He seems not to have been the colored player, for that gentleman the authorities agree in calling MATTHEWS. He must have been Mr. MATTHEWS'S antagonist, whom the Sun said was removed horizontally from the field. We did not intend to make any statements of fact about the game in question, but if our Yale brother understood us to assert that a player whom it identifies as "ROCKWELL" was carried off the field, whereas in truth his presence was prevailing and constant throughout the game, we willingly bow to our brother's fuller knowledge, and stand corrected to the full extent of our liability for the misstatement so diffused. Still, the incident, as the Sun told, or misstated, it did make pleasant reading.

And now does not our Yale brother think that it, and most of the newspapers, and a large part of the public, take the game of football at present a little too hard? And would the best interests of the game and of truth and of civilization really suffer if the game were regarded more as a lively form of relaxation, and not in such deadly earnest as a phase of endeavor to which nothing that a young man is, or has, or hopes to be, is too precious to be devoted? Is not current football too heavy, too dull, too graver, too costly, and too preposterously important, and is there any more useful service that any citizen who likes good games can render it than to make light of it? The technical end of the subject seems to be in good hands, none better than those of Mr. WALTER CAMP, whose timely thoughts and comparisons our scribe has set forth. The philosophical end of it is also fit to be discussed if it may be done without too great offence.

ON THE PECUNIARY COLLAPSE OF MRS. CAROLINE (HOOPER) CHADWICK

Adapted from the Hoover Post

"Cassie Hoover!" "Cassie Hoover!" wails the Buckeye in distress;
"Cassie Hoover!" means the "come-on"; "Cassie Hoover!" howls the press.
"Cassie Hoover!" "Cassie Hoover!" Brookline swells the doleful sound,
And the goldsmiths and hotel men bellers "Hoover" all around.

The jaws of all the easy-marks droops down in gloom intense:
The plaintive old get-rich-quick path betrays her footsteps' dents;

And the money-lender's wallet seems to wait for her to come
And swap its swollen wad for I. O. U's and chewin'-gum.

They'll sorrow in the wavin' limbs of all the buckeye-trees,
And sorrow deep in Oberlin, and on Lake Erie's breeze,
And all the swaller-anything drains deep the painful cup,
And Pittsburgh's geese go quackin' "Cassie Hoover's busted up!"

"Cassie Hoover!" "Cassie Hoover!" wails the Buckeye in distress;

"Cassie Hoover!" means the "come-on"; "Cassie Hoover!" howls the press.

"Cassie Hoover!" "Cassie Hoover!" says Carnegie "Who is she?"

Never heard of Cassie Hoover. Never had a note of me!"

A Weighty Factor in the South's Negro Problem

As article interesting in itself, and of obviously important bearing on the future of the Southern States, is contributed to the December number of the North American Review by Mr. WILLIAM GANNETT BROWN, a native of Alabama, who lately was a lecturer on history in Harvard University, and who is known to us as the author of several books on historical subjects. The article is entitled "The Immediate Peril of the Negro," the peril which the author has in view being the severe and increasing competition to which he is subjected, not only in every department of skilled labor at the South, but even on plantations. This is a new phenomenon, of which there was no trace in the old days, but which is assuming such proportions as to warrant the forecast that, by the middle of the century, the negro problem will have ceased to worry the South exclusively, but, owing to the sweeping emigration of colored people from that section, and their diffusion throughout the North, will have become one in which the whole country will feel itself vitally concerned. As was pointed out lately by an Alabama farmer in the New York Sun, it is impossible to reconcile the exodus of the negro from Southern farms, which, as Professor BROWN WASHINGTON has admitted, has already taken place on a large scale, with the twenty-million sale crop of cotton produced this year, together with the corresponding harvests of hay, corn, wheat, and oats, except upon the theory that the so-called "poor whites" have, to a notable extent, been debilitated for negro hands in agricultural work. The Alabama farmer would have his Northern brethren remember that the poor white of the South, as well as the negro, was freed by the war of 1861-5, and that this white freeman purges in his heart to make of the Southern country a Massachusetts, and not a Haiti.

It was in the course of a recent tour throughout the Southern States that Mr. BROWN became convinced that this section of our country is undergoing a profound and far-reaching change, a change in the basis of its entire industrial system. He found indisputable proofs, he tells us, of a steady movement of the blacks toward and Southward, and of a corresponding influx of whites into the agricultural districts. Even in the cities and towns, whites are displacing negroes in shops and factories, and tending to monopolize all kinds of work, except domestic service. In cotton-mills the negro is no longer to be seen at all. A few years ago he could have been encountered in a mill in Charleston, and a few months ago in a little mill at Concord, North Carolina, but, with the failure of these two experiments, he seems to have steadily disappeared from the cotton industry of the South Atlantic and South Central States. The only cotton-mill in the entire South which now employs negroes is, we are told, at Dallas, Texas. The unfitted of the negro for this industry, which is now firmly established in the South and exhibiting an amazing growth, is generally held to have been demonstrated. What this means will be appreciated when we note that, in the Carolinas alone, from fifty to a hundred thousand negro people have taken up other employments in order to meet the demand for hands in the cotton-mills. It is true that negroes are still employed in the tobacco factories, but even there whites work beside them, and seem likely eventually to displace them. Everywhere in the small towns and villages of the South you now meet with white barbers, blacksmiths, carpenters, joiners, shoemakers, and even bakers. In New Orleans, according to Mr. NORMAN WALKER, of the Times-Democrat, brick-laying is the only trade which the negroes still control. In 1870 the directory of that city showed a total of 3460 negroes at work as carpenters, coopers, blacksmiths, foundry hands, house painters, shoemakers, bakers, cigarmakers, and tailors. Today, not one-tenth as many negroes are employed in the same trades, although in the interval the negro population of New Orleans has increased by more than fifty per cent. It is even asserted that in prosperity and social station, as well as in industry, the negroes of New Orleans are now faring relatively and absolutely than were the free negroes of that town in the year 1860. The entrance of white men into manual employments is even more marked in Texas than in the other Southern States. There, as a rule, they control the urban trades completely.

Where, then, come the whites by whom the negroes are being crowded aside in so many fields of Southern industry? Strange as it may seem to many readers, it is from Mr. BROWN that farmers from our far Northern States are now coming in considerable numbers, sometimes in little colonies, to make their homes on the banks of the James, the Potomac, and the Roanoke. Of much more moment is the fact that some portion of our immense immigration from Europe is at last being directed, though, as yet, only in dribbles and wavelets, from the great Eastern cities and the growing commonwealths of the West and the Northwest to the section south of the Potomac. A movement of great prospective significance was started on December 12 in the Department of Commerce and Labor at Washington, where the passenger agents of Southern railroads and of those Western railroads having Southern connections, met in the office of Immigration Commissioner SARGENT, to discuss ways and means of inducing immigrants to go South, and, incidentally, to break up the huge colonies of aliens which are proving so difficult of assimilation in New York and Chicago. It was decided at this meeting to urge Congress to enact into law a plan in pursuance of which, by moral suasion rather than by force, government officials should control to a considerable extent the movement of aliens after their arrival in American ports, and so distribute them as to give an impetus to the industrial revival exhibited in the South during the past few years. Attention was directed at the meeting to the growing demand for foreign labor in the Gulf States and to the fact that a new line of steamers is now landing immigrants at New Orleans. The railroads represented at the conference are, of course, vitally interested in adding to the population of the South, as it means added sales, more manufacturing, more agricultural products, and the consequent enlargement of the transportation business. Already in such former strongholds of the African laborer as the Black Belt of Georgia and Alabama, the Vazoo-Mississippi Delta, and the valley of the Brazos in Texas, the negro is recovering the competition of the European, sometimes the German, but often the peasant of southern Europe, particularly the Italian and the Rumanian. Nothing improved more deeply Mr. BROWN in his journey through the lower South than the appearance of these aliens in the sugar-fields, the rice-fields, and the cotton-fields. At Calumet, a sugar plantation in Louisiana, only negro labor was employed eight years ago, but since then the blacks have been gradually supplanted by Italians. The Italian, indeed, considered as laborer and tenant farmer on the plantations of the lower South, is no longer an experiment. Mr. BROWN learned that, as a rule, he does the work at least as well as a negro, and is far more likely to save money and become a landowner. These facts, as he is told, a common saying, where the ways of both men are known, that if an Italian earns a dollar and a quarter he will spend the quarter and save the dollar, but that if a negro earns the same amount he will spend a dollar and a half. The testimony concerning immigrants to the South from Bohemia is quite as favorable.

Up to the present time, however, the phenomenal change in the South's industrial system, a change exhibited, perhaps, more strikingly in the Carolinas than in any other part of the South, is mainly attributed, and no doubt justly, by Mr. BROWN, to the rapid emergence of the native poor whites, the South's vast and long unutilized industrial reserves, from the limitations which slavery had imposed upon them, and which by nearly three hundred years of inertia, ignorance, and prejudice had been stifled into a Chinese wall of hopeless conservatism. These reserves have now, as he is convinced, become a powerful and efficient competition with the negro. The result has been disastrous to the latter. No sooner did they gain a foothold in restaurants than, as we have seen, the blacks were excluded altogether from this great industry. The effect of the exclusion on the negro's future can scarcely be overestimated. The Alabama farmer to whom we have referred as writing to the Sun testifies that the "poor white" is also beginning to out the negro even in the marketing of raw cotton. He points out that, when an old planter leaves his plantation where his wife and daughters feel as large safe, and settles in a town, he leases the plantation to a white man reared in the mountains, who substitutes his own kin for negro laborers whenever it is possible to do so. It is, as we have said, to the mountain white folk, transformed into farmers, that the astonishing crops of cotton, grain, and fruit now raised in the South, are usually ascribed. We are also informed that six-tenths of the timber in mines and furnaces come from the same mountain stock.

It is Mr. BROWN'S conviction that the change coming over the industries of the South is not merely an invasion by whites of the occupations formerly monopolized by negroes. It is likewise a change in the standard of efficiency in work; and the negro's chance of building his own depends on his ability to live up to the new standards. With the increase of population, and a better and lower struggle for wealth, the standards of industry, of skill, and of thrift in the South will approximate more and more closely those of the Northern States and of the west of Europe. The white men whom the negro has to fear is no longer the man who would force him to work for an owner. It is the man who would take away from him the work offered to voluntary acceptance by an employer. What Mr. BROWN would call "the white peril," he comes from rivalry rather than from oppression.

Should the tendencies observed by Mr. BROWN and others remain unchecked and gather force, the result would inevitably be, as we have said, a tremendous exodus of the negroes from the Southern States, and their diffusion throughout Northern cities and large towns. The Northern people will thus have brought home to them the gravity of the negro problem. They will learn that it means to have to live side by side with a people whose moral standards are relatively low, as regards several of them, and crims against property, and many of whom are unwilling to work, while the rest seem rarely capable of conforming to a high standard of efficiency in labor, or of forming habits of thrift.

The First Business before Congress

There is no reason to expect that, outside the appropriation bills, many measures of importance will be passed during the short and final session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. The fact that tariff revision was not mentioned by the President in his annual message confirmed what was previously known, that no step in that direction would be taken before March 4, 1905. We have since learned that Mr. ROOSEVELT has renewed the plan of calling a special session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, which was at first supposed to favor. The President's message was silent, too, with regard to another matter, namely, reciprocity, and it is now understood that, in view of the present temper of the Senate, the President will make no earnest effort to negotiate any new reciprocity treaties, or to secure the ratification of the French reciprocity treaty and a number of similar conventions which for some time have been piling up in the Upper House of the Federal Legislature. We infer that the Newfoundland treaty will share the same fate. It is likewise probable that the re-assembly of the Joint High Commission appointed to settle various questions in dispute between the United States and Canada, although it was lately advocated by Vice-President-elect FAIRBANKS, will be postponed. The bitterness caused in the Dominion by the decision rendered in the Alaska boundary controversy has, to a large extent, passed away, but the Laurier ministry, now more firmly installed than ever at Ottawa, seem to have become indifferent to the improvement of the existing trade relations between the United States and Canada.

There is, however, one measure of much consequence which we may count upon seeing passed in the Senate before the holidays. We refer to the Philippine Civil Government bill. The taking of the vote on which was taken Friday, December 16, last, by an agreement reached during the last session of the present Congress. Notwithstanding, according to the agreement, it was to have precedence over every other question as a subject of debate. We take the passage of this bill for granted, because it will be the fulfillment of a duty too long delayed. The actual status of the Philippines offers a discreditable contrast to that of our other insular possessions. The products of both Ithaca and Porto Rico enter our ports duty free. Since liberty of access to our markets has been applied to the sugar industry of Hawaii an extraordinary stimulus, and has assured to that archipelago a degree of prosperity unexampled in its history. If Porto Rico has benefited less from the same freedom of trade it is because our consumers are unwilling to pay the price which that island's principal stepchild—coffee—has hitherto commanded. It is only a question of time, however, when the cultivation of sugar and tobacco and of fruit and vegetables will be substituted for that of coffee, and, ultimately, Porto Rico should become a formidable competitor of Cuba and the British West Indies as a purveyor of such commodities. The impression is gaining ground among experts that if the culture of the tobacco plant were conducted carefully by Porto-Ricans their leaf would be adapted to the manufacture of all but the finer grades of "Havana" cigars. At all events, we have done our best already for the Porto-Ricans, when we have conferred to them the same absolute freedom of interstate trade which is enjoyed by our States and Territories. The Philippines, on the other hand, we have treated like a stepson. They, also, are producers of sugar and tobacco, but those Filipino products cannot enter our ports except by paying seventy-five per cent. of the duties levied by the Dwyer act on such articles if imported from foreign countries. There is absolutely no reason for such unjust discrimination against the Philippine Archipelago, except the unwillingness of our native growers of feed and sugar and of tobacco to submit to competition on anything like equal terms. The very same citizens who profess to approve of our government's Philippine policy, and to uphold a renunciation of the islands, insist upon stifling their economical progress by shutting our markets to the products which they are best qualified to export. It is true that Manila tobacco is not just now in much request among American manufacturers and consumers, but it had a good deal of vogue before the civil war, and there is no doubt that the Sinatra leaf could be cultivated with success in the Philippine Archipelago, where the conditions of soil and climate are identical. It is equally probable that, under the stimulus of freedom of trade with the United States, the Philippines would become larger exporters of cane-sugar than is the island of Java, which is continually sending great quantities of the staple to our ports. It is not the fault of ex-Secretary Root, of Secretary Tamm, or of President Roosevelt himself that the Philippines were not placed long ago on the same footing as Hawaii and Porto Rico.

In another particular, also, we have shown ourselves remiss in our treatment of the Philippine Archipelago. Having made up our mind to retain it, we were morally bound to further the development of its industries by giving it facilities for island transportation. Instead of tying its hands in this particular, we should have authorized the Insular government to encourage railway building, either by land grants or by the guarantee of the interest on construction bonds. If such authority were granted, we should see in the course of a few years a number of railroads under way, not only in Luzon, but in others of the larger islands. It is further to be noted that if President ROOSEVELT and Secretary Tamm are permitted by Congress to carry out their purpose, the Lower House of the Philippine Legislature will be made elective at an early date. It is true that the experiment may fail because the Filipinos are not yet fitted for it; but it ought to be tried, unless the provisions made in the Republican platform and in the President's last annual message were merely prophetic. Meanwhile, a high primary education should be provided for the rising generation in Luzon and other islands, which, by comparison with Meadman, may be deceived as civilized, so that, ultimately, the people may be, if they are not now, qualified for the exercise of at least partial autonomy.

It was supposed that the HOOVER-HAMILTON bill conferring Statehood upon Arizona and New Mexico conjointly, and also upon Oklahoma combined with Indian Territory, would be reported during the week ending December 17 by the Senate Committee on Territories, of which Mr. HICKMAN is chairman. As the so-called Steering Committee had agreed to make this measure the undebated business of the Senate just before adjournment for the holidays, it seemed probable that the two new States would be admitted to the Union during the present session. It seems, however, that, owing to the vacancy caused by the death of Senator QUAY, there is a hitch in the Committee on Territories, and the Republican leaders hesitate to fill the vacancy for the purpose of securing favorable action on the bill. Very likely, in the end, Senator KNOX will be assigned to the place formerly occupied by Senator QUAY, and, in that event, the bill may be reported in time to be debated and passed before the next 4th of March. The inhabitants of the four Territories named would naturally prefer to see four States rather than two, rather than two, but, as there is manifestly no chance of that, they seem disposed to take what they can get. There is some opposition to the measure in its present form from Senators representing the Transmississippi States, on the ground that they do not like to see so large a part of their section, the only part still retaining a Territorial status, represented permanently by as more than four spokesmen in the Upper House of the Federal Legislature. They point out that the State composed of Arizona and New Mexico would have an aggregate area of over 255,000 square miles, which, ultimately, if irrigation should be carried out on a great scale, would be capable of supporting a very large population. The same objection would not be applicable with anything like equal force to the new State made up of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, though its total superficies would exceed 70,000 square miles, which is almost exactly the size of North Dakota. The new State of Arizona would be much larger than either California or Montana, and would be surpassed by Texas alone, which, under the treaty that admitted it to the Union, is entitled at any time to divide itself into several States, and thus acquire additional representatives in the Federal Senate.

Whether the bill for the encouragement of our merchant marine will become a law remains uncertain, though a vigorous attempt will be made during the next sixty days to place it on the statute-book, one of the arguments for its passage being that this, like other features of the Republican programme, was stamped with popular approval at the ballot-box.

Current Criticism

To note the fashions that sway the multitude and inquire into their causes is the lowest plane of the onlooker; and if he tries to let it lead him by a swift downward path to cynicism, it is a wholesome and enlightening pursuit. One of the most prevailing tempers nowadays is that of a wholesale disparagement of whatever is thought or in execution rises to any unusual degree of excellence. No numerous are the instances of this habit of mind, it is almost absurd to pick out particular cases and dwell upon them. One cannot attend an afternoon tea nor turn over the pages of a magazine without seeing it amply illustrated. One is instantly submerged in the congratulations that average man offers himself upon his average and the average of the universe.

We are overrun by current criticism of a snash-buckling kind, presented with a bold assumption of authority. It reminds one of Mr. ARNOLD's feeling of frustration when he quoted a literary verdict from The Saturday Review, and received the reply that the Imperial Russian thought otherwise. This country has standards in some things—in conduct, for example—but aside from purely academic circles, there are no literary standards. Our literary criticism is the personal preference of the man in the street, or, at best, the gratitude of the jaded hack-writer for the tale that required the least effort.

As a nation we do not care for high standards. We are fond of thinking one thing just as good as another and one opinion as likely to be true as the next. In scholarship, as in society, we stand for liberty and equality. We are lamentably lacking in any literary tradition or standard of excellence to measure by. What passes muster as criticism is worth as little as the advertisements along the city fences.

One critic, whose name is, at least, well known, finds fault with Mr. HARPER this week for pointing out that fiction is failing because it lacks philosophy. Mr. MORSEHEAD had already spoken at length upon this very obvious fact. But our critic is entirely unimpressed by the opinion of the two greatest living novelists, and he points out with him that the smaller the content and substance of a book the better it is. Another critic, writing on the national tradition of glorifying the trite and temporary, congratulates Mrs. DELAND, not upon doing a very nice, readable little book for girls called The Woman in Blue, but that she refrained from literary studies and serious criticism. We cannot help wondering why it is so commendable to avoid studies in literature. Would this critic seriously advise Mr. SAINTSWORTH to relinquish the History of Criticism, supposing Mr. SAINTSWORTH turned to him for counsel of perfection, and to lend his energies to heart-to-heart talks with girls upon courtship? Mr. SAINTSWORTH could bring a bound and extended knowledge of many literatures to bear upon the theme.

Would these critics who speak with such a commanding tone of authority play The Wanderer beside Richard Feverel, David Brunsell, and Five of the Seven? The answer is, of course, no; and the reason is that while it is a well-timed, brightly told story, it has not the depth, the truth, the philosophy of a great book. It lacks substance. It is without that grasp upon life which recognizes things as they are in all their reality and integrity. It is without wide human sympathy and knowledge of ethical issues. Without great effort, such recognition, and happy possession, great books are not written. Any book in which the facts and because of them, the facts, are not seen as they are, but slide to its own destination, while they dimly benefit by the result, is not a great book because it has no essential grasp of truth. Daniel Defoe, with his haunting sense of our guilt being another's loss, the sense by which he held himself ever ready for redemption, and harked to consciousness the sleeping soul of Cromwell, though it were ten times as full of irrelevant Jewish theories and moral reflections, with all in virtue of the art that is a profound, sincere, and truthful account of moral issues as this one.

All this futile and careless making the worse appear the better reason is the result of our national divergence of standards of excellence. RIVINGTON pointed out our danger to us long ago: "The countries," he writes, "which, like the United States, have created a considerable popular instruction without any other high instruction, will long have to regret the fault of their intellectual mediocrity, their vagueness of manner, and their lack of general intelligence." This was written more than a quarter of a century ago, but it describes us today. It is this carelessness of our higher training for anything which has turned our literary criticism into a rebuke and a warning. We have carelessness of the truth and value of our results as we do of the truth and failure in an advertisement of a cheap medicine.

There is an element of unfairness, too, of one (perhaps even in this past practice of leaving standards forever high) to be done. It is certainly justifiable to speak a kindly word of adjustment for the common current of mediocrity position, but it is another thing to try to emphasize it by pulling down to the same level what is of real and actual value as literature.

To do this tends to increase fogs and to degrade scholarship.

The Spirit of New Japan

"WHILE you only knew us as great artists, and a wise and thoughtful Japan," you thought us barbarians. But now that we have shown that we can kill scientifically and kill in style, the sympathies with this pathetic half-truth, yet it is unjust both in old Japan and in the new. Artistic excellence was only a very small part of the spirit of old Japan, and, perhaps, a feminine part, as many of the most famous works of Japanese literature were written by women. A nation must stand among nations by its masculine qualities: the qualities of intellect and will, and, above all, the power of self-defense. Without this what do all the arts and graces avail? So Japan had to win her space before her greatness could be fully accepted.

Her triumph has been so complete, so dramatic, that it sets us wondering as to the secret of its magic. Yet in reality many fairly balanced powers have contributed to this result, and we might have found them all in Japan for generations had we had the knowledge and the insight. Japan's triumph seems due to three things: a powerful ruling class, as aristocracies have perfect in the mastery of external and very adaptable, and a peasant class full of vigor, health, endurance, and self-reliance. By a ruling class one means not a class possessed of privileges, but a class which can rule and does rule. This Japan possessed in the great feudal aristocracy, which for centuries dominated its life by an alliance the military spirit and virtues by provincial warlike, when there were no foreign foes or foreign enterprises. The feudal aristocracy had high knightly ideals, upholding valor, devotion, self-sacrifice, self-control. We all remember that fine anecdote of BUNIKIN, when a critic spoke of a soldier as one whose profession was to kill. "Not," cried RIVINGTON in protest, "a soldier is one whose profession is to be killed." It might not be said of the Japanese aristocracy, the mass of the military aristocracy, that his profession was to be killed. Other actions and other classes may have had more theology, but he had truck practical religion. And, indeed, there is a very strong religious element in the whole of Japan's success, even if it is not universally so held. The entire readiness to face death, which has made scores of thousands cheerfully insulate themselves on the battlefield at Port Arthur, is really a strong profession of faith in spiritual life, in the comparative insignificance of material life. We ourselves believe passionately in the supreme goodness of material life, and we toil and strain for that good with an energy which the world has ever seen equaled. We may give a theological account in the superior virtue of the other world, but it is a plain opinion, and, if judged by the measure of our energies directed to the one goal as to the other, our soldiers are full of courage, and ready to die if need be; but even then they are well satisfied that this is no present merit. They are not by any means content that the other world is hospitably ready to receive them; that they will be much better there than here, as are the Japanese. As to worship, which really means increased communion with the souls of the dead, has carried their whole imagination into the other world, and while a few of the most educated men may be free thinkers and to some degree materialists, this is by no means true of the masses of the people, who are still saturated with the ideal of the other world. They believe simply and deeply that every one alive has hitherto fallen in the fight has already returned in spirit to Japan, and rejoined the family from which the inscription temporarily severed him; returned with honor, adding glory to the family name.

This fine passion and faith permeated the training of the old samurai, and made it distinctly a knightly conception, but, and as in our own Western history, the knights of chivalry disappeared from the scene of errantry only to reappear as the champions of free rights in the struggle for freedom, so the samurai has been reborn, as it were, into modern Japan, with the same courage, the same idealism, the same self-forgetfulness. He has the qualities of a ruling class which can rule, of the commander who can command, and this masterful self-forgetfulness has shown out of every point of view, in every war.

But what we forget the strong intellectual element which went to the making of modern Japan. The Japanese Renaissance was an intellectual and philosophical, before it became a political movement. To compare two widely different things, the Japanese Renaissance had its antecedent VOLTAIRE and ROUSSEAU. A whole school came into existence, throughout the nineteenth century, which began with philosophy, gradually developed into nationalism. Study of the early books drew attention to the genius Japanese tongue and spirit, which had been overlaid by Chinese culture and Chinese words. The movement which began with literary passion ended with the first taking of Port Arthur and Wei-hai-wei, which meant the overthrow of Chinese domination, spiritual as well as political. The study of the past not less rarely disclosed the re-emergence of the Shogunate, and the divine tradition of the Mikados, and a strong propaganda of words provided the final attack on the Shogunate's power. All this is but evidence of the powerful intellectual forces which were ripe in Japan, wholly exempt to any foreign influence, and which might have produced a complete and wholly national revolution by this time had no foreign influence knocked imperceptibly by this time had no foreign influence knocked imperceptibly at the door. The examination of Kogachian and Shintomism, when the princes of Satsuma and Choshu came into collision with foreign powers, sustained the Japanese that they could only withstand force by force, and the whole tide of thought turned from the material sciences of the West, with what results we now realize. The adoption of Western ideas was in itself an immense intellectual achievement, only possible from the great mental activity which had already risen into being.

Mastery of natural and chemistry has belonged to Japan for centuries, so that they found it quite easy to adapt our modern engineering machinery, and in certain respects to improve on it, both the old and the new services rise from the Japanese nation, a country used to training took ready to drill, the strong ruling class holding the army together, while the vigorous intellect already described easily seized the details and principles of strategy. A nation of fishermen found it easy to become men-of-war's men, and the hardy peasants made fine recruits. These things taken together made possible the new Japan. We may be certain that the surface hardness which the fierce contests of a nation had to have imposed upon Japan are for a time only, but, and are the national well-being is assured, the old heart and idealism will once more shine through.

JAMES SMITH, JR., EX-UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM NEW JERSEY, AND THE RECEIVER FOR THE UNITED STATES SHIP-BUILDING COMPANY

The reader is referred to the interesting article by Mr. Smith on page 1986 of this number of the "Weekly" on the sequel to the ship-building failure and the general question of the ship-building industry

CHINESE VIEW OF THE WAR—PHOTOGRAPH SHOWING PILGRIMS COMING TO WORSHIP AT A SHRINE IN MANCHURIA WHILE THE WAR IS IN PROGRESS

This photograph was taken at Kien, Manchuria, on a recent July day, when thousands of Chinese, whether in search of the shrine of one of the Buddhist goddesses, or for other reasons, gathered in the shrine. In the foreground, the people are seen in the distance, and in the background, the mountains and the sea are visible. The photograph was taken from Kien, Manchuria.

A Road Tunnel through a Snowslide

The Path of a Snowslide down the Side of a Mountain through a Forest

Rescuers in one of the Slide District: searching for possible victims

A PERIL OF MOUNTAIN TRAVEL—VIEWS OF SNOWSLIDES IN COLORADO

For an interesting description of some great snowslides in the Rocky Mountains and the Sierras, their causes, and the destruction which they have caused, the reader is referred to the article by Kate A. Mills on page 1803 of this issue of the "Weekly"

Sequel to the Ship-building Failure

By James Smith, Jr.

Ex-United States Senator from New Jersey

It is reliably stated that the new ship-building company which is to arise out of the ruins of the insolvent United States Ship-building Company is to inaugurate a policy which, it is believed, will place it beyond the reach of many of the difficulties that now retard the progress of the ship-building industry in this country. The policy contemplates the construction of metal vessels and their equipment, ready for service. This to ship-building company in this country has been able to do heretofore, for the reason that no one company could construct such vessels and furnish the armor and armament therefore. The new ship-building company, however, with the aid of the Bethlehem Steel Company, which is to be one of its constituents, will be able to completely construct and equip war-vessels of all types.

The ship-building industry of today is less profitable than in former years. While the decline in our merchant marine has had an injurious effect, the present rather struggling existence of the industry is not due solely to the decline in the demand for merchant work. While it is true that twenty or thirty years ago the shipyards of this country were offered profitable work upon merchant vessels of the deep-sea type, and that such work has now almost entirely ceased, it is likewise true that during the period mentioned there has been a substantial increase in the number of shipyards, the result of which has been to induce into the trade a spirit of competition. This, coupled with other matters, has proved far from beneficial. As the merchant marine declined, and the demand for deep-sea boats ceased, many of the yards were compelled to seek work in other directions. What was suggested to be a boon to the ship-builder was the work offered by the United States government about that time, when it adopted the policy of valuing its navy contracts for the construction of war-vessels aggregating vast sums of money were placed with private yards. Premiums were offered by the government in the event that such vessels should exceed the contract requirements as to speed; payments were made promptly as the work progressed, and altogether a condition presented itself that seemed to more than compensate the builder for the loss of the merchant work. These conditions gave an impetus to competition, causing many new shipyards to come into existence and old ones to be reorganized or re-built. In order to enable the yards to execute government work properly it was necessary for them to make great expenditures of capital in the equipment of their plant facilities. To pay the fixed charges of this equipment it was essential that a certain volume of work should be sustained there at all times. Not finding a sufficient volume of merchant work, competition for government work became very keen, and in many cases most costly. As competition increased the policy of the government became less liberal.

The premiums of which I have spoken were abolished; allowances which had been made in favor of the Pacific coast yards, in order that such yards might be equal footing with Eastern competitors, were discontinued; inspection became more strict, and the appropriations which the contract must be performed were complained of by ship-builders as being barely sufficient to defray the cost of the work. Notwithstanding these facts, however, as it was profitably, the only substantial work offering, and as the shipyards must obtain work to meet fixed charges, competition for this class of work at length reached a point that was truly disastrous.

But competition was not the sole reason why contracts for government work were taken at prices which inflicted a loss of millions of dollars upon the industry. As the volume of work given out by the government at any one time was not sufficient to supply all the yards with equipment, the struggle among the ship-builders for a part was to be awarded was, of course, always keen. This fact not only necessitated the taking of contracts on a very narrow margin of non-profit, but in very many cases the ship-builder would lose his effort solely upon the appropriation made made to be awarded was, of course, always keen. The former case the torpedo boats and destroyers were let at approximately the amount of the appropriation, and resulted in a loss to many contractors of upwards of three millions of dollars. In the latter case the appropriation was again the guide, and here the ship-builders sustained a loss of upwards of a million and a quarter of dollars. I have personal knowledge of great loss on other types of government vessels, and know of half a dozen instances in later years where this class of work has resulted in a profit to the ship-builder.

The American ship-builder has now practically but two sources from which he may draw his supply—that is, merchant work and government work.

It is reported that in 1903 ninety-one vessels for deep-sea trade were launched from American shipyards. The same authority states that since 1901 not a single order for this type of merchant work has been placed here. Merchant work has declined to such a point that it is now confined to the construction of vessels for sale, repair, conversion and auxiliary elements. This work, on the whole, is not unprofitable, but there is not enough of it to meet the capacity of the several yards.

Government work is not as attractive to the ship-builder. It is hedged about with burdensome inspections, with rigorous restrictions as to compliance with the very letter of the contract, with requirements as to speed and horse-power at a given rating of machinery, and a strict enforcement of overweight penalties, although the speed and horse power be provided, and notwithstanding the builder's insistence that to meet the government requirements in these respects a greater weight of machinery than the specifications required was needed. It is further burdened with the right of the government to order changes and to call for extra work should the performance of the contract require it. The result of such changes and extra work by its own board. The result of which I speak have surrounded this class of work with such difficulties and uncertainties as to cause the ship-builder either to refrain from bidding upon it, or to induce him to add to his cost figures a percentage of profit, which will cause him to be an unsuccessful bidder; or, being urged by the necessity of maintaining his yard as a going concern and to prevent the happening of a greater loss, he will be compelled to enter into competition but work at a price that ensures a loss of the amount of estimated profit, but makes no provision for the contingencies that may arise in the war, two, or three years required to complete the contract; that bids to take into account the difficulties and hardships of which I have spoken, and which in many cases causes him to inflict a serious financial loss upon his organization, and become a substantial permanent loser.

It will thus be seen that the condition of the American ship-building industry today does not offer many attractions to the investor and capital, and that the return for the vast amount of money invested is not a very profitable one. Some relief should be provided, but by whom, and as what form? The ship-builder might seek to effect a more compact and less expensive organization at his yard, without destroying its efficiency. In this regard some of our ship-builders are open to criticism. Many yards are conducted upon a scale as extensive and costly as to consume the profit in a contract that a less expensive, but not less efficient, organization would have made certain. But the evils in this regard are of minor importance compared with the situation of which I have spoken, and are in many instances justified by the fact that once an efficient organization is built up its efficiency should not be diminished or endangered by abolishing departments or making changes when work becomes slack, with a view to temporarily cutting down expenses.

Relief could also come from outside sources. The American ship-builder cannot hope to enlarge his field by entering into competition with foreign shipyards for the construction of foreign merchant vessels. In this regard it is generally conceded that he is handicapped by a percentage of cost against him for his labor and material also, that for the present places this work beyond his reach. Formerly merchant work in this country offered a fair return for the enterprise of our ship-builders, but its condition is now not only discouraging to the ship-builder, but destroying in many cases our citizens. It is generally hoped that some kind of a holding may be given an impetus that will lift it out of its present very unprofitable position and put it upon a plane in keeping with the great ones of this country.

If relief should come to his branch, a remunerative field of operation would be offered our ship-builders, and some of the difficulties now confronting them would be removed. But to give the American ship-builder a living chance, so long as he must depend upon government work, the policy of the government toward the ship-builder should be our other of cooperation with his efforts to get a fair return for his labor than an effort in benefit at the expense of such ship-builder. When steps were taken for the enlargement of our navy the government pursued a course in itself legitimate toward the ship-builder. It was to be expected that capital to embark in the ship-building industry. Encouraged by the liberal policy of the government millions of dollars were expended in providing plants with machinery and equipment, much of which could profitably be used on other types of vessels. It is true that the change in the policy of the government, and all attempt upon its part to foster an industry which had provided it with one of the finest navies in the world was apparently abandoned.

It is conceded now, I think, that the government cannot build ships as quickly or as cheaply as via our private yards. It may be truly said, therefore, that the naval requirements of the government are to a certain extent dependent upon such private yards. This fact would seem to suggest that the attitude of the government toward the ship-builder should be changed. It would seem to suggest that much consideration is due from the government to the ship-builder; and when we consider the vast outlay of private capital expended largely in order that the purposes and aims of the government might be accomplished, it is not surprising that the ship-builder is seeking and is every day in doing for more liberality and less antagonism on the part of the government in its treatment of his interests. The American ship-builder's condition does not entitle us to such sympathy as for justice. He is entitled to the same one of the fairest and the most equitable, and it is a far beyond dispute that many of the vessels in our navy do not represent a dollar of profit to the ship-builder, but, on the contrary, the ill-will of the government in the matter of appropriations has been the cause of the loss of the ship-builder's obtaining war-vessels at prices which have inflicted losses running into millions upon private yards. I have personal knowledge of three vessels recently delivered to the government which represent a loss in the builders of fully $550,000. This loss was incurred partly by labor troubles, partly by enforcement of penalties on the part of the government, and partly because the appropriation was so low as to enforce ruinous bidding.

WITHIN FOUR MILES OF PORT ARTHUR—JAPANESE SOLDIERS WATCHING AN ATTACK ON THE FORTRESS

The photograph was taken at a point less than 1000 yards above Port Arthur, and shows a group of General Nogai's soldiers with field glasses watching the progress of an attack. Just above the head of the man at the left may be seen trenches dug by the Japanese. To the extreme right in the background is another group in which are included several war correspondents. Taken at 1000 yards by James C. H. Smith, U.S.A. Copyright, 1904, by Underwood & Underwood, N. Y.

The shipbuilders' relief must come from the government. Now in what form shall it come? Should the government return to its former premiums and privileges? In my opinion a better plan would be for the government to make its appropriations liberal enough to cover the required work, and then, under certain regulations, designate yards or yards that should perform such work. We have many yards in this country equipped for the building of battle ships and cruisers which might be designated by the government as first-class yards. We have others, again, of smaller capacity and equipment which might be styled second-class yards. In the former the larger type of vessels might be built, while the smaller type could be built in the latter class. To these yards the government work might be assigned, in regular order, the work to be done under the supervision of the government officers upon a cost and percentage basis, not in excess of the government.

The government would be receiving full value for its expenditure. The shipbuilder would be encouraged to devote his best efforts to the undertaking, knowing that a fair profit awaited his performance of the contract, while the losses incident to the present enforced cost-thrust system of competition would be eliminated. This is asking the government to adopt a course followed daily in business transactions, and recognized as being fair and equitable. It is asking for a subsidy. It is not urging the government to fritter away money for nothing, but it is a method by which the shipbuilder may be justly and fairly treated. There is much activity in certain quarters in advocacy of a government subsidy in aid of our merchant marine. Many of our government officials favor such a plan. The Hon. Paul Jones, Secretary of the Navy, appeared recently before the Merchant Marine Commission at Washington in support of such a measure. In his address before that board he is reported as having said:

"It is not a question as to what Americans want to do in the building of a merchant marine. There is, to my mind, nothing academic about it. In order to build up a big American shipping interest you will be obliged to meet the competition of all nations. You will be forced in some way to pre-empt the mail contracts, the subsidies, and the premiums of Germany and of England and of other governments, and you will have to give the American owner of seagoing craft an equality in all respects, this to be arrived at by the actual measure of what our competition is."

If the government is willing to render substantial aid in the rebuilding of the merchant marine, why should it not adopt a policy at least of fairness toward one of the prominent factors in this industry? One of the aims of the supporters of the subsidy plan is to encourage the construction and ownership of American-built vessels for the transportation of American products. The shipbuilder, therefore, is an important factor in this plan. The construction of vessels for merchant service would be undertaken by the shipbuilder on far more advantageous terms to the owner, if, in bidding for the work, the builder could feel that it was not necessary to include in the cost thereof a part of the losses which he is now forced to assume on government work. If it is fair and right for the government to grant subsidies for the upbuilding of a merchant marine, should it not, in order to give the same consideration to our industries essential to such upbuilding, make consideration to shipbuilders a part of such subsidies? No special aid is not asked for; special benefits are not requested, but fairness and a "square deal" are hoped for. I have the highest regard for the integrity and business ability of the honorable Secretary of the Navy. In his private transactions I am certain that he would never enter into a contract to perform certain work for a fixed sum, and agree that many of the details of such work should be performed "as directed" by the other party as the work progressed, that changes and alterations might be made and extra work be added up and that the amount to be added or deducted from the contract price should be fixed by a board of whose composition he had no voice and whose finding would be conclusive upon him. And yet that is precisely what the Secretary of the Navy now is doing when the shipbuilders shall do it. Indeed, he is nominally a party to a greater hardship than this. Under the method of awarding such work he must be paid for his material and labor is not only on a business-like, but is absolutely unfair. The same right is reserved to the government as to what constitutes a breach of contract, so that generally the condition of the shipbuilder as to this class of work may be said to be one absolutely at the mercy of the government. Why should not the appropriations of the government be liberal enough to insure compensation to the builder for what it is to receive? If the government feels that it should surround itself with the protection which it now has in the construction of its vessels, why should it not establish the businesslike and equitable policy of having such vessels constructed upon a cost and percentage basis within reasonable appropriations. Finally, why should not the government display a spirit of liberality in the awarding of such work? I know of no reason why it should not do so that could not be urged with greater force against the present tendency toward government subsidy. If these or similar suggestions for the fair treatment of the shipbuilder in the awarding of such work are adopted, it is certain that the shipbuilding industry in this country would be relieved of many of the hardships which it is now unfairly asked to assume.

The plan that a company should construct and fully equip battle ships and other armed vessels, and offer them for sale in their completed form, involves, in the first place, an almost unlimited amount of capital, but that difficulty overcome, I see no reason why it should not be successfully undertaken. The advantages of this plan are manifold. The yards can be engaged at all times to their fullest capacity; the rigorous inspection which are now so burdensome would be avoided; duplication of design would result not only in familiarity with the work, but a cheapening of the cost to the lowest possible limit, while ability to deliver quickly at an emergency time, that which some country will always be in need of, would insure a substantial profit upon the labor and material employed under the best possible conditions.

This plan, however, would be of benefit to the few companies and not to the country as a whole. It would not be a plan which would be in the country that could be able to carry out such an undertaking. The reorganized United States Shipbuilding Company, with the aid of the Bethlehem Steel Company, will have within its organization the ability to perform such a task, but as to its attitude with respect to such a plan, it is an undertaking.

But the chief to the majority of shipbuilders will not be found in this direction; it must come from some other source. It must come from the government, and I sincerely hope that such relief may not be long postponed.

A Manager's View of the Stage

By Daniel Frohman

"THE best plays to produce, the best manner of their production, and the best players to produce them—these problems naturally interest the American public because they concern a popular and important means of entertainment—but they are questions which fill the daily life of managers, because their solution is to a great extent a matter of experiment, as well as of individual ability."

Many theories have been advanced for facilitating and improving theatrical affairs, ranging from national theatres or government institutions to subsidized playhouses—public or private—operated simply on philanthropic lines. Some of the suggestions might dispose of a few of the minor details of selection and production of plays, and at the same time enlarge the experimental horizon, but the object to be achieved and the means adopted would remain the same. There is but one way to produce successful plays, and that is to sell the tastes of the American people. That is the philosopher's stone. All the rest is subsidiary.

There are no arbitrary fastenings in plays that vitally affect the problem of the selection of the best plays to be offered to the public, beyond the general notion of appealing to human interest and human emotion. National characteristics and the great common-sense composition of the American audience are things to be reckoned with—the interest and approval of the greatest number, where varying tastes are as many as the units of the body politic. Primarily and principally the American manager and dramatist must appeal to the American audience, and, to argue negatively, here may be found the reason for the not infrequent failure of foreign plays, which, built for and suited to the temperament of a different people, are merely transplanted to masquerade before an audience whose national characteristics and environments were not considered in their original making. Fashions in plays, however, may be of great extent of sale, and it is to be hoped that a people who are becoming more and more a nation of theatre patrons will be brought about by transportation facilities undreamed of fifty years ago, or whether our people are more inclined to alternate amusement and business, the fact remains that it has necessitated improvements in plays and in their manner of presentation which have practically amounted to a revolution in the course of thirty years. The theatre has had to keep pace with other changes in the life of a young and progressive nation, where each step is a historic event, in taste and critical ability, as well as in customs, in language, and national attributes which tend toward improvement and refinement. The dreary stilted scene play of half a century ago could be out of place to-day. "Quick action" is necessary in our amusements, as well as in our business affairs.

For these and many other reasons, a general formula for the selection of a successful play would be of doubtful value. Whatever the theme—whether American or otherwise—the play must conform to our American standards, the standards of race, and must such to be the best of its kind, in taste and critical ability, as well as all races and nations—the low element. Upon that theme the authors may be rung for all time. For the rest, Kipling's recipe for the making of stories holds good in the making of plays: give conditions and characters to conform to what is probable and true and the reader will fill in the logical details from the storehouse of his own knowledge. In facilities for securing the necessary materials no writers are richer than our American authors. The American playwright may take his choice of character of every sort and degree—East, West, North, and South, from every race under the sun. Even should he not achieve the same of realism, which caused the good old lady to complain that the book only told her about things she could see every day of her life, the condition of success is elastic. The American audience is a critical audience, but the American temperament leans to the realization of familiar things and familiar characters, and the day's work of the West is the sensational romance of the East.

It is a remarkable fact that at the present time, when conditions to dramatic writers are so great—greater, truly, than ever before in the history of the stage—that we get so little good work. In past times, when the pecuniary reward was small, there was no lack of good dramatic material. In the days of the old comedies, when Voltaire wrote and before Robertson began what he called his "Treason and Sinner" dramas, and down through the days of the early Romantic plays, the prices paid were nominal. Today managers are standing ready with purses in their hands—and to-day desirable work is largely deficient in character and preparation.

And, unfortunately, the plays of familiar human interest are not plentiful. If such plays were more numerous, the problem of successful plays would be solved, and there would be more variety in their production. No theatrical scheme can remedy a defect which lies at the heart of the trouble. The result of managerial experience, often said as well as convincing, is the criterion by which the relative value of one sort of language or appeal to our heart may be accepted as a fact that the plays must promise of success are those that depict the human interest element of the life around us; the "heart plays," briefly told, yet leaving nothing essential to be said.

Again, a play may achieve success because it is presented with attractive accessories, or it may depend for its success entirely upon the development of character, sometimes one character, apart from the sentimental aids of scenery or spectacular effects. French plays will succeed because of an absorbing plot, of intrigue, of character, and of sentimental interest. But to assume that a play promises success in America because it has been eminently successful in France or in England or in Germany is to reckon without the host. Like the prudent play, the play depending for acceptance upon perceived sex relations, they may appeal for a limited time to a limited audience—where, by the way, may be an intellectual and conventional as could be wished—but it is an audience that does not repeat itself. So with the foreign mawkish in vogue, who does not speak our sort of language or appeal to our heart interest; he is not promising of long life. The translation simply does not include the translation of American human interest, and so fails to "make good." With the nation, so with the play. The human interest and humane nature displayed—if at all—are not part of the life of the spectator—of the "age that reflects itself." The audience is left cold and unsympathetic, or is merely intellectually critical.

While the American audience prefers plays of sentimental interest, the English audience is more ready to accept plays of conventional interest. The Frenchman wants intrigue, and is willing to accept dramatic literature. The German is fond of stories of strong ethical import, without reference to what we want in this country—action, movement, and life.

It is a fact that in offering a play to an American audience, which has a more cosmopolitan taste than any audience in the world, the manager who wants to succeed, not only artistically, but financially, must first consider his galleries, for if he can please the galleries and upper classes—which, after all, is the heart of the public—he is very likely to satisfy the expensive patron down-classes. If his plays appeal to the select few—the "problem" plays from Norway, France, Denmark, Germany, where you will—he is appealing to but a portion of the public and not to the approval of the middle mass. Yet it is to reach the large middle class of theatregoers. From this class the interest radiates to all classes. The same general argument is true of the purely literary plays, like those of Bernard Shaw or the poetic writers. They are, as a matter of fact, too limited in number to meet more than literary interest. They do not reach the outlying population. Nevertheless, plays of this class, if they have dramatic quality, would succeed despite the fact that they are heartily written—and because they are. If Shakespeare did not grip the emotion and touch the heart his purely literary work would stand for dramatic interest. The audience must be made to feel. It requires an cultivated taste in appreciative writers—his plays, they are founded on the first primary emotions and constructed on the fundamental laws of dramatic effect.

Daniel Frohman

With the good play—the play which contains all the elements of success—the manager is incidental. Whether it concerns the attention of the playwright, the theatrical manager, or the successful actor-manager. The medium of presentation—whether by the stage or public means—is unimportant. The actor, if he happens to be an "actor-manager," should not be diverted from his work by being compelled to look through the curtain to determine how much money there is in the house, or to be in any way concerned with the business necessities attached to the presentation. There is plenty of work laid on the shoulders of the actor in looking after his own work and considering the characters entrusted to his care and his purely artistic concerns of their plays.

So far as the manager is concerned, he must fail or succeed through his own choice—both of plays and players. If he attempts to produce a play that proves a failure, he has to abide by serious consequences—he is out an expense in time and money that runs into many thousands of dollars. That is why there is an extra amount of care taken in the selection of plays. Possibly American and other playwrights, in voicing their grievance of lack of success in securing the presentation of their plays, fail to take into consideration the great risks assumed by the manager and producer. As a rule, plays are given a presentation in some form or other ultimately, and then the secret of success or failure is out.

It is too often the case that the unsatisfied manager believes he is a failure not because he is not good, but because he has found no one to appreciate his work. Were theatrical conditions perfect beyond the possibility of evil—were national theatres established for the purpose, among others, of insuring such recognition—were there no possible circumstances or conditions to mar the reward of merit and ability—even then the problem would not be solved.

Many efforts have been made to bring forward plays containing new elements of success—plays from the new, but they have seldom proved successful. I am speaking particularly of the occasional novelty, the special moment. When a play is produced in this way, it is safe to assume that it has made the round of the managers, and that the author has finally assumed the production. There is not a manager to-day who would not willingly produce a play that had been selected by a jury of experts, whether from the Dramatist's Club or some other source—to produce it as an experiment—having the production on the judgment of dramatic writers, press men, or authors—a jury which could appreciate the qualities and requirements of a successful play. Unfortunately, such a procedure is impracticable. We are not so well situated as some of our foreign cousins. At the Comédie Française there is a committee that decides on the plays; they are read before the committee, and then the committee decides. That, however, is an unholier theatre. Possible in imitation of this method, or for the satisfaction of the doubt, in England a year ago a manager came forward and offered to produce any play selected for similar means. The jury was formed and all the conditions fulfilled in the establishment of a successful play. The result, and what was the result of the experiment? Out of nine hundred manuscripts submitted and considered solely on merit and

(Continued on page 1599.)

A View of the Horseshoe Falls, showing the Rainbow

The Carnival of Ice at Niagara

By Broughton Brandenburg

I HAD seen the Falls in spring, summer, and fall but I had never contemplated them when their foot was hidden in a mist of ice and their torrents almost blocked in the passage of winter. The result was that the earth, every foot, was getting down from the train on the Ontario side of that tremendous gash in the face of the earth they call the gorge.

A north wind was driving the white vapors and the squally snow clouds south. A moon not yet full had her way to flood the region with a light that was stronger in effect because it fell on a blanket of snow and poured in a thousand places by edges on which the drifts could not hold them down against the wind. Proves of ice deep down in the canyon, frozen points on the fringing slabs above and below, on the islands and on the jam of hummocks caught the moonlight and dispersed it in semitinting showers.

Some one was kindling a huge bonfire at one end of the ice bridge, I could see black bodies moving in a stream up and down each bank and out across the jam. They were people of the region and strangers from all over the two countries, come to see the stupendous sight. In a few minutes I had joined the procession and was winding down the steep path that descends directly in front of the Horseshoe Falls. Great pieces of ice were coming over one after the other, and the larger of them seemed to be adding more and more to the strength of the bridge by catching against the jam. The smaller went under or were pulverized. A region rumbling and tremor of the jam told of the terrible conflict between matter and gravity-impelled water, going on under noth.

The crowds were steadily increasing. Mittened, muffled, hooded, and stout-shoeked natives were going about offering their services as guides. A big, red-faced, kindly chap, who said he was a resident of the American city, had been explaining some things to me and relating stories of other ice-bridges.

"There is a clever game being worked a little further along," he said, as we stood watching the spectacle. "Step up on this knoll. Now do you see those shanties on the ice over there by the

Half-way over to Goat Island

THE CARNIVAL OF ICE AT NIAGARA—TOBOGGANING AT THE FOOT OF THE AMERICAN FALLS

There is hardly a winter in which the formations of ice do not make an ideal tobogganing course at snow peaks, affording rare pleasure for enthusiastically snow sportsmen with bob-sleds, runners, sleds, and toboggans.

bordered about half-way to shore! There is where you can buy a drink of stiff-veal whiskey for five cents. These shanties are on the exact boundary-line between the United States and Canada, and the liquor dealer has neither rent, called States duty nor license, nor Canadian license to pay. The officers of neither country disturb these fellows, because they would first be compelled to prove jurisdiction, and by the time the courts got around to it, it would be spring, and the ice, shanty, and all would be gone."

The very formation of bridges will afford a painstaking student matter for years of study. The mere freezing power of the coldest water is not able to check in the least the mighty flood that rushes over the Falls. Nor has the agency which serves as a partial check been able at any time to more than reduce for a time the volume going over Horseshoe Falls, even though at the same time the American Falls run but little more water than a creek. When winter night fully settles down on Lake Erie the water freezes to amazing depths in quiet bays, and when there comes one of the piecemeal January thaws, the warmth, the increased height of the water, and the change of wind serve to break these fields up into clumps or banks, when the wind gets around into the southwest, are driven to the foot of the falls. I have stood on the top of the Westborough Observatory, on the roof of a high building in Buffalo, on a clear day, and as far as I could see up the lake with powerful marine glasses it was green, brown, and blue with packed floes.

When the ice comes down slowly enough not to give the lead of the river it is whirled down stream just East from the Falls, and buried over the Cataract. The first few colossal clumps make no impression, but soon the fragments begin to elaborate at the point where the tail-end of the great power canal lets into the lower stream. An arm of frozen clumps will reach out, and sometimes in a night a field will be formed. Clumps will strike the rocks and obstructions on either side of Great Island, and perhaps cling long enough to catch others and be frozen to them till the whole mass presents such an obstacle to the water that it will be wrenched away, carried over, and, after circling about, come to rest on the edge of the forming field. A down great masses contributed, and the free passage for floating ice is closed. All the ice not carried under thereafter is caught.

Ship bows if driven, can break ice up to the Edge of the Cataract Falls.

Then, should the wind begin driving ice in rapidly at the head of the river, a few hours will see a gigantic pile mounting. First before the American, then before the Horseshoe Falls. Often as the masses strike they shatter with a report like great guns.

I have seen a fragment of ice, presumably as large as a man's body, buried one hundred feet in air by the collision of two huge clumps. When once the ice cannot get away, and the wind holds steady from the west or southwest, a great bridge is assured.

The bridge of 1904 was the greatest in history. Some portions of other bridges have been more remarkable, but in no way have there been such a complete structure as the one of that winter. The sweep of the jam was so great that it is said that on the 14th of February fifteen feet of ice had formed on the very grand old of Prospect Point, placed there for the protection of boats rising the Falls, and this rapidly increased in a few days to a height of twenty-six feet, forming a great nose of snow and ice from which Prospect Point was not delivered until the 25th day of May.

Living in the terrible current the river never freezes below the

A View of both Falls from the American shore, showing ice-hummocks below the Cataracts. At the Right is the end of the Ice-jam.

A Scene in Prospect Park. Here the Snow-covered Trees has formed a Thin Layer of Ice from the frozen Mist

Looking from Goat Island toward the Steel Arch Bridge. On the Right is the Observation Tower ice-jam or bridge, but such is the temperature of the water that ice forms on the rocks to a depth of five to ten feet below the surface, and the water congeals instantly when it comes to rest at the head of Lake Ontario in severe seasons, often causing some odd formations. Some years ago, when the water was very cold, the wind was busy elsewhere long enough to allow old Lake Ontario to freeze, and the ice running down from the Falls under the ice bridge was caught at the head of the lake and the jam backed up till above the No-90-ton bridge at Lewiston, being in some places twenty feet to height and at others crowding out entirely over the bank.

THE CARNIVAL OF ICE AT NIAGARA—SCENES IN PROSPECT PARK AND ON GOAT ISLAND

Infrequently, a beautiful phenomenon is to be seen in the snow in one of the photographs herewith reproduced. The air was just right to produce mist, the water was coming over in the quantity to make it, and the wind was sweeping it in just such fashion that the morning was a fall on the bank of vapor, creating a rainbow of dazzling beauty. It is sure to be noticed in the steam, except.

There is hardly a winter in which the same band that puts the hub of the ice on the great waterfall does not in some part of the ledge erect an ideal tobogganing course. Sometimes there are two of these slides, and from far and near enthusiastic and daring snow-sporters come with balisles, racers, skis, toboggans, etc., for weeks of rare pleasure.

For several years past there has been an annual theme which caused a partial desamigration of the ledge, followed by a rebuilding of it, and these efforts on the part of nature have achieved some phenomenal effects. Great dumps of ice covered with snow, leaving but the keys of their crevices weakened, will collapse and leave also with the dark water of the stream below at the bottom.

It is not unusual for huge boulders to be split and at the lower end, leaving exposed strata of different periods of formation, quite different in color and convolutions. Again, boulders, formation forms combine to steadily raise a portion of the jam from a comparatively level to a considerable altitude, a process which may go on for two or three days, rapid enough to be visible in a careful water and felt by any one daring enough to stand in such a spot during its transformation.

There have been very few accidents during the ice season, strange to say, for it is then that bold spirits from both Europe and Asia attempt feats that are marvellous beyond relation. The fact that the bridge is so high and the jump so long, the jump is from a level usually gets very wet, but sees his name many times a year. There is quite a difference, too, in raising the ice-jam or bridge and in making one's way out on the piled-up masses directly below the entrance.

Some day there will be a very different set of formations to be seen. No one living now may behold them, perhaps. The giant boulders below the American Falls are protecting the soft side of the cliff, so that each year the Canadian Falls wears away more of the American. Two hundred years ago the forms of the Canadian Falls was so like a horseshoe that the name was given them. Now the shape is more like a V, and each year seems to increase the depth of the water, which is known to be more than eighteen feet. It is what the waterlogged schooner Drift, one of Commodore Perry's prizes, drew when, as an experiment, she was sent over in 1820. The contemplated damming of the Niagara River at Buffalo, to raise the level of the water in Lake Erie, would have the effect of raising the ice at the dam, which would make a serious difference in the winter beauty of the Falls.

Holidays at the Theatre

By James L. Ford

THE ideal theatre audience, according to my way of thinking, would be one composed entirely of children, for they alone go to the theatre in the proper spirit. Their emotions are simple and easily perverted, their perceptions are sure, quick and true, and they go to the play-house to be entertained, not to criticize. Best of all, the stage still holds for them that magic illusion that we who are worldly-wise can never know, any more, and the region behind the footlights is to them a land of enchantment, upon which they gaze with wondering, longing eyes.

It was while watching a representation of "Humpty Dumpty" at the New Amsterdam Theatre the other day and noting the extraordinary aptitude and similarity with which the audience, which was composed in great part of little children, responded to the efforts of the performers, that I went back in memory to that happy period of my theatrical immersions when the stage had lost none of its illusion for me, and the overriding iron of knowledge about the back-drops and the interlarded drama had not yet entered into my soul. We were eager theatergoers in those days, and none the less we became so vitiated a playhouse only about three or four times during the season. It was partly on that account, perhaps, that plays and players made a far deeper impression on us than they do now, and that the actresses who won our infantile affections were loved with a mad intensity that was far greater and deeper than that common adult love which finds expression in mere gifts of flowers and jewelry, or that intellectual approval that is born of a knowledge of them.

We knew nothing then about the theory that it takes a gentleman to play a gentleman, and if we had absorbed that tremendous idea it would have been impossible to realize in that even such aristocratic actors as my Lord Broderick and Veranoth were to be compared in any way with our adored Tony Pastor, elegant and debonair in evening dress and crush hat when singing his ditties and magnificently imposing when seen on Broadway in a splendid seashell coat worn by the first cut. We too, to be advanced of our own stupidly clothed relations after seeing Tony Pastor and Gus Williams walk up the street—the same Gus Williams who concluded with his joke about "all the industries of the season."

Another favorite of those simple times was John E. O'Brien, whose "Solon Shingle" was the literary gem of the less theatrical "Joshua Whitecomb," and the still more effective Dorn-Koster shown us by Mr. Horne in "Shore Acres." "Solon Shingle" was a broadly comic Yankee—a contemporary of the "Widow Bedolt" and "Mrs. Partington" of literature—who was too fat to sell his barrel of apples and eventually found himself in the police court and the central figure in a series of uproarious criminality.

Sometimes I am glad that there was no superior person around then to do the most innocent rejection of the most artificial and stage of stage farmers by telling us that he was not natural, and preferred to enter to the noisy element in the gallery rather than to give an exhibition of "repressed emotion." Theatrical snobism is artificial. "Solon Shingle" may have been, but let it be remembered of him that at least he did not violate the most sacred rural traditions by going first-dollar bills to tramps as "Joshua Whitecomb" did, or by refusing a pension after the manner of the "Shore Acres" farmer.

I think the first theatre I ever attended was the "lecture-room" of Barnum's old Ann Street Museum, and the performer whom I best remember was the "Lightning Calculator," who added up five long columns of figures with a celerity and accuracy that seemed nothing short of miraculous in little chaps like myself who were just struggling through vulgar fractions. This wonderful mathematician is still alive, and well known to the patness of a certain Boston dime museum as "Professor Hutchinson." His eloquent and scholarly lectures at the establishment, whose relics of the fattened lady, the albino king, and the grotesque living lady command the reverent attention of hothead and enraptured audiences. Then I saw the Revell troupe, in which were the veteran Gabriel Havel—he danced like a cork at fourteen; the famous "Solon Shingle," whose son, Ignazio, still does, and the wonderful Zuerfetta, the father of that exquisitely graceful and not unalike dancer, Anna Angles, of Weber and Fields renown. Some what later I was taken in "The Black Crook" by a male rival, that I had known and known that sort of an entertainment it was, but secured seats in the front row three weeks in advance—and I was not until I was several years older that I was told what sort of an entertainment had filled me with such delight and wonderment. Next, chronologically, I mean, is my memory, comes to me first of a minstrel show, on which occasion I heard Gus Kneass sing "Kaiser, don't you want to buy a dog?" and was crowned with laughter by a series of jokes about a starving and ship-wrecked mariner who was eating "chickens out of the hatchbox," "hoof from the halsauks," and who finally secured an egg in the amusement of the interlender, whose next question disclosed the fact that "the ship lay to and I got one." It is interesting to note, in this connection, that this lovely bit of prologue which I heard the first time I ever went to the minstrels I likewise heard on the occasion of my last visit to that now obsolete form of entertainment. I was still very young when I was taken to see "Humpty Dumpty," in which that matchless clown, G. L. Fox, was the star.

We boys all agreed that "Humpty Dumpty" was the finest spectacle ever seen on any stage, and Fox, with his white face and rubeolous clown suit, the very funniest person that the mind could conceive of, vivid memories of Fox came back to me the other day at "Humpty Dumpty," and certainly there is no one else to-day who to-day who I think if we boys of long ago had been taken to see such a wonderful spectacle as that which was unfolded before me on the New Amsterdam stage, I am quite sure that our minds would have been seriously affected by the glitter and the glare of lights, costumes, and stage properties, and by the marvellous series of tableaux that follow one another with a rapidity calculated to bewilder any infantile mind.

"Humpty Dumpty" is a wondrous rather than a broadly comic entertainment, but a great deal of genuine fun is furnished by Frank Merriam in the character of a cook, who rules not only the kitchen, but the whole of the king's palace as well. It is not as funny as "The Wizard of Oz," but as a stage production, it is a useful color, rhythmic dancing, ever-changing scenes, and extraordinary mechanical properties. It is one of the very few plays ever prepared for a juvenile audience. I think myself that there is a little too much in this version of "Humpty Dumpty," and I am quite sure that the child who sits through the performance—certainly it would be impossible to drag one out of the circle who feels with its bewilderment of a cook, who rules not only the kitchen, but the whole of the king's palace as well, and then again by others until the scene itself vanishes, even when the audience has had time to study out its every detail, and another appears as if by magic in its place.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

WE have too few writers in this country like Mr. E. S. Martin. It is the penalty of journalism that it induces a spirit of restlessness and hurry and a wild hurry to "get there on time." Few journalists today seem to graduate into the quieter by-paths of literature. When he does linger in a pleasant backwater to dilate on occasional themes of living interest, there is too often in evidence an impatience and eagerness to get out of it again into the main stream. His manner of writing is alert, rapid, easy, and his perceptions of life shallow and of little value. It is all a vain show; a flash in the pan; a moment's glitter and gloss. His most brilliant efforts have the insolence and impudence of a prattling brook or the mad rush of a turbulent torrent. It is when we enter upon the pages of such writing as Mr. Martin has given us in his latest book, The Luxury of Children and some other Luxuries, that we realize the truth of Matthew Arnold's complaint as applied to the mind of the age—"No leisure to grow wise, no shelter to grow ripe." No more striking contrast to the prevailing tone of literary journalism which I have just deplored could be cited than in these charming excursions of thought and fancy of Mr. Martin's into a field that is always at our doors. Here there is a world of leisure and spaciousness; an element of play, an absence of haste that invites the mind to pause for a while and rest in calm enjoyment of real delights. His thought lies in deep pools, sunny, serene, exhilarating as a summer's day in June. The flavor of earth and its sensuous beauty pervade the luminous depths of its sleeping waters, and on its bosom is reflected the light and glow of heaven. Nonsense have Mr. Martin's admirable gifts of fancy and humor shown to such advantage or adorned a theme with such an exquisite taste and taste and self-respect as regard as in these delightful chapters appertaining to children, their ways, their humors, their vagaries, their inclinations to stray, and the obligations of others toward them. And Mr. Martin has been most fortunate in his illustrator. The full-page pictures and marginal decorations by Miss Sarah N. Stillwell are a delight to the eye. The love of little children and that rare gift of ready understanding and sympathy which have quickened the writer's insight, have also spurred the artist to an exhibition of childhood. In the nursery, at play during school hours, that appeals to one's warmest affection. One feels, too, in this happily combined achievement of author and artist, the ravishing sense of wonder and gay irresponsibility with which the child looks out upon the world, and which Mr. Martin, too, upon the parents as a plea for greater responsibility and solicitude for the young, on their part. The Luxury of Children is one of the most beautiful books of the year, and a most reasonable gift-book.

E. S. Martin
Author of "The Luxury of Children"

A very attractive picture songbook for little boys—and little girls, too, for that matter—is Waltz Little Boys Sing, for which John and Rue Carpenter are responsible. The songs are very simple, and both words and music are concerned with childlike self and nature. The entire and expert of the little boys are caught in a vein of humor that is pleasing and novel. A book for little children that is sure of a welcome is Little Pictures, a successor to the series of stories with colored pictures for which Miss Gertrude South has become deservedly popular. For older boys and girls who have begun to use their minds, as well as their hands and eyes, there are two books which are especially noteworthy. One of these is Mr. Robert W. Chambers's Riverland. Mr. Chambers's previous books, Outdoorland and Oberland, have made him so widely known to young readers that no commendation is necessary to put this third book in a unique juvenile nature series into their hands. The other book is by a new writer, who won his spurs in the Middle West, and who is quickly making a deep impression in the East since his arrival in New York about a year ago. Mr. Bert Loston Taylor was associated with the Chicago Tribune for some years, and came East to take a position on the staff of Puck. He is a writer of refined taste and quiet power. He has a hand in delicious humor, which is his most delightful gift. In The World in the Wood, written about a little girl who gets called "just fluddy" because that is the answer she makes to the Yellow Dog and the Lazest Beaver and the Rabbit when they ask for her name, Mr. Taylor has given a fine example of his fun-making qualities, combined with the story-telling instinct. It is one of the best stories I have read in the manner of Alice in Wonderland; Mr. Taylor is perhaps a follower of Lewis Carroll, but The World in the Wood is not to be judged as an imitation. If other little girls of four six in ten years of age enjoy it as much as I happen to know one of seven did, then the author may feel pleased at his success. The drawings by Miss F. V. Cory illustrating fluddy's adventures in the wood in search of the well are captured with the lens of the text; it is evident that the artist enjoyed the process of putting the author's merry fantasy into her pictures.

Now that the music season has begun the interest in musical matters will be quickened in what our critics are saying about them. Mr. Lawrence Gilman, who has been the musical critic of the WEEKLY since 1901, is, I suppose, one of the youngest men in the field, and yet he comes to it with an equipment of knowledge and sympathy and a faculty of musical interpretation which are unusual for his years. The last only to read his volume on Phases of Modern Music, recently published, to recognize the freshness of feeling, the fineness and forcefulness of imaginative quality, the grasp of skill and execution in presentation, and the exhilarating sense of an originating and individual power which distinguish the critical work of this young adventurer. In study and handling. But Mr. Gilman is more than a critic and a lover of music; he has a sense of music for language as well, and his well-turned phrases and apt characterization of compositions and composers win for him a hearing with the general music-lover, as well as the student. Among the themes treated by Mr. Gilman are Richard Strauss, Edward MacDowell, Grieg, Wagner, Verdi, "Parafall" and its significance, Edward Elgar, and there is a stimulating chapter on "Women and Modern Music." Mr. Gilman dedicates his book to the veteran music critic, Mr. Philip Hale.

An English writer makes grim mirth out of the statement that when The House of the Medici was running serially, one reader begged for advance proofs, pleading that he had heart disease and fearing he might die before the story ended. "I should like to point out to Mr. Thackeray the responsibility that attaches to the writing of a novel so dangerously exciting. What would his feelings have been had the gentleman with heart disease died between the instalments? Could he ever have forgiven himself for allowing a human being to be hurled into eternity with no better preparation than a feverish desire to know what happened in this case? Imagine, too, the horror of his friends, powerless to appease the agonizing curiosity of the dying man. And, by the way, his interest was not, as described, 'heartless.' It was the fear of heartlessness that made him beg so eagerly for the advance proofs."

From "The Luxury of Children"

The "Blue-Jay" and "General Rooster" in "Woodland" at the New York Theatre

"Woodland," described as a "musical fantasy of the forest," by Fiske and Lothrop, is to be transferred from the New York to the Herald Square Theatre on December 28. The scenes of the piece are laid in a mist. All the characters represent birds, and their lives reflect those of the birds of the story of the play.

Lew Fields and Marie Cahill in "It Happened in Nordland" at Lew Fields' Theatre

The new Lew Fields Theatre was opened on December 5 with the musical comedy "It Happened in Nordland," by Gus Warburton and Victor Herbert. The story concerns an American girl who goes to the mythical kingdom of Nordland as an ambassador and by a series of misadventures finally wins the possession of the throne.

Louis Mann in a Scene from "The Second Fiddle" at the Criterion

"The Second Fiddle" is a farce comedy by Hurdon Blake, founded on a book by the same author published some years ago. Mr. Mann takes the part of "Leopold Baron von Hal-den," a penniless nobleman, who renounces his position as second fiddle in a Vienna orchestra and goes to Paris, where his sweetheart and his opera are both stolen.

MUSICAL AND FARCE COMEDY IN NEW YORK

GEORGIA WELLES AS "PAULA" IN "THE SECOND FIDDLE"

Miss Welles plays the part of "Paula," the foster sister and sweetheart of "Leopold Baron von Walden" (Mr. Mann). Miss Welles was formerly a member of the Castle Square Opera Company

Correspondence

MODERATION OR TOTAL ABSTINENCE?

MR. VERNON, IOWA, December 1, 1901.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir:—For many years I have been a constant reader and admirer of your excellent paper, but I have sometimes wondered if the position that you have taken as advocate for the moderate use of alcoholic beverages is tenable. The effects of alcohol upon the human body, both in moderation and in excess, have in recent years been carefully investigated by competent men of various countries, and their contributions to our knowledge of the subject have shed much light upon the problem. The writer recalls that about twenty years ago the New York Legislature passed an act that required the effects of alcohol and other poisons upon the human organism to be taught in the schools. Other States followed New York's example, and the consequence was that the authors and publishers of text-books in their haste to comply with the requirement often sacrificed accuracy and fell into many exaggerations. A reaction from such teaching was inevitable. But in the past few years, the subject has been approached and investigated in a more judicial spirit. The conclusions reached are generally so accepted as reliable.

Among the many recent works on physiological chemistry, that of G. Ringer, a professor in the University of Jülich, Netherlands, is widely used and recognized as a standard. In his section on alcohol, he does not simply give his own views and the results of his own investigations, but he includes the work that has been done on the subject in England, the United States, Belgium, France, Germany, Austria and other countries. The conclusions arrived at by all these investigations are almost diametrically opposite to the ideas you have advanced in defense of moderate drinking. It is shown that what seems to be the stimulating action on mind and body that the moderate drinker experiences is due to the paralysis of the nerve centers. Also in this paralysis are due the diminution of the sense of fatigue, the temporary relief from trouble, and the feeling of warmth. Alcohol does not improve digestion but retards it. All the evidence tends to show the uselessness and the harmfulness of the beverage even in moderation. Another authority, A. Beer, by collecting a large mass of evidence, shows that soldiers are able to do better service in every climate when entirely deprived of the use of alcohol. It is admitted that alcoholic drinks diminish the metabolic processes, the breaking down of the tissues; but this breaking down is natural and desirable, as it is the source of all our energy.

It can hardly be proved that ordinary food and drink, alcohol excepted, excite a progressive appetite for itself, and the tendency is in no such liquor in excess. Moderate drinking, therefore, is exceedingly dangerous, and with such risk the very doubtful advantages, which are claimed for it, are not commensurate. Many States are as hard hit by that from seventy to eighty per cent. of crime and from two to forty per cent. of the suicides in civilized countries are due to alcohol. A benefactor of the race and a powerful factor in the education of civilized communities, as every great paper is, should not you not advocate a policy of total abstinence as strongly as you have advocated that of moderation?

I am, sir,

NICHOLAS KASHNER,

AS TO "CANDLESTICKS"

MARQUETTE, MICH., December 5, 1901.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir:—In an article in a recent issue of your paper containing an estimate of the late Cardinal Newman, an Illinois man made to "candlesticks" in his comment with Whately is made the occasion of some wandering comment that a man esteemed so great could consider so small a thing important.

The author has overlooked the fact that the total reference Newman made was to the suppression of several Irish hospitals. The use of "candlesticks" in this sense is familiar to readers of the Harvard of St. John. "The seven golden candlesticks" were the seven churches of Asia.

I believe I am correct in saying that Newman's sermon to Rome had nothing to do with minor ritual matters. His mental disturbances grew out of such minor serious questions, and all of his previous associates, numbering many great men, from whom he afterwards came to differ, bear witness to the essential largeness of his mind.

I am, sir, G. MARY WILLIAMS.

Presbyterian Episcopal Bishop of Marquette.

HARVARD AND TECHNOLOGY

MASSACHUSETTS INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY.

BOSTON, December 6, 1901.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir:—Your editorial of December 3 and various other public comments on the proposed combination of the Institute of Technology and Harvard University appear to be based on an imperfect appreciation of the facts and considerations involved. The matter is much too complicated to admit of such conclusions until the actual plan is presented.

The building up by Harvard of a strong rival to the Institute is spoken of as a "needless duplication of institutions in the same field." If the supply of technological education was likely to outrun the demand, this statement might be correct. But so far from that being the case, the Institute of Technology, like other schools of its type, has been long overcrowded, and the quality of its work has tended to decline in consequence of increasing numbers, quite apart from the financial difficulty of providing the necessary space. Technological education is largely a matter of close personal relations between teachers and students. This fact makes it increasingly difficult to guard against the acquisition of quality as numbers increase, and at the same time invalidates the argument of economy in combination, since the cost, not only of buildings, but of teachers and equipment, must be increased appreciably in proportion to the number of students. Moreover, a great educational institution is not a mere mechanical "plant" to be indefinitely expanded or combined with other plants, similar or dissimilar. It is a living organism, with its own individuality, traditions, ideals, and normal direction of development. It is this which makes it so perilous to attempt any organic combination of the two institutions, with the consequent sacrifice of independence to one or both, and it is natural that the faculty and the alumni should have the keenest appreciation of this fundamental aspect of the matter. They realize that, while the development of a great educational undertaking may be retarded by lack of funds, an absolutely essential condition for such development is organic independence.

I am, sir,
A GRADUATE OF TECHNOLOGY.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE CONSTITUTION

BALTIMORE, December 11, 1901.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir:—For about thirty years I have been a subscriber to your paper with I believe, no break in my subscription. Possibly, therefore, you may think my communication is not worthy of consideration before commitment to the editorial waste-basket.

From time to time references have appeared in your columns from which it appears that you object to the act of Mr. Roosevelt in 1902 in arranging the arbitration commission which eventually stopped the coal strike. I believed that you considered his action "un-constitutional," not questioning its practical benefits in settling the trouble, at that time so alarming.

I think it would interest your readers if you would explain your grounds for alleging the "unconstitutionality" of the act and action of the President, or show why the Constitution comes into the case at all. If I mistake not, Mr. Roosevelt did not organize the commission to violate the rights of any authority he had as President, but merely did what was his privilege to do as a citizen of the United States, as you or I might have done. If done by a private individual the arbitration would probably have failed, but the prestige of the President made it succeed, and millions of our people were saved further loss and suffering, but he claimed no "authority" for acting as he did, nor any power to enforce the findings of the commission. There is, I suppose, no claim that the result was not good, but where does the Constitution come in or the assumption of authority by Mr. Roosevelt by virtue of his official position?

I am, sir, WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM.

[See this week's COMMENT.—EDITOR.]

HOW SHALL WE EDUCATE CHILDREN?

PARIS, TEXAS, December 8, 1901.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir:—A recent occurrence coming under my observation furnishes food for thought, and raises the question of the advisability of higher education for our boys.

A man in the prime of early manhood having graduated from the universities of Tennessee and of Texas, an original thinker, a most forcible writer, whose literary taste is cultured to the extreme, and a man who has made a comfortable living by the practice of his chosen profession—that of the law—has calmly, deliberately, with malice aforethought, thrown up all these attainments and retired to a rural community—"Pease Gap"—and engaged in a general mercantile business, such as can be run in a country store, the stock comprising beans, coffee, cotton, millinery, ploughs, wagons, water oil, saws, hams, etc.

This move, to me, is a great waste of fine mentality. The apology offered is about like this: "There are fifty lawyers in Paris, work for about ten; the country offers a fine field for energetic men."

The question I would ask of your readers is this: Are our parents called upon to make sacrifices to give our boys higher education, when it is proven, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the professions are crowded and little money made in them. Let me have light upon this subject. I am a widow, with a family that came on before race suicide came into vogue, and with Cornelia, the mother of the Titian, I can say of my children, "These are my jewels." How shall they be educated?

I am, sir, ELEANOR T. KIERPATRICK.

DIDN'T TELL IT

BOSTON, December 8, 1901.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir:—I had the anecdote called "Faithful," published recently in THE NEW YORKER, credited to me, in getting pretty well circulated through the country, and I wish to deny ever having repeated any such story.

I therefore wish you would do me the kindness to deny, in the columns of your paper, my responsibility for the story.

I am, sir, JOHN F. FITZGERALD.

"A LA GAUMINE"

By WILLIAM McLENNAN

IF old Nicolas Juchereau de Beaufort had not had so many sons and daughters—there was a royal baker's dozen of them, beginning with Marie Anne, twice a wife, and ending with Josephine, once and forever a nun—his sisters-in-law might have amounted to something. As it was, most of the boys left home and one had to be helped here and another there, so that the daughters, who made fewer demands, had but a meagre enough share, so when Madeleine married Monsieur Joseph Alexandre de l'Estrogien de St. Martin she had to be satisfied with her inauspicious name and her husband's position as the Governor's Guard rather than with the length of her purse or the fatness of his par. However, as "that shears the sheep according to the wind," they had only three children—Joseph, Madeleine, and Francis—instead of seventeen, like her brother Ignace, or sixteen, like her sister Charlotte.

Joseph, Marie Anne Josephine she was christened, the eldest of the family, was a regular gypsy. Her mother declared she was badly brought up; that it was a disgrace for a should-be respectable child to run wild over the whole parish; that she was altogether too familiar with both her father and her mother, who had united in spelling her from her cradle upwards. At these and all similar fault-finding, M. de St. Martin would only laugh and say: "I care but little, so long as her Josephine loved her and admired her father as the best and most lovable persons in the world. And Joseph Alexandre laughed too, for when his little Josephine, his namesake you notice, jumped on his knee and hugged him until his face became redder than ever as he expostulated:

"Oh, M. M., how scarce! We have neither lands nor gold. The children are our only wealth, and a little extravagance in it now and again keeps us from growing too wise or too old."

"You'll both be old enough, some day," rejoined Mme. Ignace, whose husband, M. Duchesnay, was now head of the family, and she, as his representative, was jealous of its dignity.—"You'll both be old enough some day; but I should for the wisdom."

"My Joseph is quite as wise as I'll ever want him," retorted Joseph's wife.

"You are a disgrace to the whole family!" thundered Mme. Ignace. "I don't know how you ever came into it."

"By birth, madame; not by marriage," flushed the little mischievous one, who that her husband had no choice to interfere.

At which Madame Ignace very properly left the house, stating emphatically her opinion of both parents, and prophesying an unpleasant future for their eldest daughter, Marie Anne Josephine de l'Estrogien de St. Martin.

All this was when Josephine was quite old enough to have known better; so were her father and mother; but even when a few years went by and they were all a few years older, they still knew no better way to get their feet out of life than by going on in the same happy-go-lucky manner, a family whose goods were freedom and affection held in strict community.

"Depend upon it, Joseph and Madeleine will some day repent of allowing such nonsense as the children dining when they have company," criticized Mme. Ignace to her husband.

"Surely you wouldn't have the children starve," soberly answered her husband.

"Have some sense, Ignace! Certainly no child should be seen when the Governor is present."

"Well, Josephine is no child now; the Governor said so one day yesterday he was surprised that St. Martin had been able to keep so pretty a bird in his nest so long."

"That is just what I say! The idea of allowing a great girl like that to be seen and talked to by every Tom, Dick, and Harry who chooses to come out from Quebec with him."

"Do you mean the Governor, ma tante?"

"No, I don't mean the Governor, indeed!—for Mme. Ignace disliked almost all things to be called "ma tante," and M. Duchesnay should have remembered this— I don't mean the Governor, indeed, I mean such trash as that young Moutholton, who comes from no one knows where."

"He happens to come from a place called Paris."

"A pretty place!" she started.

"So I've been told."

"Then why didn't he stay there? M. Beaulard says only the trash come out here."

"M. Beaulard has a fine nose, but he'll get it too high in the air if he turns it up at every one whom he meets from Paris. Leave the lad alone and tell M. Beaulard to do the same or he may run foul of Joseph a second time." And M. Duchesnay ended the discussion by walking off towards the mill.

And M. Duchesnay was quite right as regards Louis de Moutholton, for in spite of 4 and Beaulard's nose, he was a fine young fellow and came of most respectable people in Paris. I'm afraid his fault in the eyes of Mme. Ignace was that he had borne a letter to M. de St. Martin, instead of to some more influential member of the family; that he had found the little house by the church rose to his liking than the manor, and most of all, that he should slighted brother-in-law allowed the handsome young fellow to go in and out at all hours and make one with his family in their excursions into the woods. Of course, had Josephine not been so young it would have made less difference, for Mme. Ignace was fond of her pretty niece in her own imperious way, and M. Louis de Moutholton added a new anxiety to Mme. Ignace which she shared together with her indignation with M. Beaulard, who found all her points well taken.

As for the young gentleman and Mademoiselle Josephine, they were innocent of all cause of anxiety or offence. He was as much at home with M. and Mme. de St. Martin as if they had been his own father and mother, and was like an elder brother to Josephine, Madeleine, and Francis. But gradually there came a change: Josephine became more silent when in his company, she no longer proposed their usual visits to the traps or to the quiet reaches of the Montmorency where trout abound; she preferred to go off alone with her father, and when at home stuck very close to her mother's apron-string.

Louis was somewhat flustered at first, but, having a clear conscience, decided it was only a girl's way, and she would probably come round in a time. So he slowly made no change in his relations towards her, and Josephine gradually became reconciled and in her own good time she came round. Her natural upbringing saved her from all affectation, and, once over her first startled apprehensions of this new element in her life, she fell back into her usual relations without nagging or explanation.

That both the young people were in love was clear, and, being of a suitable age, neither father nor mother made any objection. Louis satisfied M. de St. Martin that he was in an independent position, that his marriage would please his mother, from whom a warm letter of approval was soon received by Mme. de St. Martin—for he had written long before the innocent Josephine had

But Mme. de St. Martin, alas! made no better progress with the unreasonable M. Rouland than had her husband. She returned home, very indignant, but unrequited. All the fighting qualities of the Juchereau were roused within her, and she succeeded to Louis her determination to go with him the next day and appeal to M. Ghinestet, the Grand Vicar of Quebec.

M. Ghinestet was white and musty like his dwelling, and invited neither familiarity nor appeal.

When Mme. de St. Martin began her story, he moved his thin hand and said:

"I have already seen your Curé M. Rouland. He is right in the position he has taken, and there is nothing to be done."

"But, monsieur, allow me to explain," protested Louis.

"You can explain, M. de Montblond, when you produce the certificates required by the Bishop's mandement."

"But, monsieur, 'tis winter now, and though I am perfectly willing I cannot possibly receive my certificates before next autumn."

"That is your affair, monsieur."

"At least allow me to produce my proof."

"What proof?" said M. Ghinestet, leaning forward with some show of interest.

"My mother's letter."

But M. Ghinestet fell back in his chair with a gesture of weariness. "Oh, la, la, la, monsieur, this is an old story. M. Rouland has refused to accept your so-called proof, and I am not going to waste my time nor my temper over such matters. The Bishop's mandement is there, it is perfectly clear. Comply with it and M. Rouland will marry you with all the pleasure in the world. And there's an end of it!"

And M. Ghinestet rose to point his words. Unfortunately it was not the end; for M. Louis de Montblond, burning under a sense of personal injustice, and outraged in his tenderest feelings, gave way to his indignation with words that certainly did nothing to help forward his cause.

Mme. de St. Martin did not accept it on a desert. Soon her influence worked on Josephine, who, after a day or two, went singing about her work. No one in the household could guess what kept Mme. de St. Martin so cheerful or inspired her unflinching assurance that all would come out right.

For her marriage was in the air, so much so that she apparently could leave no single people in peace. No thought Michel Potvin, that staid, quiet-going bachelor with the mature wisdom of forty years and better, when his mistress came into the kitchen one night if the maids had gone to bed and he sat before the fire mending his stockings.

"Michel," she began without preamble, "have you any threat of getting married?"

"Bottiguet's madame. Why should I get married?"

"Because I wish you to."

"Get married, madame? Me?"

"Yes, certainly. Didn't I ask plainly?"

"Poor l'amusé! madame. That is a poor jest to bring to a quiet man in this time of day. I've had trouble enough by myself, and 'tis a poor fool that would doubt it. No, no, have much things to the young people who don't know any better."

"Vendredi! Lévesque's daughter is a good girl, Michel?"

"Then let her be a comfort to her father, madame."

"Now, Potvin, no more nonsense! I wish you to get married and that's all about it. I'll see you have enough to start with, and old Lévesque's daughter is willing. What more do you want?"

"I don't want Lévesque's daughter, madame," said poor Louis, dolefully.

"Good heavens! man. One woman's much like another. Why do you mean?"

"Well, to speak frankly, I don't want any; but if madame is set on the matter—perhaps, Marie Belanger—"

"Marie Belanger be it!" cried Mme. de St. Martin, quickly. "I'll speak to her for her to-morrow, for the banns must be read next Sunday."

"That will make the wedding, madame."

"Early in January."

This important business being settled to Mme. de St. Martin's satisfaction, she then entered into some explanations which so sat-

Awarded Grand Prize St. Louis Exposition

INSURANCE AT LOW COST FOR

THE BEST IN LIFE

THE PRUDENTIAL HAS THE STRENGTH OF GIBRALTAR

THE WHOLE FAMILY

Other Concessions

FIVE MILLION DOLLARS

Have Been Voluntarily Given to Holders of Old Policies by

The Prudential

A Company Which is Actually Paying Out More Than its Obligations. The Best Guarantee of Liberal Treatment.

THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA

Home Office: NEWARK, N.J.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, 50-52 WALL STREET.

Bills of exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers in Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travelers' Letters of Credit. Collections abroad. International remittances. Certificates of Deposit.

THE AUDIT COMPANY OF NEW YORK

WILLIAM E. VAUGHAN, President. EDWARD E. FROCK, Vice-President. JAMES D. WHELAN, Secretary. J. H. HARRISON, Treasurer.

Investigations for Merchants, Bankers, Corporations, and Commis- NEW YORK. sioners.

Mutual Life Holdings, 4 Cedar Street.

WANTED: Advertiser de l'avis has $5000 for two pages by advertisement in the second issue of the next issue of the magazine and two complete copies of the next issue of the magazine. Send in letters of credit and cash payment. The advertiser will be paid in full immediately on receipt of the advertisement. The advertiser will be paid in full immediately on receipt of the advertisement. The advertiser will be paid in full immediately on receipt of the advertisement.

The Northwest Under Three Flags

By CHARLES MOORE

With Illustrations by Howard Pyle, Frederic Remington, and others. Maps, etc.

The early story of the Northwest—the French explorations and occupations, the British war, the English conquest, and later annexation by the United States.

In the preparation of this account of the pioneers of civilization, the author has had access to the British Public Library of MSS. and government sources.

The work is of historical importance, correcting a number of errors and misapprehensions sanctioned by previous writers, and is written in an entertaining style.

Crown 8vo, $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, NEW YORK

MOTOR BOATS
LAUNCHES, STEAM AND SAIL, YACHTS, ROW BOATS, CANOES
SPEED—PLEASURE—BUSINESS

Harold, Reineck, Economical, Simple, Safe
Our Manager can give you the inside story of the motor boat business. Write for a prospectus. Write today and we will send you a prospectus. Write today and we will send you a prospectus.

THE END OF THE BUFFALO—AN ENGLISH IDEA OF THE EXTINCTION OF BIG GAME IN AMERICA

Drawn by Paul Bell

ished M. Potvin that every cloud vanished from his face and by the next day his cheerfulness rivalled that of Josephine; he married as ardent a lover as Madeleine Marie Belanger or any reasonable girl could demand, so their banns were duly read in the parish church of Bonaparte by the Curé Bouhard the very next Sunday.

The New Year came with its obligatory round of visits between relations and friends, but no unpleasant remarks were made either at the pre-nuptial or the nuptial; the young people were apparently in good heart, and Mme. de St. Martin had a light of triumph in her eye which nothing appeared to justify, unless it were the approaching marriage of Potvin and Marie Belanger.

The marriage was fixed for Wednesday, the 7th of January. To do honor to their spiritual servant, and to the lady of honor, St. Martin's choir, the whole St. Martin family were in the church with the exception of M. de St. Martin, who was on duty at the Chateau in Quebec.

Louis de Montholon stood beside Josephine, and a very handsome couple they made. The bride and groom were in their proper places, M. le Curé Bouhard officiated, and the marriage was duly performed. He then prepared to celebrate the benediction, but the moment the consecration of the elements was complete Louis de Montholon arose in his place, and bade Josephine by the hand, declared in his clear voice:

"I, Louis de Montholon, before M. le Curé Bouhard and in presence of you all as witnesses, do take Marie Anne Josephine de l'Étréguine de St. Martin as my wife."

Then Madeleine, very pale and trembling, rose, in her turn said:

"I, Marie Anne Josephine de l'Étréguine de St. Martin, before M. le Curé Bouhard and in presence of you all as witnesses, do take Louis de Montholon as my husband."

The consecration was general. M. Bouhard turned as red as his altar cloth; but what could he do, dear man? It was after the consecration and he could not interrupt his mass. He stood still, in speechless indignation, while wisps began to run through the congregation: "C'est mariage à la canaille! Oh, la bonne Magie!" and the like, until he recovered his composure, when, raising his hand to command attention, he went on with his office steadily to the end.

Three outside, every one by common accord waited, eager to see the pair who had awakened such sudden interest in their eyes. Baid by side, hand still in hand, they stepped out of the door and passed at the edge of the narrow platform which ran across the front of the church. Then Louis spoke.

"My friends," he said, "you have seen what has happened. Every step I have taken," continued Louis, "up to the day that I went to ask M. Bouhard to marry me to this lady has been with the full knowledge and consent of M. and Mme. de St. Martin and my mother."

M. Bouhard refused to marry us. Why? Because, he says, I am a Frenchman, because I must bring to him a certificate from my parish priest, from a notary, from some one or other, whom he has not seen—how prove that? That I am not married already. "I have, as a good Catholic, the highest respect for M. Bouhard as a priest, and I now declare that if I have in any way defiled him or such I humbly ask his pardon and forgiveness, but I have done nothing I am ashamed of. I know I am in the right and M. Bouhard will yet say so himself. No man or woman can ever be made to say that any scandal save such as he himself has forced upon us shall ever fall on my wife, for, in spite of all you have heard, my wife she is married by him, in the face of the Church, and I call on each one of you as a witness!"

When he ended there was no doubt of the popular verdict, though some of the elders might shake heads over the scandal, the shaking was more perfunctory than condemnatory. There were few who did not press forward to shake hands with the rebels, and while the feather-brained laughed over the ruse, the more serious eyed the young people of their sympathy and support.

"Dame!" exclaimed Potvin to his bride, "we are very much like the dead man at his funeral—all the compliments for the company."

Music

An American "Carmen"

MISS CLARE FRENSTAD's recent assumption of the part of Carmen at the Metropolitan Opera House has been the signal for a curious determination and, as it seems to us, gratuitous disparagement of Mme. Cabel's famous impersonation of that character. There is no reasonable occasion for such disparagement. Miss Frenstad is playing the part of Blac's inimitable heroine for the first time in America, and her interpretation has been greatly and justifiably successful. Her Carmen is a brilliant, effective, and admirably artistic performance, she acts the part with delightful vivacity and skill, she sings it beautifully, and her magnetic personality invests it with an indelible fascination. It is a pleasure to be able to praise so definitely an accomplishment, but it is neither just nor desirable to forget or to deny that we have known and acclaimed in the past a Carmen which, despite its whimsicalities, pretensions, and extravagances, remains, in its essentials, a magnificent and inseparable achievement.

New Songs by Mr. Loeffler

It has been affirmed elsewhere of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, the Boston composer, that he is, in his artistic procedure, "a weaver of dreams"—that, for him, "shadows and dreams are the inimitable realities." And shadows and dreams are the substance of his music—whether forbidding and tragic, as in his mass for Martine's "La Mort de Tintagiles," lively and grimly fantastic as in the "Toujours" for orchestra after Verlaine and Rollinat, or tenderly and ironically as in certain of the songs to words by Rodolphe, Verlaine, and Gustave Kahn. He has little concern with the things that are actual and present in the world of the imagination. The note of regret, of passionate reminiscence, of loss, is persistently sounded. It is music in which the beauty, the emotion, issue from

"A more dream-heavy hand,
A more dream-heavy hour than this . . ."

His inspiration comes to him tinged with the tenderness and the fascination of a spiritual essence, but a solitude whose borderland is peopled with haunting and shadowy presences—presences which loom appallingly abandoned girls and passions and aspirations.

It is a year since Mr. Loeffler's first published work appeared—the Quatre Mélodies—a group of songs to words by Gustave Kahn through public performance. Mr. Loeffler has now followed up the Quatre Mélodies with another and even more remarkable production—Quatre Poésies pour Voix, Alto, et Piano, to words by Verlaine and Rodolphe. These songs bear an earlier origin under the Quatre Mélodies, and so evidently antedate them in point of actual composition; yet they are, if anything, even more typical and characteristic than the songs of the later volume. Mr. Loeffler has selected for his texts Verlaine's Néanmoins, Dansons La Gloire, and Le Non du Cœur s'efface Vers la Nuit, and Rodolphe's La Flocke-Flocke; and for these four poems he has written music altogether without an analogue in the literature of the song. We have endeavored to convey a sense of the spiritual and emotional side of Mr. Loeffler's artistic personality as it is disclosed in his work; of its purely musical qualities it is too easy to speak informally without technical specification. Much of the extraordinary appeal of Mr. Loeffler's music depends upon his luminous and subtle use of a certain exotic and extremely effective scale, and upon his command of pitch, significant, and daring harmony and yet, for all his adventurousness and independence, one is continually aware of a reticence, a poised and dignified, which is vigilantly on guard against extravagance and over-emphasis.

Mr. Loeffler has made a place of his own in musical art. We know of few other poets, living or dead, who have wrought more subtly and more individually in their medium—with so distinguished a beauty, and with so fine and rare a confidence.

Carlton Club

CIGARETTES

EGYPTIENNES

MOUTHPIECE

CIGARETTES

Their exquisite taste and delicate aroma commend them to men who know pure Turkish tobacco.

It not at dealers, package of 10 sent on receipt of price 25c.

S. ANARGYROS,
111 Fifth Ave., New York.

A cup of Beef Tea

gives vigor and warmth long before other food could be digested. LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF BEEF dissolves quickly in hot water, making a perfect beef tea, delicate in flavor and free from fat, sediment or adulteration. A brace without reaction.

Get the genuine with this signature of a L. Liebig on above label.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S
EXTRACT OF BEEF

BOND & LILLARD
WHISKY
IS THE BEST

Policeman (to small girl whose tiny charge has wandered into the roadway and dislocated the traffic). "That your baby?"
Small Girl. "No; it's mother's."—From "The Under"

RED TOP RYE
GOOD WHISKY
It's up to YOU
PURITY
BALTIMORE BOUQUET

AWARDED GOLD MEDAL
ST. LOUIS
1904

PERDUE, WESTMEYER & CO.
CINCINNATI, O.
AS SOLE AGENTS, SEE CINCINNATI, MO.

A BOOK FOR THE MUSIC-LOVER

PHASES OF MODERN MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

RICHARD STRAUSS—
"PARSIFAL"—WAGNER—
VERDI—ELGAR—
MAC DOWELL—GRIEG—
WOMEN & MODERN MUSIC

"The subjects are dealt with in a style at once so delightful and charming that they become attractive even to the uninitiated."

—Athletic Constitution.

"A book that musicians ought to appreciate."

—Bayle Commercial.

"Far above the average of current musical literature."

—Parkland Journal.

"He sings, and he makes us aware that we, too, may legitimately enjoy it."

—Public Opinion.

"A volume of sane and helpful studies to all music-lovers."

"As readable a volume of musical essays as has come from a publisher in recent years."

—Louisville Courier-Journal.

16mo, Gill Top, Uncol Edges, $1.25 net

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

Taste Tells

The palate must be gratified and satisfied, and the fine rich flavor of

Hunter
Baltimore
Rye

Charms the taste and it becomes at once a fixed choice against change.

It Is Always Uniform

Sold in all fine-class hotels and by all the
W. H. LAMAR & SON, Baltimore, Md.

A Quiet Evening at Home is wonderfully pleasant by having a bottle of good whiskey on the table. But remember, it has to be good whiskey.

SOUTHERN TURF RYE

10 YEARS OLD

is made for connoisseurs—has all the delicacy of flavor, smoothness and richness that come of good whiskey. It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

It is not a common or ordinary whiskey, but the finest of all. As a gift, it is the most desirable. And if you are a connoisseur, you will know it. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South. It is the only one of its kind in the South.

Fastest Trains in the World—On the New York Central.

"THE STORY OF THE SCIENCES"

A HISTORY OF SCIENCE

BY

HENRY SMITH WILLIAMS, B.Sc., M.D., LL.D.

Author of "The Story of Nineteenth-Century Science," "The History of the Art of Writing," Editor of "The Historians' History of the World," etc., etc.

IN FIVE VOLUMES

Profusely Illustrated with Portraits of Famous Scientists, Diagrams, Facsimiles, and Pictures

A GREAT EDUCATIONAL WORK

If you are a scientist, teacher, student, professional man, or layman interested in the world's progress, you will be interested in A HISTORY OF SCIENCE for it is a record of this progress from the earliest discoveries of primitive man to such recently discovered facts in modern science as radio-activity and the new theories of light and electricity.

It is a complete history of the development of the natural sciences — Astronomy, Physics, Chemistry, Anatomy and Physiology, Medicine and Surgery, Meteorology, Paleontology, Zoology, Geology, Biology, Psychology, and the various important subdivisions of these sciences. There are also biographical sketches of most of the great discoverers, with picturesque incidents that have figured in so many of their discoveries. The method of presentation as given in A HISTORY OF SCIENCE has all the charm of romance and all the authority of history.

IT IS A WORK THE LAYMAN CAN UNDERSTAND
IT IS UNTECHNICAL, YET ACCURATE

IT FASCINATES THE GENERAL READER
WHILE COMMANDING THE RESPECT OF
THE MOST CRITICAL STUDENTS

Henry Smith Williams

IT IS THE ONLY WORK OF ITS KIND IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE
SEND FOR THE BOOKS AND JUDGE FOR YOURSELF

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK
Please send me, free of charge, your illustrated booklet describing A HISTORY OF SCIENCE

OUR OFFER On receipt of One Dollar we will send you the entire set of five beautiful volumes. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $2.00 a month for nine months. On receipt of your request for these books we will enter your name as a subscriber for one year, without additional cost to you, to either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. In writing, state which periodical you want.

Name _____
Address _____

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

Schlitz

The One Pure Beer

Not all beer is pure beer—that's why we ask you to be careful.

The reason is cost. Schlitz beer costs the brewer double what common beer costs.

We must pay the price for good barley. We must go to Bohemia for hops. We must bore to rock for our water.

Cleanliness costs fortunes. We cool the beer in filtered air. We age it for months, so it cannot cause biliousness. We sterilize every bottle after it is sealed.

Do you suppose we would do all that if beer could be pure without it? Yet Schlitz beer costs you no more than beer brewed without these precautions. Ask for the brewery bottling.

The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER'S BROTHERS

NEW YORK

THE GIVERS

BY

MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the tale story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of tough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

Personally Conducted Tours

to

CALIFORNIA, COLORADO, UTAH,
OREGON, WASHINGTON and MEXICO

VIA THE

New York Central Lines

Will move in January, February, March and May.

For particulars, inquire of ticket agents at the New York Central Lines, or receive a free card showing list of "America's Winter Resorts" in America's H. Buckle's, Circular of Passenger Agents, General Ticket Station, New York.

Illustration by E. S. Martin.

THE CASTLE COMEDY

By THOMPSON BUCHANAN

An engaging story, written along comedy lines, of the time of Napoleon. The sprightly way in which the story is told, the flashing impudence of the hero, and the charm of the heroine combine with the beauty of the volume to make it unusually attractive as a Christmas gift.

With Illustrations in Color and Marginal Decorations by Elizabeth Shippen Green. Uncut Edges, Gilt Top, in Box, $2.00 net

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Illustration by E. S. Martin.

THE LUXURY OF CHILDREN

By E. S. MARTIN

With a genial charm and humor akin to that of Charles Lamb, Mr. Martin has written a series of essays which have to do with the many sweet, loving phases of child-life in the home. The book will delight all fathers and mothers. Its quiet good-humor and charming style make it a beautiful tribute to home life.

With Eight Illustrations in Color and Marginal Decorations in Tint by Sarah S. Stilwell. Square Bro. in Box $1.75 net

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII.

New York, Saturday, December 31, 1904

No. 196

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved.

LOOKING FORWARD

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2506

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 31, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered as the New York Post-Office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W

COMMENT

During the recent political campaign the person most frequently referred to as "a Wall Street man" was ARTHUR BELMONT. The term is usually meant by those who use it to be opprobrious, but we question whether Mr. BELMONT himself would so regard it. He really is a Wall Street man in the sense that his office is in that vicinity, as was that of his distinguished father before him. In those days an honorable banker was considered to be as reputable as any other citizen. Times have changed somewhat in this respect, but a pleasing indication that they have not gone wholly awry was afforded last week by the unanimous election of Mr. BELMONT to succeed the late Senator HANNA as president of the National Civic Federation. He not only did not seek the position, but was naturally very reluctant to accept it, and would not have done so but for one fact, in which lies the significance of his selection, viz., that the suggestion came from the representatives of labor in the Federation. That it was a meritorious choice is well known to everybody familiar with the admirable manner in which Mr. BELMONT has sustained the reputation of an honored name, but that it should have been made by the courageous spokesmen of an element supposed to regard the Wall Street man with horror is clearly indicative of growing breadth and tolerance on the part of both labor and capital. The personal tribute to Mr. BELMONT is surpassed only by the credit won for themselves by Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. GOWERS, and their associates.

We advise President BELMONT, however, to look sharp. Trials and tribulations are the inevitable accompaniment of high places. He will have to walk the narrow path and avoid his p's and q's. Already the Bakers' Union has taken under indignant consideration the terrifying report that, at the very dinner which ended in his election, President BELMONT ate non-union hams. We have never tested the merits of non-union hams and are therefore unable to discuss intelligently the real issue involved. But, collaterally speaking, we deem it probable that Mr. BELMONT may escape condign punishment on one of two plans—first, that he ate the ham before he was elected, or, second, taking a leaf from Mr. ROOSEVELT's book on coal-trike interference, that he ate it, not as president, but as a private citizen, in need of sustenance. Being new at the job, this first offence will probably be overlooked, but we cannot too insistently urge upon President BELMONT the advisability of branding his polo ponies with the union label forthwith, and see to it that each oat hereafter fed to them bears the regulation stamp.

"Mr. FRIDMAN presumes." It is a familiar formula which usually refers to a play. In this number of the WEEKLY, however, Mr. FRIDMAN presents some information and views respecting the methods of managers, of whom he is the kingly pin on both sides of the Atlantic, which possess the peculiar interest always attaching to authoritative utterances. Our natty friend Life will probably take exception to some things he says about the uplifting endeavors of the "stadlers," but for ourselves we fail to see how else the great amount of money required for very expensive productions could be provided. However, we are not going into that now. What we started to say is that Mr. FRIDMAN personally is a loss to the stage and to playgoers. Only last week he deliberately accepted certain failure instead of assured success of a play because he would not present to the American public a vulgar and suggestive, though sensational and in London popular, incident. The elimination cost him a good deal of money, but if he does not get it back indirectly many times over, to wit: the American appreciation of cleanliness on the stage as well as in the public prints. May many years elapse before Mr. FRIDMAN ceases to present.

The Philippine government bill passed the Senate on December 16 by a very large majority—almost two to one—but, having been amended, it had to be sent back to the House, where it originated. We presume that the amendments will be adopted ultimately by the House. Undoubtedly they ought to be. The measure in the form which was given to it by the popular branch of the Federal legislature looked so much like an attempt to exploit the helpless archipelago. The measure would certainly have been condemned by public opinion, and we doubt whether it could have passed the Senate, in the teeth of the vehement opposition of all the Democrats and of many Republican Senators, had it not been materially modified by the amendments which Mr. SPOONER of Wisconsin proposed. Even as amended, so fewer than six Republican Senators, besides the Democrats, voted against it. On the whole, however, we are of the opinion that the amendments went far to correct the defects of the original bill. In its perfected form the measure permits the Philippine government to guarantee interest on railroad bonds at no more than four per cent, instead of five per cent., and also gives the Philippine government a first lien upon the railroad property so guaranteed.

We need not lay stress upon the importance of having the latter provision stated unequivocally. It will be remembered that grave doubt ultimately arose as to whether the money advanced on bonds, presumably first mortgage, by the Federal government to the Union Pacific Railway had constituted a primary lien. Another manifest flaw in the original Philippine government bill was the provision that a railroad could obtain a government guarantee of all the bonds that it proposed to issue as soon as a few miles of its track had been laid. Here was a manifest temptation to fraud. The bill as redrafted by Senator SPOONER prescribes that any railway authorized by the Philippine government shall be constructed in sections of not less than twenty miles each; and that, when any one section is finished, the road may obtain a government guarantee of so many bonds as correspond to the proportion which the outlay on the section finished bears to the whole amount of money needed for the completion and equipment of the entire road. It would be superfluous to enlarge upon the wisdom of this precaution. Still another amendment forbids the Philippine government to deliver guarantees at any one time in excess of $1,200,000, and further provides that no such guarantee shall continue for a longer period than thirty years. We need not point out that, although the bill, as amended, safeguards the Philippines from being plundered outrageously, there is still left sufficient incentive for capitalists to begin the construction of insular railways on a great scale. We shall indicate the absolute necessity of railways when we remind the reader that even of wagon roads there are very few in the Philippines, and that, for the most part, mule paths and beasts of burden have to be relied upon for the transportation of staples from the interior to the seaboard.

Of course the guaranteeing of railway bonds, which, in the end, may aggregate a hundred million dollars, will constitute a very serious addition to the burdens already resting on the insular treasury. Will it be possible to meet the extra appropriations needed for the service of the prospective railway debt from the existing revenues? At present, we should bear in mind, a large part of the insular income is derived from the duties levied on products of the Philippines in ports of the United States. The sum collected in our custom-houses is transferred to the Philippine exchequer. Now Secretary TART, with a view of stimulating insular production and export, proposes that all of the products of the Philippines shall enter our ports duty free, except tobacco and sugar, which shall pay hereafter but twenty-five per cent. of the DUTY rates, instead of the seventy-five per cent. which at present they pay. Will or will not the income derivable under the proposed change in the tariff from the two staples mentioned equal the revenue at present received from American custom-houses by the Philippine government? That is manifestly a question of the utmost moment to the Filipinos, and it is one for experts to decide. There are those who think that the revenue returnable from our custom-houses to the Philippine Treasury would be signally increased by a reduction of the rates payable in our ports on sugar and tobacco from seventy-five to twenty-five per cent. of the DUTY demands. There are those, on the other hand, who say that, under the circumstances named, the revenue of the Philippine government would be signally depleted, in which event we cannot see how the laudal government could afford to guarantee the interest on railway bonds in addition to defraying its existing expenses.

In the number of the WEEKLY published on December 24 a valued correspondent, writing from Baltimore, requested us to state the ground on which we described the interposition of President ROOSEVELT in the anthracite-coal strike of Pennsylvania as "unconstitutional." Our correspondent suggests that Mr. ROOSEVELT did not organize the Anthracite Coal Commission by virtue of any authority he had as President, but merely did what it was his privilege to do as a private citizen of the United States. We would respectfully invite our correspondent's attention to a point of law and to a fact. The point of law is that when, in a constitution or in a statute, the powers of an official are defined, the definition is exclusive. As a private citizen, THUDGOT, ROOSEVELT's interposition in the anthracite-coal strike would have had no more effect than ours would have had, or that of our correspondent. It was solely because Mr. ROOSEVELT was President that any attention was paid to his interposition. The Constitution, however, Article 4, Section 4, proscribes, precisely and exclusively, when the Federal Chief Magistrate may intervene in affairs pertaining to the jurisdiction of a constituent State. The section provides that the United States shall protect each of the constituent States against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence. It is undisputed that the violence of the local miners prevented the working of the coal-mines and the shipment of the fuel to consumers. It is equally undisputed that neither the Executive nor the Legislature of Pennsylvania requested Mr. ROOSEVELT's interposition. It should also be obvious that not for a moment should a Chief Magistrate be permitted to transcend the powers carefully defined by the Constitution on the pretext that, in transcending them, he is acting singly as a private citizen.

Look, for instance, at the seventh clause of the first section of Article 2, which prescribes that the President shall receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and that he shall not receive during that period any other emolument from the United States or any of them. What would our correspondent think of a President who, on the plea that he did so merely as a private citizen, would accept, in addition to his salary, an annual stipend from the commonwealth of New York, or from a syndicate of capitalists? We would further remind our correspondent that the original pretence, that in his interposition in the coal strike Mr. ROOSEVELT was acting solely in the capacity of an individual, was abandoned when he signed the bill passed by Congress appropriating money of the United States for services rendered by the members of the Anthracite Commission. It is most improbable that hereafter an attempt will be made to draw a visionary distinction between the Federal Chief Magistrate qua President and qua private citizen.

Are we to construct a sea-level canal at Panama, or shall it be a lock-canal, and if so, what ought to be the height of the summit-level above the sea-level? These important questions, which ought to be answered before a definite plan is adopted and work thereunder begun, are discussed in a report to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, made by Mr. JAMES F. WALLACE, Chief Engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission. The plan recommended by our former canal commission contemplated a high-level lock-canal, the surface of the water in which at the summit should be ninety feet above sea-level. The practicability of this scheme depended on the assumption that the proper foundation for a high dam could be found at Bohio, but Mr. WALLACE pronounces the locality unfavorable for the construction of so high a dam. One of the two other lock systems proposed involves the construction of a dam sixty feet above sea-level either at Bohio or at Gatun, which is eight miles from Colon. In either case the dam would have two thirty-foot locks. The other lock system suggested provides for the construction of a canal with only a twenty-foot or thirty-foot level above the sea, and with two locks, one at Miraflores and the other at Bohio or in its vicinity.

Both of the lock systems, and, for that matter, a sea-level canal as well, would require the construction of a dam at Gatun, for the purpose of controlling the Chagres River. This dam, which in any event, unless a ninety-foot-level lock-canal is built, will have to be constructed as a preliminary work, will cost, Mr. WALLACE estimates, upwards of fifteen million dollars, and could not be finished in less than two years. As regards the cost of the three lock systems, this would vary, we are told, from two hundred million dollars for a ninety-foot-level canal to two hundred and fifty millions for a thirty-foot-level one. The sea-level canal, on the other hand, would cost three hundred millions. Mr. WALLACE points out that even a sea-level canal would require a tidal lock at Miraflores, because, although the mean sea-level of the Pacific and of the Caribbean is the same, the tide in the Bay of Panama rises ten feet above mean sea-level and falls ten feet below, whereas the fluctuation of the tide at Colon is less than two feet. Mr. WALLACE does not say how much a ninety-foot-level lock-canal could be completed, but he thinks that a sixty-foot-level one could be opened for traffic in ten years, and a thirty-foot-level one in twelve years. A sea-level canal would not be ready for traffic before the end of fifteen years, and then four years more would be needed to finish it. We believe there is no doubt that a sea-level canal is preferable to any lock system, provided we are disposed to pay the cost in time and money.

It looks as though the House Committee got rather more information out of Mr. WALLACE than he was officially qualified to give. He is, to be sure, the Chief Engineer of the Canal Commission, but it lies with the distinguished engineers who compose the commission to estimate the comparative difficulties of the several methods of doing the work, and to determine what method should be followed. Mr. WALLACE, as we understand it, is not the authorized spokesman of the commission, and it is his own views, and not necessarily the views of the commissioners, that the House Committee has in its possession. It is altogether likely that there will be considerable disparities between his present views as to the time, cost, and difficulty of the various details of the work and the matured conclusions of the commissioners. On these matured conclusions, not yet reached, it will depend what definite plan the commission adopts and puts its engineer to work at.

Senator STEWART of Nevada, affectionately known as the Congressional Santo Claus, has introduced a bill to raise the salaries of some of the officers of government. He is for paying the President $100,000 a year; the Vice-President, $20,000; the Speaker, $20,000; and all the Senators and Representatives $10,000 apiece. The bill has not been much discussed yet either in or out of Congress, but it deserves to be seriously taken up and wisely dealt with. The President gets along without known embarrassment on his present stipend, but we think the proposal to double his salary would be popular, though the end sought might perhaps be better realized by providing that all Presidents shall have life pensions of $10,000. The argument for increasing the Vice-President's salary is that the dignity and attractiveness of the office need to be increased. The Speakership is one of the great offices of our government, and its salary should get within sight of its importance. Another great office is that of justice of the Supreme Court. The justices should be paid such salaries that no man may feel constrained to decline an appointment to the Supreme Court because his acceptance would put it out of his power to make suitable provision for his family. We believe the salaries of the circuit judges ($7000) are also lower than is a fit remuneration for men of the quality and ability that we need. At present large private means are an indispensable qualification for an ambassadorship, or if a poor man is appointed his friends must furnish him with funds. The people can afford to pay the reasonable living expenses of their foreign representatives, and Congress should see that they do so. The present salaries of the cabinet officers ($8000) are entirely incommensurate with the value of their services and the cost of such a scale of living as they are expected to maintain. We believe Justice TART, for example, is not a rich man. It would be easy for him to earn a very large income in the private practice of law, but he is not interested in money-getting, and likes to serve the people. His value to the public is enormous. Such a man ought to be paid a decent salary.

When Congress has considered the items on the national payroll which we have mentioned and any other important ones which we may have overlooked, it will be time enough for the members to take thought about their own needs. Senator STEWART suggests doubling the pay of all the Senators and Representatives. In favor of that plan is the consideration that nearly all men need a little more money than they are getting. Against it is the thought that there are nearly 500 members of Congress, and that to pay them $5000 more apiece would require a considerable disbursement. If the cost of living has increased so much that their salaries have seriously decreased in purchasing power, it becomes them first to consider whether they cannot make living somewhat less costly. Let them carefully cut the tariff schedules, and see whether there are not some just and reasonable modifications which would tend to make fixed incomes go a little farther. There are reasons for keeping the majority of the members of Congress in touch with the simple life which do not apply to the cases of the cabinet officers or judges or ambassadors. Still the thing may be overdone. A million dollars distributed annually among our legislators would give each one about two thousand dollars more than he now receives. It is doubtful whether with that increase the Congressman's salary would buy in Washington as much as his present salary bought eight years ago.

It seems to us that insufficient attention has been paid to the article entitled "A Filipino View of the Philippine Problem," contributed to the December number of the North American Review by Mr. JESSE SIMMONS, who is a member of the Manila Bar Association and a professor in the Manila Law School, and who has lately officiated as one of the Filipino commissioners to the St. Louis Exposition. The writer wastes no time in discussing the question, now purely academic, whether the United States acquired their sovereignty over the Philippines legitimately or illegitimately. What he tries to indicate is the actual attitude of the Filipino people, or, at least, of a majority thereof, with reference to their own future. He admits that a good deal of careful investigation is needed to discover the direction in which the preponderant opinion really points. The difficulty of the inquiry is augmented by the fact that, with the exception of the so-called Federal party, there exists in the Philippines to-day no organized political group the aims of which are expressed completely in platforms. The Federal party itself is in the process of reorganization, and may at any moment put forth a new declaration of principles. Mr. SIMMONS asserts with confidence that, whatever other results may be contemplated in the new platform, the idea of annexation to or federation with the United States will not be countenanced. The so-called Federals, we are told, no longer entertain the hope which, for a time, they cherished, of forming a part of the American Union, and no longer look forward to enjoying the same rights as are possessed by the citizens of the United States.

As for the Filipinos that do not belong to the Federal party, Mr. SIMMONS testifies that they are frankly in favor of independence in short order, and do not care for the process of evolution that is the characteristic idea of the Federals. Not that even the "Nationalists" cling to-day with as much firmness as during the war and for a time afterward to the doctrine of independence, immediate and absolute. The growing rivalries between the maritime powers for ascendancy in the Far East, and the experience that Korea is actually undergoing, have opened, we are told, the eyes of the irreconcilable Filipinos, and have convinced them that of equal importance with the attainment of independence would be the procurement of a guarantee that the independence should not be precarious, at the mercy of the ambitions or the wrong. Outside of the Federals and the Nationalists, there are, it seems, at least nominally, two other political parties in the Philippines, to wit, the Liberals and the Democrats. Mr. SIMMONS avers, however, that the reason for their existence is not clear, inasmuch as the Liberals have aims similar to those of the Federals, and the Democrats are almost as pronounced advocates of nationalism as the Nationalists themselves. As for the so-called Labor party, it forms a group apart, and so far as it takes any part at all in general politics, it sympathizes with the Nationalists and Radicals. To sum up, then, according to this native authority, there exist only two great parties in the Philippines: on the one hand the Federals, who may be described as evolutionists; and on the other those of every political complexion who favor speedy independence, qualified, however, by a species of protection like that which we exercise over Cuba.

It is possible that by the time these lines reach the reader's eye Russia's Baltic fleet, provided Admiral ROJESTVENSKI is suffered to carry out the purpose for which he was despatched, will have reached the Strait of Sundra or the Strait of Malacca, where an encounter with the Japanese fleet will be imminent, if it be true that Admiral TOGO has left the Yellow Sea for Singapore. The two principal sections of the fleet—one of which, under Vice-Admiral ROJESTVENSKI, was to round the Cape of Good Hope, while the other, under Rear-Admiral VUKOLIKOVSKI, has passed through the Suez Canal—have been proceeding in a leisurely way, at a rate, it is said, varying from 200 to 220 miles a day. When last heard from, on November 29, the Cape detachment was at Agaña Pequeña, on the southwest coast of Africa, while the Suez detachment, on December 7, was at Jibuti, a port belonging to France, near the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. Where the two detachments will meet is, of course, pure guesswork, but naval experts surmise that they have been ordered to rendezvous either at the Chagos archipelago or at Minicoy, a coral atoll, both of which lie off the east coast of Africa. The latter point, however, is only about 350 miles to the west of the southern tip of India. If the two sections of the Baltic fleet shall meet at either of these points by Christmas day—there is no reason why they should not, even when allowances are made for stops and coaling—they should be able to reach the Strait of Sundra or the Strait of Malacca by January 3. Which of these pathways to the Pacific will be followed depends upon whether ROJESTVENSKI would make for Batavia first or directly for the French port of Saigon. Singapore is so placed that if Admiral TOGO should station himself near it, he should be able to intercept his opponent, whichever of the two straits the latter should elect to traverse. If the fleets meet, there will be, of course, a naval battle, about the outcome of which little doubt is felt by naval experts. They expect TOGO to win, although he no longer has all the little-ships and cruisers that he controlled at the beginning of the war. Obviously the Russian fleet outclasses his considerably. But what do warships amount to if the officers, the seamen, and the gunners are notoriously incompetent? That the Russian naval officers and sailors believe that they are going to their death is a fair inference from the panic into which they fell in the North Sea, the international investigation of which, by the way, is about to begin.

To have Congress and THOMAS LAWSON sitting at the same time has induced some strain on the attention of the American people, and it was a relief to have Congress adjourn for the holidays and leave LAWSON the whole of the field. But all by himself he is still somewhat more agitating than is comfortable. When he isn't pounding the market and wounding our sensibilities by making our speculative fellow creatures suffer, he bothers us by bidding for our sympathies and claiming for himself the compassion that we would naturally bestow on the objects of his wrath. In his advertisement of December 20, for example, he proclaims the awful price—"time, money, misery, perhaps death"—which he is likely to be compelled to pay, for disclosing the recondite and awful facts which he is struggling to bring to our knowledge. Our hearts, already wrung by the predicaments of the speculators, and by our suspicion of the anguish that "The System" must be suffering, must bleed, he assures us, for him alone. Awful things are in store for him, horrible revenges, diabolical persecutions, but we must stay by him and help him in the great work of freeing his mind and relieving his conscience. We are willing to receive his confidences in so far as our other engagements will permit, but really his demands are almost too pressing. We concede that he is a remarkable phenomenon, and that his use of the appliances which the progress of American civilization has made available to persons who appreciate and can handle them is considerably instructive. The first of the great truths recognized that things could be done in this country which had not formerly been practicable, because the conditions were ripe and the tools ready. The first of the truly great blatherkites seems to have made an analogous discovery. None of us knew that so prodigious a dust could be raised by advertising until we saw it done.

Among the staple products of the Philippines are statements and reports that are contrary to expectation and to other reports. We don't remember any important eyewitness assertion about these islands that has not been controverted by other eye-witnesses. Nothing that anybody avers about the Philippines from knowledge, either general or particular, may be safely treated, in the light of our experience, as indisputable. The most recent surprising report that controverts beliefs and principles that were commonly accepted is conveyed by Major CHARLES E. WOODBURY, a surgeon in the United States army, and concerns the use of intoxicants by Americans in the Philippines. When President ELDER of Harvard had occasion to address a group of teachers who were starting for the Philippines, he admonished them, among other things, to abstain from alcohol. Major WOODBURY says that was bad advice. He relates that in 1902, being impressed by the common assertion that alcohol was particularly dangerous to our soldiers in the tropics, he made a study of the physical condition and drinking habits of an infantry regiment that had been three years in the Philippines, and of a cavalry regiment that had been there fifteen months. He found, to his astonishment, and somewhat to his confusion, that 48 per cent. of the excessive drinkers retained their health, 66 per cent. of the moderate drinkers, and 46 per cent. of the abstainers. Of the excessives, 1½ per cent. died; of the moderates, 4 per cent.; and of the abstainers, 9 per cent. His comment is:

It these figures prove anything, they prove that in the terrible depressing, neurotic, anemic conditions brought about by living in a tropical climate, against whose onslaughts we have no protection like the dark-skinned native, a white man who is not assisted by a little alcohol is more harmed by the climate than the man who does get it. Moreover, the damage done to these young men by occasional excess is not so great as the damage done by the climate to the abstainers. What a lot of misstatements have we received from our teachers, text-books, and authorities!

As for the teachers whom President ELDER exhorted, he relates that he was often called in to see them professionally, and that he never encountered a more horrible condition of health in any people as a class. Every woman among them whom he saw was in a wretched state. He says there is less drunkenness among our soldiers in the tropics than at home, and gives statistics. He also insists that Americans need animal food in the tropics if they are to avoid the exhaustions due to the climate and the consequent infections.

These are very grievous as well as surprising reports. We quote them as we find them and turn them over to denial and controversy. What the Rev. Dr. WILLIAM F. CHAPIN, of Washington, will say about them we should hate to conjecture. It is he who is quoted as saying in Pittsburgh on December 18, "If I were to form a composite picture of the devil as an angel of light and of darkness, I could easily imagine LYMAN ANNOTT and Bishop PORTER in the composite." Dr. CHAPIN will have to let Major WOODBURY into the same group. If the Major's findings are sustained by other observers and investigators, they will help to impress upon us that the conditions of existence are different in the Philippines from what they are here, and that we must adapt our expectations and our judgments to those differences. If Americans in the Philippines need rum, we must resign ourselves to their consumption of it, hoping, nevertheless, that it will not be necessary to contrive for their special use a new moral law with larger loopholes in it than the one we patronize at home.

According to the request of Governor-elect DORGLAS, the President assigned General BRAN to duty as Adjutant-General of Massachusetts. The effect of the detail is to give him the pay of a lieutenant-general in active service, to which Massachusetts adds the $1600 which she pays her Adjutant-General. The modest total is by a good deal the largest pay that any American army officer is drawing in consideration of military services.

Carliff, South Wales, has published abroad the tale of a new evangelist, EVANS ROBERTS by name, who, from a common collier, has suddenly leaped into fame as almost a second WESLEY. He draws vast throngs to hear him, and not only do his own words thrill and fire his hearers, but he seems to possess the power of conferring upon them the gift of eloquent speech. Old men and nuns, young men and even children, rise and give testimony to the spiritual change he has worked in their lives. This marvellous preacher the gospel of joy. He smiles and laughs in the pulpit, and his services in their gay and festive character are in marked contrast to the familiar lugubriousness of our own camp-meetings, with their weeping mourners, and their overpowering sense of sin. It is said that at many of the factories in South Wales the hands have stopped work to hold prayer-meetings, and the owners complain that they are in consequence put to serious loss. At one of the large triple-factories, when the horn sounded the other morning, the men all dropped their tools, and for three-quarters of an hour they held a prayer-meeting, while the machinery stood still. They prayed for the manager's soul, but he replied that he preferred their work to their prayers. The whole story may remind us that the Celtic character in Wales, as in Ireland or Scotland or Brittany, is singularly prone to waves of religious emotionalism, and goes to extremes in fervent piety.

Dr. LYMAN ANNOTT preached, on December 18, to the Harvard students in Appleton Chapel. "I wonder," he said, "if you students will understand me when I say that I no longer believe in a great first cause. To-morrow the newspapers will brand me as a heretic. My God is a great and ever-present force which is manifested in all the activities of man and all the workings of nature." He went on to tell about the God he believed in, "who is in, and through, and of, everything," who is the one eternal energy, intelligent and possessing personality. To the lay mind Dr. ANNOTT's idea of God, as set forth in the newspaper reports, seems to include most of the elements that are essential. With whatever words my one attempts to define the immeasurable, there will always be more left over than the words include. Dr. ANNOTT seems over-ambitious in aspiring to be qualified as a heretic on the score of his idea of God alone. Nevertheless, he did get into larger type than usual, and our theological contemporary the Sax defines him as a pantheist, and suggests that he ought to be "on a platform wholly independent of religion as it was once conceived to be." The Sax is eternally solicitous that every seeker after truth should get on the platform where he belongs. We share its solicitude to the extent of much curiosity as to the platform that the Sax itself should occupy. It is the greatest defender of the faith among, but somehow half its efforts seem to be directed to demonstrating that the faith is, and must ever continue to be, indefensible. Dr. Annett's digressions do not convey that impression. Whether his newly defined idea of God is heretical or not, he will probably continue to say his prayers. We have high authority for believing that Satan trembles when he sees the weakest saint upon his knees, but is there any basis to suppose that the Adversary is seriously dismayed when Brother LUFAS expounds theology?

Mr. Pearson, the English publisher, owns a popular magazine, a weekly paper, and nine newspapers, all in England and distributed through London, Birmingham, Leicester, and Newcastle. His list includes papers of diverse styles, sizes, politics, and department. He appreciates and owns all kinds, Tory, Liberal, Unionist, Imperialist, Conservative, and Radical. When he acquires a new paper he aims to keep it in the same groove in which he finds it, and to sell it to the same readers. Therefore he makes no sweeping changes in the staffs of papers that he buys. But in one particular all his properties are harmonious. They all support Mr. Joseph CHAMBERLAIN's protective policy. One of the latest of his acquisitions is the old conservative, free-trade London Standard. He decided that it should remain old and conservative, but its free-trade proclivities have made trouble. Not that he pressed the point with undue ardor. He asked all the Standard's editors to stay, and most of them stayed. He was willing to let free trade and protection go unadvised for a time, but even that did not satisfy Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, the old editor, who declared that he must be outdone, either against Mr. CHAMBERLAIN or for him, and that he was not for him. So Mr. CHAMBERLAIN resigned, and wrote to the Times explaining why, and the matter has given the other journals and their correspondents a topic on which they have relieved their minds profusely and with glowing candor.

It is an interesting situation. If a publisher wants to own a lot of newspapers with conflicting views on various subjects, there is no moral reason why he shouldn't. If he has a talent for management, he can manage a group of papers to some advantage, buying his ink and white paper and even his news in larger quantities, and therefore cheaper, than if he had only one to provide for. He can make all his papers reflect more or less his energy and taste and knowledge in many particulars without disturbance, but if he undertakes to make them all support a detail of political policy about which there is intense feeling and almost disparity of public sentiment, of course he must look out for squalls. He has changed the situation. The readers of a paper don't care who owns the ink, so long as it is black; nor do they greatly care who supplies the ideas and convictions, so long as they are to their taste and accord with their expectation. But to swap convictions on them in a vital matter is a critical experiment and usually fitter to be made for conscience sake than in the way of business.

All England knows now, as the result of the affair of the Standard, just what papers Mr. PEARSON owns, and that they all support Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's policy. If he intended to publish papers of opposing politics, he ought not to have allowed himself the luxury of having political views. Some of our capitalists have understood the matter better. They have been for both sides. But they have not been successful as newspaper owners, and none of them that we know of has attempted to own a string of assorted papers. Mr. HEARST owns a string of papers, but they are not assorted. They all behave alike, and their owner provides them all with convictions out of the same chaldron, just as he provides them all with pictures, poetry, moral homilies, sporting news, and ink. We think Mr. HEARST's method is wiser than Mr. PEARSON's, but perhaps the distances in England are not great enough to make them practically there. Each one of Mr. HEARST's papers needs territory. Bring them as near together as Mr. PEARSON's papers are, and the combination of convictions might be greater than would be consistent with the public safety.

MILLENNIAL

Td love to have the anti-imperial
Bill Tarr with ASSUALDO on his knee;
Not prone nor backside up, but sitting prim,
While kindly Tarr ameliorated him.

Will President Roosevelt Rule His Party?

MANY observers of the phenomenal majority of both the popular and electoral votes secured by Mr. ROOSEVELT last November were inclined to predict that the leaders of the Republican party in Congress, though they may hesitate and delay, will ultimately carry out any plans deliberately formed and earnestly advocated by the President. It is an interesting fact that the forecast is not warranted by our political history. In 1868 JAMES MANUSCH obtained 122 against 53 electoral votes, yet he was so far from dominating the Democratic-Republican party that HENRY CLAY and other rising men in Congress forced upon him against his will the "Young Men's War" of 1872. Indeed, it looked at one time as if his party would refuse to give MANUSCH a re-nomination. In 1852 FRANKLIN PIERCE got 234 against 42 electoral votes, yet, far from dominating his party, he was dominated by it, the leaders compelling him to champion a repeal of the Missouri Compromise. In 1864 ABRAHAM LINCOLN was re-elected by 232 electoral votes against 21. Did he rule his party? On the contrary, he could not even call his cabinet. In the winter of 1864-5, he read to his cabinet the draft of a message to Congress embodying a proposal to distribute $400,000,000 in United States bonds among those Confederate States which before a designated date should have taken down their insurgent abolishing slavery. Every member of the cabinet opposed the message, which, accordingly, was withheld. ULYSSES S. GRANT in 1868 received 214 against 80 electoral votes. So far he was, however, from exercising ascendancy over his party that not a few of its most eminent leaders revolted, held in 1872 a so-called Liberal-Republican Convention, and nominated HORACE GREELY for the Presidency. In the year that followed the electoral college gave GRANT 206 against 63 electoral votes, a tremendous majority. In GRANT, in his second term, proved unable to carry out his New Dealings project. Mr. CLEVELAND in 1892 had a majority of 110 electoral votes over his Republican and Populist competitors combined, and, as his popularity was attested by his carrying States never before since the civil war carried by a Democratic nominee for the Presidency, it was taken for granted that he would be able to shape legislation. As a matter of fact, the Wilson tariff bill, which embodied his fiscal views, was subjected at the hands of Democrats in the Senate to a degree of mutilation that the President witnessed not only with disapproval, but with indignation and disgust. So far, then, as precedents go, we cannot assume that, because of Mr. ROOSEVELT's amazing triumph at the ballot-box, he can count upon the obedience of his party in Congress. It is true that he possesses a resiliency of character to which no other President since BUCHANAN or BISHOP GRANT or CLEVELAND, however, were men of sturdy fibre and firm will, comparable with Mr. ROOSEVELT's own; yet both had to succumb, as we have seen.

Unless, therefore, Mr. ROOSEVELT's second administration should prove an exception in our political history, it will depend mainly or largely upon circumstances beyond his own control whether he shall succeed in securing the execution of a programme definitely formulated by him, and commended by him to Congress. On occasion among these circumstances will be the intrinsic merit or political expediency of the policies which he is known to favor. What are those policies? We name, primarily, tariff revision, because, if nothing should be done in that direction by the party now in power before the spring of 1908, it is well-nigh certain that the next Presidential campaign will turn upon that issue. There seems to be no doubt that, before the Fifty-sixth Congress met for its second regular session, Mr. ROOSEVELT was freely alive to the advisability of revising some schedules of the DUTY tariff, and of doing it before the spring of 1906, when the campaign preceding the general election of Representatives in Congress would be at hand. Those who had access to him reported that he was disposed to express his views on the subject in a special message announcing that he should consider in extra session the Fifty-sixth Congress soon after the 4th of March, for the purpose of revising the tariff. What was the outcome, however, of prolonged consultations with Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. HALE, and other leaders of the majority in the Senate, and with Speaker CANNON and other influential Republicans in the House? Instead of converting them to his revision ideas, Mr. ROOSEVELT seems to have become a convert to theirs; or, what practically amounts to the same thing, he has assented apparently to an indefinite postponement of his project. If any ruling has been done in this business, it is not the President who has proved to be the ruler.

We pass to what some would deem the capital feature of Mr. ROOSEVELT's personal programme; certainly, it is the most important feature of his last annual message. We refer to his warmly urged request that Congress should clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power not only to set aside an unreasonable or excluding railway rate, but to substitute for it a rate which in its judgment would be more reasonable. As we have formerly pointed out, bills making substantially the same proposal were already pending in the present Congress, one in the Senate and the other in the House of Representatives. There is no indication that either bill will become a law, or will even reach the stage of public debate. Moreover, even those Senators and Representatives who are supposed most faithfully to represent the President's opinions—including the Secretary of the Navy, who is a railroad man of much experience—seem inclined to renounce the plan of conferring the function named on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and of delegating it instead to an Interstate Commerce Court. Even the substitute thus talked of, however, is still in embryo; no bill defining it has yet been introduced in either House of Congress, nor is one known to have been prepared. Inasmuch as the present Congress will expire in about two months after the holidays, and inasmuch as none of the great appropriation bills has come up even for discussion, we may dismiss as out of the question the notion that an Interstate Commerce Court, whether the large one suggested by Senator KLAY, or the small one favored by the Secretary of the Navy, will be treated earlier than the winter of 1903, even if the establishment of such a tribunal is seriously contemplated by the leaders of the Republican majorities in the Federal Legislature.

Let us glance at some of the other measures to which Mr. ROOSEVELT is committed, but as to which it remains to be seen whether he can rally his party to their support. There, for example, are the arbitration treaties, of which five have been concluded, namely, with France, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, and England. We have little if any doubt that a considerable majority of the Republican Senators will consent to ratify these treaties, but whether the necessary two-thirds vote can be secured is by no means certain. In view of the reluctance previously displayed to substitute a general arbitration treaty for diplomatic negotiation and special agreements, made with reference to particular questions as they arise, the Spanish Boundary controversy, we should not be much surprised to see a few Republicans combining with all the Democrats to defeat a ratification of the compact above named. We doubt, at all events, whether any of them will be confirmed during the short remnant of life left to the Fifty-eighth Congress. For our own part, we wish that every one of the treaties might be ratified before the next 4th of March; but a wish is one thing, expectation is another.

If there is one of the appropriation bills in which the President may be presumed to be personally interested, it is that which will make provision for the navy during the coming year. The estimate submitted by Secretary MURKIN to the House of Representatives puts the amount needed for our Navy Department in the next twelve months at $113,000,000. The estimate contemplates four new battle-ships and six scout-cruisers, besides better deck facilities, navy-yard improvements, and the construction of new buildings for the Naval Academy, and it terms out, however, that several Republican members of the House Committee on Naval Affairs are determined to pare down the estimate, holding that only one new battle-ship instead of four such vessels should be authorized this year, and that more scout-cruisers are not needed at this time. There is some force in the assertion that, since economy is to be the watchword of this session, and since money is inevitably required for rivers and harbors, and for certain public buildings, are to be refused, the appropriation for the navy ought to be diminished rather than increased. Under all the circumstances, the appropriation finally made is not unlikely to fall short of Secretary MURKIN's estimate by from five to ten per cent. Here, manifestly, is another of Mr. ROOSEVELT's policies that Congress will scarcely agree to carry out in its entirety.

We have, on the other hand, no doubt that one of Mr. ROOSEVELT's purposes will be fulfilled, and that in his plan for developing the natural resources of the Philippines, a plan formulated in the Philippine government bill, the essence of which is a provision authorizing the insular administration to guarantee four per cent. interest annually for thirty years on the first mortgage bonds of corporations undertaking to construct railways in the archipelago. We take for granted that the House of Representatives will concur in the prudent amendments made in the Senate, and that the bill thus amended will become a law. The question arises, however, whether Mr. ROOSEVELT's success in securing the assent of Congress to this particular measure will not render impracticable any other project upon which he is understood to have set his heart, that, namely, of admitting to our ports, duty free, all products of the Philippines, except sugar and tobacco, which should be subjected hereafter to twenty-five per cent. of the DUTY rates instead of the seventy-five per cent. which they now pay. It looks as if such a fiscal change might, despite its signals, the public revenue of the Philippines as to put it out of their government's power to sustain the burden that will be imposed by the guarantee of interest on railway bonds. It will be remembered that at present all duties collected in our ports on products coming from the Philippines are turned over to the insular treasury. Suppose that the Philippine government should presently find itself obliged to pay three or four million dollars a year by way of interest on guaranteed railway securities, where would it find the money, if it ceased to receive any considerable income from United States custom-houses?

On the whole, we arrive at the conclusion that while in minor matters Mr. ROOSEVELT's wishes will have much weight with the Federal legislators, yet in things of far-reaching moment, like tariff revision or the creation of an Interstate Commerce Court, the Republican majorities in the Senate and the House of Representatives are much more likely to be influenced by their own leaders than by the President. After all, that is as it should be, if our Federal Constitution is based on a sound principle—the principle, namely, that the Legislature ought to be paramount, and that to this end no sort of compromise in it should be conceded to official spokesmen of the Executive.

Russia's Prayer for Self-Government Denied

Ever since the spokesmen of the zemstvos, or provincial councils, met in St. Petersburg, and drew up a memorial imploring the Czar to move to a more objective, practical, and effective, there have been in all large Russian towns violent demonstrations, adopted, if not deliberately intended, to alarm Nicholas II. and thus frustrate the attempt to secure representative institutions. There is but too much reason to suspect that the outbreak of tumult and disorder was instigated by tools of the reactionists, by such emissaries, in other words, as the French called agents provocateurs. The hand of such agents seems detectable in the resolutions passed at meetings of the extreme Radicals and Social Democrats, who have insisted upon concessions much more extensive than those which the delegates from the zemstvos deemed it prudent to request, and who have coupled such indecent exactions with a peremptory demand for the immediate cessation of the war in the Far East.

One can almost hear the sinister delusions drawn by those who have urged the Czar, to say the least, to allow them to reach his ear, from the violent agitation and the extravagant demands brought about at the very time when the fate of the petition for self-government presented by moderate reformers hung trembling in the balance. The grand dukes, who are inflexibly opposed to any mitigation of the autocratic system, would interpret after their own fashion the history of the French revolutions, and point out that that not our Louis XVI. listened to the rebels and called together the States-General, did he enter upon the path that led him quickly to the scaffold. The experience of that sovereign affairs, they would say, conclusive proof that, where a people is totally unaccustomed to self-rule, an autocrat who plunges his foot on the slippery slope of concession to popular clamor is doomed by physico-psychological laws to topple into the abyss. Unquestionably, the rather series of the French Revolution will bear out this view, and we may be sure that, during the last fortnight, his imperial relatives have driven the lesson home to the sensitive intelligence and quaking heart of NICHOLAS II. At all events, the deed is done. The prayer of the moderate reformers is rejected, and the reactionists have triumphed by the same repulsive instrumentalities to which, in desperation, they resorted twenty-five years ago. The Official Gazette of St. Petersburg, which it was hoped, would, on Monday, December 14, the Emperor's five-day, proclaim his assent to the zemstvo petition, published, on the contrary, a circular note, directing the provincial governors to prevent the zemstvos from discussing hereafter the question of a constitution, and holding the governors personally responsible for any breach of the order. Thus end the plans of circumspect reformers to combine progress with peace and to safeguard their country from a bloody revolution.

The members of the autocratic system are too shrewd and too experienced not to couple the rejection of the zemstvo petition for representative institutions with an ostensibly gracious concession of some other kind. They are willing, or professedly willing, to do something for the peasants, who constitute nine-tenths of Russia's population, and who are still loyal to the Czar, or, as they name him, their "Little Father." Now, as a matter of fact, the peasants are subject to grave disabilities, which, owing to economical causes, are aggravated every day. Their status is radically different from that of other Russians. The fact is often overlooked that, in their cities, or village communes, the principle of communism, as distinguished from individual property prevails. Participation in communal rights has hitherto carried with it corresponding obligations. The peasant, although, nominally, no longer a serf, is still, practically, ascriptus glebe—that is to say, he is tied to the soil on which he was born. He looks the right owner by other subjects of the Czar to quit his domicile, to move from place to place in search of employment in one or another occupation. Without the permission of the village council he cannot leave his commune, where, aside from a few minor household industries, he has no opportunity of earning a livelihood, except by taking part in the tilling of the common fields. Under the circumstances, and in view of the exceptional fecundity of the Russian peasant women, it is not surprising that the pressure of the agricultural population on the means of subsistence is already severe and rapidly increasing. The grand dukes, therefore, had the sagacity to publish on December 18—the day before the rejection of the zemstvo prayer for a Parliament was to be made known—the report of Mr. WRRG, president of the Ministerial Council, who, ex chairman of a special committee appointed two years ago, has been investigating methods of improving the condition of the agricultural population and the expediency of revising the special laws affecting the peasantry. The conclusions reached in the report are said to have met with the approval, not only of the Minister of the Interior, but of the Czar himself, on which account they are expected to be made by the commission the basis of new laws. Mr. Witte proposes to complete the emancipation act of 1861 by putting an end to the treatment of peasants as a class apart, and giving them an opportunity of proving themselves forever from the soil, and placing themselves on an equality with all other classes of the population, by removing the restrictions hitherto imposed in their case on initiative enterprise.

No Russian reformer would dispute the equity and the urgency of such a reform. He would applaud a scheme deeming it as at least a step in the right path, but he would, at the same time, point out that there can be no guarantee of the fulfillment of any proclaimed reform in the absence of an effective national assembly, to which legislators should be, at least annually, if not constitutionally, responsible. Russian bureaucrats are past masters in the art of keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hilt.

Those who have no personal acquaintance with Russia, and who desire to learn why it is next to impossible to secure by pacification any substantial and permanent reform, may do well to read a book lately published by the HARRIS, and entitled The Land of Buddha, by Mr. HIRSH GINS, a distinguished journalist of Vienna, who, during his recent sojourn in Russia, had exceptional opportunities of obtaining authentic information. His information seems to have convinced him that, so long as the upholders of autocracy can borrow from foreign countries the money needed to defray their expenditures, and, above all, to pay their soldiers, a revolution is impracticable. He asked a well-known and representative Russian landowner in Moscow what he thought about the war as the Far East and the internal conditions of his country. The answer was characteristic: "It is not anybody's business to think, but to obey God and the Czar." The present order of things in Russia rests upon this principle, and on the stupidity of the half-savage Cossacks. Mr. GINS holds, therefore, that, in spite of the many symptoms of bitter feeling, a revolution under organized leadership, and with a definite object, is as yet impossible. At the most, single individuals, or the starving peasantry, might rise up fitfully, only to suffer a sanguinary overthrow. Not yet within sight is deliverance for those most unfortunate of men, the serfs in the life of a nation, as in that of an individual, when the patient must be worse in order to be better. In national bankruptcy alone is a gleam of hope discernible. Therefore it is that so many Russians pray, under their breath, "God help us so that we may be defeated."

Educational Conferences in Virginia

THE recent earthquake which Virginia lately brooked fortunes and devastated lands after the war is shown in the spirit with which she is now facing the industrial and educational problems set her. The great question of how to spread adequate educational facilities throughout the State is being vigorously considered. The Cooperative Education Commission of the State met in Norfolk, December 11 and 12, with Governor MANTON in the chair. The seriousness with which the people view the cause was attested by the great audiences attending these educational endeavors. President ALDERMAN of the University of Virginia made a most eloquent and inspiring address upon "The Education of All the People." Practically all the colleges of the State were represented, and educational rallies were held in all the neighboring small towns. The chief action of the commission was to resolve that a thorough canvass of the State should be made in the spring in behalf of the progressive purposes of the commission, and that the trustees of the State and the president of the university should lead the campaign.

The city educational associations can meet the needs of the city schools in due time, but the question of offering adequate educational advantages to the rural districts is a larger question, and involves more difficult undertakings. The rural schools, even were they in themselves satisfactory, can never have full attendance until there is a mounted, efficient rural police who understand that their duties are as much preventative as punitive. The second great need is the need for good roads. It is doubtless true that much of the best of human material is in the country, and always will be there, quiet and unpolished and only being their own gifts to character, but unless the literacy and education of such living can be accomplished, it will become a difficult matter to keep a rural population on any terms.

There are still in the more aristocratic Southern States a few people left who do not believe in education for the masses. In a despotism or under a feudal system it may be possible to avoid certain inconvenient stages of growth. Where blind obedience to authority prevails the yeast of a little knowledge, which is both painful and dangerous, may be omitted. In a democracy this is not only unwise, and that is more yeast until the whole lot is leavened.

Even among those who believe education to be an excellent thing for their own children, but a questionable good for other men's children, the question would bring forth a different answer if shifted to the basis of character. Character is admittedly a good thing for all men's children. More and more our deepest thinkers are losing moral character upon the power to think. "To strengthen the will it is necessary to give the person of weak will the power to think correctly, and especially to reach a goal by long and complex trains of means," says Mr. FELIX ADER. A merely emotional religion will not make a reliable man in all people know who have had dealings with primitive races. Morality is progressive, and strides alongside the mental development. It is beside the mark to say that we have known good, ignorant, and bad clever men. Book-knowledge is by no means the only knowledge in the world, and the so-called ignorant man may have funds of observation and carefully thought-out principles, and the so-called clever man may have a natural facility for making a show of a very little superficial knowledge. A point of view is: What is the percentage of crime among college professors and university trained men? Does it or does it not exceed the percentage of crime among the uneducated classes? If one base this question on the lowest rung, a man cannot learn much without burning that honesty and decency are good policy.

And there is another point to consider: Is this matter of a pending money and energy upon education. What are the happy hours when they are the happiest, the happiest, the happiest, the happiest? Say what one will, the world of ideas is the one that never fails a man. Who has learned to live there cannot be crushed by outer circumstances. Things have never yet made a man happy. Wealth in itself is mere raw power, and in the hands of the ignorant or the thoughtless it is a subversive power. The educated man alone can be trusted to find life as an inextinguishable pleasure. A world of noble ideas and interests stand by a man as a solid and lasting consolation; though death may devastate, change only in circles and the years gather little treasures. Who presses alone shall never reach the end of his search nor be overcome by pain, disgust, and boredom.

Beginnings

THAT are moments in the lives of all men when with closed eyes they hear through the silence the pulsing away of the hours and they realize the life beyond time. The smallness of the present moment, made up as it is of half of past and half of future, its whole illusory nature, "so helpless a kitten in the star-spangled universal fog," springs upon one, and the calendar upon which we mark out our sense of succession is a futile blank. Birth itself is but "a sleep and a forgetting." It is not time, but content that counts. The great birthday of the world commences a short life, not so much as half the allotted span of man; a life chequer except for a few short years of arduous service and of suffering. It is not the unnumbered succession of days that is life, but the men a soul covers, its stretch over man and out beyond space and time. It is, humanly speaking, that we tell of growth in time; growth in life, in fullness of consciousness, in abundance of giving. For "the transition," said MARTINEAU, "is more to the large soul than the everlasting to the little."

But we cannot think in terms of the eternal; even so in older myths the gods appeared to mortals only in disguise, so the life everlasting, pitiful of mortals, presents itself to the dwelling on existence under the symbols of time and space. We live in the sine of beginnings and ends. The flower drops its seed into the earth, darkening and appearing, death that a new life and a better life may be brought to the birth.

This is what we mean as we turn aside from our daily need to give at Christmas-time. We are reaching there, with all our hearts, the wonderful paradox of human existence, that what we cling to, we lose, and what we give, we have, and when we die, we live. We are emphasizing the truth that we hear half-broken through the year, that we are, inasmuch as we are in other men. We are making the separate existences all at once itself in the million's life. The fathers of consciousness escape out beyond ourselves, our home, our friendships, and on those few days we learn a little to love humanity entire. We kind closer our relations to all that we have seen and heard, and our good-will stretches over the earth. Humanity wakes on its birthday morn and makes claim not to gain, but to give; not to be loved, but to love; not to be in, but to love the self. This is the culmination of human life. To lay it aside, Greater love hath no man than this, that he die. This is the final ideal that we hold aloft to human nature, and once a year, as far as in us lies, we try to realize and celebrate it. We have had the vision of the perfect human life. And let life come as it will, to the throne or a manger, it comes to perfect itself in wisdom, to serve, unafraid and in all diligence, the Will not its own, and to offer up its life for other men as best it may.

ROBERT MARION LA FOLLETTE, GOVERNOR OF WISCONSIN

For an interesting sketch of the career of Governor La Follette, who has just been reelected Governor of Wisconsin, the reader is referred to the article by Earle Hooker Eaton on page 225 of this issue of the "Weekly."

A Russian Transport at Hsin-min-tsun

Loading Supplies for the Russians at Hsin-min-tsun

Prince Radzivil, with Commissary Wagons, obtaining Supplies before orders were issued forbidding their sale to the Russians

TROUBLES OF THE RUSSIAN FORCES IN MANCHURIA—DIFFICULTIES ENCOUNTERED IN SECURING SUPPLIES FROM THE CHINESE

One of the most serious problems which now confronts the Russian army in Manchuria is the difficulty in obtaining supplies from the Chinese. In a number of towns the Chinese authorities have forbidden the merchants to dispose of goods to the Russians, and Chinese troops patrol the streets to see that these orders are obeyed. These photographs were taken at Hsin-min-tsun, about eight miles from Liao-Yang, just previous to the issuance of an order by the Chinese prefect forbidding the sale of goods.

New Phases of Theatre Management

By Charles Frohman

I DO not know what more effective commentary can be made on the current speculations concerning the American stage, under present theatrical conditions and management, than to point out the constant necessity under which managers labor of giving the public, in the best manner, the best that can be produced in the way of plays, players, and productions. It is the one condition under which theatrical managers are able to do business. If attractions fall short in "drawing" qualities, it is the fault of the supply, not the fault of the managers. The difficulty with the stage of today lies with the playwright. It may seem a remarkable assertion, yet it is none the less true that in our year the playwrights of America, France, Germany, and England have not turned out six genuine plays. The quality of the American drama is certainly small, though we have a number of playwrights in this country who are, in my opinion, equal to any playwrights in the world—and I base this assertion on my acquaintance with the playwrights of the world and on the cosmopolitan character of my work. Such authors as Gillette, Thomas, Fitch, George Ade, Paul Potter, and others, turn out as good, logical, consistent plays as any writers in the world. But with possibly few exceptions our dramatists have not advanced far enough in their work to make it acceptable to other countries; and this notwithstanding the fact that they produce plays of good construction, serious interest, and genuine comedy.

Why the language of "business management" should have become a distinctive question I cannot understand. There is no doubt that the legitimate business management under which the theatres are run today is the best that could possibly be devised. It is the business system which obtains with the large business and banking institutions, and is intended for the best interests of actors, playwrights, and employers. But the business of management is misunderstood, so far as the theatres in America are concerned. There is no "concentration" of managers. We managers have not formed an alliance. The public has been misinformed concerning "theatrical syndicates" and the condition of theatrical affairs.

There has been formed in this country a combination for the sole purpose of representing theatres and of facilitating what is known as the "booking" of attractions for these theatres. This combination has nothing to do with the production of plays, or the engagement of actors, or the running of theatres. The members of this combination work separately, except so far as the "booking" of theatres under their control is concerned. They compete for plays, for actors, and for theatrical work on an equal basis, on other interests in common, and their work is absolutely independent. It is obvious that if a "combination" existed it could not last. For the purpose stated the arrangement was made for five years; it was renewed for five years more, and is now in its seventh year. The indicative satisfaction which the plan has given, if any continue and it may not—that I cannot say.

In the mean time all work independently. As in the case of the other members of the "combination," my successes are my own and my failures are my own. There has been no other interest connected with our productions. The other people connected with the combination are competing with me for plays and actors. The financial success of the productions is not tested in a body of such or a combination representing a number of theatres. Individual experience and facts govern the outcome of productions, whether it be gain or loss. As a manager myself, producing plays in two countries, with probably more "stars" under my management than were ever put together before, I am able to tell at least that in this great work of "stars," plays, and audiences, there is no connection with "play syndicates" or "theatre syndicates."

There is no financial connection between these managers in the matter of productions for the stage. They do not cooperate in engaging actors; they do not cooperate in securing dramatists; nor in producing plays. Their work is separate and distinct, one does not know what the other is doing or intends to do. Each one competes with the other to secure plays, stars, and attractions generally. Whatever the result of the productions, these managers stand or fall by their own work. Their only connection is in handling the various "bookings" throughout the country so that the work will be done in an orderly and skillful manner from New York, without conflict of dates or loss of time in all else they do as business rivals.

This plan, by the way, did not originate in America. It has been going on in London for fifteen years. Over there the managers throughout the English provinces joined together and worked in London through their representative provinces in the same way. If you observe the idea of a "combination" from everything concerned with individual productions—dramatists, actors, plays, management, and all people and things connected with the production—you have the whole story in a nutshell.

The New York manager is especially benefited by the fact that so many of his audiences go abroad and gather greater impressions. Returning home from Paris and other places, they have reason to come back to their own New York theatres with a sigh of satisfaction and phrases as a result of comparisons drawn between the theatres in this country and in other countries. New York today can show more advancement and more improvement in theatrical property—and brought about by the managers alone—than any Continental city.

If all of these things were not done for the benefit of the stage they would have no meaning. And it is surely for the benefit of the stage to have these perfect theatres and everything else in proportion.

The result of connecting the theatres has brought about a better condition of affairs throughout the whole United States. What we have given to the public in the way of theatres speaks for itself—managers feel now that it is obligatory upon them, beside being a matter of pride in them, to give the public what will satisfy it in these theatres. It is a case where business policy and professional pride go hand in hand.

In the present condition of theatrical affairs in this country as they are being improved, the theatres are open to everybody, and so our managers, the American playwrights more than I do. Thousands of dollars are laid out in this way in advance of any American work. I am constantly making contracts with American authors and paying them money for their time. They have had the best encouragement and the best services, and have been looked with every financial facility. Nothing would be more desirable to me than to secure the best part of my material on this side. Nevertheless, that has never stopped me from producing foreign plays, wherever, as I do, the right to be competition in my offerings. For the past few years I have left New York in January, opened the same month in London, and gone on with my work in the theatres controlled by me there as I do here. Personally, I have not been slow to produce American plays in London or English plays in New York. In fact, the change was one lessened to me. The change has been made, and it has been made successful abroad; that, those plays having succeeded, it is no simple matter for me to produce them in America. Now, merely as a matter of fact and theatrical history, I myself produced one of the plays in London where they came here. It was with many of the plays of Barrie, Jones, Marshall, Jerome, Paus, and others. Instead of securing the plays for America, I went to London and made the original productions there. And to secure the picture, I could mention a number of English plays which I first done here by me. If there is any one who has "ruined the children up" more effectively I would be pleased to meet him.

Foreign plays, if successful, are valuable in America. A successful play, though, is not a question of geography. If a foreign play is successful in its intention and of genuine appeal, it does not matter whether the scene is laid in Maribor or in the Champ de Mars, so far as an American audience is concerned. An experienced manager does not take that point into consideration, though it may be the fact that it is. The manager has to be satisfied with the success of the scenes held in America; the American audience would be better satisfied, simply because the realization is brought closer home to them.

The successful English play is one that makes for the attraction and attention. That is what is liked in America as well. The French play is passing, so far as the American stage is concerned. The French play begins where our plays stop. With the French play the interest begins with married life and the difficulties surrounding it. In America and in England the interest chiefly centers around people who are engaged in courtship. The French play goes more deeply into life and passion, and is based upon a kind of psychological analysis which is objectionable and obnoxious to Anglo-Saxon audiences. I should say that, on the other hand, it would be difficult for what is known as a "clean play" to succeed in France today. Therefore, I am on the alert for French failures.

The society play in Paris today will rarely succeed in this country. The French society play is almost invariably connected with intellectuality. Speaking of the French stage (which, as a manager, I have watched closely and carefully for a number of years), I should say its products are becoming absolutely indifferent to us. The German play is a very different proposition for our stage. The German audience are following more and more the lines of what is known as "conviviality." The German plays lack situation; in fact, the Germans are arriving at the point where they talk over their plays instead of acting them. That sort of performance does not suit the American audience.

In many European countries the "problem" play seems to have assumed its own individual importance and distinctness. But the French society play, it is not especially adapted to the present stage of the American audience. The French society play is played (as it usually is) by some important "star." It will succeed, in spite of its nature.

The "literary" play is just as certain of success as a play that is full of movement, so long as it is capable of being played in a pessimistic manner, if the play may be judged of without speech—if the dialogue were entirely cut away and it were possible to tell the story in a connected way entirely in pantomime—then that particular play would have a chance of success. However, if the story of the play may be told, it must have a better, the greater object of the manager is to entertain. The audience is in the theatre, primarily, to be entertained, and the manager feels perfectly satisfied if he can secure a play that will meet that purpose in a pessimistic manner. The question of the play is secondary. In my opinion, people do not, as a rule, take the theatre very seriously, and they are not particularly eager for instruction or so much a seat. But they do want entertainment, and the manager must not assume that instruction may be substituted as the purpose of his production.

One of the most radical revolutions brought about by present

OFFICERS OF THE OLDEST ST. ANDREWS SOCIETY IN THE UNITED STATES, WHICH WAS FOUNDED AT CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, IN 1729

In three days, when meetings and dinners of national importance are being given by the prominent clubs and societies throughout the country, it is interesting to note that the oldest of these societies is known as the St. Andrews Society of Charleston, South Carolina, which was founded in 1729, and recently celebrated its one hundred-and-seventy-fifth anniversary. The officers of this society are: President, J. B. Gordon, secretary, and W. R. Chickens, second vice-president.

theatrical affairs have less affected the actor. Today when the actor makes his contract he can disclaim financial worries. His career depends upon himself. He knows his money is certain when he enters it. All the conditions which affect him are handled according to the best principles. The actor need not walk home now. The old-fashioned hard-luck stories are no more. The position of players has never been better than to-day, and the change is of vast importance to the accomplishment of good stage-work. The comedian is able to concentrate himself on his work. Clean, serviceable, well-arranged dressing rooms are provided, and the day has gone past when the actor was compelled to save up money to buy a wardrobe that is now furnished by the management, and all the old distracting cares are done away with. Like all the environments of the theatre, the profession is clean and wholesome.

Because of the variety of theatres and the enlarged opportunities, more actors are employed now than ever before. There is the high class, the middle class, and the cheaper class theatre, as well as the continuous house, so that the actor has to-day more opportunities than were formerly possible. There are now so many theatres of every grade that the people who used to go into the gallery to see the old-fashioned play can now go down stairs. And because of the many grades and classes the actor can play in all of them, with advantage to his pocketbook and without detriment to his dignity. It is what is called the rank and the class desire the most benefit from present conditions. The days when they were compelled to wait for holiday and special performance are past. The actor's work can be as regular and safe now as that of any business calling. Except for the "star," the actor is not affected by playing in any particular grade.

There need be no apprehension about the condition of theatrical affairs for the public and for the professional. Theatrical people have, through present conditions, assumed a standard higher than ever before. There never was a time when the actor took his work so much to heart and felt the importance and opportunity of it more strongly, or was more ready in his work or more serious in intention. The fact that so many actors are brought forward as "stars" throws a greater responsibility upon the audiences players—far more than when they were doing the same work as leading people of stock companies. In fact, conditions upon the professional tend to best efforts, and there is no fear of "decadence" of the drama or art.

The idea of a "bad act" in the drama exists only in the minds of the very few who feel that the theatre ought to be a classroom of the high-class theatre. As a matter of fact, the class of entertainment that is being given is not only satisfactory to the audience, but is beneficial to their health, and in no way conducive to harm. I am sure that there is more genuine satisfaction and pleasure and help in going to see a George M. play than in sitting through a performance by Mr. Steinhilber. The public seeks entertainment and diversion from work.

In fact, I think that the greatest competitor of the play to-day is the musical comedy. The great appeal of such entertainments is the possibility of concentrating all that the musical comedy contrasts in one evening—all that attracts the audience, color, "fantasy scenes," revivals, singing, dancing, pleasing, dancing, all that appeals to the multitudes variety and taste of the audience. It is only by the force of a skilful dramatic play and the "drawing" power of a "star" that we are able today to compete with the musical comedy.

Probably in imitation of certain foreign institutions, there has appeared some comment concerning "national" institutions—theatres and schools. I do not believe in the practicability of the so-called national theatre or national school, because I do not know what it means. I do not see how a national institution of any sort could be of more benefit to authors or actors or could accomplish more than can be accomplished by business men seeking the best business methods of procedure. But I do believe in the present theatrical school, because it has brought to some of the best players that are playing throughout the country to-day. The theatrical school is not supposed to make actors or actresses, but it does afford an opportunity to select competent players from a large number of people, and weed out those who suppose that when everything else fails they can still go on the stage. The school selects those that are capable and have ability—managers have an opportunity to judge and select the capable ones from the ranks, namely, those aspirants whose ambition is not to begin by playing Juke, but who are willing—figuratively, and sometimes literally—to make their first appearance carrying a spear. Those are the people who do the honest hard work, and in the theatrical schools they get the opportunity to perfect themselves in the career they have chosen. That is why I believe in the schools. These schools supply the training formerly given by the stock companies. Like all theatrical matters, evolution changed the conditions which obtained with the stock-company times, and schools are the more important in that prospect for the revival of the stock-company system are not ready. The difficulty with stock companies is in order to produce plays with their successfully they are compelled to make "runs" of them. If they fail and you produce a great number of stock plays there is no definite success. We had in the Empire Theatre for twelve years a stock company which contained probably two-thirds, or at least half, the "stars" of the travelling companies of to-day. The success of many plays brought forward so many good actors that those actors became public favorites, and by natural gradation became stars. This deprived us of the possibility of keeping such an organization together.

The "star system" is one of the developments of theatrical progress, and I have the greatest faith and belief in it. I think the public feel that in getting a play—a good play—with a "star," they are getting something of value. They are not getting the value concerning theatrical attractions. I am convinced of that fact the other day in looking over an old magazine—published in this country sixty-three years ago. In it appears an editorial protesting against the "star" system on the American stage, and complaining that "it must die out very shortly." But the system is with us to-day, and it is stronger than ever.

General Jackson's Famous Duel

By F. A. Olds

THE writer has secured from ex-Associate Justice A. C. Avery, of Morganton, North Carolina, a document which is of very marked interest. It is a challenge to a duel.

Andrew Jackson to Colonel Waightstill Avery, the grandfather of ex-Judge Avery. Both Jackson and Avery were men of the highest degree of bravery, and, in fact, it has been said that neither knew what fear was. There are some errors in spelling in the challenge, and in the date, which is August 3, 1798. The challenge is a postscript, and, like the postscript of a woman's letter, it is short, but one of the most important parts of the document. In those days in North Carolina there were large gatherings at the courts, and the tilts between couples were witnessed with great eagerness. In this case there was a large audience, and Colonel Avery, who had signed the War of the Revolution and in the trenches with the Indians on the western border, used language which Jackson took to be insulting. The challenge is in these words: "When a man's feelings & character are injured he ought to seek a speedy redress; you need a few lines from me yesterday & a duelist's sword would have been at your disposal."

My character you have injured; and further you have insulted me in the presence of a court and a large company. I therefore call upon you as a gentleman to give me satisfaction for the same. I further call upon you to give me an answer immediately without equivocation and I hope you will do so before the sun sets, unless the business is done, for it is consistent with the character of a gentleman when he further calls upon you to give me a speedy reputation; therefore I hope you will not fail in meeting me this day noon at 12 M. M.

Yrs.

ANDREW JACKSON.

COL. AVERY: "F. A. Olds, Evening after report is secured." The facts relating to the trouble between Jackson and Avery were told in

Facsimile of General Jackson's Challenge to Colonel Avery

Colonel A. C. Avery by his father, Colonel Isaac T. Avery, who was the only son of Waighlight Avery. When the latter practiced law in Mecklenburg County, North Carolina, he and young Jackson were well acquainted. Avery was elected, in 1777, the first Attorney-General of North Carolina. He afterwards married a lady who lived in New Castle County, and some years after this marriage resigned and settled in Jones, becoming colonel of that county's regiment of militia. His command was not in active service during the Revolution, except in some occasional forays with the Tories until it was called out when Lord Cornwallis invaded North Carolina. It remained on duty from that invasion until the close of the war. His family was sent, in charge of Mr. Williams (the father of a well-known banker of that name of Charleston, South Carolina), to York County. Avery continued, when not prevented by public duties, to practice law in Mecklenburg, Buren, and in the new county of Burke, which was established in 1777. He secured the passage of a bill creating the county of Washington, which embraced the whole State of Tennessee, and then became the leading member of that bar, at Jonesboro, which was the county seat. At the close of the Revolutionary war Andrew Jackson went to Burke County and applied to Waighlight Avery to take him as a boarder at his country home and instruct him as a law student. Colonel Avery told him he had just moved to the place, and had built nothing but cabins, and could not grant his request. Jackson went to Salisbury, studied law there, and settled at Jonesboro, until the new county of Davidson (with Nashville as its county seat) was established. Nashville becoming subsequently the county seat of Tennessee. Just before the challenge to fight was sent by Jackson, Avery appeared in some lawsuit at Jonesboro as opposing counsel to Jackson, and ridiculed the position taken by Jackson, who had preceded him in the argument. Jackson considered the argument insulting and sent him the challenge. Colonel Avery was raised a Puritan. He graduated at Princeton with the highest honors in 1766, and remained there a year as a tutor, under the celebrated Jonathan Edwards and the famous Dr. Witherspoon, who signed the Declaration of Independence as a representative of New Jersey. Avery was a Presbyterian, and was opposed on principle to duelling, but he so far yielded to the impetuous custom of the time as to accept the challenge and go to the field, with Colonel, afterwards Governor, Adam, as his second. After a usual preliminary, Avery was allowed Jackson to shoot at him, but did not return the fire. Thereupon, having shown that he was not afraid to be shot at, Avery walked up to young Jackson and delivered a lecture to him, very much in the style a father would use in lecturing a young man. Avery was very calm, and his talk to the brave young man who had fired at him was full of good sense, dispassionate and high in tone, and was heard with great attention by the seconds of both parties, who agreed that the trouble must go no farther, but should end at this point, and so then, and there, a reconciliation was effected between these two brave spirits. Colonel Avery took the challenge home and filed it, as he was accustomed to file all his letters and papers, endorsing it, "Challenge from Andrew Jackson." This endorsement appears upon the back of the paper.

In this connection it is interesting to know that there has been quite a dispute between North Carolina and South Carolina as to which State was really the birthplace of Jackson, but this is set aside conclusively, upon the evidence of contemporary records, which show that the Jackson boyhood, in which the great old soldier was born, was on the North Carolina side of the settlement then and yet known as the "Waxhams."

A Personal Sketch of Governor La Follette

By Earle Hooker Eaton

SHREW, courageous, resourceful, eloquent, shrewd, and honest, Robert Marion La Follette, thrice Wisconsin's choice for Governor, is one of the most remarkable figures in American politics to-day. The things he has been fighting for in Wisconsin—the nomination of all candidates by direct vote, the taxation of public-service corporations at the same rate as other taxable property, and the regulation of transportation charges—are issues which he has brought to the front throughout the length and breadth of the nation.

Meanwhile, unmindful to present successes or greater ones in prospect, Governor La Follette is preparing to round out and make fully effective his reforms, and the regulation of transportation charges, and so long. His primary election law, adopted by referendum vote at the recent election, is ready for enforcement, and as it provides that all State, county, and municipal officers save those for judicial places—whose nomination by primary had been provided for by previous statutes—are to be named at the primary elections, its workings will be watched with interest throughout the country. Even United States Senators are to be voted for in this manner, and their names submitted to the Legislature as a recommendation. Victorious in one notable reform crusade, the Governor will now carry on with undiminished energy his fight for the equitable regulation of transportation charges and against tax-dodging corporations. When the people of Wisconsin elected him to a third term they commissioned him to bring about these reforms, and as he usually manages to get everything he is after, they are not likely to be disappointed.

"The election result," he said recently, "not only insures the efficiency of the railway law I have recently adopted, but further legislation with respect to public-service corporations. The next Legislature will give the State a rate commission that will insure reasonable transportation charges, abolish the system of secret rebates, prevent unjust discrimination between persons and places, and bring the public-service corporations back to their legitimate business as common carriers."

Born in a log cabin on the town of Princeton, Wisconsin, in 1855, "Little Bob," as he is called, was lost fatherless when a mere lad, and at fourteen took charge of his mother's farm. Since then he has led the strenuous life of farmer, schoolteacher, student, struggling young lawyer, politician, and reformer. He worked on the farm and attended district school until he was eighteen, and then the family moved to Madison, where he entered the University of Wisconsin. He was the breadwinner of the household and the provider that forced him was "How shall I get a college education and support a family at the same time?" La Follette is he displayed the same courage, industry, and indomitable will power that were later to become such conspicuous factors in Wisconsin's history.

In his speeches of to-day he is wont to refer dramatically to "God's patient poor," and he knows the full meaning of the phrase from personal experience. The college paper was not a financial success, but he thought it could be made so. He bought it, taking all the money the family had on the venture, and then went to work with characteristic energy to build up his new property. He wrote much of the matter the paper contained, hunted for advertising, kept the books, made collections, and even set some of the type. All this was done, of course, in addition to his regular college work, and the result was that the paper producedly supported his mother and himself and the younger children during his entire university course, at the end of which it was sold for a substantial sum.

During his university days young La Follette's oratorical powers began to make themselves felt. Born with a gift for public speaking, he speedily developed into an eloquent and convincing debater, and in a conspicuous figure in the literary and debating societies. The interstate oratorical conflict between Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, Indiana, Iowa, and Illinois was one of the notable events of the college year, and in 1876 he entered the lists as a competitor. The subject of his oration was "Laps," and even as La Follette, a scrupulous lawyer, a student of history, a lawyer, and an interpreter smoothed his forensic rills, first in the University of Wisconsin contest, second in the broader forum of the assembled colleges of the Middle State, each of which had sent its best speaker, and third in the interstate competition itself when the six champions orators of as many States were pitted against each other on the same platform.

Young La Follette staked everything on the merits of "Laps," won the same oration in all three contests, and carried off the interstate championship with ease. The winning oration, treasured still in scores of Wisconsin scrapbooks, although a quarter of a century has passed, was printed in many Western newspapers, was treasured by ambitious schoolboys for years, and was even said to have given the great Edwin Booth a new conception of the character of Iago.

One of La Follette's classmates at the university was Miss Belle Case, of Baraboo, Wisconsin, an attractive young woman of strong mentality. The two were very congenial. Both were interested in oratory and law, and both were of energy and ambition. They became fast friends, and friendship ripened into love, the outcome of their courtship days grew out of the Lewis prize contest for the best Commencement oration. Only those who stood very high in their studies and in their character were eligible to compete. As she was one of the elect and he was not, he spent considerable time coaching her for the contest. He had already won the interstate competition, and they were the happiest pair of lovers on earth when she supplemented his victory by winning the Lewis prize.

He spent one term in the university law school, then his funds gave out and he entered an attorney's office, where he studied to such good purpose that he was admitted to the bar in six months. In 1881 they were married, and in that year he became Mrs. La Follette. But he continued in the university law school, from which she received the first diploma ever awarded to a woman. From that day to this she has been his ablest lieutenant in nearly a quarter of a century of unswerving political strife.

At twenty-five the young orator lawyer was district attorney at Dane County; at twenty-nine he was sent to Congress, and at forty-five he was first elected Governor of Wisconsin. He served three terms in Congress, and as a member of the Ways and Means Committee framed the agricultural schedule of the McKinley bill. He was elected Governor in 1900, retiring him to private life, and he resumed the practice of his profession. In 1904 he practically began his great fight for the overthrow of the Wisconsin Republican machine, which he alleged was merely the creature and tool of the railroads and monopolies. It was in that year that he lost a prominent part in Nils Hagen's unsuccessful attempt to secure the Reprovision nomination for Governor. In 1896 he had secured such a strong following that he sought the nomination himself, but was beaten; in 1898 he made a still stronger attempt to secure the honor, but the machine succeeded in defeating him by the rise of adopting his platform, the pledges of which he promptly ignored after the election. Undaunted, La Follette kept hammering away, and in 1900 was triumphantly nominated and elected. Thwarted in his attempts to secure the reforms for which he was battling, he secured a second term in 1902. Again partly thwarted, he sought a third nomination in 1904, and this time the machine, to beat him, lured the State convention and nominated its own man. Meanwhile the regular State convention nominated La Follette. Thus ensued the bitterest political fight in the history of Wisconsin. The turning down of La Follette delegates to the Republican national convention, his shattering conquest of the State, the decision of the Wisconsin court that the La Follette ticket was the regular Republican ticket, and his defeat of both the Democratic candidate for Governor and the so-called "Newland" candidate named by the Republican machine are matters of recent history.

Some men fight for a day or a week or a year, but Governor La Follette fights until he wins. Coming from his lips, General Grant's famous saying would be, "We will fight it out on this line if it takes all summer, all winter, and all the summer and winter in all time to come!" When reverses overtake him they seem only to nerve him for more valiant and determined efforts. This trait was well characterized by an Irishman in Madison the day after La Follette met with one of his worst Waterloo's.

"Well, Mike, La Follette's dead this time, sure!" said a friend, closing one eye in a suggestive manner. Mike doveled.

"Yes, he's dead all right, all right, but he's not dead as yet!"

In 1904, when the House was called for the Union material nomination, La Follette promised his delegates from Dane County. It was a critical time for "Little Bob." Success at the primaries would establish him as Republican leader of one of the most important counties in Wisconsin, and make him a notable figure in the State convention. Failure would be a severe blow to his ambition and to his usefulness. The first night designated for the primaries, half of the entire number in the county were held, and La Follette failed to capture a single delegate for himself. The night was dark, but it seemed like daylight when compared with the political gloom that enveloped La Follette and his friends. About midnight, when the worst was known, he and five of his lieutenants met to talk over the situation.

"It was like a mortal," said one of these present. "Five of us were members and Bob was the candidate for the majority. Half of all the primaries in the county had been carried by the enemy, and we must carry every single primary that remained if Hanger was to get the delegation. We five members, one after another, spoke eloquently at the after hours-council of the fight, and there up the stage. 'Carry all the remaining primaries in Dane County! It simply couldn't be done!'

"'Gentlemen,' said La Follette, 'you can do as you please, but I am going to carry all the remaining primaries in Dane County if I have to crawl to them on my knees!'

"The funeral services were called off right there. Inspired with new hope and new determination we fled out into the night, and 'Little Bob' carried every single remaining primary in Dane County, controlled the delegation for Hanger, won his place as lieutenant on the convention floor, and from that day on this La Follette's 'unconquerable soul' has led him onward and upward, to matter what obstacles barred the way."

From 1896 to 1899, when he was organizing the forces that were to win for him his future victories, he suffered from a peculiar form of indigestion that compelled him to spend fully half his usual working time in bed. It was a terrible handicap. Doctor after doctor was consulted, but none helped him. His enemies and it was going to die. He had, and for that matter still has, a decided antipathy for anything resembling dilute exercise, but he had that certain heroic guarantee that he would not let his own, he began using them, specially cured his malady, and made himself a veritable athlete. The exercises were rigorous, but his iron will made them a daily duty, and a daily duty they still are.

Graphic as he is, Governor La Follette does not constantly lead the strenuous life, and he is equally entertaining as man of peace and man of war. When he relaxes in the company of his family or intimate friends, his flashes of wit keep those about him in a hour of laughter. His former partner, Gilbert E. Roe, who is now practicing in New York, said recently:

"Governor La Follette has the keenest and brightest sense of humor, and I have often seen him convulse jury and spectators when trying a case. Some years ago we were retained in a proceeding involving the building of a new court-house, the old one not only being worn-out, but absolutely small for the uses of the county. Certain taxpayers objected to the issue of bonds, and procured an injunction restraining the county officials from carrying on the project. We were for the new court-house, and Governor La Follette argued the motion to set aside the injunction in the old building itself. He dwelt at length upon its remarkable condition, upon its smallness and inadequacy for the purpose.

"In view of your Honor's position, you can't lift your eyebrows in this room without raising the roof!"

Governor La Follette has a well-built, athletic figure, is about five feet six inches tall, and weighs 160 pounds. He has a frank, open manner, and is genial and approachable. He makes his friends and better enemies; has the marvelous memory for names and faces that was one secret of Blaine's success; wins and holds the admiration, affection, and respect of his followers, and fights for the things the people demand as their just due. He has an exuberant fund of humor, is rather a socialist, an anarchist, and has no quarrel with honest capital or with corporations that are fair and law-abiding. There has never been a Governor of Wisconsin who lived as frugally as he, and the La Follette home is a house of plain living. When President Roosevelt is in Wisconsin he always visits the La Follette. The friendship began when the President was civil service commissioner and Governor La Follette was a Congressman.

The President tells an incident that occurred at a reception he gave Mrs. La Follette. He invited her to the White House, and she was standing in his outer engaged in conversation and eating vegetables. He was doing the bulk of the talking and she was so attentive and unwavering listener.

"Suddenly," said the President, "that for at least five minutes I had been pouring ice-cream down the front of her handsome evening gown. She had known it all the time, but had not indicated it by even the quiver of an eyebrow or by the slightest change in the smiling, interested expression upon her face, she had been so busy with her vegetables, by word of look or move, no matter what happened to the gown!"

Experiences of an Exile in Siberia

By Isador Ladoff

"WHERE is Middle Kolyma?" I asked of the Russian official who had named this town as the place of my exile by the personal order of the Czar.

It is in the Kolyma district of the Yakutsk province. If I am not mistaken, Middle Kolyma is a Kosak settlement on the Kolyma river about a quarter of a degree beyond the arctic circle. It is one of the furthest and least-inhabited parts of Eastern Siberia. "Darkest Siberia," if you choose to use an appropriate English term.

"What do you know about Kolyma?"

"Precious little, except that a European era hardly exists there for any length of time," was the encouraging reply of the Czar's servant.

In the city of Yakutsk, the metropolis of the province of that name, on the left bank of the mighty Lena River, I did not succeed in getting much information about Kolyma, but learned quite a little concerning the conditions of travel along the road from Yakutsk to Kolyma. I found out that it would take about a month to reach the town of Verkhnyokolyma and another month to reach my destination—it was believed that my journey through the arctic wilderness during the severest part of the winter required extensive preparations.

Following the advice of competent men I procured the necessary clothing and provisions from local dealers.

I bought a "parka"—a shirtlike double fur coat of soft, dark, and glossy reindeer skin supplied with a hood of the same material. The hood (karak) protected the head. A pair of fur stockings (tsharki) and fur boots (tshobosi) were made of the skin of the feet of the reindeer. The soles of the boots consisted of tanned fish skin. A cap of seal-skin completed my fur apparel. Besides these I was supplied with heavy woollen underwear, a thick woollen suit of cloth, and a warm overcoat.

My supply of provisions consisted of eighty pounds of rye bread, forty pounds of rye biscuit, forty pounds of reconstituted butter, twenty pounds of meat, and a gallon of "vodka" (rye whiskey). I also took with me about eighty pounds of rye flour, a few carpenter's tools, lead tobacco, calico, sugar, an inferior grade of tea pressed in the shape of little bricks, etc., for the purpose of barter with the natives.

I had in my own sled (auras), a vehicle constructed of wooden parts fastened with exceptionally strong strips of skin. The auria, in spite of its rather shabby appearance, was very durable, and spacious enough to hold two passengers comfortably under its cover of reindeer-skin.

I embarked on my long journey in company with an experienced Kosak, a tall, manly, somewhat gruff-looking fellow of about forty years. A Yakut driver also accompanied me.

It was a fearfully cold day. The greenish atmosphere seemed saturated with tiny ice-crystals to such a degree that it was impossible to breathe without the protection of a respirator.

The road from Yakutsk to the Alkha River was across a hill plain almost devoid of snow and strewn with erratic blocks of stone. The most interesting incident of my journey to Kolyma was the passage over the Werhnyokolyma Mountains, which were about three thousand feet above the level of the nearest point on the Tubular River. The steep precipice seemed exactly perpendicular from the valley.

The driver supplied us with bag staffs, tied our sarkas together, and drove the reindeer in front of the train. The snow under foot was firm. We had to dig holes in it with our staffs in order to be able to climb and keep our equilibrium.

It was a laborious and perilous task. The false step would have cost our lives. We climbed very slowly. In a short time I felt hot, in spite of the low temperature of the surrounding air. I had to take off my heavy fur one by one. When I finally reached the top of the passage I felt very tired. I put on rapidly the rest of my gear. As exceedingly wild landscape greeted my gaze, the valley of the Lena River, cut in all directions by the tributaries of the Lena, stretched before me to the north. The range seemed to consist chiefly of black soil, and appeared to be more steep to wards the south. High, peaked, snow-covered mountains, hills of various altitudes and shapes, marshy plains and lakes thronged around me in picturesque confusion as if scattered by some giant in a moment of violent anger.

My contemplations were interrupted by the arrival of an Irkutsk driver, pried retaining with his family to Jolntsk, and ready to descend the passage we had just climbed up.

The reindeer in this case were tied behind the sarkas, and the travellers had to slide cautiously down the steep incline on their backs, storing their way with the staffs. I arrived at the conclusion that the descending was more dangerous than the ascending.

We rested that night in an uninhabited hut called "potarnas." The "potarnas" are built in a rough and hasty manner for the accommodation of travellers. Some of these huts have only wooden boxes filled with soil for a hearth and a square opening in the flat roof as an outlet for the smoke. Some have no fireplace and no outlet for the smoke. The "potarnas" are certainly less convenient than the houses inhabited by the natives. However, the former have one advantage—an unlimited supply of pure air.

In many stations we had great trouble in procuring reindeer or horses for transportation. At some we could not even find a living person willing or able to help us locate the "dubak," or manager, of the station. In such cases we were detained many days until transportation was in some way provided.

The distances between stations on the road to Kolymsk varied from 20 to 225 miles. I will pass here in silence the meetings with drunken Kossaks and starving natives, with thieving criminal settlers and pilly itinerant merchants, and hasten to describe my arrival at Kolymsk. The last few days of travel were especially trying. The long months of monotonous vegetation on the road strained all my nerves. I was yearning for a change. Since I left Jakutsk my mind had been busy with plans of activity in Kolymsk, and I was very impatient to learn to know the place where I would have to pass long years of exile.

When I replied from the distance the steeple of the Kolymsk wooden church I could not abstain from exclaiming:

"At last! God be praised!"

About two o'clock P.M. my sarkas was ushered into the spacious yard of the local chief of police, the highest official in the district, called the ispovnik. A crowd of curious people surrounded me and stared at me blankly as at a strange creature from another planet. The ispovnik was absent or asleep. As it was very cold out of doors I entered a neighboring house to warm myself. My Kossak called me out.

"Is the ispovnik ready to receive me?" I asked.

"No," replied the Kossak, "but he may be here any moment. And we have to await him in the yard."

I waited in the house for about an hour, after which the ispovnik arrived and met me graciously. He ordered a room prepared for me. I then left him to retire for a much-needed rest. The temporary quarters in the hut of a native, assigned to me by the ispovnik, seemed to be snug enough for awhile. But I wanted a place for myself, where I could work and study in privacy. I was advised to see the local trouss, the merchant Nicolas Matveyevich Birshtoff, the head of the first of text snare, who owned much property in the town. Mr. Birshtoff, a man of some education and natural wit, received me cordially. He told me that the city of Jolntsk was the farthest point south he ever reached.

The furniture and all the other belongings of the Birshtoffs represented a feeble attempt to approach the European standard of comfort. A genuine Russian trouss, or "sawyer" (literally, self-boiler) was lustily steaming on the table, covered with a snow-white cloth. The lady of the house served the tea in the most approved Russian style.

We had a pleasant chat before we talked business. When we approached the subject of renting a house, Mr. Birshtoff advised me to look around and choose some one of the uninhabited but well-preserved huts, and he offered to let me have one.

It is up according to my own taste and liking. This appeared to be a sensible plan, but I had to wait for its execution until spring, and try to make myself as comfortable as possible as I could in my temporary quarters.

Unhappily was not considered as essential by the inhabitants of Kolymsk. The air in their dwellings was impregnated with the odor of fish and other unwholesome odors when the sunbathers were kept closed.

What astonished me most during my house-hunting expedition was the apparent indifference of the inhabitants. Besides getting water from the river and frequently wood from the nearby forest, the male population spent their time in gentlemanly leisure,—smoked, chatted, played cards, and drank whiskey,—if this could be procured without much trouble. The occupation of the inhabitants was fishing during the short three months when the waters were free from ice. The primitive fishing-instruments and methods employed by them in their trade was probably the reason why their supply of poorly preserved fish was not sufficient to feed them all the year round. At the time of my arrival in Kolymsk there was a marked scarcity of fish in the settlement, and it was four months before new supplies could be procured. Meat was as scarce as fish. The local merchants, having no competition whatever, asked fabulous prices of the natives, and were both to buy and dealing with me, as they were unable to change me the usual exorbitant prices.

The only way out of this dilemma was to procure my provisions directly of the natives by barter. My attempts in that direction were very unsuccessful from the start, for obvious reasons. I did

Mr. Canada de nos meilleurs amis, je vous prie de m'excuser de ne vous avoir pas écrit plus tôt. Je suis très occupé par les affaires de mon pays, mais je ne puis pas oublier de vous écrire. Je vous prie de m'excuser de ne vous avoir pas écrit plus tôt. Je suis très occupé par les affaires de mon pays, mais je ne puis pas oublier de vous écrire.

Page of a Letter received by the Author, showing Franco's Pen in his first discovery of Writing

From Birshtoff's "In the Yukon"

Exterior of an Eskimo's Hut in Siberia

From Birshtoff's "In the Yukon and Tundra"

Interior of the Hut, showing Fireplace

Two captured Elk Dead from Exhaustion

Rescuing a broken Antler from a Thrown Elk

Moving an Elk Range

By H. D. Van Eaton

FIFTY years ago immense herds of elk browsed on the Sierra foothills and the beautiful valley of the San Joaquin and its many tributaries. With the rapid advance of civilization the elk disappeared from the lowlands, and twenty years ago probably less than a score remained in all the vast territory still owned in its entirety by the cattle barons. This remnant hung together in the foothills of eastern Kern by night and roamed far up in the Sierra by day, secretly hidden from hunters' least upon extermination. Finally this last year detailed to one or two bulls and half a dozen cows. Then Uncle Sam woke up and set about saving the last of the game which but a few years before fattened on the natural grasses of California's hills and valleys.

Love of home is said to be stronger in the elk's heart than in that of any other animal. It was this characteristic which made them comparatively easy prey for the hunter, for an elk seldom, if ever, abandons the range on which it was born. A law was passed forbidding absolutely the killing of elk—bulls, doe, or fawn—and punishing a violation by heavy fine and imprisonment. So well were the animals protected that even the Digger Indians ceased the chase which had long been a tribal institution.

The result was most gratifying. With the wonderful instinct that rules all game animals during a close season, the elk soon abandoned the mountain fastnesses entirely, even descending into the valleys, and often ranging near houses to settlers whose fields and orchards were protected by mere six foot fences. But no complaint was made, and the farmers joined with the soldiers and vaqueros in the effort to rehabilitate the elk. The herd, tenderly cared for, began to multiply, slowly at first, then more rapidly, until today it numbers over two hundred, despite some mauling by later settlers. During all these years the herd has stuck closely to the Kern range. Near the town of Kittick, in the Kern foothills, is an immense round-up corral, containing 1250 acres, surrounded by a high fence. Of late years the elk have made this corral their nightly rendezvous, entering at an opening three hundred feet wide.

In every herd of elk there are some adventures who wander here and there and get into serious trouble. A number of the elk on the Kern range have chosen to associate with cattle, and it has frequently happened that during the great yearly round-up it has been impossible to separate the elk from the herds, and they have been shipped to San Francisco and sold. Most of these have found their way into private and public parks.

A year ago this herd was formally presented to the United States government by the owners, on the understanding that the animals were to be removed to Sequoia Park in the Yosemite Valley. Under twenty years of rigid protection the elk had become so tame that the government authorities foolishly thought they could drive the two hundred animals north to Sequoia Park, led by the big bull leaders knew nothing of the loveliness of the new home awaiting them and their families, and preferred the range of their forefathers. Two months ago Uncle Sam resolved to make an effort to mend his charges up and whip them by rail. California was counted for its most famous vaqueros, and in two weeks thirty-five gathered at Bakersfield, the county seat, under the leadership of Billy Woodruff and Raphael Quinn, the two most noted lariat-men in all that region. The stirring events which followed will never be forgotten by those who witnessed the great battle waged by the government and its utter defeat. County officials, sportsmen from far and near, farmers, business men, clerks, every citizen of Bakersfield who could secure a horse, accompanied the cowboys. The Kittick rendezvous was reached an hour before daybreak, and the retreat of the herd from the great corral cut off. The plan was to drive the animals into the railroad corral, some miles distant from the main entrance.

The cowboys, led by Woodruff and Quinn, entered the main corral and succeeded in rounding up eighty elk and leading them towards the railroad pens. Once fairly started, the outlaws made wide detours and succeeded in driving in many stragglers. Superintendent James Ogden had given strict orders that ropes were not to be used, and for some time it seemed that they would not even be an occasion for resorting to the lariat. For three miles the elk moved rapidly, but kept well together, and gave little trouble. Then the railroad tracks and county road were reached, and for the first time the leaders seemed danger. Once across the tracks they gradually increased their pace until only the vaqueros with their speedy, trained horses could keep within hailing distance.

Two miles more of the heart-breaking pace and the elk began to grow weary, but the cowboys gave them no rest, and it became a pitiless drive. Suddenly it dawned upon the leaders that they were being driven, and with a loud snort each led his particular family in a wild flight in different directions. Some of the bulls turned upon their torturers so fierce that they had to be roped. The cowboys succeeded in holding together only about thirty of the herd. The others made for the high ferns, which they easily scaled, and dashed away for the range.

The elk which were surrounded seemed infused with new life, and fought their pursuers so hard that they were roped and thrown and dragged towards the railroad pens a mile away. Five magnificent specimens died before the pens were reached. Those which were not thrown were gradually driven towards the corral, but the sight of the high, white-washed fences maddened the animals, and another fierce stampede followed. Some of the bulls were thrown and dragged into the corral. Those which were forced inside, but were not roped, forged their tired legs, and scaling the high fences, dashed away for the hills and mountains.

When night came the pens held just eight helpless elk as the result of the battle. The last to escape was a badly hurt bull known as General Grant. His splendid antlers were broken, his side torn in a dozen places, but he was as defiant and as full of battle as at the beginning. He snorted contemptuously at his enemies cowering on the fence or peering through the rails, stamped the dirt in an angry cloud all about him, and dashed for the white-washed prison wall. He scaled the eight feet with ease, and braved for the mountains, with several cowboys in pursuit.

"Let the General go. He's cornered freedom," cried Ogden, and the cowboys gave the herd the herd a parting cheer.

At daybreak the following morning another effort was made to drive the elk to the railroad corral. The vaqueros rounded up fifty animals that had not been rounded the day before. They started slowly, but soon were obliged to "panch" the elk like wild steers. The work of the day before was repeated: ten were dragged into the pens, but five of these died, and now this method of securing the herd has been abandoned as utterly impracticable. Cattlemen, who understand the animals, declared from the beginning that the attempt would end in a failure. Some have gone so far as to say that the government will have to be satisfied with moving the calves from year to year, allowing the older animals to remain until they die. No attached are the animals in the ranges where they are released, and as accustomed to their covering long distances, that many believe that even though the bulls were landed in Sequoia Park they would lead their families back to the hills and mountains through which the Kern River flows.

The Baltic Fleet

By Sydney Brooks

LONDON, December 28, 1904.

THE Baltic fleet has behind it an eventful, if not glorious, past; its present is highly disputatious; its future is big with almost limitless possibilities. With the signing of the Anglo-Russian agreement to deal with the Japanese "Black Incident," its past may be said to have already closed. For the fleet, at any rate, it has ceased to exist: I doubt whether Admiral Horthy's views give a thought to it. Even in England that white-necked goose was an "unpardonable" and "intolerable" "outrage" is now an "accident" simply. The public mind has calmed down completely. At the beginning of November England was as America would have been had the British North American agreement, during the great crisis of the Venezuela affair of 1895, first come and killed the existence of the fleet. But to-day placidity reigns supreme; the enemy, while more than ready to fight if the need arose, is now honestly thankful that war has been averted, and regards the agreement as something all it could reasonably demand. The terms of international conventions as a rule are not very closely studied by the public and are soon forgotten. It is, therefore, well to recall precisely what it is that England and Russia have agreed upon. They have agreed to enter into an international commission of inquiry into the fact of establishing "by means of an impartial and non-partisan investigation" the questions of fact "connected with the incident which occurred during the night of the 23rd-24th October, 1904." The commission is to consist of five naval officers of high rank, four of them appointed by the governments of Great Britain, Russia, the United States, and France, and the fifth either by agreement between these four governments or by the Emperor of Austria. The British and Russian commissioners will be assisted by legal advisers. The commission is to settle its own procedure, and a majority vote of the five commissioners will be held to represent the decision of those all. The object of the commission is to "inquire into and report on all the circumstances relative to the North Sea incident, and particularly on the question as to where responsibility lies, and the degree of blame attaching to the subjects of the two high contracting parties or to the subjects of other countries in the event of their responsibility being established by inquiry." This is all in the text of the convention that really matters. Nothing it will be noticed, is said about the punishment of the guilty persons, or that point England has to rely on the "discreet statement" which Lord Lansdowne declared a few weeks ago had been given to him by the Czar's government that the fleet would be duly punished.

Can this be regarded as a satisfactory settlement of the difficulty? Most Englishmen answer yes; a few say no; while many criticise the workings of British diplomacy in the matter. Looking at the affair as a whole, and by itself, I think that every one who is not a complete Jingis must admit that the settlement arrived at is right, appropriate, and honorable. Those who denounce it do so either for the Bismarckian reason that England should have seized the opportunity of wiping the Russian fleet out of existence, or because they feel that the Russian fleet was being lowered by Donaghy Street's handling of the situation. And probably they are accurate enough in arguing that Palmerston would have acted very differently, the usual spite-fueled Palmerston allowing the Russian fleet to proceed on its voyage unhindered, graciously unopposed. He would have acted upon these theories that any one who ventured to meddle with British subjects should be chased off the seas and that the British navy existed for that express purpose. There were plenty of people who urged Lord Lansdowne to be another Palmerston. He had the courage to refuse, just as the Czar had the courage to stand up to the Anglo-Japanese gun duels. And, indeed, it was not Lord Lansdowne, but Mr. Balfour, who was to blame if British diplomacy seemed to be running on a continuous groove. The famous speech at Southampton in which, while announcing that the fear of war had passed, he meretriciously flayed the Russian admiral and ridiculed his tale of Japanese torpedos, might never have been delivered. When the admiral, a day or two afterwards, calmly watched another Japanese vessel, shooting only two lieutenants to represent his fleet and his country before the international commission, Mr. Balfour looked foolish. Worse still, he made English law look foolish. He accepted too, a turn which almost marks the apex of a British diplomatic defeat.

But there is one circumstance of the whole affair from which Englishmen may do extract comfort. It showed the navy to be admirably organized and admirably ready. No more remarkable naval spectacle has ever been witnessed than when the British, German, and Channel fleets were ordered to render "mutual support and cooperation." A writer in the December Fortnightly Review well describes what followed. "Hardly had the instructions gone forth than Lord Charles Berkeley, commanding the Channel fleet, brought his ships into Gibraltar. Admiral Sir (now) Lord Dunsley, who was being lifted in the Adriatic, recalled all his flotillas, and steamed away with the Mediterranean squadron to Malta; while Vice-Admiral Sir Arthur Wilson, in command of the Home fleet, steamed from Cromarty round to his base in the English Channel. Portland, where he was joined by a crowd of mosquito craft and the ships of the cruiser squadron. Thus, in a few days, the navy, which is always ready for war, had resolved its war preparedness to open hostilities if diplomacy failed, and the pressure of the fleet being not did provide a solution in the difficulty. The life of the nation went on as usual. Parliament was not called together. The Board of Admiralty merely despatched orders to three fleets, and they proceeded to their stations; not a single ship was specially commissioned." Six years ago, when war threatened over Fashoda, the Board of Admiralty issued similar orders. Those orders were revised in 1904 by 16 light ships, and in 1904 by 28; six years ago by 13 protected cruisers, and last month by 12 protected and by 13 armored cruisers; in 1904 by 5 torpedo-boats and 20 destroyers, and in 1904 by 63 divisions. The fleets of six years ago carried 263 guns; the fleets of last month 600; and the difference in size and equipment is, on the whole, not making compared with the difference in organization and fighting effectiveness. Altogether, England had ample cause to be satisfied with her naval situation.

So much for the past of the Baltic fleet. Its present I have described as highly disputatious. It is so because England, although the ally of Japan, is providing the fleet with the wherewithal to proceed to the Far East; and the Japanese resent the fact. Without English coal the Baltic fleet can never reach Aden waters. This is an undeniable fact, and the Japanese minister in London has been pressing it upon English attention rather sharply of late and hinting that in an ally it is rather queer conduct. So it is, or so, at least, it appears to be. But then it must be remembered that all arguments based on the plea of an alliance between Great Britain and Japan are irrelevant. I have been told by a high authority on international law that it is incorrect even to speak of Great Britain as Japan's ally. The agreement between the two countries merely signifies that each should assume the rights of the other under the provisions of the various international treaties. Those circumstances have not arisen, and until they do arise England's position, like the position of France or the United States, is merely that of a neutral. And the claims of a neutral state have the right to sell what goods they please to belligerents providing they take the risk themselves. It is not the business of the government of the neutral state to stop them from doing so, but of the belligerent who finds himself suffering from the raising of contraband to his opponent. No government could possibly act on any other principle. The Welsh mining magnates would simply laugh in Lord Lansdowne's face if he were to forbid their selling steam coal to the Russian fleet. Moreover, it is well known that the Japanese themselves have taken full advantage of the situation, and are selling like wildfire millions of tons of coal in excess of normal requirements have been sent to Chinese ports within the last nine months. There is no reason why Chinese ports should be in such sudden and overwhelming need of Welsh coal. Practically all that, of course, is sold to the Japanese. The law could only be altered, if at all, against both belligerents. At present it seems to be favoring Russia rather than Japan. Six months ago it was favoring Japan rather than Russia. I will confess that in this matter Albion is "as perfidious as usual." But she should be so. It is making both belligerents pay handsomely for her services.

But if the past of the Baltic fleet has been exciting and its present raises most interesting points of conflict between the two warring empires, the future of the fleet, and the fleet itself, are infinitely more momentous. It is a rather interesting fact that, in spite of the hundreds of thousands of tons supplied by South Wales to the Baltic fleet, the price of coal in the ordinary market is actually lower than it was three months ago. South Wales is of opinion that the greater part of this coal will be thrown on the market within three months and could then be bought up at better prices. In other words, South Wales does not believe that the Baltic fleet will ever reach the Far East or that it ever had any intention of doing so, and that its departure was, in short, a fiasco. Three months ago, I imagine, most Englishmen would have subscribed to this view of things. To-day there is a very obvious disposition, if anything, to overrate the possibilities of the Baltic fleet. These possibilities are contained in the famous speech of Lord Arthur. If Lord Arthur is still holding out for the time the Baltic fleet, having refitted and repaired (let us say) the French part of Nelson, is ready for action. Admiral Togo will obviously be most awkwardly placed. He will either have to raise the Japanese flag and risk a battle with the British fleet, to crash the Baltic squadron, or he will have to run the enormous risk of disabling his already now too powerful force, leaving a few ships to watch over Lord Arthur and taking the rest to make him to make up his mind to do so. The fleet, the fleet, but to make up his mind to do so, the Baltic fleet. The escape of even a few ships and their junction with the Vladivostok squadron would jeopardize the Japanese communications and expose the coast of the island Kingdom to a systematic harrying operation. If he the time the Baltic fleet has arrived in Aden waters Lord Arthur has fallen. Admiral Togo will then be free to concentrate practically the whole of his force upon the new intruder, and to that extent his problem will be simplified. But the Japanese are almost as sure to see the end of the line as the Russian course—rumors of the seizure of a Chinese port and the loss of a German one in Shanghai, and what not. But one thing is made clear—that Japan's ultimate success depends not so much as ever, upon Germany; that the Russian fleet, and that the despatch of the Baltic fleet is a tardy attempt—perhaps too tardy—to retrieve that huge and fundamental error. Even now, though, a Japanese defeat at sea would more than offset—it would wipe out—the Japanese success. So long as the fleet is in the progress of the Baltic fleet must rivet the thoughts and engage the speculations of the entire world.

The American Nation

By C. H. Gaines

NATIONAL pride finds satisfaction in national art, in national literature, in the mastery of all in national history. History makes a nation appear as a living entity. The written record is the nation's self-consciousness, without which it can have no true realization of its own greatness. For this reason, if for no other, the object for which the associated scholars, under the supervision of Professor Albert Bushnell Hart, have collaborated is worthy of all appreciation. The American Nation is a worthy monument to our country, more permanent than any material structure, no part of which will ever need to be undone or rearranged.

To write history from a single and restricted viewpoint is but to express an individual opinion of certain phases in a country's life. Such a method reminds one of the dissection of a dead body; the living spirit is absent. A national history should be, like the human mind, "all in one, and all in every part"; that is, it should be complete in every important detail and breathe the national spirit from every page. This is the ideal aimed at in the work under consideration, and it is not too much to say that it has been attained. No phase of the country's life and development has been ignored. The student of political science, the inquirer into the history of institutions, those for whom the significance of the nation's story is bound up in the lives of great men—all will find their specialties fully and entertainingly treated within the scope of this magnificent work; and, best of all, these varying elements are so compounded as to form a complete, harmonious whole, so that one never loses the conception of national entity; never loses the sense of reality through a preponderance of abstract dissection, never loses the main narrative. To read through such a story of our native land is almost to live through the experience of past epochs. We may be sure that the men of former days did not concern themselves, as they lived, exclusively with any one phase of their political existence. It was not politics alone, or institutions alone, or the lives of contemporary great men alone, which made up the sum of their lives as citizens. Therefore, to bring home a realizing sense of our nation's past to the men of today, the second, inductive method employed by the learned authors of The American Nation is the correct one.

There is our request in which the writer of history has a distinct advantage over contemporary authors. He sees men and events more nearly in their true perspective, and is able to trace the workings of cause and effect. It is upon this principle that history is interested, and the dialectic value of history largely depends. Without discussion of cause and effect history sinks to the level of the Anglo-Saxon chronicle. This principle has never been lost sight of in the construction of The American Nation. There is throughout a true sense of cause and effect, binding events together, and rendering the latter intelligible. Thus the full value of history as national experience is conserved.

As a reference book, and as an ex-laudatory story of The American Nation will prove indispensable to scholars, yet it is not for scholars alone that it is designed. In fact, the authors have addressed themselves primarily to the lay reader. Each volume has been written "by an expert for laymen."

In order to gain an adequate idea of the immense scope and importance of this work, a consideration of the methods employed in its construction is necessary. Needless to say, the task would have been too vast for any single person to undertake. Because was had, of necessity, to be thought of as specialization in education. And so matter what may be thought of as specialization in education, there can be but one opinion as to the beneficial effects of specialization in fields of research. The entire subject of American history, including its European backgrounds, has been mapped out and subdivided by Professor Hart of Harvard, who edits the whole series, and each part, constituting a volume, has been assigned to an independent author, an acknowledged expert in the particular field, who has exhausted every source of information bearing on his period. Thus, of the first five volumes thus far published, Volume I, The European Background of American History, is written by Edward Potts Cheney, A.M., Professor of History in the University of Pennsylvania; Volume II, The Basis of American History, by Livingston Farrand, A.M., of Columbia University; Volume III, Slavery in America, by Edward Taylor Bourne, Ph.D., of Yale University; Volume IV, England in America, by Lyon Gardner Tyler, LL.D., President of William and Mary College; Volume V, Colonial Self-government, by Charles McLean Andrews, Ph.D., of Bryn Mawr College. The remaining twenty-one volumes of the history proper will bear names of equal importance and authority upon their title-pages. The result of the united efforts of all these scholars is a history of prodigious scope, perfect in every detail, and so well knit that it seems to be the work of one master mind of nimble superhuman grasp and insight.

No small part of the credit of this achievement is due to the intelligent care of Professor Albert Bushnell Hart, Ph.D., LL.D., Professor of History at Harvard University, than whose duty is probably no man living better qualified for the important work of supervising this vast undertaking. As chief engineer of this great enterprise he has mapped out the work in advance, divided the subject into groups and volumes, and given to each cooperator his share of the work. To him is due, in large measure, the exquisite proportion and intimate connection between the various members of the series, which is one of its distinguishing features. Professor Hart is also the author of Volume XVI, of The American Nation, entitled Slavery and Abolition, and of Volume XXVI, Ideals of American Government. It should be said that in his editorial work Professor Hart has been aided by advisory committees appointed from the historical societies of Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Virginia, and Texas—committees which list the names of men well known for historical learning and research. It will be seen that every effort has been made to concentrate upon the planning and execution of The American Nation the utmost historical talent which the country can furnish, and the result is a work of which the American nation may well be proud.

A feature of the history which will commend itself to students is its admirable division into groups, each group containing five volumes. Thus the first group is entitled Foundations of the Nation; the second, "Transformation into a Nation"; the third, "Development of the Nation"; the fourth, "Trial of Nationality"; and the fifth, "National Expansion." This classification is natural, and facilitates grasp of the entire subject, but it is only one instance of the perfect proportion which rules in every part of this work. The American Nation is a giant among American histories—but not a disproportioned or deformed giant.

Even as embodying the results of the researches of trained investigators, the work is of the first importance. The time is now full upon when the mass of newly discovered material should be incorporated in a work of comprehensive scope, and the views of historical experts should no longer remain scattered in monographs not accessible to the general public. But the narrative would still remain of prominent value even if it contained no new material whatever, for this is the first American history which has ever been undertaken upon such extensive and carefully surveyed lines, and, as such, it fills a place not occupied by any work of its kind.

The five volumes of the first group have been already given to the public, and the next five are soon to follow. It is the intention of the publishers to issue from five to eight volumes a year.

It must be obvious to any one who has been for some time conversant with the fact that The American Nation is not only a somewhat more extensive undertaking in itself, but also marks a significant advance in the making of historical literature—an advance characteristic of American spirit and methods. Division of labor has solved the problem incident to so great a task, rendering the knowledge of a specialist at every point. The master minds who have thus far shaped the annals of American history—such renowned historians as Bancroft, Prescott, Hilhath, Fiske—have treated only limited fields or periods.

More searching historical investigation and new methods of study have made the task of the historian who works single-handed well-nigh impossible if he would seek to cover any considerable period of time or delve deeply into his subject. The co-operative method, fully recognized and accepted in the scientific world, has been found a necessity in the working out of a literary undertaking of such tremendous proportions as that of The American Nation.

The successful inauguration of this work, as attested by the reception accorded the initial volumes and the high promise of the succeeding ones, augurs the success of an enterprise which for manumit is analogous to the great feat of steel construction of our twentieth century. To nothing else, perhaps, can this work in twenty-eight volumes be more aptly compared than to the great shafts of steel which sink high in the streets of our great cities or to those broad arches which span our rivers—the work of many hands and many brains. As such, it is a triumph of American progress, perseverance, and performance, and a notable addition to contemporary literature.

Professor Albert Bushnell Hart
Editor of The American Nation

"Bumpy Dumpty" at the New Amsterdam Theatre
"Bumpy Dumpty" is called a "usual roundy pantomime," and is an Americanized version of the Phantoms production of the same name produced at the Dunc Lane Theatre in London

Sir Charles Wyndham and Mary Moore at the Lyceum
Following his production of "David Garrick" at the Lyceum, Sir Charles Wyndham and his company are appearing in "Mrs. Farringham's Avenger," a comedy by Robert Henry Davis, author of "Countess Kate" and "Cynthia"

A French Play given by the Cercle Français at Harvard
"Les Poltes Amoureux," a comedy in three acts, by J. P. Regnard, was recently produced in Cambridge and in Boston by students of Harvard University. The play was given by the Cercle Français of the University. It was the eighteenth annual dramatic performance given under the direction of this society. The production also marked the two-hundredth anniversary of the play, which was originally produced in France in 1704

SOME RECENT THEATRICAL PRODUCTIONS

VIOLA ALLEN AS "PERDITA" IN "THE WINTER'S TALE" AT THE KNICKERBOCKER

Miss Viola Allen began her New York engagement in Shakespeare's "The Winter's Tale" at the Knickerbocker Theatre on December 28. Before coming to New York, Miss Allen made a tour of Western cities, where the production was favorably received.

Correspondence

APPROVAL

NEW YORK, December 11, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR:—The article in your last issue defending the action of the President of the United States in shutting off the means of information from the paper whose representation, either under the influence of stimulants or else gifted by nature with a mind unconscious of rectitude, published an article without even a shadow of fact, and tending to place not only the head of the family, but the junior members of it, in an unfavorable light, deserves the commendation of every right-minded person in the United States.

The length to which this so-called "freedom of the press" has gone is becoming a blot on our Americanism. We are to-day treated to the spectacle of two individuals, one in the honored literary centre of the United States, the other in the metropolis of the United States, vilifying each other in the public prints, where the names har, third, soldier, and cheat are handled as though they were the newest drop of the venom spewed out of the mouths of the authors. A fine spectacle for the youth of the day, a lesson in manners in education, in the refinement that is supposed to be begun in our schools and finished in our colleges, afterwards to be of use in our commercial life!

We take off our hats to the scoundrel of this country where not law, but the tone of the community, prescribes a code of honor that tempers language and makes the public press a medium for discussion and not an outlet for filth.

It is high time action were taken to bring certain papers under the ban of the law, or else let us compel the law against defaming and go back to a system which will give some protection to a good name.

I am, sir,

A CONSTANT READER.

FROM AN OLD SUBSCRIBER

CLEVELAND, N. Y., December 8, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR:—Being an anti-slavery man in HARPER'S WEEKLY, and having been such continuously since that time, and having preserved in book form every number thereof since 1858, ought to be concrete evidence of my appreciation and admiration of your unique and matchless publication. It wields a tremendous power and only at times, but almost, and I believe it stands on a loftier plane today than ever before. But I must confess I have not always been in accord with its political views and theories, especially so during the Presidential campaign just closed. That previous year—consistency—is often lacking. You have a peculiar way of striking the fur smooth with one hand and railing against it with the other. I have been both an ardent, pious and depressed, with some of your comment and editorials, but taking your utterances in their entirety they often cause me to ponder the point and truth that those of some of your contemporaries, and had a most potent and powerful influence in bringing about the desired result. Pursue your independent and frank—rather—giving advice and taking advice in all things pertaining to the welfare and prosperity of the whole country. Above all, assist in breaking down the imaginary barrier between the so-called North and South, and let it be one people with one aim and one hope—United States in the true and fullest sense of those words. I rejoice the caricatures of Nast and the influence they wielded in their time—not only among the lettered, but unlettered people, and I hail with pleasure the space allotted to "Irresponsible." This new departure is a most commendable act of your management and adds much to the value of HARPER'S.

I am, sir,

GEORGE J. MACKAY.

WELCOME

PHOENIX, ARIZ., December 4, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR:—I most heartily concur in the deserved compliments that are appearing in the correspondence page of the WEEKLY, and I often wonder at the age of the "old subscriber," as my subscription, without missing a single issue, dates for over thirty years, and my father, I believe, began with the first issue. His absence would appear to me like the loss of both father and child, of all the thousands who weekly are cheered and elevated by its coming I doubt if any has a kinder feeling or gives it a warmer welcome than I.

I am, sir,

T. L. GARDNER.

THE STATUE OF FREDERICK THE GREAT

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 1, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR:—Your position as regards the statue of Frederick the Great is a strong one and unassailable by any editorial comment I have noted on the question. Nevertheless, residents of the Mississippi Valley, who revere the memory of Pitt and Forbes, and western Pennsylvanians, who feel honored that the dust of General Braddock is mingled with their soil, might plead historical justification as against the more abstract claims of military eminence—for they incline to accept Parkman's dictum that the Seven Years' War "supplied to the United States the indispensable condition of their greatness, if not of their national existence."

That Frederick enjoyed great popularity in America during revolutionary times seems indisputable, and it may well have been due to the part he played in the Seven Years' War, and it may have been well understood that he could not consistently with his honor take open part against the nation to whose subsidies he owed his existence as an independent sovereign, no matter how much he might dislike the then king and his ministers, despite the fact that England was indebted to his army for her ability to contend on equal terms with France in America by being freed from the necessity of bearing the brunt of the war on the Continent.

I am, sir,

H. L. CLARK.

A SOUTHERNER'S VIEW

ATLANTA, GA., December 5, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR:—is a recent issue you say "would that while he was about it, President Roosevelt had carried the other Southern States and given us a united country, that could in due time break apart on new lines." With an enormous majority now in Lower House, and the probable large gain from contested seats, and in addition the cutting down of the representation in the South (as introduced by General Keizer), is not the solid South already disintegrated?

Absolutely powerless, the small minority, although led by competent leaders, can do nothing. Whatever measures the dominant party desires to pass can be done with the greatest ease and the least amount of friction. I see no hope for the formation of a new party.

Secretly entrenched, an enormous majority in the governing power behind them, in my judgment the Republican party will be the dominant party for years to come. The South must continue to miscegenate and develop its great natural resources, and be content therewith.

I am, sir,

GEORGE H. PALMER.

STILL THE GOD OF BATTLES

CHICAGO, ILL., December 5, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR:—There is no such term as the "God of Battles" in the Bible. At least I have never been able to find it. The only reference I know of is in Shakespeare's play of "Henry the Fifth," Act IV., Scene 1, in which King Henry prays before the battle of Agincourt:

"O God of battles! Steel my soldiers' hearts!
Possess them not with fear; for thou art here,
The sense of reckoning, if the opposed numbers
Flurk their hearts from thee!—Not to-day, O Lord!
If not to-day, think not upon the fault
My father made in compassing the crown!"

I am, sir,

E. F. TROT.

THE ENGLISH PRESS

MANLY BATH, MICH., December 6, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR:—I was glad to read in your number of December 5 and to preserve for future reference Mr. Sidney Brooks's article, "The English Press," containing a valuable characterization of London newspapers. The world looks in vain in the usual books of reference for the information which he gives as to the standing and policy of the several London papers. Almost immediately comes an opportunity to make use of this information.

Among to-day's London despatches is one which quotes the comments of the Standard Reviewer and the Speaker on President Roosevelt's recent message to Congress. Both are ill-timed, and that of the Speaker is abusive and in bad taste. Turning to Mr. Brooks's article (p. 1890) we read:

"The Standard Reviewer, which was an organ of some authority, but is no longer, and the Speaker, which is a sort of weekly edition of the Daily News, are also published weekly."

"The Daily News, after being brilliantly edited for five years by one of the keenest and most catholic minds engaged in English journalism, Mr. E. T. Cook, changed hands a year or two ago, and is now the rallying point for all the 'bores' of the extreme Radical party. For this reason and for its utter antipathy to imperialism, the Daily News nauseates the statesmanlike majority of Englishmen, and has ceased to be a paper that is worth any body's while."

Mr. Brooks thus enables us to assign the Standard Reviewer and the Speaker to its proper place—the wastebasket.

In conclusion, I would suggest that a similar article from Mr. Brooks or another of your European correspondents dealing with the Continental press would be read with interest and would help many of us to a more intelligent reading of foreign newspaper comments, whether on things American or European.

I am, sir,

J. F. B.

EDITORIALS

UPPER MERID, December 2, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR:—The editorials in HARPER'S are a source of great pleasure to me.

I am, sir,

E. T. H.

THE SONG OF HYACINTH

BY JOHN OXENHAM

KATHERINE caught her breath. For a moment, which had in it the elements of eternity, it seemed to her that her heart stopped beating and fluttered in her throat. Then her breath came again, in a sigh whose only expression was the quick rise and long, slow fall of her bosom. Her husband, bending over her with the usual letter crumpled in his hand, saw it, and the twist of pain which wrung his heart for her was like the throat of a bayonet.

He bent lower and kissed her tenderly. His face was very grave, lips tight set under the thick mustache, jaw squared to the facing of a soldier. The greater face below bore the same signs—on a softer scale, but with as less determination. The tightening of the stout lips thrown into prominence the traces of her Northern descent, and disturbed the delicate sweep from eye to chin which was one of Captain Charles's memories of the early days when he used to sit and worship her at a distance. He caught the pathetic foreboding in her dark eyes, and, soldier though he was and fearless for himself, his own eyes were misty for a moment as he kissed her again and said:

"It is hard on us, dear, but the post will always be ours, and we will hope for the best. Promise me, Kate, to hope for the best," and his manner implied how much the post had held for them, till the hope he urged upon her be himself showed little sign.

"If only—" she began, and then shook off her useless hangings and said, more valiantly, "Yes, dear, we will live upon the post until—until we are together again." And the thought in both their hearts was that in this world that might never be.

They had been married scarcely a year.

He had that moment received orders to proceed to the front with his regiment.

And she—she was looking forward, with such spirit as she could muster, to a campaign of her own of quite a different character—its object the going, not the taking, of life, she herself the sole campaigner, and likely now, she said to herself, to be the certain victim. She had looked for the comfort and bartenment of his nearness when the time came, and now—she must go and she must face it all alone.

If she had looked forward with anxiety before, now her fears were doubled. For her mind would be full of forebodings on his account, and if anything happened to him, truly her only desire would be to join him as quickly as might be. Nay, she had, in her thoughts, already discounted the worst. Already she was saying to herself that when they parted now they parted forever, until they all three met where partings have no place. And she knew that it was as hard for him to leave her to face it alone as it was for her; that the dangers of the field would be to him as nothing compared with the anguish of anxiety he would suffer all the time on her account.

But in becoming a soldier's wife she had accepted all the possibilities. Her own fears for herself must not add to the burden of his fears for her. He would carry weight enough as it was. A burden of men must wear no cheerful face. She would do her best to bear herself bravely during the days that remained to them. She would have days enough when he was gone to grieve for his going and to gaze into the hollow face of the future. Happy the warrior who carries his family inside his helmet. So, for these days that were left to them—full, busy days for him, and, for her, treasureless as waning days to shipwrecked sailor—she gave a brave nod and bore herself bravely.

And he and all the hosts of his preparations,—for the call had been an unexpected one consequent on a distant disaster,—bent true to being her in thing after thing that caught his eye as he hoped to and for which he thought would cheer and amuse her in his absence.

She was passionately fond of fancies. Winter was coming, till all the winter blossoms, her favorite was the hyacinth, growing on the window-sill while all the outside world was bound in ice and snow or smothered in fog and mud. He would fit her out with the first hyacinths he could find, and they should whisper of him when he was gone.

As he sped, one day, through the parkland that he loved, Pierdilly and the Strand, with hyacinths lurking in a corner of his brain, his eye lighted and dwelt on a row of glasses, which looked in him like something new in hyacinth glasses, in the window of a shop. He stopped his cab and went in.

"Those," he said, pointing to them.

"What are they for, and how much?"

"Ah!" said the old man in charge, "they're nukes, they're nukes, they're nukes!"

"I beg your pardon?"

"Quite nukes! Not another set for you in the north, I'm for I know."

"I see. What are they for?"

"Glasgow things."

"I reckon. They come from Holland, where they're great of that kind of thing, I'm told."

"How much?"

"There's right of 'em. I want five bob apiece. As I say, they're nukes. Take the set and we'll call it thirty shillings."

"All sound!" said Captain Charles flicked one lightly over and there with his finger.

They rang true and sound,—full, sweet, long-drawn tared notes which still hummed on the air of the dark little shop while the two men went on talking.

"All sound," said the old man. "Take 'em!"

"Yes, I'll take them if you can pack them so that they won't break."

"Right!" and the old man hauled out a flat wooden box and pro-

She was saying that when they parted now they parted forever needed to pack the glasses with much precaution and an ample supply of fine wood shavings.

Katherine had expressed the pleasure she had done her best to feel in many of the things he had brought her. But when he carefully unpacked those old glasses and set them up in a row before her there was no slightest recreation in the gaudiness of her enjoyment.

"Oh, how beautiful!" she cried. "And how very odd! Where on earth did you get them, Charles?"

"Picked them up in a curio-shop. Odd, aren't they? I thought you'd like them."

"I have never seen anything like them. They are delicious."

"The old chap said they were ugly, quite ugly. I thought they'd please you. Listen!" and he rang them one after another with a flick of the finger.

Katherine sat listening to the sweet quivering notes. Then she swiftly changed the positions of the glasses and said, "Now again, please!"

He tapped them one by one all down the row, and said, "Well, I'm blundered!" and stood staring at them. For the glasses sang the notes of a perfect octave, had the sweet tones rang out soft and round, and seemed to rise and fall in slowly lengthening, slowly dwindling vibrations, till at last they died away. And the silence they left seemed the sweeter for their having filled it.

And Captain Charles, drawing a pencil from his pocket, proceeded to pick out on the row of glasses, with a stumple here and there, the one time he knew on the piano, "Home, Sweet Home," and before he got through he regretted that he had begun. For his own eyes were misty at thought of it all, and he did not dare to look at Katherine, and the last notes got somewhat mixed in retrospection.

"I am so glad you got them," she said at last, when the mellow tremors of the last treasured tune had died away. "They are quite the dearest things you could have got me. How very odd they are!"

And truly they were odd. Down below they sprang out in beautiful flowing curves, widening at the base into glides of all sizes, all fluted with tiny volutes, which swept round and round and upwards towards the neck, where they were no more than the trailings of a hair. Above the neck the delicate flutings grew again, and widened and deepened, and swept round and round the waving curves of the cup till they melted out of sight and were lost in the convolutions of the down-turned rim. No two of the cups were quite alike in shape, and all the glasses were widely distinct in color. They looked so like great southern sea-shells, with their whorlings and flutings, that Captain Charles placed one to his ear and heard therein the sound of the tireless sea.

As they stood in their octave, the one that sang the highest note was white-clear white, not opaque—and flecked with silvery notes like unexpected snowflakes falling through the thin white sunshine of a young spring day.

And the next was clear, bright yellow,—not the faded yellow of age, but a vivid, vital blaze like the early morning sunbeams.

And the next was sweet pale green, like the first tender flushing of the woods in the spring.

And the next was blue like the cloudless sky of summer.

And the next was blue like the Riviera sea.

And the next was orange, like the amber glow of sunset.

And the next was royal ruby red.

And the eighth and last was glowing purple.

"They are wonderful," said Katherine. "They grow upon you the more you look at them. Will you get me bulbs for them, dear?"

"I've got them," he said. "The very last they had. I hope they'll do well, and you'll think of me every time you look at them."

"I'll think of you in any case," she said, with an April smile which held the hint of tears.

He had been gone six weeks, and her

The Nation's Favorite

Particular people prefer the always ready Pope-Waverley Electric for general about town utility purposes, because it is stylish, clean, noiseless, easy riding, and any member of the family can operate it.

IN WASHINGTON.

as a fair example, there are half a hundred Pope-Waverley Electrics in daily use—spring, summer, autumn, and winter—by Senators, Congressmen, Members of the Army and Diplomatic Corps, Heads of Departments, Physicians, etc.

Model No. 30—Price, $2,000

WE HAVE A CATALOGUE CONTAINING FIFTEEN DISTINCT MODELS OF BUS MOTORS, CHILDS, STAYLIPPE, SHERBURN, PHILLIPS, ROAD, STATION, AND DELIVERY WAGONS.

Pope Motor Car Company, Indianapolis, Ind.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

January, 1905

Concerning Copyright. MARK TWAIN

Our Antiquated Method of Electing a President, Professor SIMON NEWCOMB

Representative Government for Russia. HANNIS TAYLOR

The Issue of the Open and Closed Shop. HENRY WHITE

D'Annunzio's "La Figlia di Jorio". HELEN ZIMMERN

Japan and Asiatic Leadership. PAUL S. REINSCH,

Professor of Political Science in the University of Wisconsin.

The Proper Grade of Diplomatic Leadership. JULIEN GORDON

Tariff Reform. CHARLES J. BULLOCK,

Assistant Professor of Economics in Harvard University.

The Panama Canal from a Contractor's Standpoint. G. W. CRICFIELD

The Armenian Church and the Russian Government, The Rev. S. G. WILSON

Henry James: An Appreciation. JOSEPH CONRAD

Shall the Fourteenth Amendment be Enforced? EDGAR GARDNER MURPHY, Executive Secretary of the Southern Education Board.

WORLD POLITICS

London; Berlin; St. Petersburg; Washington

50 cents a copy $5.00 a Year

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

spirits had descended as steadily as the thermometer from the moment of their parting.

She had a cheery letter from him at Madeira,—God knows how he managed to write it, for his spirits were as low as hers,—in which he strenuously insisted on her keeping her heart up, both for her own sake and somebody else's. Then a mile from Cape Town notifying his safe arrival, and now she was looking forward to his first letter after landing. After that she knew that letters might be few and far between. He would write whenever opportunity offered. That she was sure of. But the mischance of war might prevent what he wrote ever reaching her, and her fears would fill all the gaps in their correspondence with the most dreadful possibilities. She would strive against it, but she knew it would be so. She was only human, and in circumstances such as these poor humanity has a bias towards the shadowy side of the road.

With his last kiss on her trembling lips, which would not keep straight, for all her efforts, and the thrill of his passionate embrace still about her, and that deep, longing look in his eyes, which was more of a prayer for her than any words that ever uttered, she had said to herself: "It's good-by forever. I shall never see him again, until—until—"

And when, in spite of herself, she could not but think of all he was going to, it seemed to her impossible that it could be otherwise.

How could a wala possibly come through it all alive?

None did—no one. But how very many did not. Half her acquaintance was in mourning. She had seen Joseph Garibaldi drive past within an hour after Charlie's parting from her. They were married the same day, and Jack Garibaldi lay under the velvet and Joseph lay back in her carriage, dead. If white under her little black bonnet, with great black eyes under her eyes, and the eyes themselves such wells of hopeless grief that even casual passers-by, when they saw them, said to themselves: "Poor young thing! The war's again!"

And Katherine said to herself: "Any day, any day, and I shall be like that. Poor Joseph! Poor Jack! My poor, poor Charlie! And my poor little baby that is not born! Oh, the war, the war! God have mercy on us all!" and then she would lie down on her couch and cry her heart out for the bitterness of it all.

The baby hyacinths in their heavy gray cradles were weaned at last from their cooing in the dark, and gladdened her eyes with their vigorous nodding. The lower globes were filled with the wretched entanglement of twining white coils and tendrils, and the bulbs themselves showed prospective stirrings of life up above. In the two days they had been out of limbo she had learned their larval characteristics by heart, and had got on friendly terms with them.

Charlie's letter was long of coming. Four or five hours after day after day she lay on her couch listening wistfully for the postman. She heard his official knock far up the quiet square. She heard him rap-rapping himself nearer. He stopped at her door with everything but the one thing she wanted. Then he was tramped, in listless ignorance of the hungry heart which his passage left a little more empty and hungry still.

Fortunately for Katherine, she had at hand the next best thing to a mother—her own old nurse, Mrs. Pinner, who had carried her as a baby, who tyrannized her yet, and still regarded the man of war as something of an interloper. The one great fear of Pinner's old eye was to nurse Katherine's children as she had nursed Katherine herself, and she hovered about her and mothered her as an aged hen might mother a baby duck.

The long-delayed letter began to get upon Katherine's nerves. Her imagination flamed the darkest reasons for the delay. He had had an accident on board ship. He was dead. She would never see him again.

She was lying on her couch before the fire, thinking doubtful thoughts such as these, very late one night (for there was still to come), when a faint sound fell on her ear,—the faintest of sounds, no more than a tiny scratch on the rim of the elbow and the darkness. And yet hardly a scratch, for there was in it a latent sweet resonance, the sweet impression of a musical bow. It was like the fine thin piping of a very small insect, but on a very much higher note than she had ever heard insect pipe before.

Besides, there were no insects at this time of year.

She thought at first that it must be the indistinct of some far-distant noise, and then it seemed to her that it was certainly inside the room.

She sat up and listened. It died away at times, and then began again, faint, low, long—drawn, rung and falling, just one high sweet note, thin and clear and hardly to be heard; and yet she seemed it when it sank below her hearing.

It was certainly in the room. She decided that it was one of the strings of her either in its wooden loom, singing sympathetically to some unseen, unseen vibration too fine for her senses to detect.

She lay back and listened intently. But she was in that state of high-strung nerves in which even so small a thing as this may not be passed over unexplained. The infinitesimal piped died away and left the darkness dead.

It came again, and to her straining ear seemed to swirl round this time before.

She got up and moved slowly to and fro.

To the piano. She laid her ear against it. It was mute.

To her mirror. She opened the case and went over it. The sound was outside it.

To and fro she went, slowly following the excitement of the tiny piping. To and fro, till she stood at last before her row of hyacinths, their great globes swelling with the bulbs above well sweetened and bright.

And as she stood gazing down at it, the faint sweet song of the newly stirring life, communicated in some mysterious way to the resonant cup in which it lay, and by it transmitted to the ear. Look out again, faint and fine and ineffably sweet. She bent and softly kissed the nothing hope, and said aloud: "Dear little truer! I too will hope." And just then the postman's knock rang through the house, and in a moment the boarder's letter was in her hand and everything else was forgotten.

The days dragged on and brought no news

How many times she read that letter! Till she knew it off by heart almost, and some parts of it quite. In between times the ugly thought would come, now and again, that four weeks and more had elapsed since the letter was written, and in four weeks much may happen at the front. Four weeks! Ah, (four—four hours! four minutes! four seconds! and any second of them all sufficient to end that dear life. He might be lying dead even now as she read his words of hope and cheer for the hundredth time, and his spirit might be watching her as she read.

The days dragged on and brought no news. He had told her not to be disappointed if no letters reached her. But she lay expecting them even while she told herself they would not come, and in spite of her faith and her prayers her spirits drooped daily.

For the shadow of the valley towards which her pulses were racing lay heavy on her, and at times almost overcame her.

She was lying on on her couch one night, with an unexpressed look to her hand, thinking, thinking, and praying at times, when her thoughts got too much for her and coming away and leaving her clinging to reason by a prayerful thread.

Suddenly she caught once more that fine sweet thrill of sound which had tantalized her so that other night. This time it was a pure delight. She lay listening intently and scarcely dared to breathe.

For it was not a single note she heard now, but several, and she knew that in others of the battle the struggling life had broken its trammels and was striving hopefully upwards to the light.

She lay for a long time listening, till the meanings of those wordless songs worked into her soul and she knew that they were good. And she said to herself: "If these can have hope and confidence, shall not I? If these can have hope and confidence, shall not I?"

And that night she slept as she had not slept for many weary nights.

Each night now the stirrings of life in the byerinth gave her hope to her. Every one of the eight had lost its female and joined the chorus. And hour after hour she lay listening to them, and never in her life had she heard music half so sweet.

And so Katherine drew nearer and nearer to the Valley of Shadow—the valley into which she must descend alone, hoping by God's mercy to come through into the sunlight beyond.

One morning Katherine's paper was not in its usual place alongside her cup.

"Why, what has become of my paper?" she asked, and caught a tremulous look on Pfunder's gray face which was not usually there.

"Get it for me, please," said Katherine, gently, and to herself she said, "He is dead!"

"Died?" said the old nurse, as she reluctantly brought her the paper. "He is—"

"I know," said Katherine. "He is dead."

"No, no, not dead!" cried Pfunder, moved at her composure. "Wounded, dearie only wounded, and it doesn't even say severely. Maybe it will bring him home. I do hope it's just bad enough to bring him home."

"Now leave me, Pinner dear, and let me read it for my self," and she sent the old woman away, and read the account of his wounding as if it had been a chapter in the Bible.

She was surprised herself at her own calmness. But truly she had been daily expecting news of his death. Since the day he started she had said to herself that she would never see him again, and now the letter, when it came, was so much lighter than she had feared that it left her steady and almost unmoved.

Now, her first feeling was one of grateful exultation. He was no longer exposed to the deadly risks of the field. In capital surely the chances were in his favor. It was no longer thousands of treacherous bullets seeking his life, and any one of them sufficient to end it, but careful doctors and patient Sisters striving diligently to ward off death. Oh, surely the chances were in his favor now! Then she thought of the

CRYSTAL Domino SUGAR

A Triumph in Sugar Making!

Sold only in 5 lb. sealed boxes!

CRYSTAL DOMINO SUGAR is a trademark of the Domino Sugar Refining Company, New York, N. Y. It is the only sugar in the world that is refined to such purity that it is absolutely free from all impurities. It is the only sugar in the world that is refined to such purity that it is absolutely free from all impurities. It is the only sugar in the world that is refined to such purity that it is absolutely free from all impurities.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

Be sure you get the genuine article. Look for the "DOMINO" MARK. "DOMINO" STONES are the only ones that will stand the test of the "DOMINO" MARK. INSIST UPON HAVING THE GENUINE.

THE TRUANTS

By A. E. W. MASON

Author of "The Four Feathers"

AN exhilarating story of London, which not only introduces the reader to strange phases of life in that great city, but speedily involves him in an engrossing plot. The theme is that of military honor and a wife's reputation, balanced in the scales.

Illustrated, Post 8vo, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

MOTOR BOATS

LAUNCHES, STEAM AND SAIL YACHTS, ROW BOATS, CANOES

SPEED—PLEASURE—BUSINESS

Beautiful, Reliable, Economical, Simple, Safe

That is a large list of things which the motor boat does for you and your family. Write today and address RACINE BOAT MFG. CO. (Inq. 17), MUSKOGEE, MICH.

THE ONLY SALESROOMS IN GREATER NEW YORK FOR THE CELEBRATED

SOHMER

ARE LOCATED IN THE SOHMER BUILDING
FIFTH AVENUE CORNER 224 STREET
THE "SOHMER" HEADS THE LISTS OF THE HIGHEST GRADE PIANOS

Pennock Park Capitol Hill Mount of Sion Mount of Sion Mount of Sion

Capitol Hill

Mount of Sion

Mount of Sion

Capitol Hill

PLANS FOR THE NEW GEORGE WASHINGTON UNIVERSITY AT WASHINGTON

Through the efforts of the George Washington Memorial Society, founded in 1897, the purpose of which was to establish in the city of Washington a university modeled after the plan outlined in the will of George Washington, the Columbian University, by a group of citizens, was able to secure the necessary funds to carry out the plan. The Memorial University is now being built on the site of the old White House, immediately west of the White House, fronting upon the President's Park, and plans are now being made for a quadrangle of buildings with the Memorial Hall in the center.

Progress of Science

The Mont Blanc Railway

many deaths in hospital, the frightful ravages of enteric, and are begun to doubt, after all, if he would not have been safer in the field. The towing in and out of her from that mind was rapidly working her into a fever, when her doctor came in to see her, at the instigation of the anxious Pfimder.

He probed the idea of greater risks in hospital than in the field, and gave it as his opinion that the war was almost over, and that she would be better out of it. At which Katherine clasped her hands ecstatically.

Still more to the point, seeing the state she was in, he offered to cable at once for fuller news, and left her eager and hopeful. But the hours passed and no answer came, and that night was surely the longest she had ever passed.

Her thoughts swung back to their lowest depths of fearful foreboding. He was dead, the count to dead, or he would surely have replied. And now all she had to do was to follow him as quickly as possible.

Twice during the evening the doctor called, and rose, to learn if any reply had come to his cable. He did not go up to see her, lest his face should betray his anxiety. For he said to himself that Mr. Pfimder was right in his line, though he did not say it in words to her:

"If good news comes, she will get through all right. If bad, she will not. I will kill her. And in this case no news is best news."

She woke with a start the next morning in the gray of the dawn with the rebuke of a heavy knock on the street door in her ears. And presently Pfimder came in on heavy tiptoes, in a wonderful dressing-gown, and after a searching glance at her face, fanned her a half-cant yellow envelope, with a hand that shook in spite of herself.

And Katherine rose lit open with a steady hand and read: "Wounded, lost, dead will, flower soon as can travel."

"Thank God!" she said, and then went white in the lips and fell back on her pillows. And Pfimder ran to the door, where the doctor was waiting as if he had never been out of the house, and he nodded cheerfully, as much as to say:

"All's well, Pfimder! All's well! God's in His heaven, after all, Pfimder!" As though he knew perfectly well all that was in that telegram.

And Katherine slipped gently down into the Valley of Shadow.

Six weeks later Colonel Charles sat by Katherine's couch, looking worshipfully down on his little daughter, and the baby shared back at him with eyes like velvet pomegranates, and apparently found it very difficult to account for him.

He was lean and brown of face, and thin and work of body, and one of his arms was permanently out of action, the sleeve hooped up to his elbow, as he used to hunt again.

And Katherine herself was thinner, he thought, than he ever remembered her to be, but the sweet thin face, lined and discolored to a still rarer delicacy by its passage through the valley, shone with a radiance the like of which he had never before seen. And as he looked on mother and child there was that within him which made his own less fear sorrow—breaking-point almost. The grin lines which the close companionship of death and wrought there were like themselves and before this wonder of creation, and a glory akin to hers shone dimly through.

"What shall we call her?" he asked, as his daughter clutched anxiously at the brown finger he tendered her.

"Her name is Hyacinth," said Katherine, softly.

"Business"

WILLIAM NORRIS, the actor, tells of a variety actor who was speaking of the way he and his partner were always hunting for new "business."

"We have just changed our act all around," he said. "Everything is now brand new."

"What have you done?" asked Mr. Norris. "Oh, we've done enough. We recognize that the public demands novelty and we supply it. My partner used to go on the stage first, and when I appeared he came out with a club. Well, I go on first now, and when he comes on I hit him."

Weather Forecasts from Humming

The attention of many persons has often been directed to the humming of telegraph and telephone wires, but it has only been recently that a connection has been found between this phenomenon and weather conditions. Professor F. Beck, of Babenhausen, Hesse, has found, after a study of the subject, that it is possible to forecast local weather conditions by observing the humming, and that properties holding good for several days may be used if certain rules are followed. The plan is to observe the humming twice or three times daily, preferably at 11 A.M. and 5 P.M., and the best results for local forecasts are obtained when the phenomena are interpreted in the light of the official forecasts for a large district. The humming is, of course, influenced by the strength of the wind, the tension of the wire, and various causes, which in turn are affected by temperature and other atmospheric conditions. It is said that the best forecasts have been obtained on the humming on wires proved quite successful, and the interest of meteorologists has been aroused in their Beck's method of observation.

Overland Wireless Telegraphy

A development in wireless telegraphy has been the successful transmission of messages on a practical scale between St. Louis and Chicago, a distance of some 500 miles, and it is hoped that wireless communication can be established between New York and St. Louis, a distance four times as great. The transmission of wireless messages on land involves difficulties not encountered at sea, and constantly the range is much more restricted. Between the St. Louis and Chicago stations both either interval, but the country was free from hills and mountains, being practically level. Experiments have been made in sending messages between the Mediterranean and England, where several hundred miles of land intervene, but these were transmitted only in a single direction, and communication has been maintained between Jersey City and Philadelphia, a distance of about one hundred miles. In the St. Louis-Chicago experiments quite an elaborate equipment was required, including more than two hundred feet in height, carrying twenty vertical conductors. It is the ambition of one company to colonize the relation between Seattle and the Philippine Islands, and predictions have been made that this can be accomplished.

THE CAROLINAS, FLORIDA, AND THE GULF COAST.

Justly spent than among the places of North or South Carolina, the palms and flowers of Florida, and the sunny resorts of the Gulf Coast. The latter appeal alike to the warmer water side and the cooler air strength and health.

The Florida coast is the first in this Winter Paradise. In addition to its general through train service to points in the Sunny South, it offers to its visitors, beginning January 8, three solid railroads (Pulmon, Tampa and St. Petersburg, Tampa and St. Petersburg, and the Florida Special—) running to the Gulf Coast. The latter is a special charge, and making direct connections for all the leading resorts in the South.

Persons, conducted travel has become more and more popular with every year of its growth under the Pennsylvania Railroad System. The tour in Florida, run under this system every year, offer, perhaps, the most satisfactory way of seeing the Sunny Florida.

Special Pullman trains are utilized to and from Jacksonville, on which meals and berths are included in the cost of the ticket. The first section, consisting of two weeks or more, during which time tourists may travel as they desire. Tickets for the tour are sold at a single rate, but no special rates are allowed for those who desire to travel on their own Pullman recommendations and special return on this tour. New York, Philadelphia and St. Louis will be January 21, February 14 and 26. The round-trip rate, $50 from New York, $45 from Philadelphia, and proportionately from other points, brings these tours within the reach of every one.

For further information consult ticket agents, or address Geo. W. Beach, General Passenger Agent, Pennsylvania Railroad Company, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, Pa.

Financial

Letters of exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers in Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Financial Letters of Credit. Collections made. International Cheques. Certificates of Deposit.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 67 WALL STREET.

INTELLIGENT MEN

will find congenial and dignified employment in presenting the History of North America. Liberal commissions. Address: GEORGE BARRE & SONS, 1313 Walnut St., Philadelphia

Later Adventures of Wee Macgregor

By J. J. BELL

These "Later Adventures" of the small Scotchman which will form his new friends, as they will hold the old.—Outlook. These humorous sketches continue among the brightest things in modern fiction.—Baltimore Herald.

Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK CITY

PATENTS

Our Head Office at Patents, Trade-Marks, and Inventions, is located at No. 20, Nassau Street, New York City, and we have branches in all the principal cities of the United States.

SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN

MUNN & CO., 361 Broadway, N. Y.

BRANCH OFFICE: 612 F St., Washington, D. C.

PISO'S CURE FOR CONSUMPTION

OPIMUM and Elixir (Hahnemann's) 10 to 20 drops. See page 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

THE PACE THAT KILLS.

First Motorist. "What is the name of this big cemetery we are passing?"
Second Motorist. "That's not a cemetery, my dear boy; those are milestones."
—From "The Jailer"

I. W. Harper Rye.

"On Every Tongue."

For gentlemen who appreciate quality; for the weak who need to be strengthened; for the careful physician who requires purity; for everybody who knows a good thing.

Sold by leading dealers everywhere.
BERNHIM DISTILLING CO., Louisville, Ky.

The Rise and Progress of the Standard Oil Company

By GILBERT HOLLAND MONTAGUE

This is a scholarly and accurate study of the Standard Oil Company, from its beginning in 1866 till its control in 1878 of twenty-five per cent. of the entire oil business of the United States, and thence down to the present time. The story of this gigantic trust reads like a tale of magic, and is of profound interest even to the casual reader.

Cloth, $1.00 net (postage extra)

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE

ABBOTT'S ANGSTUR BITTERS

Under the bad name of a delightful stimulant for all colds, coughs and croup, it is a medicine of the highest quality. It is a powerful and safe remedy for all ailments of the stomach, liver, and kidneys, and is a most valuable aid in the treatment of all diseases of the digestive system. Important to see that it is Abbott's.

Between New York and Chicago in 23 1/2 Hours.
Via New York Central—Lake Shore Route, . .

"LAKE SHORE LIMITED."

DAINTY
DELICIOUS DIGESTIVE

LIQUEUR
Pères Chartreux

—GREEN AND YELLOW—

Formerly known as Chartreuse

At New York: Wm. M. & Co., 44 Broadway, New York, N. Y.
Sole Agents for United States.

Books on the Operas

By ANNA ALICE CHAPIN

The Story of the Rhinegold told for young people

It contains the four operas of Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring," The Rhinegold, The Valkyrie, Siegfried, and The Götterdämmerung, woven into the form of a story, and thus adapted to the comprehension of children, although in great demand by older readers who desire an intelligent, consecutive, and concise guide to the Nibelungen circle, told with charming simplicity.

Illustrated. Post 8vo, $1.25

Wonder Tales from Wagner

Contents:—The Flying Dutchman; Tannhäuser; Lohengrin; Tristan and Isolde; The Meistersinger of Nuremberg. Illustrated upon much the same basis as "The Story of the Rhinegold," and forms an invaluable companion volume to that book.

Illustrated. Post 8vo, $1.25

Wotan, Siegfried, and Brünhilde

In her unpretentious study of these three principal characters, Miss Chapin, thanks to her sound knowledge and sympathetic insight, appeals as strongly to advanced Wagnerian scholars as to intelligent laymen.

Illustrated. Post 8vo, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

for 1905

A WORD TO OUR READERS AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS

THE fifty-two numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY, at the end of the year, make the most interesting, complete, and informing library possible to place in your home. Every event of importance, every happening of interest in all parts of the world, every possible phase of home and human interest is chronicled from day to day in the pages of the WEEKLY by writers and artists who say the last word of authority on each subject. For this reason it is impossible to tell our readers and subscribers exactly what they will find in each of the fifty-two issues of the coming year; every day, every hour brings a new subject—the announcement and description of a new invention, a discovery in science, new phases of education, politics, finance, literature, art, religion, architecture, home-life, music, the theatre—the field is as wide as human interest, and the WEEKLY tells you of each of these things in each issue in a way to keep you in touch with the best thought of the world.

The plans for the coming year are, however, so far perfected that it is possible to outline some of the features for 1905.

EDITORIALS OF THE HIGHEST AUTHORITY

HARPER'S WEEKLY has become the foremost political journal of America. In every issue seven pages will be given to editorial comment on all the important topics of the day. This feature of the WEEKLY has come to be recognized as the most important editorial comment published anywhere. The subjects are selected from every phase of human activity, from comment on important international affairs to the intimate subjects of home interest. The comment stands not only for a brief exposition of all questions of personal interest to every intelligent reader, but for an expression of opinion upon these questions by the best authorities to be procured. In this department the WEEKLY stands pre-eminent. It has in its editorial staff one of the ablest writers of the day. It is a matter of record that no paper in any country is as widely quoted in the press of America and Europe as the editorial comment in HARPER'S WEEKLY. The political situation this year gives the editorial pages of the WEEKLY exceptional value and importance.

CARTOONS

The well-known aggressive policy of the WEEKLY toward corruption in politics and toward all tendencies toward unfairness, justice, and clean administration of law for the public welfare is known to every reader, and is one reason why the WEEKLY stands as the most influential journal of America. The historic cartoons of Mr. Thomas Nast, which figured for many years exclusively in the WEEKLY, were a large factor in giving the WEEKLY its present international reputation. During the coming year cartoons by the well-known artist Mr. W. A. Rogers will be a regular feature.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS IN EVERY ISSUE

The illustrated features of the WEEKLY have long been recognized as the most genuine presentation of current events in all parts of the world published in any journal. At least four full pages will be given in every issue to interesting photographs and drawings of the week's news. This feature of the WEEKLY will appear in every issue through the year. On account of the quality of paper used and the care shown in the selection and reproduction of the pictures, the WEEKLY is able to offer a more interesting pictorial record of current events than any other paper.

FEATURES IN EVERY NUMBER.

Together with these pictures the WEEKLY will present every week a number of special features.

There is no higher authority than Mr. W. D. Howells on all questions of current interest in art and letters. Mr. Howells writes only for Harper's, and gives regularly in the WEEKLY intimate personal talks on interesting questions of the day.

Another page will be given each week to a letter from London, written by Mr. Sydney Brooks. Mr. Brooks makes his home abroad, and is in closer touch, perhaps, than any other journalist with the men and women of high social, business, and political standing both in England and on the Continent. His relations with the statesmen and with the men who are directing the policy of England and of Government and affairs on the Continent make his letters of the utmost moment. They tell the intimate story and motives of the men who today are making world history. These articles will appear in every issue of the WEEKLY.

To keep our readers and new subscribers in touch with the book world, Mr. James MacArthur, former editor of the Bookman, will write an interesting story each week of the new books published, stories of authors, and in general will keep before our readers the week's literary news. Mr. MacArthur's literary news will appear regularly in the WEEKLY.

In addition, two pages of pictures will be given each week to the theatre and to the important plays here and abroad. Photographs and drawings of scenes from these plays will be published in each number, together with interesting photographs and paintings of the actors and actresses who are before the public.

There will be at least one page of humorous drawings in each issue by such well-known artists as Peter Newell, Albert Leaning, Henry Mayer, E. W. Kemble, R. C. Carter, and others of equal distinction in their special lines of work.

There will be, also, in each issue a page of correspondence from our readers, in which an opportunity will be given to everyone interested to express his ideas upon any subjects of moment and to take a personal part in the success of the paper.

FIFTY-TWO SHORT STORIES

In every issue of the WEEKLY there will be at least one short story, written by a well-known writer. In addition, an important series, which will run through several issues and which will be one of the most interesting contributions of the year to fiction, is now being arranged for.

SPECIAL ARTICLES

In addition to these features, every number of the WEEKLY will contain special articles on all topics of interest, science, invention, art, finance, travel, adventure, discovery, etc., written by authors who can give the last word of authority to each subject. Such men as Professor Simon Newcomb, in science; President Charles F. Thwing, President of Western Reserve University, in education; Professor Jacobus of Columbia, in astronomy; Edwin Leafe, in finance; Booth Tarkington, in letters; Robert W. Chambers, and Frank Sherman Pever, in hunting and outdoor sports; E. S. Martin, Thomas Hardy, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, etc., in fiction and poetry; T. C. Martin, editor of the Electrical World and Engineer, and Dr. Louis Bell, on developments in science and electricity, etc., etc.—these will be some of the regular contributors to HARPER'S WEEKLY. All branches of human interest will be covered in an authoritative manner.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS

At the present time the WEEKLY has representatives in all parts of the world, who are reporting at first hand the important happenings of world history. They will contribute articles on travel, adventure, and on the important events in all parts of the world.

POLITICS

HARPER'S WEEKLY, as the foremost political authority of America, is in a position to offer, from the sources of information at its command not only the most intelligent expression of editorial opinion, but the most intimate record anywhere of American politics—the conclusive record of authority which comes from personal touch with the prominent leaders of both national parties. The well-known editorial policy of fairness, objectivity, independence, and justice will dominate the discussion and presentation of political subjects during the coming year.

The Subscription Price of Harper's Weekly is $4.00 a Year
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

H. de Cabañas y Carbajal

“CABAÑAS”

cigars are known to almost all who have any knowledge of fine cigars, as the one Havana brand that unvaryingly holds its exceedingly high standard of excellence and mildness. The highest percentage of fine and mild tobacco from San Juan and San Luis sections of the Vuelta Abajo district that is grown in Cuba, goes to the world's most discriminating smokers in the CABAÑAS brand. The characteristic traits of the CABAÑAS brand are its aroma and mildness, what the Spaniard calls “suave.” It has made its reputation on these qualities more than on any others, so difficult is it to find a mild Havana cigar that has character; that is not neutral, yet not so pronounced that it is unacceptable:—that is really mild and yet has individuality. It has taken more than one hundred years to bring the CABAÑAS brand to its present perfection, and the fact that it is to-day the most aggressively imitated brand in Havana is the strongest evidence of its established, continued and present excellence.

Dealers who are not interested in substituting brands made to imitate the CABAÑAS brand will confirm these statements and recommend the CABAÑAS brand to you for these qualities.

All known sizes are made in the CABAÑAS brand.

H. de CABAÑAS Y CARBAJAL, Manufacturers,

LEOPOLDO CARBAJAL, Marquis of Pinar Del Rio, President.

Zulueta 10, Havana, Cuba.

20
19 18
17
16
15
14 13 12
11 10 9
8
7
6 5
4
3
2
1

—

